
“He started against the Americans, but he moved on to killing Sunnis,” said Sattar Awad, a 29-year-old resident of the district. “People here look at him as a brave man.”

American forces are hunting for Mr. Dera, the intelligence officer said, but he has eluded capture.

DOJ_NMG_0070624

Although the splintering has solved some problems for the American military, it has raised new ones. “In some ways it makes it easier for me because I now have digestible doses I can deal with,” said a senior American military official at a briefing on Wednesday, also in Baghdad. “At the same time it creates problems because they are harder to find when they are splintered.”

The splintering has changed the tone of the American military’s interaction with the Mahdi Army in Sadr City. In past years, American forays into the area would often draw a storm of grenade attacks. But recent American moves into the area have been carried out relatively peacefully: Mr. Sadr has not ordered attacks because the men being sought were freelancers like Abu Dera, the intelligence officer said.

The fighters’ defections have raised the troubling prospect of more avenues of influence for Iran, the senior intelligence official said. The official cited shipments of weapons with labels that trace back to Iranian weapons manufacturers as evidence that Iran was actively aiding groups in Iraq. And that assistance has not just been limited to Mahdi Army offshoots. “They’re not sure who will come out on top, so they fund everybody,” the official said of Iran.

Even Mr. Sadr, who fashions himself as the quintessential Iraqi nationalist, has reached out to Iran’s government, making a very public trip to Iran for talks early this year. He is also trying to reassert control over his power base at home, and to expand his influence, the intelligence official said. “What Sadr is looking for is discipline,” the official said.

He said Mr. Sadr had begun to increase his exposure in the northern city of Kirkuk and in Diyala Province, both mixed-population areas north of Baghdad where sectarian disputes have been on the rise. There, he is trying to appeal by casting himself as a defender of Shiites against Kurdish and Sunni Arab factions.

Heralded Iraq Police Academy A 'Disaster' (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 27 -- A $75 million project to build the largest police academy in Iraq has been so grossly mismanaged that the campus now poses health risks to recruits and might need to be partially demolished, U.S. investigators have found.

The Baghdad Police College, hailed as crucial to U.S. efforts to prepare Iraqis to take control of the country's security, was so poorly constructed that feces and urine rained from the ceilings in student barracks. Floors heaved inches off the ground and cracked apart. Water dripped so profusely in one room that it was dubbed "the rain forest."

"This is the most essential civil security project in the country -- and it's a failure," said Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, an independent office created by Congress. "The Baghdad police academy is a disaster."

Bowen's office plans to release a 21-page report Thursday detailing the most alarming problems with the facility.

Even in a $21 billion reconstruction effort that has been marred by cases of corruption and fraud, failures in training and housing Iraq's security forces are particularly significant because of their effect on what the U.S. military has called its primary mission here: to prepare Iraqi police and soldiers so that Americans can depart.

Federal investigators said the inspector general's findings raise serious questions about whether the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has failed to exercise effective oversight over the Baghdad Police College or reconstruction programs across Iraq, despite charging taxpayers management fees of at least 4.5 percent of total project costs. The Corps of Engineers said Wednesday that it has initiated a wide-ranging investigation of the police academy project.

The report serves as the latest indictment of Parsons Corp., the U.S. construction giant that was awarded about $1 billion for a variety of reconstruction projects across Iraq. After chronicling previous Parsons failures to properly build health clinics, prisons and hospitals, Bowen said he now plans to conduct an audit of every Parsons project.

"The truth needs to be told about what we didn't get for our dollar from Parsons," Bowen said.

A spokeswoman for Parsons said the company had not seen the inspector general's report.

The Coalition Provisional Authority hired Parsons in 2004 to transform the Baghdad Police College, a ramshackle collection of 1930s buildings, into a modern facility whose training capacity would expand from 1,500 recruits to at least 4,000. The contract called for the firm to remake the campus by building, among other things, eight three-story student barracks, classroom buildings and a central laundry facility.

As top U.S. military commanders declared 2006 "the year of the police," in an acknowledgment of their critical role in allowing for any withdrawal of American troops, officials highlighted the Baghdad Police College as one of their success stories.

"This facility has definitely been a top priority," Lt. Col. Joel Holtrop of the Corps of Engineers' Gulf Region Division Project and Contracting Office said in a July news release. "It's a very exciting time as the cadets move into the new structures."

Complaints about the new facilities, however, began pouring in two weeks after the recruits arrived at the end of May, a Corps of Engineers official said.

DOJ_NMG_0070625

The most serious problem was substandard plumbing that caused waste from toilets on the second and third floors to cascade throughout the building. A light fixture in one room stopped working because it was filled with urine and fecal matter. The waste threatened the integrity of load-bearing slabs, federal investigators concluded.

"When we walked down the halls, the Iraqis came running up and said, 'Please help us. Please do something about this,' " Bowen recalled.

Phillip A. Galeoto, director of the Baghdad Police College, wrote an Aug. 16 memo that catalogued at least 20 problems: shower and bathroom fixtures that leaked from the first day of occupancy, concrete and tile floors that heaved more than two inches off the ground, water rushing down hallways and stairwells because of improper slopes or drains in bathrooms, classroom buildings with foundation problems that caused structures to sink.

Galeoto noted that one entire building and five floors in others had to be shuttered for repairs, limiting the capacity of the college by up to 800 recruits. His memo, too, pointed out that the urine and feces flowed throughout the building and, sometimes, onto occupants of the barracks.

"This is not a complete list," he wrote, but rather a snapshot of "issues we are confronted with on a daily basis (as recent as the last hour) by the incomplete and/or poor work left behind by these builders."

The Parsons contract, which eventually totaled at least $75 million, was terminated May 31 "due to cost overruns, schedule slippage, and sub-standard quality," according to a Sept. 4 internal military memo. But rather than fire the Pasadena, Calif.-based company for cause, the contract was halted for "the government's convenience."

Col. Michael Herman -- deputy commander of the Gulf Region Division of the Corps of Engineers, which was supposed to oversee the project -- said the Iraqi subcontractors hired by Parsons were being forced to fix the building problems as part of their warranty work, at no cost to taxpayers. He said four of the eight barracks have been repaired.

The U.S. military initially agreed to take a Washington Post reporter on a tour of the facility Wednesday to examine the construction issues, but the trip was postponed Tuesday night. Federal investigators who visited the academy last week, though, expressed concerns about the structural integrity of the buildings and worries that fecal residue could cause a typhoid outbreak or other health crisis.

"They may have to demolish everything they built," said Robert DeShurley, a senior engineer with the inspector general's office. "The buildings are falling down as they sit."

Herman said that he doubted that was the case but that he plans to hire an architecture and engineering firm to examine the facility. He also plans to investigate concerns raised by the inspector general's office that the Army Corps of Engineers did not properly respond to construction problems highlighted in quality-control reports.

Inside the inspector general's office in Baghdad on a recent blistering afternoon, several federal investigators expressed amazement that such construction blunders could be concentrated in one project. Even in Iraq, they said, failure on this magnitude is unusual. When asked how the problems at the police college compared with other projects they had inspected, the answers came swiftly.

"This is significant," said Jon E. Novak, a senior adviser in the office.

"It's catastrophic," DeShurley added.

Bowen said: "It's the worst."

Two Wars, One Mission (LAT)

By Rich Lowry, David B. Rivkin Jr.

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

TO CRITICS of the Bush administration, the war in Afghanistan is the "good" counterinsurgency. Their calls for troop reductions or a timetable to end the "bad war" in Iraq are matched by demands for more resources and perseverance in Afghanistan. However, this preference is senseless, driven either by sentimentality or partisanship. There is no sound strategic reason to favor the Afghan war over the war in Iraq. In fact, the fates of Baghdad and Kabul are intertwined.

The two wars began differently, of course. The Afghan war has always been much less controversial. No one has ever denied that the Taliban's harboring of Al Qaeda was a legitimate casus belli. The Iraq war had much more opposition from the beginning, and one of its chief rationales — that Saddam Hussein was harboring stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction — seemed to collapse after the U.S. invasion. But if you put aside how the wars began — and we realize that many opponents of the Iraq war will never be able to do that — there is little to differentiate them.

In Iraq, we face a vicious insurgency that will take years to defeat; the same is true in Afghanistan. In Iraq, the insurgency is made more difficult by the overlay of sectarian violence (Sunni versus Shiite); the same is true in Afghanistan (Pashtun versus everyone else). In Iraq, the insurgents are aided by infiltration from neighboring countries (Syria, Iran); the same is true in Afghanistan (Pakistan). In both countries we are trying to rebuild the army and the police — with fitful progress — and fostering a fragile central government whose writ doesn't seem to extend very far across the country.

DOJ_NMG_0070626

Of course, at least today, the difficulties in the two countries are not of equal severity. In Iraq, the violence is worse, American casualties are much higher and the capital city — the center of gravity of the country — is besieged by insurgents and murderous sectarians. Compared to that, Afghanistan is doing quite well. But it has deep problems of its own, namely the risk that it will become a lawless narco-state.

Pessimists about Iraq say the country is in the midst of a civil war. By most definitions, it certainly is, but this needn't be a cause for utter despair. Indeed, in Afghanistan, the U.S. success in driving out the Taliban regime was greatly aided by the fact that the country was in the midst of a civil war and that we allied ourselves with one side. Likewise, there is no reason that the U.S. cannot successfully navigate the shoals of communal violence in Iraq, which pits not just the Shiites against the Sunnis but features major — and exploitable — splits within the Shiite leadership.

The most important similarity between the Iraq and Afghan wars is that in both we are fighting Al Qaeda. Leaving aside the issue of how and when Al Qaeda came to be in Iraq, it is there now, and it considers Iraq a central battlefield. What we are fighting to prevent in Iraq — a country, or a chunk of it, established as a terrorist base — is exactly what we fought to destroy in Afghanistan immediately after 9/11 and are fighting to prevent from reemerging there now.

Insurgents in both countries share the jihadi battle against the U.S., and tactics such as the use of improvised explosive devices and suicide car-bombings have migrated from Iraq to Afghanistan. The killing this week in Basra of Omar Faruq, a senior Al Qaeda leader of Iraqi decent who escaped last year from a U.S. detention facility in Afghanistan, further underscores the connection between the two insurgencies.

At the strategic level, the more Iraqi insurgents seem to be succeeding, the more emboldened insurgents in Afghanistan become. As the just-declassified portions of the National Intelligence Estimate put it, "perceived jihadist success [in Iraq] would inspire more fighters to continue the struggle elsewhere." Their belief that the U.S. is a "weak horse" lacking the will for a long fight would be validated.

The costs of the Iraq war are higher to the U.S. in terms of blood and treasure. But the stakes are higher as well. If the terrorists capture Iraq, they will win a country much more strategically located than Afghanistan, and they will control the world's fourth-biggest oil reserves.

There is no doubt, as the intelligence estimate noted, that the Iraq war is a recruiting tool for terrorists. But Iraq war opponents should not fool themselves; so are Afghanistan and dozens of other Muslim grievances, from our support for Israel to Russia's campaign in Chechnya to the publication of cartoons of Muhammad in Danish newspapers. In the view of jihadis, both the Iraq and Afghan wars are Western assaults on Islam. The recently arrested suspects in the London airplane bombing plot cited both wars as stoking their rage.

There is no good reason to favor the Afghan war over the Iraq war. The Afghan war was launched in a brief period of national unity, while the Iraq war helped stoke our current period of political enmity. But one war will not be won without the other.

DOJ:

Eid's Ethnicity An Asset, Not An Issue (DENP)

By Bruce Finley, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, September 28, 2006

U.S. attorney, son of Egyptian immigrant, says his post reinforces America's freedoms. Bush appointee says he'll fight illegal immigration, drug trafficking and those who prey on children.

At dinner atop a Denver office tower recently, a visiting Jordanian military chief who'd just been introduced to the new U.S. attorney, Troy Eid, an Arab-American, approached Eid incredulously.

"'How can that be?'" Eid recalled the Jordanian asking. A man of Arab descent couldn't possibly be picked to represent U.S. government interests, the Jordanian said. "'It must be a token post ... Are you wealthy?'"

Appointed by President Bush, Eid responded with pride. "I said: 'I'm not wealthy. I went to Wheat Ridge High School. That's the great thing about this country.'

"If my background can show a few people what's possible in this country, that's great."

Tommorrow Eid marks the formal start of his service after an ambitious first six weeks on the job as the government's top law enforcement officer for Colorado. The only son of an Egyptian immigrant, Eid, 42, appears to be the the only Arab-American among the 94 U.S. attorneys.

DOJ_NMG_0070627

And with enforcement of immigration law his top priority, Eid said he'll draw on this background and a longstanding "interest in the underdog" to ensure fairness.

"Being fair is very important, telling people what your policy is going to be," he said. "You get into problems when you're selective."

The criminals he vows to prosecute most aggressively - deportees who illegally re-enter the United States - often prey on immigrant communities, he said.

And criminals from abroad often drive illegal drug trafficking, his second major priority. Colorado has emerged as one of the busiest drug distribution centers in the country with transnational gangs taking root.

Taken together, immigration and drug-related crime now dominate federal criminal prosecution in Colorado.

Other priorities for Eid: sexual exploitation of children using the Internet, and terrorism cases - the overall top priority of the Justice Department under Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

"We get terrorism cases. We take them very seriously. They typically come to us through the JTTF (the FBI-run Joint Terrorism Task Force). ... We have some investigations that have resulted in charges and convictions."

A symbolic investiture ceremony scheduled for this afternoon marks the formal beginning for Eid, who on Aug. 11 replaced acting U.S. Attorney William Leone. He had served since December 2004, when John Suthers resigned to become Colorado attorney general, after Ken Salazar left that position for the U.S. Senate.

Eid previously worked as legal counsel to Gov. Bill Owens and as a lawyer specializing in environmental and Indian affairs cases. He grew up in Wheat Ridge and graduated from Stanford University the University of Chicago law school. His wife, Allison Eid, because a Colorado Supreme Court justice in February. They have two children.

Eid's father, the late Edward Eid, fled from Egypt in 1957 after military dictator Gamal Nasser took power and started fresh in America. He worked at a steel factory and as an accountant at a candle factory - and dealt with discrimination along the way.

"My dad was typical of immigrants off the boat. ... He would have been offended if anyone focused on his roots. He came from a time when you put your head down and assimilated as quickly as possible," Eid said in an interview Wednesday.

"I thought of myself as an American whose father was from Egypt."

Diversifying the government's legal workforce - only 18 of 94 U.S. attorneys are women - has loomed as a goal.

"I venture Eid is among the first Arab-Americans to hold such as office," said Nidal Ibrahim, executive director of the Arab-American Institute.

"During an especially critical and sensitive time in our country's history, having an Arab-American serving as U.S. attorney for Colorado represents an important milestone."

Staff writer Bruce Finley can be reached at 303-954-1700 or bfinley@denverpost.com

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Dunn Suggests She Was Unaware Of Probe Tactics (WSJ)

By PETER WALDMAN, DON CLARK And STEVE STECKLOW

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

Former Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairman Patricia Dunn said she relied on advice from H-P executives, including the company's chief financial officer, before pushing a leak investigation that delved into personal phone records and used tawdry tactics.

Ms. Dunn, in testimony prepared for a House committee hearing today on the H-P investigation scandal, said she was informed that using Ronald DeLia, a Boston-area private investigator involved in the affair, constituted "normal processes" in pursuing investigations at the Palo Alto, Calif., computer company, having been told he had worked for H-P for "eight or nine years."

The testimony of Ms. Dunn, who resigned last week in connection with the leak investigation, could shed light on the question of how much Mark Hurd, H-P's chief executive, knew about the affair. Her remarks also raise new questions about how H-P may have conducted any investigations that predated the leak probes, which took place in 2005 and early 2006.

The H-P investigation involved obtaining phone records through false pretenses -- a practice known as pretexting -- of at least 20 people, including board members, H-P employees and reporters.

Ms. Dunn, who pushed for the investigation following board leaks in early 2005, said she learned by late that spring that private phone records were being accessed. But she got the "clear impression" from Mr. DeLia that such phone records "could be obtained from publicly available sources in a legal and appropriate manner." She said she discussed the investigation with Mr. Hurd and other directors, though she didn't spell out whether they were told that private phone records were obtained.

Ms. Dunn's remarks confirm the impression from H-P emails that Mr. Hurd was eager to catch leakers and was briefed multiple times of the progress of H-P's investigations. The chairman of the House subcommittee investigating the H-P scandal yesterday said he believes Mr. Hurd knew of the company's efforts to obtain personal information about some of its own board members and others as part of the investigations.

TRACKING THE SCANDAL

See a graphical timeline1 and key documents in the H-P scandal. Plus, read profiles2 of former H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn, CEO Mark Hurd and other key players in the leak-probe controversy. · Hurd's Testimony3 | Dunn's Testimony4

· Complete coverage5

Rep. Ed Whitfield, the Kentucky Republican who chairs the House Energy and Commerce Committee's subcommittee on investigations, said he intends to grill Mr. Hurd on the matter, and whether the H-P CEO also knew such tactics were potentially illegal. "We're going to ask him a lot of questions and get the facts out," Mr. Whitfield said in an interview.

In his testimony prepared for the hearing, Mr. Hurd said "although the board was informed that an investigation had started, they were not told the operational details."

Echoing remarks he made at a news conference Friday, Mr. Hurd apologized for what he characterized as a "rogue operation." He castigates investigators for being "so focused on finding the source of the leaks that they lost sight of the values of this company." (See Heard on the Street6.)

Ms. Dunn, in her statement, said she turned to Robert Wayman, H-P's longtime chief financial officer, after she decided to pursue the matter of board leaks. She said he referred her to Kevin Huska, a staff member responsible for security, who referred her to Mr. DeLia. Mr. Huska couldn't be reached to comment.

"It was my assumption that Mr. Wayman, having ultimate authority over all the resources involved in security and investigations, as well as having been one of the directors who felt the most strongly about the importance of controlling leaks from the board, had provided authorization for whatever work was undertaken," she said.

Michael Moeller, an H-P spokesman, said "any assumption about Bob Wayman's involvement made by Ms. Dunn was nothing more than that, an assumption." He declined comment about any H-P investigations before the leak probe.

Ms. Dunn said Mr. Hurd was involved in two or three meetings on the leak probe this year, when H-P's investigators employed its most aggressive tactics that have come to light.

In early 2006, she said Mr. Hurd was included in "perhaps two or three meetings," to review "key milestones and provide his own input on the priority and motivations behind the investigation."

Ms. Dunn adds that "neither Mr. Hurd nor I designed or implemented the investigative techniques." She said she knew that some of the probe targets were followed, but said she had no problem with such "old-fashioned detective work."

She and Mr. Hurd have said they were aware of a gambit that involved sending a bogus email to a reporter as part of the probe. Ms. Dunn said she made special efforts to ascertain the tactic's legality, before referring it to Mr. Hurd for "the final decision."

Mr. Hurd said he approved the content of the message, but doesn't recall whether he knew the misinformation plot involved the use of tracer software that could show where the email was forwarded.

Mr. DeLia has been issued a subpoena by the House committee to appear at the hearing. He and his attorney haven't responded to requests for comment.

The House committee has requested testimony from Ms. Dunn, Mr. Hurd and several other H-P officials involved in the probe, as well as the company's outside counsel, Larry Sonsini. The House also issued subpoenas to five additional witnesses who may have been involved in surreptitiously obtaining telephone numbers, a person close to the investigation said yesterday. The five witnesses are believed to be subcontractors to Action Research Group, a Florida contractor believed to have been involved in accessing telephone records.

One of the persons suspected of obtaining phone records, Bryan Wagner, of Littleton, Colo., said in an interview yesterday that he didn't know if he obtained any phone records in connection with the H-P leak probe because his employer-Action Research Group-never identified its clients.

"They do not provide me any details on anything," he said. "I pretty much always assume that I am looking for people who have taken cars and aren't paying." He added that he believed most of the clients are "bounty hunters and bondsmen."

Mr. Wagner said he hadn't yet decided if he will answer questions before the House committee, but will appear. He also declined to comment about an article in The Wall Street Journal yesterday that he had told an investigator in Denver last week that he had destroyed his computer with a hammer and discarded it after learning that he might get caught up in the investigation of the H-P leak case.

"I just don't have my computer anymore," he said, declining to answer any questions about it.

Ex-H.P. Officer To Say She Knew Of No Illegality (NYT)

By Miguel Helft And Damon Darlin

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — In her most detailed account of the leak investigation that forced her to resign, Hewlett-Packard's former chairwoman maintains that while she was in regular contact with those conducting the operation, she was not its supervisor.

In prepared remarks that she is expected to deliver Thursday at a Congressional hearing, Patricia C. Dunn, the former chairwoman who resigned from the board last week, also said she never had reason to believe that illegal methods were used. And she said she repeatedly sought assurances on that point from those directly involved.

But even as she got those assurances, a senior investigator for the company was warning early this year, as the operation entered a crucial phase, that its techniques of using subterfuge to gain private phone records were "very unethical at the least and quite likely illegal."

Saying that the practices, even if legal, "could damage our reputation or worse," the investigator, Vince Nye, said in an e-mail message, "I think we need to refocus our strategy and proceed on the high-ground course." Mr. Nye worked in the company's global security unit.

Why that advice was not followed — and apparently did not reach the top levels of Hewlett-Packard's leadership — is expected to be a central theme of Thursday's hearing.

The roles of Ms. Dunn and the company's chief executive, Mark V. Hurd, in the investigation — the extent of their knowledge, their action or inaction, and the questions they raised or failed to — are expected to dominate the questioning. Several company officials and others engaged in the effort are to testify.

The investigation, aimed at tracing press leaks from the company's board in 2005 and early 2006, included the hiring of private detectives who used ruses to gain the phone records of directors, employees, journalists and others — a practice called pretexting.

The operation came into public view scarcely three weeks ago as a result of boardroom divisions that have already led to three resignations, including Ms. Dunn's. It is also the subject of federal and state criminal investigations.

Mr. Nye's e-mail message, obtained by The New York Times from someone with access to documents given to the committee, is the strongest indication yet of internal questions about the operation's legality.

It came on Feb. 7, shortly after a new leak from the board had revived the investigation and while more elaborate forms of surveillance, beyond obtaining phone records, were being considered or carried out.

The message was addressed to Anthony R. Gentilucci, the head of the company's Boston-based global investigations unit, a key figure in the operation from its start a year earlier. It is not clear whether or how Mr. Gentilucci responded.

In her prepared testimony, Ms. Dunn said that once the board agreed to an investigation of leaks in early 2005, she relied on top Hewlett-Packard officials who referred her to the company's global security department, which in turn referred her to Ronald R. DeLia, a contractor in the Boston area who had performed investigations for Hewlett-Packard for nearly a decade.

"I did not 'hire' the private investigators" involved in the operation, Ms. Dunn said. "They were already under contract to H.P. when the leak investigation was initiated."

Ms. Dunn called Mr. DeLia's firm a "captive subsidiary" of Hewlett-Packard and noted that it was used to perform a background check on Mr. Hurd before he was hired, including a report on his health.

Ms. Dunn said that after she learned in the spring of 2005 that the phone records of directors were being gathered, "the clear impression I had from Mr. DeLia was that such records could be obtained from publicly available sources in a legal and appropriate manner."

She also said that "given that attorneys were unambiguously overseeing" a later, more intense phase of the investigation that employed similar techniques, she had no reason to believe those techniques were inappropriate.

It was not until after the second phase concluded in May 2006 that she began to comprehend the word "pretext," Ms. Dunn said, adding, "I still do not understand whether it is or is not legal, as opinions vary."

Ms. Dunn also lashed out at Thomas J. Perkins, a former board member whom she accused of disseminating "false statements about my having organized and conducted an elaborate spying campaign on H.P. directors for no good reason except, to paraphrase, a delusion of paranoia."

Mr. Perkins resigned from the board in May over the leak investigation, whose findings pointed to a friend and fellow director, George A. Keyworth II, as the source. It was Mr. Perkins's subsequent inquiries into the investigation's methods that led to their disclosure this month.

Ms. Dunn's statement defends the goal of the investigation, and it includes no expression of regret or apology for its handling.

In his own prepared testimony, Mr. Hurd portrays Ms. Dunn as having taken a more engaged role in the operation, saying she "enlisted the professional services" of Mr. DeLia.

Mr. Hurd's statement largely reiterates the account he offered in announcing Ms. Dunn's resignation last Friday. He says he was present at two meetings to discuss the operation while it was under way, and was consulted at another point about the use of a bogus e-mail message to try to detect a reporter's source.

"While many of the right processes were in place, they unfortunately broke down, and no one in the management chain, including me, caught it," he said.

Just how those processes broke down is likely to be a topic of pointed questioning by members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

Among the documents sent to the committee is an 18-page report from Kevin T. Hunsaker, senior counsel and director of ethics at the company, after the investigation's conclusion in May that summarizes the findings and makes clear that private phone records were obtained — adding in a footnote that the effort involved "a lawful investigative methodology commonly utilized." It was sent to Mr. Hurd, the company's board, and Ann O. Baskins, the general counsel.

"These folks still in the company need to come clean," said Greg Walden, the Oregon Republican who is vice chairman of the panel's investigations and oversight subcommittee, which is convening the hearing.

Five additional witnesses, all said to have been engaged in obtaining phone records, were subpoenaed Wednesday to appear at the hearing.

The five are Bryan Wagner of Littleton, Colo.; Darren Brost of Austin, Tex.; Charles Kelly of CAS Agency in Villa Rica, Ga.; Cassandra Selvage of Eye in the Sky Investigations in Dade City, Fla.; and Valerie Preston of InSearchOf Inc., in Cooper City, Fla. Congressional staff members said they did not know if any would answer questions.

The five are believed to be at the end of a long investigative chain that stretched from Hewlett-Packard's headquarters in Palo Alto, Calif., to its own investigators in Boston, through Mr. DeLia's firm, Security Outsourcing Solutions, and on to Action Research Group, a data broker in Melbourne, Fla., that is said to have hired the actual pretexters.

The hearing is scheduled to begin at 10 a.m. and stretch into the evening. It is expected to be covered live by C-Span 3, a government affairs cable network.

The hearing will begin with a panel of witnesses who are expected to invoke their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

Lawyers for two of those subpoenaed — Mr. Gentilucci, the manager of global investigations, and Mr. Hunsaker, the senior counsel — said their clients had not decided whether to answer questions.

Mr. DeLia, the author of several reports on the investigation given to company officials, has also been subpoenaed, but it is not clear how he will respond. His lawyer could not be reached for comment.

A second panel will include company officials who were involved in the investigation, including Ms. Dunn; Ms. Baskins, the general counsel; and Fred Adler, a security investigator, as well as Larry W. Sonsini, the company's outside counsel. That panel will also include Joseph DePante, the owner of Action Research Group, the Florida investigative firm.

A third session will include only Mr. Hurd, at his request, in part because he wanted his role to seen as separate from other H.P. officials.

Sitting separately, however, carries its own risks. He will face more questions than if he shared the panel with others, since each committee member gets 10 minutes to ask questions at each panel.

Ousted HP Chairwoman Says She Consulted Others In Leak Probe, Was Certain Methods Were Legal (FINDLAW/AP)

By Marcy Gordon, Ap Business Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Hewlett-Packard Co.'s ousted chairwoman said it was her duty to stem boardroom leaks of sensitive information and that her decision to initiate an investigation was made in concert with others at HP, according to prepared testimony released by a congressional committee.

Patricia Dunn said she believed that the methods used in the investigation were anything but legal, and that she discussed the conduct of the probe with the technology company's CEO and board members - getting a clear impression that the directors were satisfied with it.

"I never doubted ... that what they were doing was legal," Dunn said in written testimony prepared for her appearance Thursday at a hearing by the House Energy and Commerce Committee. It was released by the panel late Wednesday.

She was referring to the probe led by Ron DeLia, the operator of a private detective firm. The investigation involved private eyes impersonating HP board members, employees and journalists to obtain their phone records, spying on targeted people and their relatives, sifting through their garbage, and using an e-mail sting to dupe a reporter.

"I initiated the investigation, in response to directors who urged me to take more serious action in response to leaks," Dunn said in her lengthy and detailed recounting of events. "I turned to resources that HP normally used to do this type of work.

"I now believe that not only I, but all of the executives upon whom I relied at HP, whose integrity I have never questioned to this day, were similarly confident that these records were accessed under fully legal circumstances."

Five private investigators who allegedly served as the foot soldiers in the company's efforts to identify the source of leaks have been ordered to testify at Thursday's hearing.

The subpoenas, announced Wednesday, were the second batch issued by the Energy and Commerce Committee. The private eyes are believed to have masqueraded as journalists, HP directors and employees to obtain their phone records. Last weekend, two HP employees and the operator of a detective firm were ordered to appear.

The House committee will be exploring a scandal has roiled Silicon Valley's largest and oldest technology company, brought federal and state criminal probes, and claimed the company's chairwoman, two directors and two high-level employees. California's attorney general has said he has enough evidence to indict HP insiders and contractors.

Dunn, HP CEO Mark Hurd - who succeeded her as chairman on Friday - and General Counsel Ann Baskins also have agreed to appear at the hearing.

"I'm deeply concerned about corporations, in this case HP, using private detectives and information brokers to obtain illicit access to telephone records and other personal information," Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., a senior member of the House panel, said in a statement Wednesday. "We need to know how this happened, why HP and others thought this was legal, and how widespread (is) this practice of spying on employees, directors or the corporate competition."

The five private eyes summoned to appear are believed to have acted as "pretexters" who got phone records under false pretenses. They are Bryan Wagner of Littleton, Colorado; Charles Kelly of CAS Agency in Villa Rica, Georgia; Cassandra Selvage of Eye in the Sky Investigations, Dade City, Florida; Darren Brost of Austin, Texas, and Valerie Preston of InSearchOf Inc., Cooper City, Florida.

Wagner told an investigator that he had destroyed his computer with a hammer, The Wall Street Journal reported in Wednesday's editions, citing an anonymous person familiar with a probe of the HP case.

Documents have shown that investigators working for HP intruded into the personal lives of seven HP directors, two employees, nine reporters and family members of the targeted individuals. In addition to impersonating those targeted to procure phone records, they also spied on an HP director and his wife, sifted through their garbage, and concocted an e-mail sting to dupe reporter Dawn Kawamoto of CNet Networks Inc.'s technology news site.

On the Net:

Dunn testimony: http://energycommerce.house.gov/108/News/09282006-Testimony-Dunn.pdf

Hurd testimony: http://energycommerce.house.gov/108/News/09282006-Testimony-Hurd.pdf

CEO Faces Gantlet At Hearings (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, September 28, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — When Hewlett-Packard CEO Mark Hurd takes the stand before a congressional committee today, he will be fighting for his reputation — and possibly his job.

Hurd, 49, has acknowledged approving at least part of a plan to snoop on journalists, board members, even his own employees. Some of the tactics his team and their contractors used may have been illegal.

Now, Hurd and other key players have been asked to defend their actions before the House Energy and Commerce Committee. Wednesday, the Committee subpoenaed five more individuals, all private investigators. That brings the total requested witness list to seven detectives, six current or former HP employees and one outside lawyer.

But none will face as much scrutiny as Hurd, who as CEO, is ultimately responsible for what happened at HP.

HP board member Robert Ryan, a former Medtronic executive, says Hurd is a victim of the scandal, not the cause. The board had told Hurd to focus on fixing HP's operational problems instead of boardroom squabbles, Ryan says.

So Hurd wasn't paying much attention when a private investigative team began using subterfuge to obtain phone records of reporters and staffers, in hopes finding a leak, Ryan says. When the board delivered a report, Hurd and the board were so busy figuring out what to do about the leaker (board member George Keyworth) that nobody thought to ask how the investigation was conducted, Ryan says. The mistake shouldn't get Hurd fired, he says.

But it will be difficult for Hurd to emerge untarnished. He will face tough questions, including:

·Did Hurd know that private detectives were physically surveilling people at their home and work?

·Why did he OK a plan to send e-mails from a fictitious source to a journalist in order to trick her?

·Did he knowingly allow HP staffers to turn over employees' Social Security numbers to investigators?

·Is there more snooping that has not yet been uncovered?

Morgan Lewis, a law firm hired by HP to conduct an internal investigation, says it also has evidence of detectives snooping through someone's trash, though it doesn't know whose. Morgan Lewis says it hasn't found evidence of wiretapping phones or installing software to track computer keystrokes.

Congress is eager to know, says Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass. Internal documents that the company has released show a blasé attitude toward pilfering phone records, he says. That suggests, “It is very unlikely that HP is the only corporation that is aiding and abetting the illegal practice,” he says.

And Congress intends to stop that. “We clearly need to ban these kinds of practices,” says Rep. Diana DeGette, D-Colo. While the House committee can't prosecute HP, it can help spawn regulation that will prevent such scandals from happening again, she says. Several other government agencies are investigating and could impose penalties.

The results will affect all of Corporate America, but the stakes are huge for HP. Hurd, head of the company for 18 months, has won acclaim for turning around the troubled computer giant. Now, he must grapple with a messy, attention-getting scandal that exposes HP to legal liability. And he must do so just as his corporate overhaul enters a crucial and difficult period.

“His performance on Thursday will be a career-defining moment,” says business professor Eric Johnson at Dartmouth College.

Hurd has a good chance of surviving it, Johnson says: He has handled the crisis fairly well, so far. If he continues to do so, he should be able to hang on to his position — unless HP drops another bombshell. If that doesn't happen, “he'll weather the storm,” says equity analyst Charlie Wolf with Needham & Company.

A big part of Hurd's defense is plausible deniability. He wasn't at HP when the snooping program started in early 2005. His predecessor, Carly Fiorina, launched it as a way to find out which board members were leaking information to the press. In the shake-up that ousted Fiorina, board member Patricia Dunn became chairman and assumed responsibility for the program.

Hurd has repeatedly said that his focus at HP has been on day-to-day operational problems. During his tenure, he focused on retooling HP's 150,000-person bureaucracy. (Hurd's previous job was head of NCR, a company less than one-fifth HP's size.)

Hurd has publicly confessed to giving a general go-ahead to the snooping program, though he says he didn't know many of the details. He has also apologized, and hired former U.S. prosecutor Bart Schwartz to analyze the company's business practices.

The board is also looking for outside members to help improve corporate governance, Ryan says.

The public statements could have come out earlier, says tech analyst Crawford Del Prete at researcher IDC. But overall, Hurd is “taking this head-on,” he says.

If HP's stock price is any indication, HP's investors are not too worried. Shares have risen more than 61% since Hurd became CEO. They've slipped less than 3% this month despite non-stop coverage of the scandal in the business press.

Wall Street's main concern is that Hurd keeps his job, Needham's Wolf says. Hurd told BusinessWeek he has no reason to believe his job is in danger. (Hurd denied requests to be interviewed for this story.)

Other major players have not been so lucky. Dunn tried to hang on to her board seat, agreeing earlier this month only to resign as chairman. But as more reports were issued that linked her to Ron DeLia, a private investigator in the case, she resigned.

So did HP security manager Anthony Gentilucci, who handed at least one HP employee's Social Security number over to private investigators.

HP lawyer Kevin Hunsaker left the company Tuesday, though HP wouldn't say whether he quit or was fired. Hunsaker had led one stage of the snooping program, assuring others at the company that it was legal, HP's current lawyers say.

Gentilucci, Hunsaker and DeLia have all been subpoenaed to appear before the House committee. Dunn and Hurd have been asked to appear, as have two more HP employees: general counsel Ann Baskins and security investigator Fred Adler. The exact details of their roles are not yet publicly known. It's also unclear what role HP employees Vince Nye, Denis Lynch, Tim O'Neill or Jim Fairbaugh played. All were members of the investigation team, according to an HP document obtained by USA TODAY.

Private investigator Joe Depante has also been asked to appear before the committee. He owns Action Research Group, a subcontractor of DeLia's firm, Security Outsourcing Solutions (SOS).

Silicon Valley attorney Larry Sonsini is also scheduled to testify. Sonsini, HP's outside legal counsel, was part of the team that investigated HP's snooping methods after HP director Tom Perkins complained. At the time, Sonsini said he could not say that all techniques employed by HP and its subcontractors were legal.

It's less clear what role the five private investigators subpoenaed Wednesday played in the HP scandal. The Committee says each has used subterfuge to obtain phone records — a technique known as pretexting — and all have relevant information to HP.

But one, Cassandra Selvage of Dade City, Fla.-based Eye in the Sky Investigations, says she has not worked for HP, SOS or Action Research Group. She says her subpoena contained no details, and the Committee wouldn't provide any when she called and asked. "I will be there, but I don't know what for," she says. She would not say whether she used pretexting. The others, Bryan Wagner of Littleton, Colo., Charles Kelly of Villa Rica, Ga., Darren Brost of Austin and Valerie Preston of Cooper City, Fla., could not be reached for comment. HP had no comment on the new subpoenas.

In addition to the House committee, five other government agencies are looking into the snooping scandal. That's a distraction, but a corporate shake-up may ultimately benefit Hurd, Needham's Wolf says.

Hurd has made few big changes to HP's top ranks. Now, at the very least, he will have the opportunity to pick two board members to replace Dunn and Perkins, who resigned in protest of Keyworth's treatment.

But Hurd faces huge challenges in the coming months, IDC's Del Prete says.

Corporate turnarounds are relatively easy at first, he says. Cost-cutting measures often instantly boost profits. Hurd has slashed 15,000 jobs, and reported five straight quarters of rising net income.

Now, things get tougher. He must get the $87 billion company to grow despite tough competitors such as Dell, Sony and Kodak.

Additionally, Hurd now holds the dual role of CEO and chairman, putting him in charge of HP's famously contentious board.

He must boost morale inside the battered company. And he'll have to prove that he has the strategy to keep the computer giant — which rivals IBM in size — moving forward.

But if things go well Thursday, it will "at least put to bed the question of whether Mark Hurd can survive (the scandal)," Dartmouth's Johnson says.

HP Leader Hurd Expected To Apologize At Hearing (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler And Jon Swartz

USA Today, September 28, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Hewlett-Packard CEO Mark Hurd is expected to apologize before Congress for HP's snooping scandal today. Former chairman Patricia Dunn is expected to blame others for the mess.

According to prepared remarks released by the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Hurd will tell Congress that a hunt to find out which board member was leaking information to the press "became a rogue investigation that violated our own principles."

"The end came to justify the means," Hurd's prepared remarks say. "If Bill Hewlett and David Packard were still alive, they would be appalled."

The statement contains few new details about Hurd's role in the scandal, which unfolded after an HP contractor used subterfuge to obtain home phone records of journalists, board members and employees.

Dunn, in contrast, plans to name names. In her statement, she says she was put in charge of the leak investigation in early 2005. She turned to Bob Wayman, HP's longtime chief financial officer then also serving as interim CEO.

Wayman introduced Dunn to an HP security employee, Kevin Huska, who in turn introduced her to private detective Ron DeLia, the statement says. DeLia has been subpoenaed to appear before the committee. He is expected to invoke his right against self-incrimination, says Rep. Diana DeGette, D-Colo.

HP spokesman Ryan Donovan said Wayman was not involved in the leak investigation. "Any assumption about Bob Wayman's involvement made by Ms. Dunn was nothing more than that, an assumption," he said.

Dunn's statement also says that she was in regular contact with Hurd and Ann Baskins, HP's general counsel, about the leak hunt. She says she knew that private detectives were physically following HP board members. "I did not find it objectionable," she said.

Dunn says, though, that it wasn't until board member Thomas Perkins began questioning HP's investigative tactics this summer that she understood that the detectives were swiping phone records.

Dunn, a former executive at Barclays Global Investors, was forced out last week. Among letters of support to the House panel, she is endorsed by John Galvin, president of the Henry David Thoreau Foundation, and David Nygren, head of the corporate governance group at Mercer Delta Consulting. Both have had business dealings with Dunn.

House Panel Expands Probe Of Hewlett-Packard Spying (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, September 28, 2006

The House Energy and Commerce Committee issued five more subpoenas yesterday to detectives tied to the privacy invasion scandal at Hewlett-Packard, setting the stage for two days of hearings that could reveal new details of the tech company's now-infamous spying practices.

Hewlett-Packard (HP) stumbled into a political and legal minefield this month when its internal probe of boardroom leaks of confidential company information became public. HP admitted hiring private detectives to fraudulently obtain the phone records of board members and journalists through a tactic known as "pretexting," which has been in the crosshairs of Energy and Commerce's oversight subcommittee for almost a year.

"Clearly the HP case is a high-profile example of the scam" of pretexting, in which detectives impersonate individuals in order to access their personal data, Energy and Commerce spokesman Terry Lane said. "We want to find out how pretexting was used and find out any other type of investigative methods that were used by HP."

The witness list for today's hearing includes most central players in the widening HP scandal. HP chief executive officer Mark Hurd offered to appear last week to discuss the company's use of pretexting, and Patricia Dunn, who resigned as board chairman last Friday over her role in the affair, also will testify under oath.

In a statement late last week, Dunn was optimistic that today's hearing would be the first step to rebuilding HP's reputation. "I look forward to appearing before Congress next week to answer their questions and help the company put this unfortunate event behind it," she said.

The committee also has called HP's general counsel, global security manager, and Larry Sonsini, a top Silicon Valley lawyer who gave legal advice to the company. Two other witnesses are private contractors used by HP who could take the 5th Amendment rather than potentially incriminate themselves.

The five new subpoenaed witnesses, sources said, may have played subcontractor roles in HP's broad pretexting operation but may have done so without full knowledge of their ultimate employer.

Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton has pushed for months for floor action on his panel's pretexting bill, which would explicitly criminalize pretexting of phone records and empower the Federal Trade Commission and Federal Communications Commission to step up enforcement of penalties. But the bill was pulled from the House floor schedule in the spring as the National Security Agency's warrantless-wiretapping program first made headlines and its future is uncertain.

Despite the harsh light cast by the HP scandal on the commonality and low price of invasive pretexting, the packed House schedule could prevent any action this year, a House GOP source said. The nine appropriations bills yet to be considered look to push pretexting to the bottom of the House agenda though the situation coudl change.

Rep. Ed Markey (D-Mass.), who sent a strongly worded letter to Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) after the bill was initially pulled, nonetheless hopes today's hearing and a follow-up tomorrow will jumpstart debate on privacy protection issues.

"We need to know why this happened, why HP and others thought this was legal, and how widespread this practice of spying on employees, directors, or the corporate competition [is]," Markey said in a statement.

Representatives from the Federal Trade Commission and the Federal Communications Commission will testify tomorrow, and the FTC is expected to stress its escalating efforts to prosecute phone-records pretexters for unfair or deceptive practices. While the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act of 1999 made it a crime to pretext for financial records, phone records remain a murky area in the law.

The House has unanimously passed the Judiciary Committee's pretexting bill, increasing criminal penalties for detectives found using the tactic, but that measure has yet to see action in the Senate. Earlier this month, Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) and two fellow panel members wrote to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), urging action on their product.

"If an attorney of Mr. Sonsini's caliber (in our view mistakenly) believes that pretexting is not already a crime, then the time has come to clearly and unambiguously make that activity illegal," wrote Sensenbrenner and Reps. Lamar Smith (R-Texas) and Howard Berman (D-Calif.) on Sept. 8.

Consumer and grassroots groups largely prefer the House Energy and Commerce approach to the Senate Commerce Committee's pretexting bill. Still, that measure has yet to be merged with an overlapping Senate Judiciary Committee bill, leading to a crush of options that is likely to postpone Senate action until after the election, if at all this year.

Two central players in the HP saga have signed lawyers with significant Bush administration clout. Thomas Perkins, the board member whose May resignation ignited internal scrutiny of Dunn's handling of the leak probe, has retained former Justice Department counsel Viet Dinh, while Sonsini has retained Akin Gump's Michael Madigan, a onetime counsel for President Bush's 2000 campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0070635

Hewlett Packard's media relations department did not return requests for comment by press time.

Between The Lines Of HP's Spy Scandal (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Hewlett-Packard Co.'s media-leak investigation went forward despite warnings from HP security personnel that the tactics used were "probably illegal" and should be stopped, according to documents collected for today's congressional hearing on the scandal.

In February, HP global security investigator Vince Nye told a Boston colleague working with him on the leak probe that he had "serious reservations" about how they were obtaining phone-record information in an internal probe to ferret out the source of media leaks.

He said he thought the method, impersonating someone else to trick the phone company into providing call data, "is very unethical at the least and probably illegal."

"I am requesting that we cease this phone number gathering method immediately and discount any of its information," Nye wrote in a Feb. 7 e-mail to Anthony Gentilucci, one of four members of the internal investigative team reporting to HP's legal department. Nye sent a copy of the e-mail to Kevin Hunsaker, then HP's chief ethics director, who supervised the probe.

How and why top management failed to heed the warning are among the questions members of the House Energy and Commerce oversight and investigations subcommittee want answered at today's hearing. More than a dozen key figures, including chief executive Mark V. Hurd and former chairman Patricia C. Dunn are scheduled to appear to explain how their media-leak probe morphed into an elaborate spying operation that targeted board members and journalists.

The hearing was fueled by concerns about how private citizens' phone records were illegally accessed. On a deeper level, analysts and lawmakers said, the issue is one of corporate ethics and how HP's leaders could let an internal probe go so awry.

Dunn, in a statement submitted to the committee for today's testimony, strongly defended her handling of the leak investigation, which started in 2005. She distanced herself from its operational aspects, saying: "I did not at any point consider myself its 'supervisor.' "

Dunn professed not to know that illegal tactics were used. At some point in spring 2005, Dunn said she became aware from Ronald DeLia, a Boston contractor who had done investigative work for HP for eight or nine years, that phone records were being obtained as a "standard component" of internal investigations.

"The clear impression I had from Mr. DeLia was that such records could be obtained from publicly available sources in a legal and appropriate manner," she said.

Dunn, who left the company Friday, said both she and Hurd were aware of a planned e-mail sting operation on a reporter conducted in February in an attempt to flush out the reporter's source of company information. She said she was assured that this was "a legal and common investigative technique" and so referred it to Hurd for the final decision.

Dunn's remarks contrasted with a more contrite statement from Hurd to the committee for today's testimony. In it, he apologized to the nine journalists, two current HP employees, and seven former or current HP board members and their families whose phone records were to varying degrees obtained under false pretenses, a practice known as pretexting.

"How did such an abuse of privacy occur?" he wrote. "It's an age-old story. The ends came to justify the means."

"What began as a proper and serious inquiry into leaks to the press of company information from within the HP board became a rogue investigation that violated our own principles and values," he added. "There is no excuse for this aberration. It happened; it will never happen again."

The scandal brings to the fore questions of privacy that affect thousands of Americans whose phone or bank records have been fraudulently obtained by data brokers who sell the information to investigators. What catapulted this to the headlines was the fact that this time, it was a Fortune 100 company seeking the personal data

Not only did investigators lie to obtain phone call records, they also conducted extensive background checks of reporters, directors, their spouses and children; plotted to plant spies in newsrooms; discussed the possibility of inspecting trash; and planned a ruse to trick a reporter into revealing her source by planting a tracer in an e-mail sent by a fictitious HP tipster.

"What happened here was like cutting off your head to kill a head cold," said Charles M. Elson, chairman of the University of Delaware's John L. Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance.

The purpose of today's hearings, lawmakers and aides said, is to lay bare what happened, find out who committed or knew about any acts that were illegal or unethical, and to push Congress to pass pending legislation that could prevent much of this from happening again.

"For the highest-ranking officials of a company like Hewlett-Packard to be aware of and seemingly approve this kind of activity I do not think speaks well of their value system or their culture," said subcommittee chairman Edward Whitfield (R-Ky.).

The scandal seems curious, considering how Hewlett-Packard, founded in 1938, spent decades building an image as an ethical company devoted to civic responsibility and the welfare of its employees. HP codified its philosophy of respecting individuals, encouraging teamwork and promoting openness as it tried to fashion useful products. Called "the HP Way," its corporate philosophy became a legend in Silicon Valley.

In his statement, Hurd admitted that the probe had fallen afoul of the "HP Way." He outlined steps taken to correct mistakes, including accepting Dunn's resignation. Two others involved in the investigation, Hunsaker and Gentilucci, have also left the company. Hurd said existing ethical practices will be reviewed and new measures developed to protect information privacy.

He, too, distanced himself from the investigation's operation: "I was apprised of the existence of the investigation by Ms. Dunn, but I was not involved in the investigation itself."

Both the FBI and the California attorney general's office are investigating the case, and California Attorney General Bill Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to bring criminal charges against people inside and outside the firm. Documents delivered to Congress detailed one exchange between HP investigators that suggested they knew they were pushing the bounds of the law.

In a Jan. 30 e-mail, Hunsaker asked Gentilucci how HP's private investigator was obtaining phone records. "Is it all above board?" he asked.

Gentilucci replied that the investigator, DeLia, used " some ruse" to trick phone operators. "I think it's on the edge, but above board," he wrote.

Hunsaker's reply: "I shouldn't have asked."

Staff writer Yuki Noguchi and staff researcher Richard Drezen contributed to this report.

Dunn And Dumber (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

One refreshing aspect of the Hewlett-Packard "leak" scandal is that it hasn't become an excuse to diagnose some larger sickness in all of corporate America. Today, however, the story heads to Congress, which specializes in false diagnoses, not to mention bad prescriptions. So perhaps it's time to sort out the lessons of this case, prosaic as they are.

From our vantage point in the cheap seats, the spectacle looks like a unique case of board of director dysfunction and bad human judgment. Such things are known to happen, even among the rich and otherwise savvy. Patricia Dunn, H-P chairman until her recent resignation, led a wild leak chase all out of proportion to the story that prompted it. That chase evolved into a fishing expedition into telephone records and even newspaper trash, including misrepresentations that may have been illegal. Most H-P directors still haven't admitted, perhaps even to themselves, how dumb and dumber this all was.

None of this is to say that board leaks aren't a problem. Directors are supposed to have a company's best interests in mind, and leaks to the press can make life difficult for any management. H-P's most damaging leak came in January 2005, when this newspaper reported that the board had concerns with then-CEO Carly Fiorina. She was later sacked, and the H-P board agreed not to speak to the press. But leaks are a fact of modern American life, and the search to find the leaker typically does more harm than the leak itself. Media relations, leaks included, are a key part of an executive's job.

All the more so in H-P's case because the actual "leak" that triggered a second phase of the probe hardly deserves the term. A story on CNET News, the Web site, was mostly an endorsement of the strategy of new CEO Mark Hurd. Most companies want this kind of publicity. But Ms. Dunn seems to have used the story as an excuse to investigate directors she disagreed with, specifically physicist George "Jay" Keyworth.

Ms. Dunn hasn't yet told her side of this story -- not surprising given California Attorney General Bill Lockyer's loose words about criminal indictments. But the board's internal disagreements seem to have been about the role of directors. Mr. Keyworth, who was Ronald Reagan's science adviser and whose 21 years on the board go back to the era of founder David Packard, was part of a faction who believe directors need to be conversant enough with technology to appreciate the company's main business risks. After H-P's failure to recognize the threat from the distributed computer revolution in the 1990s, this makes a lot of sense.

Ms. Dunn, by contrast, is a former financier with little knowledge of the computer industry. She believed H-P's board should focus more on supervisory process -- for example, by fulfilling its obligations under Sarbanes-Oxley. There may also have been some residual tension on the board over Ms. Fiorina's dismissal; Mr. Keyworth was among those who wanted to replace Ms. Fiorina, who still has friends on the board.

In any case, there's little doubt that Ms. Dunn's leak probe was aimed principally at Mr. Keyworth, who acknowledged having lunch with the CNET writer, a long-time acquaintance. Asked to resign at a board meeting in May, Mr. Keyworth understandably refused on grounds that what he had "leaked" was public information, finally resigning this month as a way to help Mr. Hurd clear the decks.

DOJ_NMG_0070637

Are there any bigger lessons here about "corporate governance"? Not really. The fad of dividing the roles of CEO and chairman may sometimes make sense, but at H-P that division of responsibility led to dysfunction. Ms. Dunn seems to have meddled too much in corporate operations by supervising a leak probe run from the H-P counsel's office. That's one danger of dividing the two jobs. But like any collection of human beings, the knowledge and judgment of the individuals on a board matter far more than its structure.

Mr. Hurd and the entire H-P board also seem to have ignored a law of modern public relations, which is to get all the bad news out early, take responsibility, and move on. Instead, the board knew as early as June that the probe involved "pretexting," or misrepresentation, to obtain Mr. Keyworth's phone records, yet it failed to stop it. Mr. Hurd has finally acknowledged he should have paid more attention to the details of the probe, but he was also too slow to accept that Ms. Dunn had to leave as chairman. He's fortunate H-P's stock has performed so well, or some investors would be using this episode to call for his head as well.

As for Congress, we understand the impulse to grab some camera time by beating up on H-P witnesses. But even otherwise shrewd Members of Congress have been known to do stupid things from time to time. The last thing the country needs is a new Bureau for the Prevention of Bad Business Judgment, which is at bottom what the H-P saga is all about.

A Fugitive's Haven In Africa Turned Out To Be Anything But (WSJ)

By CHARLES FORELLE, KARA SCANNELL And PAUL DAVIES

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

Kobi Alexander Is Arrested In Namibia; the Tip-Off Was Hefty Bank Transfer

Kobi Alexander, a former chief executive embroiled in a stock-options scandal and the focus of an international manhunt, seemed to have found the safest of havens: Windhoek, the picturesque capital of Namibia, an African country with no extradition treaty with the U.S.

Missing since early August, and supposedly spotted in Sri Lanka several weeks ago, Mr. Alexander was living openly in Windhoek with his wife and children, said a U.S. official in Namibia. He had filled out a temporary residence permit using his given name, Jacob Alexander, the official said, had enrolled his children in the international school and was looking for real estate.

Yesterday, this life on the lam came to an end. Early in the morning, Namibia's justice minister filed a special notice with parliament to allow the country to extradite Mr. Alexander to the U.S., and a magistrate issued an arrest warrant soon after. At about 2 p.m. local time, authorities arrested Mr. Alexander, the 54-year-old former chief of Comverse Technology Inc., as he was having lunch with his wife in his suite at the luxury Windhoek Country Club. They'd been staying there while shopping for a residence, according to the U.S. official.

Shortly thereafter, the U.S. attorney in Brooklyn, N.Y., unsealed a 32-count indictment against Mr. Alexander for his alleged role in a scheme to backdate stock options at the company he had co-founded.

Herman Oosthuizen, an attorney for Mr. Alexander in Windhoek, declined to comment. Keith Krakaur, an attorney for Mr. Alexander in New York, said he hadn't spoken to his client since the arrest and didn't know how he would respond to the effort to extradite him.

About a month ago, an official at Namibia's bank regulatory agency noticed an unusual transfer of funds into the African country: Tens of millions of dollars to the account of Mr. Alexander, who had arrived days before. That seemed suspicious for a person with no known permanent Namibian residence, family or business connections. The official sent word through an Interpol liaison, who got in touch with the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation, and learned that Mr. Alexander was a wanted man. "The Namibians and we are flabbergasted about why he would come here," said the U.S. official who provided the account of Mr. Alexander's capture.

The Wall Street Journal's Lee Hawkins8 reports on the news that former Comverse CEO Kobi Alexander is in custody.

Windhoek, a city of both modern buildings and German colonial architecture, has a reputation as one of the most beautiful in Africa. Namibia is off the beaten track and has beautiful deserts and haunting coastlines. Like South Africa next door, it has a colonial history and modern lifestyle. Namibia got a publicity boost earlier this year when actors Angelina Jolie and Brad Pitt traveled there for the birth of their daughter, Shiloh Nouvel.

While corruption, lackluster law enforcement and an absence of extradition treaties make much of Africa a refuge for people looking to dodge prosecution, Namibia has a fairly sophisticated legal and business environment. The regulator's tip set off a quick chain of events under the Namibian laws that let the justice ministry seek dispensation to arrest and extradite a fugitive. Namibian officials filed the required notice with parliament yesterday morning, said the U.S. official, and after an arrest warrant was granted, Mr. Alexander was arrested.

DOJ_NMG_0070638

He is spending the night in jail and will have a hearing today. The U.S. official, who said no one could remember a case where Namibia has extradited anyone to the U.S., praised Namibian authorities for their quick action.

In the 1980s, Mr. Alexander and an Israeli engineer co-founded Comverse to produce technology for voicemail systems. Mr. Alexander was the son of the head of Israel's national oil company and a former member of an elite Israeli army unit. At Comverse, he was known as a tough executive who held tight sway.

Comverse was originally something of a family affair, with Mr. Alexander's sister, brother-in-law and father once board members. It grew to become a leading maker of voicemail software and survived when many others failed in the collapse of the telecom bubble. Based in New York, it has more than 5,000 employees and about $1.2 billion in annual revenue.

The business made Mr. Alexander wealthy, but prosecutors allege that millions of dollars of his fortune came from improper backdating of stock-option grants. In August, they charged him and two other former executives, alleging a scheme by which they deceived directors who were supposed to authorize stock-option grants. By using bogus dates, prosecutors charge, the executives made the grants appear to have been given at a time when Comverse's stock price was lower, making the grants more valuable.

According to an affidavit filed by an FBI agent, Mr. Alexander and former finance chief David Kreinberg also engineered the creation of a secret options slush fund that held grants to phony employees, with the options later doled out to favored employees. Mr. Kreinberg and former Comverse General Counsel William Sorin surrendered to federal agents on Aug. 9. Mr. Alexander didn't show.

Messrs. Kreinberg and Sorin are charged in a complaint with securities fraud but haven't been indicted. Mr. Alexander faces a 32-count indictment that includes false-filing counts for each of eight forms submitted to the Securities and Exchange Commission. It also includes 14 wire-fraud counts for various emails, electronic forms and faxes, plus three mail-fraud charges related to the sending of documents to directors.

Prosecutors allege that in July 2006, knowing he was under investigation, Mr. Alexander shuffled money that included options proceeds between two accounts -- then sent $57 million to an account in Israel. He is charged with three money-laundering counts. Prosecutors are moving to seize funds in two accounts at Israeli banks held by Mr. Alexander, along with two West Side Manhattan apartments.

Namibia has relatively close ties to Israel, and Windhoek once had a sizeable Jewish community. Laurence Pieters, former president of the Windhoek Hebrew Congregation, said, "We have a lot of Israelis coming to services here." The community numbered more than a thousand between the 1950s and the 1970s but has declined. Mr. Pieters said he hadn't heard of Mr. Alexander.

Just what happens to Mr. Alexander's money in Namibia isn't yet clear. Being in jail, he doesn't have access to the cash, the U.S. official said, adding that it likely would be informally held by Namibian authorities until legal proceedings are sorted out.

--Robert Block contributed to this article.

Former Chief Of Comverse Is Arrested In Namibia (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

Life on the run ended early yesterday for Jacob Alexander, the former chief executive of Comverse Technology, after he was arrested by local authorities in Windhoek, the capital of Namibia in southwestern Africa.

Mr. Alexander, also known as Kobi, is expected to be brought before a court in Namibia, possibly as soon as today, and the United States intends to seek his extradition to face charges stemming from a scheme to backdate stock option grants at Comverse, according to the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn.

Once back in the United States, Mr. Alexander, 54, will face conspiracy, securities fraud and money-laundering charges, according to a 32-count indictment against him that was unsealed yesterday. Prosecutors are also seeking forfeiture of $138 million in bank accounts or other assets held by Mr. Alexander.

Details about Mr. Alexander's arrest and what brought him to Namibia remained murky yesterday. He is believed to have been in the region for some time and was, at times, there with his family, according to two individuals briefed on the investigation.

Adding to the confusion were questions over whether the United States can legally request Mr. Alexander's extradition from Namibia.

"The U.S. does not have an extradition treaty with Namibia," said Janelle Hironimus, a spokeswoman for the United States State Department. "Our understanding is that Namibia law permits extradition in the absence of a treaty in certain circumstances."

"The U.S.," she said, "will submit a formal request for Mr. Alexander's extradition and that request will be considered by the Namibian courts."

One of Mr. Alexander's lawyers, Robert G. Morvillo, said, "I don't have a clue with regard to this particular country and what his particular rights are in the context of whatever is going on there."

Another of his lawyers, Keith D. Krakaur of Skadden, Arps, said he also had not spoken with Mr. Alexander since his arrest and did not know whether he intended to fight or cooperate with extradition attempts.

The arrest ends another strange chapter in Mr. Alexander's career. Credited with turning Comverse from a penny stock to a communications software company with $1 billion in annual sales, Mr. Alexander was the subject of an international manhunt this summer, with reports — all unconfirmed — that he traveled from Israel to western Sri Lanka during his time as a fugitive.

Mr. Alexander's fortunes had turned earlier this spring, when Comverse began an internal investigation into the altering of dates of options granted to him and other executives and employees of the company. The investigation prompted Mr. Alexander to resign as chief executive of the company and chairman of the board in April.

In August, federal prosecutors described a brazen scheme that involved backdating every companywide option grant between 1998 and 2001 to days when Comverse's stock was trading at lower prices, hence creating the potential for bigger profits. Mr. Alexander and two other former Comverse executives were charged in a criminal complaint with securities, mail and wire fraud.

Options give an employee the right to buy a stock at some point in the future at the price of the stock on the day it was granted, commonly referred to as the strike price. The lower the strike price, the more an option is worth to the recipient. By dating the options back to a time when the stock was trading at a lower price, the recipient receives even bigger profits.

Two of the executives, David Kreinberg, the former chief financial officer, and William F. Sorin, the former general counsel, were not named in the indictment that was unsealed yesterday. Their cases are still pending.

Among the allegations against the three executives was that they were involved in a scheme that in which stock options were granted to fictitious employees to create a secret account of options to dole out to favored employees.

The account was initially named "I. M. Fanton" by an assistant who had seen the Broadway show "The Phantom of the Opera." Later, it was renamed "Fargo" for the movie directed by the Coen brothers.

According to the indictment unsealed yesterday, Mr. Alexander "reaped substantial personal gain from his fraudulent conduct," citing more than $15 million in "paper profits." The indictment does not say whether any of those paper profits were sold for real profits.

So far, executives from only two companies — Comverse and Brocade Communications Systems — have faced criminal charges as the investigations into options practices widen.

More than 100 companies nationwide are now under investigation over their options practices by the Securities and Exchange Commission or by federal prosecutors in San Francisco, Brooklyn and Manhattan.

Fugitive CEO, Sought In Brooklyn, Captured In Namibia (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-The fugitive former chief executive of leading voicemail software maker Comverse Technology Inc. has been captured in Africa following a two-month international manhunt, U.S. officials announced Wednesday.

Details of the arrest of Jacob "Kobi" Alexander in the Republic of Namibia were not immediately available. But in a statement, U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf credited local officials in the southwest African nation for assisting the FBI in the capture.

"We are very grateful for the Namibians' swift action and commend them for their vigilance," she said.

Mauskopf said she would seek Alexander's swift extradition to face charges in federal court in Brooklyn. A call to his defense attorney in New York was not immediately returned.

The manhunt was launched in late July shortly before authorities unsealed a criminal complaint accusing Alexander and two other former top executives of secretly manipulating stock options for personal profit.

Before he disappeared, Alexander, 54, an Israeli citizen and a U.S. permanent resident, allegedly transferred $57 million (â,¬45 million) to Israel, fueling speculation he may have fled there. News reports in Israel speculated that he may have been hiding out in a small Sri Lankan fishing village.

Two other defendants, former finance chief David Kreinberg and former senior general counsel William Sorin, surrendered in August and were released on $1 million (â,¬790,000) bond each.

The complaint unsealed in federal court accuses the three men of making stock options more lucrative by backdating their exercise price to a low point in the stock's value. Usually, a stock option's exercise price coincides with the market value at the time of a grant to give the recipient an incentive to drive the price higher.

DOJ_NMG_0070640

From 1991 through 2005, Alexander exercised options and sold stocks worth approximately $150 million (â,¬118 million), making $138 million (â,¬108.7 million) profit, according to the complaint. Of that, about $6.4 million (â,¬5 million) was generated by backdating options, it said.

Prosecutors allege Kreinberg and Sorin earned about $1 million (â,¬790,000) each on backdated options.

In addition, the company awarded thousands of stock options to fictional employees, then secretly transferred the awards to an internal account under the name I.M. Fanton, which stood for phantom, court papers said. The scheme allowed Alexander to award those options to real "favored employees" and to himself without board of directors approval, the papers added.

Comverse Technology is headquartered in Wakefield, Massachusetts.

Former Comverse Chief Alexander Arrested In Namibia (Update5) (BLOOM)

By Allan Dodds Frank And Bob Van Voris

Bloomberg, September 28, 2006

Sept. 27 (Bloomberg) -- Jacob ``Kobi'' Alexander, the former Comverse Technology Inc. chief executive officer who became a fugitive after being charged with securities fraud, was arrested today in Namibia.

Alexander, the ex-Israeli intelligence officer turned high- technology entrepreneur, will be brought before a court in Windhoek within 48 hours, and the U.S. will seek his extradition, the Justice Department said.

Federal prosecutors charged Alexander, 54, on Aug. 9 with backdating stock options to boost the compensation of executives at New York-based Comverse, the world's largest maker of voicemail software. He is the second CEO charged in the government's probe of illegal stock-option backdating, the largest investigation of corporate wrongdoing since a mutual fund trading scandal three years ago led to $4.3 billion in penalties.

``Alexander's alleged role in options back-dating victimized Comverse shareholders and deceived prospective investors,'' Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf said today in a statement. ``The fraud affected the company's bottom line by misstating earnings.''

Alexander, the wizard of Israel's technology boom, was arrested by Interpol and local police on a Namibian warrant issued at the request of the U.S., said Ray Castillo, a spokesman for the U.S. embassy in Namibia.

Sought by Jiang Zemin

The former Comverse CEO was sought out by the likes of former Chinese President Jiang Zemin, who slipped away from official meetings in 2000 and steered his motorcade through a pot-holed section of Tel Aviv to meet with Alexander. Engineers at the company cheered as the Chinese leader shook hands with their chief executive officer.

The probe of backdating at Comverse presents the widest- ranging fraud allegations arising from more than 130 inquiries launched by regulators, prosecutors or companies into stock- options timing. Options backdating, used by companies to reward employees with shares granted at below-market prices, has so far cost investors at least $7.9 billion in market value, according to Bloomberg data.

Alexander left New York-based Comverse in April. His former subordinates, David Kreinberg, Comverse's ex-chief financial officer, and William Sorin, a former general counsel, were also charged last month and released on $1 million bail each. The three were charged in a criminal complaint July 31 of changing the dates on millions of Comverse stock options so employees, including themselves, could buy shares at low prices. Kreinberg and Sorin pleaded not guilty.

Most Wanted List

Since then, the FBI has put Alexander's face on its Most Wanted list and Interpol has sent out a global ``red notice,'' asking police to arrest the former CEO, a dual U.S.-Israeli citizen, and extradite him to face trial in New York. His assets at two Citigroup Smith Barney accounts were frozen by the Brooklyn court July 31.

A 32-count indictment unsealed today in Brooklyn charges Alexander with crimes relating to an alleged ``slush fund'' and the backdating of stock options from 1998 to 2006. He is charged with conspiracy, securities fraud, making false filings with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, mail fraud, wire fraud and money laundering.

If found guilty of the charges, Alexander may be sentenced up to 25 years in prison, according to Mauskopf's statement.

Alexander's lawyer, Robert Morvillo, didn't return a call seeking comment.

Extradition Treaties

``The apprehension of Alexander follows an international manhunt led by the FBI, and the cooperation of the government of the Republic of Namibia,'' Mauskopf said in her statement.

Windhoek is the capital of Namibia, located on the southwestern coast of Africa. The country was administered by South Africa until 1990, when it won its independence, according to the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency's Web site. One-fifth of the country's economy is dependent on mining, including diamonds and uranium, according to the CIA.

DOJ_NMG_0070641

Under international extradition treaties, a foreign country must determine whether the U.S. crime is considered a crime at home and whether the treaty covers it.

Comverse's fortunes soared during the late 1990s with growing sales of cellular phones which use the company's voicemail software. The stock rose from a low of $9.98 on Oct. 8, 1998, to $121.63 on Jan. 24, 2001.

Last year, the company reported $959 million in sales and employed just over 5,000, about half of them in Israel, according to Bloomberg data and the company.

Second CEO Charged

A message left on voicemail at Comverse's headquarters wasn't immediately returned.

Alexander is the second CEO to be charged in the backdating scandal. The first was former Brocade Communications Systems Inc. Chief Executive Officer Gregory Reyes, who Sept. 25 requested a subpoena of two San Francisco-area law firms to defend against charges he improperly backdated stock option grants.

Reyes last month pleaded innocent to 12 counts of securities fraud and other charges that he improperly backdated options so employees could profit from when Brocade's stock was lower.

Comverse shares rose 34 cents to $21.85 at 12:57 p.m. in Nasdaq composite trading.

The case is: U.S. v. Alexander, No. 06-MJ-817, U.S. District Court, Eastern District of New York (Brooklyn).

To contact the reporter on this story: Bob Van Voris in New York at rvanvoris@bloomberg.net

Bondholders Seek $21.5 Million In Damages From BearingPoint Default (WP)

By Kim Hart And Terence O'hara

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Plaintiffs who won a bond default ruling against BearingPoint Inc. last week said that they aren't trying to ruin the company and that they don't think the $21.5 million in damages they have requested will hurt the McLean consulting firm's business.

A group of bondholders sued BearingPoint for failing to file up-to-date financial reports -- a violation of the bond agreement that has become a common tool used by creditors and most typically hedge funds to extract concessions. A New York court last week agreed that the firm was in default on about $200 million in corporate debt.

Hareesh Paranjape, portfolio manager at New York-based Fore Advisors L.P. and one of three hedge fund managers who instigated the lawsuit, said he's only trying to make the company meet its obligations.

"The company is not in financial distress," Paranjape said. "Of course, it is just a technical default. But they breached the covenants [of the bonds]. We wanted the damages due to us as a result of that breach. I think it's ludicrous that a $1.7 billion market-cap company thinks that a relatively small damage claim would put them in financial distress."

He said that usually in such cases, companies settle with the bondholders and move on. "BearingPoint for whatever reason did not concede an inch, and now they're paying the price," he said.

BearingPoint officials have appealed the court ruling and asked other creditors to grant waivers to avoid similar suits. The company said it would delay filing its annual report, expected tomorrow, because of the uncertainty that the court ruling has produced for the company.

BearingPoint's stock closed yesterday at $7.78, down more than 8 percent.

Chief executive Harry L. You yesterday criticized the creditors who brought the suit, saying hedge funds who file this sort of litigation are preying on technicalities to boost their return.

"All the people we've talked to outside the plaintiffs are being very rational about this," You said. "This is just a group of people who've made some money suing people on this technicality."

BearingPoint has not filed timely financial statements in more than two years after inheriting accounting and other problems from when it was part of KPMG LLP. BearingPoint was spun off from KPMG and provides management and information-systems consulting for large corporations and government agencies. In 2005, a new management team, including You, took over, and the firm was "ahead of schedule on its turnaround," said Adam Frisch, an analyst with UBS AG.

"It's unfortunate that this has to overshadow the improvements," he said.

Some analysts agreed that BearingPoint would be able to weather this problem without seeking bankruptcy protection.

But the court ruling still poses risks. Other creditors could use the default judgment to pursue their own payment demands, for example. It could also spook potential clients and prompt existing customers to consider canceling contracts, said Ivan Feinseth, an analyst with Matrix USA LLC.

"How do you advise others when your own house is not in order?" he said. "I don't think bankruptcy is imminent, but they'll have to do some kind of restructuring" of their debt.

You said bankruptcy is not in the cards, though credit-rating agency Egan-Jones Ratings Co. said yesterday that a bankruptcy protection filing remains a possibility.

"The company needs to be watched," Egan-Jones said in a written analysis released yesterday.

Despite its creditor problems, BearingPoint says its revenue has been growing, and it has $291 million in cash on hand. The company warned in its SEC filing, however, that it probably wouldn't be enough to fund its operations should its creditors start submitting "sudden, unexpected significant demands for cash collateral or for accelerated payment of principal and accrued interest."

Revenue for 2005 was $2.40 billion, about a 2 percent increase over 2004, You said yesterday. The company expects to report a loss of $650 million to $720 million for 2005, at least $100 million more than it lost in 2004.

Moody's said yesterday that it had a B1 rating on BearingPoint's corporate debt, a rating it assigns to speculative corporate bonds with relatively high probability of default and loss. Moody's also said its BearingPoint rating "may be under review."

Regulators Urge Joint Action On Derivatives (FT)

By Gillian Tett In London And Anuj Gangahar In New York

Financial Times, September 28, 2006

Three of the world's most powerful financial regulators have taken the unusual step of issuing a joint warning that individual nations cannot contain some of the risks posed by the explosive growth of derivatives and must collaborate across borders.

The dramatic pace of integration and innovation in global markets makes it increasingly difficult to solve problems with "a local or national solution", top officials from the UK Financial Services Authority, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and the US Securities and Exchange Commission write in the Financial Times.

"In a more integrated global market, we will increasingly find ourselves compelled to pursue borderless solutions," write Timothy Geithner, president of the New York Fed; Sir Callum McCarthy, chairman of the FSA; and Annette Nazareth, a commissioner at the SEC.

The comments come after leading global investment banks, institutional investors and international regulators met at the New York Fed on Wednesday to discuss industry initiatives to improve back-office systems for derivatives trading. The move follows concern last year that back-office backlogs were so serious they could create systemic problems if not addressed.

At the New York meeting, regulators said a process of co-operation between the US and European regulators last year had cut credit derivatives backlogs, but warned the industry still needed to tackle serious backlogs in the equity derivatives world. Their comments prompted the International Swaps and Derivatives Association to declare that it would take urgent action.

In the FT article, the regulators suggest the US-European initiative could act as a model for co-operation on broader issues in the future. "In the case of derivatives, a local or national solution would have been insufficient to protect domestic financial markets from the risks posed by market practices," they said.

"To fix the credit derivatives problem, it was necessary to involve a large and diverse pool of financial institutions. No firm or national authority had the capacity to make progress on its own."

The comments will be closely watched in the financial industry. Although US and European regulators have co-operated extensively behind the scenes in recent years, this collaboration has been discreet, since national supervisors have been expected to handle problems in their local markets. As a result, when Long Term Capital Management, the US hedge fund, imploded in 1998, the New York Fed facilitated rescue efforts by local, Wall Street investment banks.

However, the growing integration of capital markets is making it easier to transmit shocks across borders. When Amaranth, the US hedge fund, lost $6bn this month in US gas markets, this triggered a massive firesale of Amaranth's loans in London.

Projects Under Scrutiny (HC)

By David Ivanovich

Houston Chronicle, September 28, 2006

Inquiry looks at Halliburton work in Nigeria and elsewhere

WASHINGTON - Federal investigators, who have been looking into a possible bribery scheme involving Houston's Halliburton Co. and a Nigerian natural gas plant, are scrutinizing "multiple" projects both within and outside Nigeria, according to company filings.

Recently uncovered information suggests employees at Halliburton's M.W. Kellogg Co. — some time before 1998 — may have planned to funnel payments to government officials to land projects in countries outside Nigeria, Halliburton subsidiary KBR said in a filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission.

The SEC has issued subpoenas seeking documents related to multiple projects from the last 20 years in and outside Nigeria, the filing said.

Halliburton spokeswoman Cathy Mann would not discuss the investigations, saying in an e-mail: "As these are ongoing investigations, it would be inappropriate to comment further at this time."

DOJ_NMG_0070643

She did point out that the activities under investigation predate Halliburton's acquisition of Dresser Industries, which owned M.W. Kellogg.

Halliburton officials have been scrutinizing the activities of an unnamed agent who "has worked with us outside of Nigeria on several current projects and on numerous older projects going back to the early 1980s," the company said in the filing.

Halliburton officials are trying to determine whether this individual broke the law or violated the company's code of conduct.

At the same time, Halliburton has been examining another agent involved in a project in Nigeria.

The company was tipped off by an unnamed joint venture partner about "allegations of wrongful payments" the agent may have made.

Kellogg was merged with Halliburton's Brown & Root to form Kellogg Brown & Root, now known as KBR.

A $5.5 billion projectThe latest inquiries grew out of a long-running investigation into the construction of a $5.5 billion natural gas liquefaction complex at Bonny Island in Nigeria's Rivers State.

That facility was built by a Madeira, Portugal-based joint venture known as TSKJ. Kellogg held a 25 percent stake in TSKJ. Other partners included France's Technip; Snamprogetti Netherlands, a subsidiary of Italy's Saipem; and Japan's JGC Corp.

Halliburton officials have acknowledged that agents working for TSKJ may have made improper payments to Nigerian officials in connection with that project.

Several investigationsThe SEC and Justice Department, as well as authorities in France, Nigeria, Switzerland and Britain have all been investigating. Halliburton officials said they do not expect those probes to be wrapped anytime soon.

Spokesmen for the Justice Department and the SEC declined to comment.

In August 2005 and then again in January, the SEC subpoenaed documents from Chicago Bridge & Iron Co. in relation to the TSKJ probe.

Chicago Bridge, an engineering and construction company based in The Netherlands with its worldwide administrative headquarters in The Woodlands, served as a subcontractor for a Halliburton affiliate on the project.

"We are cooperating fully with such investigation," Chicago Bridge said in an SEC filing last month.

Some Shocked At Sentence (HC)

By Kristen Hays And Tom Fowler

Houston Chronicle, September 28, 2006

Fastow's 6 years has a few experts scratching heads

Andrew Fastow's six-year prison sentence caught many longtime observers of the case off guard this week, including a former member of the government team that negotiated his 2004 plea agreement.

Fastow had agreed to a 10-year prison sentence in the plea deal with the understanding that he would not ask for a lesser sentence later.

Yet his lawyers asked for just such a break. The government didn't object and instead stressed the critical cooperation Fastow provided in helping the government build criminal cases against former Chairman Ken Lay and former CEO Jeff Skilling.

With no dissenting opinion from prosecutors, U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt cut four years from Fastow's term.

"The way the government handled it is surprising, given the written terms of the agreement," said Andrew Weissmann, former director of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, who was on the team when Fastow's plea was negotiated. Weissmann step- ped down from the task force last year and later went into private practice.

Michael Wynne, a former federal prosecutor in Houston, also was surprised.

"I expected him to receive the full 10 years. The judge even said that there was no way Fastow would be able to repay all the harm that he caused," Wynne said.

Fastow, 44, has long been considered among the most egregious of Enron's felons, having orchestrated multiple schemes to help Enron manipulate earnings while enriching himself with kickbacks. Some of those unsustainable schemes began crumbling in 2001 and helped fuel the company's failure late that year.

Both Lay and Skilling argued in their fraud and conspiracy trial earlier this year that no fraud occurred at Enron other than Fastow's self-dealing. But Fastow linked both to fraud, either for participating in or approving fraudulent schemes or lying to investors about Enron's financial strength to maintain an illusion of success.

A short fightFastow fought the government for more than a year after being indicted in October 2002, but admitted to two counts of conspiracy and agreed to cooperate in January 2004.

Since then, Fastow's plea agreement was thought to guarantee he would serve the decade he agreed to serve in prison, with potential to shave some time off with credit for good behavior.

But a January 2005 U.S. Supreme Court decision prompted Fastow's lawyers to try to unchain Fastow from that agreed-upon decade.

Fastow's plea agreement said his 10-year sentence was governed by 2001 federal sentencing guidelines that were mandatory. Last year, the high court ruled that the guidelines were strictly advisory.

Fastow's lawyers argued that the change meant Fastow was no longer bound to the 10-year agreement because judges' discretion in sentencing had largely been restored.

However, Candace Zierdt, a contract law professor at Stetson University College of Law in St. Petersburg, Fla., said the plea agreement — and its written terms — remained binding despite the Supreme Court ruling.

"There's this whole area of case law that says once you enter a plea agreement, it is governed by contract law. Just because it turns out to be a bad deal because the law changed, that doesn't mean the contract changes," Zierdt said.

She noted a 2005 ruling from the U.S. 7th Circuit Court of Appeals that said the Supreme Court said the same thing. That case involved a defendant who appealed his sentence based on the Supreme Court decision after agreeing not to do so as part of a plea deal.

"Disputes over plea agreements are usefully viewed through the lens of contract law," said the opinion, written by Judge Richard Posner. "A plea agreement is a type of contract."

Yet Kirby Behre, a former federal prosecutor and an expert on federal sentencing, said the binding nature of the plea agreement could be challenged in light of the ruling.

"It's not a clean way of doing it," he said of the argument from Fastow's lawyers, "but one can understand why there would have to be some tinkering with an agreement predicated on an assumption that the Supreme Court said is no longer part of the law."

Asked for fiveFastow lawyer John Keker alerted U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt to Fastow's intention to ask for mercy in a court filing last week. He did not suggest a specific prison term until Tuesday, when he asked for five years followed by probation for three years.

Prosecutor John Hueston, who questioned Fastow during Lay and Skilling's fraud and conspiracy trial earlier this year, didn't object to Keker's suggestion or recite the terms of the plea agreement. Instead, he praised Fastow's "critical" cooperation, without which he said the outcomes of the investigations of the company's former top two executives "were in doubt."

Hoyt, who was never bound by the plea agreement, said Fastow deserved mercy despite his crimes because of the cooperation he provided to the government and shareholders trying to recover money from others allegedly involved in Enron's demise, and the torment he and his family have been put through.

Credit for good behaviorFastow can shave up to nearly two years from his six-year sentence with credit for good behavior and completion of a drug rehabilitation program he wants to enter.

Hueston declined to discuss why he didn't object to Keker's request, but he said the government didn't backtrack from its intention that Fastow serve a decade in prison.

"The government's position has always been that under the plea agreement, the government was recommending a 10-year term," he said. "Then you have to consider what the defendant did and what the judge did."

Behre said Hueston's silence on Keker's request coupled with his praise of Fastow's cooperation likely conveyed unspoken support for a lesser term.

"Without asking for it, you're clearly asking for it," Behre said.

Others agreed.

"It tells the judge they're in agreement with it," Kent Schaffer, a Houston defense attorney who has followed Enron, said Wednesday. "I'm sure for PR reasons the government doesn't want to come in and recommend a six-year sentence, but by not objecting I think it shows that was probably their intent all along."

Often reiteratedFastow testified repeatedly in the Lay-Skilling trial that he expected to serve 10 years.

"My outcome is already determined," he told Skilling lawyer Daniel Petrocelli. He later told Hueston: "My understanding is that I will be sentenced to 10 years. The judge ultimately has a discretion; but in my plea agreement, I agreed to the 10-year sentence."

Petrocelli questioned why four months after the trial, Fastow's lawyers asked that he serve half that time.

"What is disturbing is that in the trial against Mr. Skilling, Fastow and the prosecutors represented to the jury that Fastow would serve a minimum of 10 years," Petrocelli said.

David Gerger, another of Fastow attorneys, said his client fulfilled the terms of the plea agreement in full.

"The judge exercised his discretion as he is allowed," Gerger said.

DOJ_NMG_0070645

CRIMINAL LAW:

Jeanine Pirro Under Criminal Investigation (WNBC-TV)

WNBC-TV, New York, September 28, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. -- NewsChannel 4's Jonathan Dienst has learned Jeanine Pirro, the Republican candidate for New York Attorney General, has been under state and federal criminal investigation.

Images: Pirro Probed For Alleged Spy Plan

Video: Conversations With Kerik

Raw Video: Pirro Press Conference

Dienst reported these allegations center on whether Pirro illegally spied on her own husband, Albert Pirro, while she held the office of the Westchester District Attorney.

The sources said that court authorities wiretapped conversations that appear to show that while preparing for a statewide run for office, Jeanine Pirro was desperate to prove her husband was cheating on her.

She came under the scrutiny of six different law enforcement agencies, including the New York Police Department, the city's Department of Investigation and prosecutors in the Bronx and Westchester.

According to documents now in the hands of several defense attorneys, Pirro and the former New York City Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik were apparently talking about planting a hidden device aboard her husband's boat. Her possible motive may have been to see if he was having an affair.

Sources told NewsChannel 4 that in one conversation, Pirro complained that one of Kerik's employees was reluctant to board Albert Pirro's boat.

Jeanine Pirro suggests, "We can just simply say, if there is an issue, that I am redecorating it for our anniversary." She complains that Kerik's man is, "uncomfortable with that."

Kerik responded by saying, "But Jeanine, I'm having the same f------g problem with everybody. Everybody is panic stricken because it's you. I've gone out on a limb. I had two other people looking at this. It's a problem."

Pirro said, "What am I supposed to do, Bernie? Watch him f--k her every night? What am I supposed to do? I can go on the boat. I'll put the f-----g thing on myself."

Minutes later, Kerik called a contact at Giuliani Partners, former Mayor Rudy Giuliani's consulting firm, asking him to find a recording device, according to documents.

Sources said the FBI and Justice Department have been asked to look into whether Pirro and Kerik also might have violated federal laws.

In the wiretapped conversations, Pirro appeared to discuss how her husband's alleged indiscretions hurt her politically.

Without her husband, sources said she told Kerik, "I move into the governor's mansion." That's an apparent reference to her aspirations for higher office, the documents said.

Lobbyist Albert Pirro was convicted of tax fraud in 2000 and has fathered a child out of wedlock. He was investigated for allegedly leaking information from his wife's Westchester district attorney's office to the mob, which he has denied. To date, no charges have been brought.

Twice this summer, he has been ticketed for speeding in his Mercedes.

Jeanine Pirro decided not to seek re-election in Westchester, and first put her name in the race for the Senate. However, she dropped out in her bid to go against Sen. Hillary Clinton and switched to the Attorney General's race.

However, according to documents, when speaking to Kerik in the summer of 2005, Pirro apparently belittled a run the attorney general job, saying it's a "been there, done that kind of thing."

Some of the conversations with Kerik were recorded because Kerik's phone was tapped in 2005, as part of an unrelated corruption probe. Kerik ended up pleading guilty to two misdemeanor charges in June to receiving gifts from a construction firm investigated for having mafia ties.

Pirro currently trails Democrat Andrew Cuomo in the race for attorney general.

As for Kerik, his legal troubles appear to be mounting. NewsChannel 4 has revealed that Kerik remains under investigation for more than $1 million missing from a jail charity when he was city corrections commissioner.

U.S. Investigating Pirro's Talk Of Taping Spouse (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070646

Federal prosecutors in New York are investigating whether Jeanine F. Pirro, the Republican candidate for state attorney general, and Bernard B. Kerik, the former New York City police commissioner, illegally taped conversations of Ms. Pirro's husband last year to determine if he was having an affair.

At a hastily arranged news conference yesterday, called because of an imminent television report on the inquiry, Ms. Pirro conceded that she had her husband, Albert, followed in the summer of 2005. She said she had discussed bugging the family's boat with Mr. Kerik, an old friend who was then running his own security business. But Ms. Pirro, who was the district attorney of Westchester County at the time, said she never went through with the plan, and she insisted that she broke no laws.

Seething with anger, and choking up as she laid bare her marital problems, Ms. Pirro said that two federal agents approached her at her home late one recent night and revealed that the United States attorney's office for the Southern District of New York was investigating her surveillance discussions. They had been caught on tape by Bronx authorities who were conducting a separate investigation of Mr. Kerik.

With less than six weeks to go until the Nov. 7 election, Ms. Pirro said she was being hounded by authorities as part of a "political witch hunt and smear campaign" led by the same federal lawyer who helped convict Mr. Pirro of tax evasion in 2000. But the United States attorney for the Southern District, Michael J. Garcia, a Republican appointee, issued a statement denying that the inquiry was politically motivated.

Ms. Pirro said she would remain in the race against the Democratic nominee, Andrew M. Cuomo, although top Republican leaders appeared torn over her fate yesterday, and former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani canceled a fund-raiser for her next month. A telegenic politician who has often appeared as a commentator on legal matters, she has been considered a potential future leader of the party and perhaps a candidate for governor. Republican leaders had considered Ms. Pirro's bid to replace Attorney General Eliot Spitzer as the party's best hope of capturing a statewide office.

At her news conference, Ms. Pirro acknowledged that she was angry with Mr. Pirro, who fathered a child in an extramarital affair in the 1980's, and with whom Ms. Pirro has two children. But she said she was guilty only of the anger of a woman scorned. And she also said her political fate should be a matter of a concern to women.

"There is no way — when I have the opportunity to be the first woman attorney general in the history of this state — that I am going to be pushed out of this race because somebody wants to delve into the personal lives of my husband and myself," she said. "I'm standing up for myself and I'm standing up for women."

Ms. Pirro, a former three-term district attorney, repeatedly said her actions were not illegal. Legal experts said the law was murky, and one important factor was whether the boat, owned by Mr. Pirro, would be treated the same way as a marital home. Mr. Pirro did not return telephone calls for comment.

Details of the conversations between Ms. Pirro and Mr. Kerik were rushed onto the air by WNBC-TV, which broke into its regular programming. Minutes later, Ms. Pirro held her news conference, in which she said prosecutors had no business investigating her "matrimonial discord," and she demanded an investigation into how the report of her conversations with Mr. Kerik was leaked.

Joseph Tacopina, Mr. Kerik's lawyer, said yesterday that nothing illegal was discussed or done. "Bernie spoke to a friend in distress regarding a domestic conflict," Mr. Tacopina said.

WNBC said the conversations included profanity-laden rants by Ms. Pirro about her husband, as well as politically damaging remarks. At one point, according to WNBC, she is said to be heard dismissing the attorney general's job as a "been there, done that kind of thing" for her; at another, she suggests she could be governor if not for Mr. Pirro's baggage. Ms. Pirro had initially run to unseat Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, but pulled out of that race late last year at the urging of party leaders.

Ms. Pirro blamed for the revelations a man far less known to most New Yorkers, Elliott B. Jacobson, an assistant United States attorney who prosecuted Mr. Pirro in 2000 and sent him to jail for 11 months. She said Mr. Jacobson's motives were "personal and highly improper" and, as a result, federal agents were now "prying into the personal lives of married couples."

"Let me reiterate my disappointment with the United States attorney's office for allowing an unethical overzealous prosecutor with a partisan political agenda using taxpayers' money and public resources to pursue a baseless investigation into a marital situation and seek to affect the outcome of an election," Ms. Pirro said.

The United States attorney, Mr. Garcia, confirmed the investigation in a statement yesterday and disputed Ms. Pirro's accusation that the inquiry was politically motivated.

"Because the investigation is ongoing, we will not comment as to its substance, except to say that we do not take politics into account in deciding either the subject matter or timing of our investigations," said Mr. Garcia, who was appointed by President Bush.

The new revelations set the latest scene in one of the most Shakespearean political dramas in New York, the complicated lives of the Pirros, and immediately set off speculation about Ms. Pirro's future. State Republican leaders, who have suffered through the Pirro marriage for years now, watching her scuttle past plans to run for lieutenant governor and United States Senate, appeared torn over what to do.

DOJ_NMG_0070647

The chairmen of the Republican and Conservative Parties, which are both running Ms. Pirro on their November ballot lines, issued statements supporting her candidacy. But these are two parties with a history of sacrificing problematic candidates, and Mr. Giuliani's move to cancel his Pirro fund-raiser was widely seen by top Republicans as a sign of things to come.

Other respected party leaders, like Edward F. Cox, a son-in-law of President Nixon, said openly that they doubted her candidacy could survive this latest controversy.

"The political issue is not whether she broke any laws, but the fact that she would think about doing this to her husband raises questions about her judgment and about whether you want that individual as attorney general," said Mr. Cox, a Manhattan lawyer who briefly ran against Ms. Pirro for the Republican nomination for the United States Senate against Mrs. Clinton last year.

Gov. George E. Pataki was traveling yesterday and could not be reached for comment. His spokesman, David Catalfamo, said Mr. Pataki was still reviewing the details and had no comment about Ms. Pirro's candidacy.

Two senior Republican Party leaders said yesterday that Mr. Pataki had some inkling that Mrs. Pirro's problems with Mr. Pirro had been looming last year. They said he had asked Mr. Cox not to quit the Senate race last fall because he thought Ms. Pirro — who was still running — would ultimately bow out over problems with her husband.

Mr. Catalfamo said that Mr. Pataki had no foreknowledge of Ms. Pirro's conversations with Mr. Kerik, and that it would be inappropriate to discuss the governor's conversation with Mr. Cox.

Ms. Pirro said yesterday that she was staying with her husband, and she came close to tears as she explained why.

"My husband is a great father. I have two beautiful children in school, a teenage son who needs his father with him," she said, and then choked up audibly as she added, "These are personal choices that I have made, and I shouldn't have to keep explaining them."

Mr. Pirro, a prominent lawyer, Westchester power broker and a friend of state Republican leaders, has been a frequent source of embarrassment to his wife. Besides his prior conviction on tax evasion charges, investigations of his business practices have drawn scrutiny, particularly his ties to reputed mob figures, and he was ticketed twice for speeding this summer.

Ms. Pirro's lawyer, Paul Shechtman, maintained yesterday that case law existed to support a spousal exception to the federal wiretapping statute. Regardless, he added emphatically, Ms. Pirro had never actually bugged the boat.

"There were no devices, no devices were put in anywhere," Mr. Shechtman said.

The tape recording of the Pirro-Kerik conversation was made by the Bronx district attorney's office and later provided to the F.B.I. It was made as part of the investigation into Mr. Kerik's acceptance of a free apartment renovation from a contractor looking for city work.

Ms. Pirro spoke to Mr. Kerik when she was dragging out deliberations in the summer of 2005 over whether to run for governor, senator or attorney general in 2006. She said at that time that she took so long to make her choice because her mother had been ill; it became clear for the first time yesterday that her concern about her husband's behavior was also a factor in the much-delayed decision.

"This was one of the reasons we wanted her to run for Senate — all this awful Al Pirro stuff would cloud her credentials to be the top law enforcement officer," said one Republican Party official who spoke only when granted anonymity.

The campaign of Mr. Cuomo, the son of former Gov. Mario M. Cuomo, and Democratic Party officials said they had nothing to do with the revelations. Ms. Pirro did not accuse her opponent, though associates of hers suggested yesterday that Mr. Cuomo and Mr. Jacobson might have worked together long ago.

Yet it is another man, Mr. Pirro, who has done more damage to Ms. Pirro than anyone else over time, Republicans and political analysts said yesterday. Ms. Pirro acknowledged as much at her news conference, urging voters not to hold her accountable for a husband who had driven her to profound bitterness.

"I was a very angry woman and I said a lot of things, but what matters is what I did and didn't do, and I didn't do anything here other than vent," Ms. Pirro said.

AG Candidate Focus Of FBI Investigation (AP)

By Beth Fouhy, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

New York (AP) -- Republican state attorney general candidate Jeanine Pirro said Wednesday she was under federal investigation for plotting to secretly record her husband to find out whether he was having another affair.

Pirro, speaking at a Manhattan news conference, said that any probe into her troubled marriage was "highly improper" but she had no intention of quitting her campaign, calling the investigation politically motivated and sexist.

"My husband is a great father. I have two beautiful children in school ... a teenage son, who needs his father with him," she said, her voice cracking. "These are personal choices that I have made, and I shouldn't have to keep explaining them."

She also said that federal prosecutors had no business delving into her union with millionaire lobbyist Albert Pirro, who spent 11 months in prison after being convicted on tax fraud charges in 2000 and fathered an illegitimate daughter after their wedding in 1975. The couple has a 21-year-old daughter and a 17-year-old son.

"Sometime last year, I came to believe that my husband was seeing another woman," Pirro said. "In the midst of matrimonial discord, I was angry and had him followed to see if what I suspected was true. Although I spoke about taping him, there was no taping by me of anyone. There was anger, and frustration, and disappointment."

Pirro, former district attorney of Westchester County, just outside New York City, said that "placing a recording device on one's property to intercept a conversation involving one's spouse is not a crime."

Two people familiar with the situation, who spoke to The Associated Press before Pirro's news conference on condition of anonymity because she had not yet spoken herself, said Pirro was overheard by authorities having a telephone conversation with former New York City Police Commissioner Bernie Kerik in the middle of last year. They said that Pirro suspected her husband, Albert Pirro, might be having an affair and that she and Kerik, a private security consultant, discussed possibly placing a recorder in a room to listen in on him.

The two people said that the recording device was never used and that a Kerik investigation turned up no firm evidence of an affair. Kerik's attorney declined to comment on the case.

Pirro said Kerik was a friend and confirmed that they had spoken about her marital concerns.

"I was a very angry woman, and I said a lot of things," Pirro said. "What matters is what I did and didn't do, and I didn't do anything here other than vent."

Pirro, who faces former federal Housing Secretary Andrew Cuomo in the attorney general's race, said she learned about the investigation when she was approached by a pair of FBI agents outside her home. She repeatedly said this was a personal matter involving her husband and charged she was the target of "an unethical, overzealous prosecutor with a partisan agenda."

U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia confirmed in a statement his office was investigating but declined to offer details. But, Garcia said, "we do not take politics into account in deciding either the subject matter or timing of our investigations."

A telephone call to Albert Pirro's White Plains office was not immediately returned Wednesday. A Cuomo spokeswoman, Wendy Katz, declined comment.

Associated Press writers Marc Humbert and Mark Johnson in Albany, N.Y., contributed to this report.

Gifted School Teacher Arrested On Pornography Charges (NSDY)

By Robert E. Kessler, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 28, 2006

A long-time teacher at a Huntington Station private school was arrested yesterday after dozens of images of child pornography were found on his home computer, authorities said.

Michael Kelly Reiner, 46, an educator for 18 years at the Long Island School for the Gifted, faces federal child pornography charges for possessing the 70 pictures and 42 videos, officials said.

Reiner, of 82 Pengo Circle, East Meadow, also operated a Web site devoted to sadistic fantasies and cannibalism, prompting investigators to probe whether he has acted on his fantasies, the officials said.

Reiner, who taught fourth, fifth and sixth grades at the school for especially bright students, pleaded not guilty to child pornography charges at his arraignment yesterday in U.S. District Court in Central Islip.

He was temporarily detained pending a bail and permanent detention hearing scheduled for tomorrow by U.S. Magistrate Kathleen Tomlinson. In court, federal prosecutor Allen Bode had asked that Reiner be permanently detained as a danger to the community and children. In making the recommendation for detention, Bode said school officials had not immediately taken the federal investigation seriously.

Bode, head of the child exploitation unit in the Eastern District, said that when agents of the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement recently approached school authorities about contents of the Web site, they were told investigators "didn't understand the defendant's sense of humor ... and called customs officers 'ignorant.'"

The attorney for the school, Linda Caputo-Friedmann, said Reiner had been suspended from teaching and in fact, the school had cooperated fully with federal authorities and taken the matter seriously. The school fired him yesterday after learning of the arrest.

Caputo-Friedmann said Reiner was "a beloved teacher" who had "excellent rapport with students and ... parents."

DOJ_NMG_0070649

Reiner's attorney, federal public defender Randi Chavis, said her client had voluntarily cooperated with federal investigators. Chavis questioned whether the government was in a position to criticize the actions of school officials -- "a school that certainly has a number of experts on its staff.

"Their determination that Mr. Reiner was not a danger should be given respect," Chavis said.

Federal agents began investigating Reiner after Canadian border police notified them that they had made a routine stop and search of Reiner and a portable computer in his car when he crossed over from the United States into Ontario on Aug. 4. Reiner was going to Canada to visit a friend with whom he operated the Web site, court records show.

At the time, according to court documents, the Canadian police said they found an estimated thousand images of young boys in "sexually provocative poses" that are not pornographic under U.S. law.

The boys appeared to range from 4 to 16 years old and wore bathing suits or underwear, the Canadian authorities were quoted as saying. "Reiner stated, in sum and substance, that he had a fetish for young boys, slavery and cannibalism," though he said that he did not actually practice cannibalism, the federal officials said, quoting Canadian border police.

"He further stated in sum or substance 'I like kids. They're fun. I'm a school teacher for grades four, five, six for Long Island School for the Gifted. I joke with them; I say I'm going to eat them, but I'm only joking; the kids always laugh,'" according to officials.

Federal officials said they were trying to determine whether Reiner's statements were part of a fantasy world, or whether he had acted upon any of his impulses.

The Web site Reiner operated has a disclaimer saying, "The complete contents of this Web site are entirely fictional, and are intended for entertainment purposes only. Contributors to this site in no way condone or support any harmful action against any person."

Staff writer William Murphy contributed to this story.

PIRRO'S FURY AT CHEATING AL (NYPOST)

By KENNETH LOVETT And FREDRIC U. DICKER

The New York Post, September 28, 2006

September 28, 2006 -- ALBANY - In a devastating blow to her campaign, Republican attorney-general candidate Jeanine Pirro admitted yesterday she is under federal investigation for discussing with former city Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik how to secretly record her bad-boy husband to see if he was cheating.

Bombshell transcripts of conversations between Pirro and Kerik reveal that an angry Pirro even offered to plant the bug herself on her husband's boat, where she believed he was having sex with another woman.

"What am I supposed to do, Bernie? Watch him f- - - her every night?" Pirro is quoted as saying on the transcripts, obtained by WNBC-TV. "What am I supposed to do? . . . I can go on the boat, I'll put the f- - -ing thing on myself."

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia confirmed his office is "investigating allegations recently brought to our attention by other law-enforcement agencies" and is working with the FBI and Pirro's old District Attorney's Office in Westchester County.

Garcia is looking into whether Pirro engaged in illegal wiretapping, which carries a five-year maximum prison sentence.

The conversations between Pirro and Kerik came to light as federal investigators tapped the former NYPD commissioner's phone during an unrelated investigation, according to sources.

Pirro, who has hired a lawyer, was Westchester County DA in the summer of 2005 and gearing up for a run against Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton when she became convinced that husband Al was being unfaithful and she wanted to catch him in the act.

In one conversation, Pirro complained to Kerik, who heads a private security firm, that one of his workers was reluctant to board Al Pirro's boat.

Kerik said: "But Jeanine, I'm having the same f- - -ing problem with everybody. Everybody is panic-stricken because it's you. I've gone out on a limb. I've had two other people looking at this. It's a problem."

Soon after, according to the transcript, Kerik asked a contact at Rudy Giuliani's consulting firm to find him a recording device, WNBC/Channel 4 reported. A Giuliani spokeswoman had no comment.

Pirro also belittled the AG's office she is now seeking, calling it a "been-there-done-that kind of thing." She said she would have been in the governor's mansion if it weren't for her husband.

In a hastily called Manhattan press conference yesterday, Pirro tried to contain the fallout and insisted she is in the race to stay.

At times choking back tears, she angrily denied breaking the law, calling the investigation a "political witch hunt and smear campaign" that is "timed to affect a statewide election."

"It is wrong, it is an outrage and I demand an investigation into why sealed documents were leaked publicly," she said.

Thinking that her husband was again cheating on her - he fathered a love child more than two decades ago when the two were married - Pirro admitted she had him followed "to see if what I suspected was true."

While she talked with Kerik about secretly taping Al Pirro, no taping ever occurred, she insisted.

She said she was simply venting to the former police commissioner, who has had his own recent legal problems.

But the political fallout was already beginning last night.

Giuliani was supposed to host a fund-raiser for Pirro next week at the East Side Marriott, but according to a source close to the mayor, "We're not going forward with the Oct. 3 fund-raiser for Jeanine."

"She's done," a top Republican political operative said simply of Pirro, who already trailed Democratic AG opponent Andrew Cuomo by double digits in recent polls.

Kerik's lawyer said his client e was listening to a friend in distress and that "nothing illegal was discussed and nothing illegal was done."

Even if she had taped her husband, Pirro argued, there is nothing illegal about one spouse taping another.

"There was anger, frustration and disappointment, so why a federal investigation?" said Pirro.

She said she was approached earlier this week outside her house at 10 p.m. by two FBI agents who told her she was the target of a U.S. Attorney investigation.

She noted that one of the prosecutors, U.S. Assistant Attorney Elliot Jacobson, was the man who prosecuted her husband on tax-fraud charges seven years ago, "which is to say it's personal and highly improper."

"Prying into the business of a married couple is not the business of a federal prosecutor and it's time to stop," she said.

"Nothing happened that is or should be the business of the United States Attorney's Office."

Garcia denied politics was involved in his probe.

Pirro acknowledged her family over the years has had ups and downs and said she stays with her husband because he is a "great" father to their two children and her teenage son "needs his father with him."

"These are personal choices that I have made and I shouldn't have to keep explaining them," Pirro said, adding, "I've said it before and I'll say it again, I love my family."

The transcripts, though, quote Pirro as saying that without her husband's years of public transgressions, "I move into the governor's mansion."

Pirro did not reveal whether she found evidence he was having an affair.

Neither Al Pirro nor his lawyer returned calls for comment yesterday.

Yesterday's startling turn of events was just the latest in a long public saga of the Pirros' marriage.

It was 20 years ago that Pirro abandoned her campaign as the Republican candidate for lieutenant governor because of her then-virtually unknown husband Al's alleged ties to mob-connected companies. And it was almost a year ago that Pirro abandoned her campaign for U.S. Senate - deciding instead to run for attorney general - after her husband secretly worked behind the scenes to undermine her candidacy.

In 1995, a woman who worked for the Florida branch of Al Pirro's law firm stepped forward to claim that he had fathered her child.

After repeated denials and an insistence that the woman was a well-known liar, Al Pirro was forced by a court order a few years later to submit to a DNA test. It showed he was, in fact, the father.

In 1999, word surfaced that Al Pirro was the subject of a massive federal investigation into income-tax evasion. A year later, he was charged with evading taxes on $1 million in income and for claiming deductions on such luxuries as his own $123,000 Ferrari and his wife's new Mercedes.

He was eventually convicted on 66 counts of federal tax fraud and served 11 months in a federal prison.

In 2001, Al Pirro's law license was suspended because of his conviction, and remains so to this day.

In 2003, he denied allegations from a suspended Mamaroneck police officer that the department covered up an incident in which Al was stopped while driving drunk. His wife, who was in the car, allegedly demanded special treatment.

In 2004, Al Pirro was alleged by a FBI informant to have bragged to a local Westchester mobster that he was leaking confidential information involving an investigation being conducted by his wife's DA's Office.

In July, he was charged with driving nearly 100 mph on a Westchester highway. Earlier this month, he was accused of going more than twice the speed limit in a school traffic zone.

But through the years, Al Pirro also emerged as a wealthy and powerful Westchester County influence peddler and, after the 1994 election of good friend Gov. Pataki, he parlayed his power at the local and state level into influence.

Using his connections, Al Pirro set in motion a career ladder for his intelligent and attractive wife that led her from an initial appointive job as an assistant district attorney to her election as a Westchester judge in 1989 and then to her election to her defining post as Westchester DA in 1993.

In the mid-1990s the Pirros became close social friends with Pataki and his wife Libby, as well as then-U.S. Sen. Al D'Amato, and both used those connections to help advance Al Pirro's economic interests and Jeanine Pirro's political ambitions. As a result, during the '90s, Jeanine Pirro emerged as a rising star of New York GOP politics, talked about as a successor to D'Amato, as the next attorney general, and possibly even a candidate for governor herself.

Cuomo and state Democrats had no comment yesterday. State Republican Committee Chairman Stephen Minarik dismissed yesterday's revelations as a "political leak five weeks before an election."

"We stand 100 percent behind Jeanine and her candidacy," Minarik said. "This is an intensely private matter and should remain that way."

Uh, Jeanine, Hope You Had Career Plan B (NYDN)

By David Saltonstall, Daily News Senior Correspondent

New York Daily News, September 28, 2006

The political fallout for Jeanine Pirro was swift yesterday - a planned fund-raiser to be hosted by former Mayor Rudy Giuliani was abruptly canceled.

"We're not going forward," a source close to the former mayor said of the Oct. 3 event.

It was that kind of day for the former Westchester County district attorney, whose once sparkling career seemed to flame out in the space of a few hours amid revelations that she considered wiretapping her allegedly philandering husband - itself a potential crime.

"Oh ... my ... God," was all veteran political consultant George Arzt could say when told of Pirro's latest implosion. "In my 40 years in politics, this is the worst plummet I have ever seen."

It was hard to know which aspect of Pirro's latest fall was the most politically lethal yesterday - there were so many choices.

Was it that the tough-talking prosecutor discussed bugging her husband - an act federal investigators are now probing - with former Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik, who at the time was himself a soon-to-be-indicted con already being bugged by law enforcement?

Or was it the actual words that Pirro was caught uttering on those tapes in the summer of 2005, many of them four-lettered and some suggesting she was willing to break the law herself?

"I'll put the f-----g thing on myself," she tells Kerik when the former police commissioner expresses concerns about the legality of placing a bug on the Pirro family boat, according to transcripts of the tapes reported by WNBC NewsChannel 4.

Without her husband, she allegedly tells Kerik, "I move into the governor's mansion."

As for the attorney general's race, which she did not enter until months later, Pirro had nothing but disdain, telling Kerik it was a "been-there-done-that kind of thing."

Pirro forcefully stressed yesterday that she never went through with the wiretapping plot, casting herself instead as an angry and frustrated spouse who was just "venting" - and who remains a candidate for attorney general.

"I was a very angry woman, and I said a lot of things," Pirro told reporters.

As a political strategy, playing the spurned-but-still-married wife - as Pirro did masterfully, many said - was perhaps the best card she could play.

Think of Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.), who more than once converted her husband's "bimbo explosions" into politically potent sympathy, often by forthrightly facing the cameras as Pirro did yesterday.

Pirro also rightly pointed to the timing of yesterday's leak - coming just 41 days before the election, and more than a year after she was recorded - as more than a little suspicious, experts said.

But the writing may be on the wall. Pirro may or may not have committed a crime in trying to wiretap her husband, political experts agreed, but her fate as a viable candidate may have been sealed yesterday.

Pirro: Feds' Probe Is 'Highly Improper' (CBS2CHI)

CBS 2 Chicago, September 28, 2006

(CBS) NEW YORK State attorney general candidate Jeanine Pirro on Wednesday angrily denounced a federal probe of her plan to secretly record her husband because she suspected he was having an affair.

At a packed news conference in Manhattan, a furious and at times tearful Pirro insisted she would not quit the race and blasted the investigation as politically motivated and sexist.

"There is no way, when I have the opportunity to be the first woman attorney general in the history of this state, that I'm going to be pushed out of a race because somebody wants to delve into the personal lives of my husband and myself," Pirro said. "I'm standing up for myself and standing up for women."

DOJ_NMG_0070652

Pirro confirmed she had been informed by FBI agents this week that she was under investigation and said she had hired an attorney to represent her in the case.

But she insisted that prosecutors had no business delving into her troubled union with lobbyist Albert Pirro, who spent 11 months in prison on tax fraud charges and fathered an illegitimate daughter after their wedding.

"Sometime last year, I came to believe that my husband was seeing another woman," Pirro said. "In the midst of matrimonial discord, I was angry and had him followed to see if what I suspected was true. Although I spoke about taping him, there was no taping by me of anyone. There was anger, and frustration, and disappointment."

Pirro noted that one of the U.S. attorneys assigned to the case, Elliott B. Jacobson, had prosecuted her husband's tax evasion case seven years ago.

"This is personal and highly improper," she said, adding that she would demand an investigation into who leaked information about the case to reporters.

Michael J. Garcia, U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, released a statement Wednesday confirming the investigation but declined to offer details. But, Garcia said, "we do not take politics into account in deciding either the subject matter or timing of our investigations."

Pirro, a former Westchester County district attorney, spoke with Bernard Kerik, the disgraced ex-New York police commissioner, about possibly placing a recorder in a room to listen in on her husband, said two people familiar with the situation, who spoke to The Associated Press only on condition of anonymity.

Pirro said Kerik was a friend and confirmed that they had spoken about her marital concerns.

"I was a very angry woman, and I said a lot of things," Pirro said. "What matters is what I did and didn't do, and I didn't do anything here other than vent."

Kerik, who was working as a private consultant when the conversation occurred, has his own problems. There were reports that during his 18-month tenure as police commissioner he had simultaneous extramarital affairs with two women, including the publisher of his memoir. And he pleaded guilty three months ago to accepting tens of thousands of dollars in gifts from a New Jersey firm accused of having mob connections.

Kerik lawyer Joseph Tacopina confirmed Kerik's role in the matter but said he had become involved through a long friendship with Pirro.

"Bernie spoke to a friend in distress regarding a domestic issue," Tacopina said. "Nothing illegal was said, and nothing illegal was done."

Pirro, a Republican who faces former federal Housing Secretary Andrew Cuomo in the attorney general's race, repeatedly said this was a personal matter involving her husband and charged she was the target of "an unethical, overzealous prosecutor with a partisan agenda."

A telephone call to Albert Pirro's White Plains office was not immediately returned Wednesday. A Cuomo spokeswoman, Wendy Katz, declined comment.

Pirro, whose troubled relationship with her husband of 21 years has been a source of controversy throughout her public life, was unusually candid when she spoke of why she remained in the marriage. They have a 21-year-old daughter and a 17-year-old son.

"My husband is a great father. I have two beautiful children in school ... a teenage son, who needs his father with him," she said, her voice cracking with emotion. "These are personal choices that I have made, and I shouldn't have to keep explaining them."

U.S. Attorney's Office Fires Back At Pirro Accusations (WNBC-TV)

WNBC-TV, September 28, 2006

The U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York says the investigation is far from a game of politics.

Pirro stated in an afternoon news conference that the timing of the investigation is improper, and said prosecutors had no business delving into her troubled union with lobbyist Albert Pirro, who spent 11 months in prison on tax fraud charges and fathered an illegitimate daughter after their wedding.

Shortly afterward, Michael J. Garcia, the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York released this statement:

"This Office is, as Jeanine Pirro said today, investigating allegations recently brought to our attention by other law enforcement agencies, involving possible violations of Title 18, United States Code, Sections 2511(1)(a) and (b).

There are two Assistant United States Attorneys assigned to the case. They are both career prosecutors with experience in public corruption matters. They are working in conjunction with an experienced Assistant District Attorney from the Westchester County District Attorney's Office.

DOJ_NMG_0070653

Their actions, and those of the FBI agents with whom they are working, have been approved by several layers of supervisors, including me. Because the investigation is ongoing, we will not comment as to its substance, except to say that we do not take politics into account in deciding either the subject matter or timing of our investigations."

In The Murky World Of Marital Spying, Legal Pitfalls Await Those Who Tape A Spouse (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

Jeanine F. Pirro, in criticizing what she called a politically motivated federal investigation into whether she illegally eavesdropped on her husband, insisted yesterday that anything she had done, or considered doing, to find out if her spouse was having an affair was entirely legal.

Ms. Pirro's insistence that she never contemplated doing anything illegal in investigating her husband — including her discussion of placing a recording device on a boat he owned — involves the somewhat murky world of what amounts to marital spying.

Paul Shechtman, the lawyer Ms. Pirro retained recently, said that federal law permitted spouses to eavesdrop on each other in a house they shared. He cited several cases, including one from 1986 in which a federal judge on Long Island dismissed a case brought by a woman whose husband placed a listening device on the family phone in the course of their divorce, but while they were still sharing a house.

And on the specific question of whether it would be legal for Ms. Pirro to place a device on her husband's boat, Mr. Shechtman argued that it would be as well, because the boat was used by the entire family. "It's a family boat," he said.

But some experts were not so sure.

"If the boat is registered only in his name, it could be considered unlawful wiretapping," said Robert Mann, director of global operations for Worldwide Intelligence Network, a private investigation and personal protection company headquartered in Los Angeles.

Steven F. Gruel, a criminal defense lawyer and a former federal prosecutor in San Francisco, said that surreptitiously recording conversations was always risky because of the broad scope of a federal law that generally prohibits intercepting the communications of others. The rights of other people caught on any recordings might become an issue, he noted, saying, "Who else is going to be in the room other than the person being targeted?"

If Ms. Pirro's claim that she never went ahead with any plan to record her husband was true, Mr. Gruel said, she had made the right choice.

"Given that this area of law at the federal and state levels is laden with pitfalls and uncertainties, it sounds like the prudent thing was done, which was nothing," he said.

That is what Ms. Pirro, the Republican candidate for state attorney general, stressed during her news conference when she conceded that she had discussed recording her husband in the summer of 2005. She had those discussions with Bernard B. Kerik, the former police commissioner of New York, who was then running a private security firm.

"I was a very angry woman and I said a lot of things," she said about the conversations. "But what matters is what I did and didn't do. And I didn't do anything here other than vent."

And that, Ms. Pirro insisted, should be clear to federal investigators. She said the timing and nature of the investigation — in the final weeks of a campaign and involving the embarrassing issue of marital strife — made clear to her that the investigation was driven by politics.

She offered no specifics to support that claim, but mentioned a federal prosecutor, Elliott B. Jacobson, suggesting he was involved in the inquiry. Mr. Jacobson, an assistant federal prosecutor for the Southern District of New York, had prosecuted her husband, Albert J. Pirro Jr., several years ago for tax evasion.

"This is a waste of taxpayer money timed to affect the outcome of a statewide election," she said. She asked for an investigation into how sealed documents related to the inquiry had become public.

Mr. Jacobson, a registered Democrat who worked under Rudolph W. Giuliani when he was the federal prosecutor, did not respond to telephone messages left at his office and home.

But his boss, Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney in Manhattan, issued an unusually forthright statement in which he confirmed that Ms. Pirro was under investigation for possibly violating federal wiretapping laws. Mr. Garcia, who was appointed by President Bush last year, said that two assistant United States attorneys were assigned to the case, though he did not name them.

"They are both career prosecutors with experience in public corruption matters," Mr. Garcia said. "They are working in conjunction with an experienced assistant district attorney from the Westchester County district attorney's office. Their actions, and those of the F.B.I. agents with whom they are working, have been approved by several layers of supervisors, including me."

Kerik Is Again A Figure In An Official Investigation (NYT)

By Russ Buettner And William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

The name of Bernard B. Kerik has already figured in embarrassing moments for the Bush administration and for former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

Yesterday, Mr. Kerik's name turned up in yet another uncomfortable place: a federal investigation that threatens to disrupt the race for state attorney general.

In a rare afternoon news break, WNBC television revealed that Jeanine F. Pirro, the former Westchester County district attorney and current Republican candidate for attorney general, was captured with Mr. Kerik last year on wiretaps discussing how Mr. Kerik might secretly record Ms. Pirro's husband, Albert J. Pirro Jr., to catch him in a suspected affair with another woman.

The conversations took place in mid-2005, long after Mr. Kerik's rise to fame in the months after Sept. 11, 2001, had been upended by damaging allegations that emerged after his nomination by President Bush to become the nation's homeland security secretary.

Mr. Kerik had left Mr. Giuliani's consulting business, Giuliani Partners, months earlier and was opening his own security firm, the Kerik Group. But he remained under investigation by the Bronx district attorney's office, which was finding that as New York City corrections commissioner, he had accepted free renovations to his Bronx apartment from a city contractor when the company was under investigation for possible ties to organized crime.

Apparently as part of that investigation, Bronx authorities began listening to Mr. Kerik's conversations, including several in which Ms. Pirro asked him to undertake the grunt work of the average private investigator, marital surveillance.

Ms. Pirro yesterday did not deny the substance of the conversations as reported by WNBC. The station said that in a profanity-laced exchange, the two discussed whether Mr. Kerik's company could place a recording device on her husband's boat to capture evidence of any trysts.

In the conversations, WNBC said, Ms. Pirro expressed frustration that her husband might be cheating on her.

At one point, Ms. Pirro complained that an employee of Mr. Kerik seemed hesitant to plant a recording device and offered what she suggested was a plausible reason that workers might be on the boat.

"We can just simply say, if there is an issue, that I am redecorating it for our anniversary," Ms. Pirro said, according to the WNBC report.

Mr. Kerik, WNBC said, spoke during the conversation with concern that recording conversations on the boat might be problematic, although the report did not specify what the problems were. "Everybody is panic-stricken because it's you," Mr. Kerik was quoted as telling Ms. Pirro.

Ms. Pirro, swearing, said during one conversation that if need be, she would put the monitoring device on the boat herself.

WNBC reported that Mr. Kerik, just minutes later, called an employee at Mr. Giuliani's consulting firm and asked him to find a recording device. A spokeswoman for Mr. Giuliani, Sunny Mindel, declined to comment yesterday.

Although federal prosecutors confirmed the existence of the investigation, they declined to comment yesterday on whether they believe a recording device was ever planted and used. Ms. Pirro said emphatically that none had been.

Joseph Tacopina, a lawyer for Mr. Kerik, said yesterday that Mr. Kerik had done nothing wrong in discussing a possible investigation of a marital dispute.

"I don't think this is a problem. This is not a problem," Mr. Tacopina said. "Bernie had his problems. He dealt with them in the Bronx."

Earlier this year, at the conclusion of the joint investigation by the Bronx district attorney's office and the city's Department of Investigation, Mr. Kerik pleaded guilty to two misdemeanors stemming from the apartment renovation. Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg ordered Mr. Kerik's name removed from the city jail in Lower Manhattan that had been named in his honor.

One person familiar with the conversations, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the matter, said the Bronx district attorney's office had provided tapes of the conversations to Janet DiFiore, the Westchester County district attorney. The tapes were later passed on to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and federal prosecutors in Manhattan. Spokesmen for the Bronx and Westchester County district attorneys' offices would not comment.

Mr. Pirro has been listed as owner of several boats in recent years. Current state records describe him as owning a 26-foot-long pleasure craft that is registered in his name only.

In an afternoon news conference after the WNBC broadcast, Ms. Pirro characterized the federal investigation of her conversations with Mr. Kerik as politically motivated.

Ms. Pirro and Mr. Kerik have a history of lending professional support to each other. Earlier this year, Mr. Kerik sent an e-mail message to friends urging them to support Ms. Pirro's campaign.

"Jeanine Pirro is a fighter," Mr. Kerik wrote, according to a copy of the e-mail message obtained by The New York Times. "Smart, understanding and tough," the message goes on, "she has dedicated her career to fighting crime and improving the lives of her fellow New Yorkers."

Several friends of Mr. Kerik have lost their jobs in the fallout from the investigations into his conduct, including the Correction Department's longtime inspector general, Michael Caruso, and Thomas Antenen, Mr. Kerik's spokesman at both the Correction and Police Departments.

And the contractors accused of having played a role in the renovation of Mr. Kerik's apartment, Peter and Frank DiTomasso, are under a felony perjury indictment for telling a Bronx grand jury that they had nothing to do with it.

Federal investigators are still looking into other matters regarding Mr. Kerik, including his role in a Correction Department charity that spent $1 million in rebates on cigarettes bought with city money.

Judge Declares Another Mistrial In Gotti Racketeering Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-For the third time in the past 12 months, a judge declared a mistrial Wednesday in the racketeering trial of former mob boss John A. "Junior" Gotti.

The jury, which deliberated for seven days over two weeks, sent out a second note in as many days indicating it could not reach a unanimous verdict. "Your honor, unfortunately we are deadlocked," said the note, prompting U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin to declare the mistrial shortly after noon.

A relieved Gotti hugged his brother Peter and other supporters, then wiped his eyes while sitting at the defense table.

"It was a tough one," said Gotti, who has almost become a full-time defendant in the last year. "This one drained the life from me."

Two previous juries in the last year wound up deadlocked, with resulting mistrials, after Gotti's lawyers argued the second-generation Mafiosi had years ago severed his ties to organized crime. If convicted, the 42-year-old Gotti had faced up to 30 years in prison.

He is free on $7 million (â‚¬5.52 million) bail, and there was no immediate word on whether the government would mount a fourth prosecution.

"That's a decision above my pay grade," said prosecutor Victor Hou when asked about the possibility. The defense made motions to suspend Gotti's current home detention and electric surveillance by the government.

From the start, the key issue in the case has been whether Gotti quit the Gambino crime family as he claims before July 1999. If so, a five-year statute of limitations would have expired before prosecutors brought new racketeering charges in 2004.

Prosecutors say the jury should conclude Gotti continued to receive mob money after 1999 and thus was part of a racketeering conspiracy.

His defense lawyers say Gotti paid a large fine when he pleaded guilty to a racketeering charge in another case in 1999 and was permitted to keep the property and businesses which remained, regardless of where the money originated.

Gotti was also accused of ordering two 1992 attacks on radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa, including one where he was shot twice before escaping out the window of a taxi rigged to keep him trapped inside.

Prosecutors have said Gotti was retaliating for on-air attacks against his father, John Gotti, who was sentenced in 1992 to life in prison without parole. He died in prison in 2002.

Sliwa sat in the courtroom, looking disappointed, as the mistrial was declared.

But this trial didn't focus as much as the first two did on the Sliwa attacks. Prosecutors instead aimed their evidence at convincing jurors that Gotti never quit the mob before he pleaded guilty to racketeering charges in 1999 as he insisted he had.

They tracked Gotti's financial moves to try to convince the jury that Gotti never left the mob because he continued earning money off businesses such as real estate that he started with crime-tainted money.

Gotti's defense team acknowledged his life in organized crime, but insisted their client had retired from the Mafia and had no role in the Sliwa attack. Gotti was indicted on these charges in July 2004, just two months before he was due out of prison on a prior conviction.

Last September, a jury deadlocked 11-1 in favor of conviction. At his second trial, the majority of the second jury favored acquitting Gotti in March after his lawyers successfully emphasized their claim that he had had quit the mob.

The trials were meant to resolve the 14-year-old question of whether Gotti ordered two assaults on Sliwa. Sliwa and prosecutors maintained the Gambino family targeted him to halt his daily verbal fusillades against Gotti's father.

"He's getting personal," Gotti allegedly told one of Sliwa's attackers. "I want us to get personal."

Sliwa testified for a third time, although he was called by the defense at this trial.

According to authorities, the younger Gotti assumed control of the powerful Gambino family after his father's 1992 conviction on racketeering and murder charges.

For The Third Time, A Jury Fails To Convict Gotti (NYT)

By Timothy Williams

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

For the third time in just over a year, a federal jury yesterday failed to reach a verdict in the racketeering prosecution of John A. Gotti, the former head of the Gambino crime family, allowing him to walk free even though jurors said they believed he was guilty of one of the main accusations against him.

A federal official said that after three mistrials, the prosecution was unlikely to retry Mr. Gotti unless new evidence turned up, a decision that would all but end an expensive and highly publicized organized crime prosecution in a startling defeat for the government.

Jurors said they believed Mr. Gotti was guilty of orchestrating the 1992 shooting and bungled kidnapping of Curtis Sliwa, the radio talk-show host. But, the jurors said, the government failed to prove that the shooting was part of a pattern of crimes, a necessary part of the racketeering charge, and so they could not convict him.

Jurors, who first said on Tuesday afternoon that they could not reach a verdict, told Judge Shira A. Scheindlin that they had made no significant progress since Monday. They had deliberated for a total of six and a half days and were dismissed at midday yesterday after they sent the judge a note just before lunch that read, “Your Honor, unfortunately, we are deadlocked.”

After the judge read the note, Mr. Gotti cried and rested his head on his folded hands on the defense table. He then reached over to hug his lead lawyer, Charles Carnesi. His sister Angel, brother Peter and other friends and family members in the packed courtroom also began to sob.

“It’s enough now, they got to let us go,” Mr. Gotti, 42, told reporters afterward, referring to prosecutions against him and his late father, John J. Gotti, who preceded him as family boss. “Just let me go and let me move on with my life. Let us go. He’s dead.”

The jurors’ names were not disclosed. After they were dismissed, several said they had been unable to agree on the trial’s key issue: whether Mr. Gotti had withdrawn from the Gambino organized crime family before July 1999, which was an essential piece of the defense’s case.

“Ultimately, it’s based on our division regarding withdrawal,” said one juror, a woman in her 40’s who described herself as a health professional. Four jurors believed that Mr. Gotti had quit the mob, eight did not, she said.

A law enforcement official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak about the case, said the government would not prosecute Mr. Gotti again on the same charges unless it turned up new evidence — or was able to link him directly to a murder.

His father became known as “the Teflon Don” after he avoided conviction at three state and federal trials from 1984 to 1990. By the time he was convicted on federal murder and racketeering charges in 1992 and died in prison in 2002, he had become famous.

The Gotti name automatically linked the son with organized crime in the national consciousness while guaranteeing that the trial would be well attended. Mr. Gotti’s public persona seemed different during the three trials — the first in September 2005, the second in March 2006. Before they started, his wardrobe consisted of velour track suits, but in court he wore coats and ties.

During this trial, Mr. Carnesi acknowledged for the first time that Mr. Gotti led the Gambino family during part of the 1990’s. In addition to two racketeering charges, Mr. Gotti faced single counts of extortion and witness tampering, but the jury divided on those as well.

Because the jurors could not reach a verdict, the charges against Mr. Gotti still stand, at least for now. Seth Ginsberg, one of Mr. Gotti’s lawyers, told Judge Scheindlin that he planned to ask that the charges be dismissed and that some conditions of Mr. Gotti’s bail be ended, including home confinement and electronic monitoring.

Mr. Gotti could have been sentenced to up to 70 years behind bars if convicted on all counts. Before the first trial, he rejected a government plea deal that would have sentenced him to 17 years; later he turned down an offer of 10 years before the second trial and 5 years before the third.

The most serious act under the racketeering charge against Mr. Gotti was that he had ordered the abduction and beating of Mr. Sliwa, a founder of the Guardian Angels. Witnesses testified that Mr. Gotti was angered by what Mr. Sliwa said on the radio about the Gotti family, including calling his father a drug dealer.

DOJ_NMG_0070657

Mr. Sliwa was shot twice and escaped his attackers by leaping out the window of a speeding taxicab commandeered by two Gambino crime family enforcers, according to witnesses. Mr. Sliwa, 52, testified for the prosecution in the first two trials, but in the third, it was not the prosecution that called him, but the defense.

Yesterday, Mr. Sliwa watched the teary Gotti family celebration from the back of the courtroom, gritting his teeth.

Jurors said they quickly agreed that Mr. Gotti was responsible for the abduction and shooting of Mr. Sliwa, but in order to convict Mr. Gotti under the full racketeering count, they would have had to find him guilty of at least one more act in the racketeering charge — witness tampering, extortion or loan sharking.

"It's an insult to injury that the jury can be so clear about that, then see him hug and glad-hand his supporters and walk free," Mr. Sliwa said outside court. "Now I'm going to have to see him party."

The six-week trial delved into a number of murky areas: Mr. Gotti's personal finances, the truthfulness of the testimony of two former Gambino family members, and the question at the center of each of the trials: whether Mr. Gotti had truly quit the Gambino crime family before July 1999.

The date was critical because if the jury was unable to find evidence of criminal activity by Mr. Gotti after July 1999, the five-year statute of limitations on the racketeering charges would have expired by the time Mr. Gotti was indicted in 2004.

Mr. Carnesi said Mr. Gotti quit the mob as he prepared to begin serving a 77-month prison sentence in 1999 on unrelated charges of racketeering and illegal gambling. Two former Gambino family members who had been Mr. Gotti's confidants testified against him, but they acknowledged that they did not know that he was involved in crime after July 1999.

The government's case was built around F.B.I. surveillance recordings of Mr. Gotti while he was in prison. The recordings, though muffled and often difficult to understand, appeared to present a vengeful and petty Mr. Gotti who threatened violence against his uncles as well as against people who he feared might testify against Gambino family members in various trials, including his own.

Jurors said the quality of the sound undercut the recordings' usefulness.

"The tapes didn't help," said one juror, a man in his 40's, who described himself as a security supervisor at a law firm.

Another juror, an editor at a newspaper, also in his 40's, said: "My worry is that this is the only life he has known, and if he is out, I hope he doesn't get drawn back in. I think he's been given a real chance here, and I hope he takes advantage of it."

Mr. Gotti said he was looking forward to spending time with his family and wanted to "work with children."

"I can't tell you how thankful I am for this jury," he said. "They saved my life."

Jury Tunes Out Tapes (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, September 28, 2006

The hours of jailhouse tapes played during John A. (Junior) Gotti's latest trial made for some great courtroom drama - but didn't have much of an impact on the jury deciding his fate.

"The tapes were a very cloudy issue because you couldn't hear them very well," one juror said yesterday after the panel deadlocked - prompting Gotti's third straight mistrial.

The female juror and two others agreed to speak with the press yesterday after seven days of deliberations locked in a windowless room.

The panel was split, 8 to 4, in favor of conviction, on most counts. Each side made arguments, most low-key, some emotional.

But in the end, no one was budging.

"We voted again this morning on every count" and nothing changed, said the female juror, who works as a meeting planner.

Among the anonymous panel of seven women and five men was a working journalist and one who has left the profession, a nursery school director, a college professor and a former singer.

The jurors who talked with the press said they were confused by testimony about Gotti's finances and that allegations that he had continued to rake in mob money even after 1999 - when he said he quit the mob - just didn't add up.

"We didn't feel that we had all the information," said another female juror, a health professional.

The only thing they could agree on was that Gotti had a role in the 1992 attack on radio host Curtis Sliwa. Sliwa was shot after getting into a cab near his lower East Side apartment.

The jurors said they were not swayed by defense suggestions that Sliwa's inability to identify his attackers masked an all-out effort to blame Gotti in the shooting.

Some panelists questioned the motivation behind the testimony of Gotti's brother Peter, who denied retrieving some $50,000 in mob money from Gambino capo Michael (Mikey Scars) DiLeonardo for his brother.

DOJ_NMG_0070658

"We all felt he was there to support his brother," said one female juror. "We weighed it against that."

The panel split, 6 to 6, on the witness-tampering charge involving Gotti's alleged attempt to get to DiLeonardo - a key turncoat witness - through DiLeonardo's son.

Most panelists held on tightly to their convictions from the start, with little movement among the camps.

Still, they said they continued deliberating right up until the moment yesterday afternoon when they told Manhattan Federal Judge Shira Scheindlin they were deadlocked.

MISTRIAL TEARS OF JOY FOR 'JR.' (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, September 28, 2006

September 28, 2006 -- It was strike three for prosecutors in the John "Junior" Gotti case yesterday as a federal judge declared a third mistrial - a stunning development that could mean freedom for the mob scion.

The Teflon son of late Gambino boss John "Dapper Don" Gotti buried his face in his hands and wept as Manhattan Federal Judge Shira Scheindlin read the final note from a deeply divided anonymous jury.

"Your honor, unfortunately we are deadlocked," wrote the hung jury, which deliberated into a seventh day before throwing in the towel.

An emotional Gotti bear-hugged brother Peter and sister Angel and then turned to the future, announcing his hopes to move his family to the Midwest and pursue a degree in child psychology.

"[If] they let me leave, I'll leave. I'll take my family and I'll go. Let me move on with my life," said Gotti, 42, who accused the feds of going after him because of his father's legacy.

Three jurors who spoke with reporters after the verdict revealed that the panel agreed on one thing - all 12 believed was Gotti guilty of the sensational 1992 kidnapping of radio host Curtis Sliwa.

That wasn't enough for conviction because the kidnapping was charged under a racketeering count that requires prosecutors to prove a second criminal act.

"I'd be better off dead," said a disgusted Sliwa, who got little consolation from the mixed result. "This guy got away with a crime . . . but as God is my witness, God will not forget that he tried to kill me."

"I know he's going to go straight to hell without an asbestos suit," said Sliwa, flanked by red-jacketed members of the Guardian Angels civilian patrol group, which he founded.

The sticking point for the jury was Gotti's claim that he retired from the mob in 1999 and therefore could not be convicted under the five-year statute of limitations - with four jurors buying that defense, the jurors said.

Prosecutors tried to overcome the defense by showing Gotti continued to live lavishly off his ill-gotten gains.

The panel was also split 6-6 over an alleged witness-tampering plot targeting star turncoat Michael "Mikey Scars" DiLeonardo in 2003 and voted 8-4 that Gotti was guilty of construction-industry extortion and related crimes.

The jury first announced it was deadlocked at 12:15 p.m. Tuesday, but followed the judge's instruction to continue trying to reach a verdict, before giving up at 12:05 p.m. yesterday.

Gotti was facing up to 30 years behind bars if convicted.

In dismissing the jurors, Scheindlin commended their dedication and said their inability to reach a verdict was "not your failure. The case has its difficulties."

Gotti lawyer Seth Ginsberg told the judge the defense would file legal papers asking for dismissal of the charges.

Prosecutors, who mounted their case three times over the past year only to get the same non-result, would not say whether there would be a fourth trial.

Outside court, Gotti told a crush of news crews, "I'd like to go back to school, get a degree in child psychology."

"I'd like to work with children," said the former Gambino leader, who already penned one children's book while behind bars and plans to write another.

A THIRD MISTRIAL (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Staff Writer; Staff Writers Wil Cruz, Herbert Lowe And Carl Macgowan Contributed To This Story.

Long Island Newsday, September 28, 2006

His father was the Teflon Don, but John A. Gotti is proving to be very slippery, too.

For the third time in about a year, a federal jury deadlocked yesterday in the racketeering case against the son of the late Gambino crime boss, ending the case in a mistrial and forcing federal prosecutors to decide if they should try again to stick him with a conviction.

After six full days of deliberation, the jury in federal court in Manhattan failed to agree on any of the four counts in the indictment and prompted Judge Shira Scheindlin to declare the mistrial shortly after noon. Some jurors later told reporters that the government's case wasn't overwhelming but added that Gotti's claim he withdrew from mob life didn't convince many either.

"Unfortunately we are deadlocked," the jury of five men and seven women reported in a note Scheindlin read out in court at 12:15 p.m.

With the word "deadlocked," the 42-year-old Gotti buried his face in his head and gasped. Defense attorney Seth Ginsberg gave him a hearty slap on the back. Gotti then turned to lead defense counsel Charles Carnesi and planted a kiss on his check and gave him a crushing embrace.

"This was a tough one, it drained the life out of me," said Gotti after the jury left the courtroom. He then took a cell phone call from his wife, Kim, who was with the couple's six children at their Oyster Bay home.

Gotti said the government should move on and not take another shot at him.

"My father's dead for over four years; it is time for us to move on ... it is time for us all to move on," Gotti said. He then drove to his 65-year-old mother Victoria's home in Howard Beach and left there at about 4 p.m., presumably for Oyster Bay.

By failing to reach unanimity, the jury couldn't decide on charges of racketeering conspiracy, racketeering, extortion conspiracy and witness tampering.

The mistrial was a clear indication that a revised government presentation, which included prison tapes and financial evidence, failed to sway the jury. Jurors said that the only thing they agreed on was that Gotti took part in the 1992 abduction and wounding of radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa. But the Sliwa act was only one so-called "predicate" racketeering crime for which two were needed for conviction on the substantive racketeering charge.

"John Gotti Junior has to be the luckiest person in the world ... it's absolutely unbelievable that he escapes justice and gets to walk out of court," said Sliwa. "It actually would have been better if I were dead, believe it or not, because then he would have been held culpable."

Since the trial opened last month, prosecutors Victor Hou and Miriam Rocah presented tapes made of Gotti while he was at Ray Brook federal prison in upstate New York, as well as tapes made of him and his father. The prosecutors believed the tapes showed that the younger Gotti never left his life of crime prior to July 21, 1999, as he had claimed. That date was important because it would put the indictment outside the statute of limitations.

In addition, prosecutors were using the tapes to show that he was still taking extortion money after July 21, 1999. But some jurors later said the tapes were inconclusive.

Immediately after the verdict, Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia issued a terse statement that expressed disappointment but praised his staff.

"We are disappointed ... but we commend the dedication of our prosecutors and the agents who worked on this case," said Garcia. "We will inform the court in the very near future about how we plan to proceed."

Carnesi said the defense would be asking for a dismissal of the indictment.

Shortly after the mistrial, Ginsberg asked Scheindlin to change the terms of Gotti's $7-million bail so that he wouldn't be under home confinement. Scheindlin was expected to approve that request late yesterday.

"We feel so great, I can't tell you, I feel first for my mother, second for my brother," said Gotti's sister, Victoria.

Gotti said he didn't have wild plans for the night.

"To go home and sleep in my own bed and be with my children, that is my celebration," Gotti told Newsday when asked how he would celebrate.

Staff writers Wil Cruz, Herbert Lowe and Carl MacGowan contributed to this story.

Fuhgeddaboud Me Stayin' Here (NYDN)

By Austin Fenner, Jose Martinez, And Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, September 28, 2006

Prosecutors' third bid to send John A. (Junior) Gotti back to prison ended with their third mistrial yesterday - spurring bittersweet tears from the mob scion and a vow to leave New York forever.

It appeared unlikely last night that the government would seek a fourth trial, giving the Teflon Son a chance to prove he really has ditched the mob life he inherited from his father, whose specter loomed large over the courthouse.

"They let me leave, I'll leave," Gotti, 42, told reporters outside Manhattan Federal Court, as he pledged to flee his Long Island mansion with his wife and six children for a quieter life in the Midwest.

"I'll take my family and I'll go. It's enough now. They got to let go. Let us go, he's [Dapper Don John Gotti] dead. We just want to move on. He's in Tomb 451 at St. John's [Cemetery, Queens]. It's over.

DOJ_NMG_0070660

"If they let me, I want to go back to school," he added, his lawyer Charles Carnesi by his side. "I want to study child psychology and I want to write a book. I want to buy some property out west .... In the 1990s, I lived an opulent and extraordinary lifestyle. I have very simple needs now.

"I want to start from scratch, wherever my wife would be happy," he said. "I'm different than my father. My children are my life. You can convert me. My father you could not ...

"I want to thank this jury. They saved my life," he said before leaving for a pizza party with family.

The emotional words came after the jury declared themselves deadlocked a second straight day. Judge Shira Scheindlin relented and declared a mistrial.

Gotti rode his "I quit the mob" defense to the third mistrial by convincing four holdout jurors he chucked the Mafia life - even though the panel agreed he was responsible for the 1992 attack on radio host Curtis Sliwa.

"Your honor, unfortunately we are deadlocked," the jury said in a signed note that ended their seventh and final day of deliberations.

With those words, the burly Gotti bowed his head and cried. A few rows back, his brother Peter wiped away tears. Sister Angel slumped into her husband's arms weeping.

"It's over," she said.

Scheindlin seemed to express the same sentiments when she urged Gotti's lawyers to file a motion to dismiss the racketeering indictment that could have put him behind bars for 30 years.

Later, at the frame house in Howard Beach, Queens, that John (Dapper Don) Gotti called home, the Don's widow, Victoria, welcomed her oldest son with hugs and kisses. Daughter Victoria, the writer and reality TV star, arrived with a stack of fresh pizzas.

"I will thank our good fortune every day for a judge like Shira Schiendlin," Mamma Gotti told the Daily News. "She is the difference between a fair trial and a railroad job. God bless her."

"It's been torture for her," daughter Victoria said of her mother. "She hasn't slept right. She hasn't eaten right. It was like her life stopped. She was at her breaking point."

Junior Gotti was facing a four-count racketeering indictment and the key the issue was whether he quit the Gambino crime family as he claims before July 1999.

If so, a five-year statute of limitations would have expired before prosecutors brought new racketeering charges in 2004.

The only charge jurors unanimously agreed upon was that he was guilty of the June 1992 attack on Guardian Angels founder Sliwa, which followed his relentless battering of the Gotti clan on his WABC radio show.

But the 12-0 vote on the Sliwa kidnapping claim proved a hollow victory for prosecutors, who needed to prove Gotti participated in at least two criminal acts in the four-count conspiracy in order to win a guilty verdict.

The jurors' 6-6 split on a witness-tampering charge involving the son of mob informant Michael (Mikey Scars) DiLeonardo. The panel split 8-4, in favor of conviction, on the other major counts.

"He lives to high-five and laugh at me another day," a stunned Sliwa said outside the courthouse. "But I'll have the last laugh either in the criminal justice system or when we're knocking at St. Peter's gate.... You can bet your last George Washington I will continue to be John Gotti Jr's worst nightmare."

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said he was disappointed in the outcome, adding, "We will inform the court in the very near future about how we plan to proceed."

At the time of the last mistrial, in March, prosecutors said almost immediately they would try Gotti again.

Before the start of this trial, Scheindlin raised questions about the fairness of trying someone three times and sounded reluctant to let prosecutors give it a fourth try.

The judge indicated that she would consider lifting house-arrest restrictions on Gotti, who is out on $7 million bail.

Gotti took a risk by going to trial, turning down a plea offer before trial that would have allowed him to go free after five years.

He feared that prosecutors would come after him again. After taking a plea deal in 1999 and serving nearly six years on racketeering charges, federal prosecutors slapped him with a new indictment in 2004 as he was about to go home.

He spent more than $1 million in legal fees, by mortgaging his $1.3 million Oyster Bay Cove, L.I., estate and borrowing from family and friends.

"It was a tough one," Gotti said of his third trial. "This one drained the life out of me."

With Tamer El Ghobashy and John Lauinger

When all's said and Don...

"In the 1990s, I lived an opulent and extraordinary lifestyle. I have very simple needs now."

"I'll take my family and I'll go. It's enough now. They got to let go. Let us go, he's [John (Dapper Don) Gotti] dead."

DOJ_NMG_0070661

"I want to start from scratch, wherever my wife would be happy. I'm different than my father. My children are my life. You can convert me. My father you could not."

Will Prosecutors Throw In Towel? (NSDY)

By Joseph Mallia And Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writers

Long Island Newsday, September 28, 2006

Experts agree: It'll be tough to get a conviction - ever

Legal experts to Gottiprosecutors: Three strikes, you're out.

John A. Gotti's third deadlocked jury - and racketeering mistrial - should mark the end of his legal saga, academic experts and defense lawyers said yesterday.

"This case is fatally flawed. One could even say that if they bring it again it would be abuse of prosecutorial power," said Fordham Law School professor Jim Cohen, who specializes in criminal law.

"There were concerns in the legal community that the case was brought to trial this time," Cohen said. "It would be very surprising if it were brought a fourth time."

One thing on which several experts agreed: After the highly visible defeats, prosecutors must balance mounting costs - by one estimate already exceeding $1 million - against chances of success.

U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia hasn't said whether his office will drop the case, which was based on the charge that Gotti, known as "Junior," replaced his father, John J. Gotti, as the Gambino crime family boss.

A Manhattan federal court jury of five men and seven women told U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin yesterday it couldn't agree on a key question: whether Gotti had withdrawn from the crime family by July 1999.

Observers said the U.S. attorney's office operated on the belief that Gotti's withdrawal was a sham, but had not convinced the jury with persuasive evidence.

"If I were in charge, the kind of question I would ask is, 'Can you convince me that, in a subsequent trial, we can be more persuasive?'" New York University Law School professor James Jacobs said.

"And, 'Why do you think it would come out differently than the last two or three?'"

A decision to try again would be viable only if new witnesses or information had come to light, said Jacobs, author of the books "Mobsters, Unions and Feds" and "Busting the Mob."

Cosa Nostra cases typically depend on the quality of surveillance tapes, undercover officers, participating witnesses and wiretapped conversations, Jacobs said. Clear financial links between an organized crime suspect and a flow of money from unexplained, or illegal, sources is also crucial, Jacobs said.

But in the "Junior" Gotti cases, the money flow wasn't easy to prove, he said.

Jacobs was skeptical that any new evidence is forthcoming.

"They've been investigating for a long time. It's probable that they have surfaced as much evidence as they can against John Gotti," Jacobs said.

In all three cases, the number of jurors who favored the defense is a clear indication that the evidence was weak, defense lawyers said.

In yesterday's mistrial, the jurors were unanimous on only one charge, while others were split 6-6 and 8-4 in favor of conviction, jurors said afterward.

"I'm not a statistics expert but a sample of 36 jurors over three trials is pretty strong evidence the prosecution should drop the case," said Gerald Lefcourt, a past president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers.

Manhattan defense lawyer Gerald Shargel said the courts must look hard at a decision to continue prosecuting the case.

"My view is that enough is enough," Shargel said. He acknowledged that the family's notoriety was bound to affect jurors' view of Gotti's recent cases.

"Here we have a case of Shakespearean proportions. The fallen king, the conflicted prince, the concerned mother, the larger-than-life sister," Shargel said.

But Shargel added that credit for the mistrial may have more to do with another factor. "I really don't think this is a case of him outwitting the prosecution," Shargel said. "It's a matter of him having very good lawyers."

John A. Gotti isn't the first defendant to face multiple prosecutions for the same alleged crimes. After two mistrials caused by alleged jury-tampering, Gotti's uncle Gene Gotti was convicted in May 1989 on federal charges of running a heroin ring.

Thank Goodness For Fair Judge (NYDN)

By Victoria Gotti, Special To The News

New York Daily News, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070662

Last month, with her son fighting for his life in court, Victoria Gotti described him as a "gladiator ... waiting in the center of the arena for the lions to be let in and spectators waiting with anxious anticipation for what they hope will be a bloodbath." Now she reflects on her son's third mistrial:

I will thank our good fortune every day for a judge like Shira Schiendlin. She is the difference between a fair trial and a railroad job. God bless her.

The defense team was second to none and basically worked pro bono. Last, but not least, God bless those jurors for not believing the swill they were being fed daily by government and stories being planted by their government shill at the New York Post.

I pray my son, who I love more than life, will now go with love and my nightmare will now be over.

There is no celebration. We are all just too exhausted, emotionally and physically. We can all just get a good night sleep tonight.

As for Curtis Sliwa, let him explain - as former Guardian Angel William Diaz testified at the trial - why he would take a gang and go to assault another group that he thought were the people who attacked him. What does that make him?

I would think, as I said, Mr. Sliwa needs to be very, very grateful for that statute of limitations or it would be him doing hard time.

He is what he is, a carnie guy - anything that can give him a show. He will now go from show to show to get the attention he craves.

As for John giving up people, had he been willing, he would not have been on trial a third time. It is John who was given up by several people - including a legal person.

It was a government source who tried his best to get my son murdered by circulating that he was a rat. Conveniently, the government source, an FBI agent, gave this garbage to The Post ... We learned that Curtis Sliwa's best friend ... is the new publisher of that paper. We didn't expect anything but yellow journalism.

For Theft Of Rare Maps, A Sentence Of 42 Months (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Sept. 27 — A map dealer who stole nearly 100 rare maps valued at $3 million from Yale and other institutions was sentenced to three and a half years in prison on Wednesday after a federal judge credited him for helping the authorities retrieve most of the items taken.

Representatives of the institutions that were looted, who had traveled long distances to lobby for a stiff sentence, left the court saying they were deeply disappointed with the punishment given the map dealer, Edward Forbes Smiley III. Federal sentencing guidelines suggested that Mr. Smiley was looking at a term of 57 to 71 months, although the maximum penalty was 10 years.

Mr. Smiley, 50, told the court he was “deeply ashamed” and was eager to make restitution to the institutions and dealers who lost money. Some of the stolen maps have not been retrieved, and dealers who bought maps from Mr. Smiley and then resold them often had to reimburse their clients so that the maps could be returned.

He stood within 20 feet of three cartons containing dozens of the stolen maps that had been retrieved, which had been brought into court to allow the judge to inspect them.

“I have hurt many people,” he said, his hands clasped behind him. He said he had read the many victim-impact letters sent to the court and said, “I find them very powerful. I believe they were written by a group of people who have love for these materials and who have devoted their lives to making them public.”

Mr. Smiley said he understood the sense of betrayal felt by the curators and library staff members who had helped him when he came to examine their collections.

Mr. Smiley, 50, was arrested by the Yale police in June 2005, shortly after leaving Yale’s rare-book library with seven maps stashed in his briefcase and tweed jacket.

After a year of cooperating with the authorities, he pleaded guilty in federal court in June this year to the theft of a major artwork. As part of the plea agreement, he admitted to removing maps from collections at Harvard, Yale, the New York Public Library, Boston Public Library, the Newberry Library in Chicago and the British Library in London.

All of those institutions sent representatives to Wednesday’s hearing to press for a stiff sentence. Robert Karrow, the map curator at the Newberry, said he wanted a sentence that would tell “Smiley’s successors that the stakes in this game of cultural hijacking have been raised.”

Several also expressed outrage that Mr. Smiley’s lawyer, Richard A. Reeve, wanted his client to be rewarded for helping retrieve what he had stolen.

DOJ_NMG_0070663

"That cooperation, of course, occurred only after he was caught in the very act of mutilating books and stealing maps" at Yale, said Professor Frank M. Turner on behalf of the university's libraries.

The judge, Janet Bond Arterton of the United States District Court, said "this is anything but an easy sentence to impose" given Mr. Smiley's many contradictions.

She said she was awed earlier that day when she inspected the maps that Mr. Smiley had taken.

But she said Mr. Smiley's decision to cooperate when he could have told federal agents to "have a nice investigation," as Mr. Reeve had put it earlier, made her feel Mr. Smiley deserved to get less than the sentence suggested by federal guidelines.

Map Dealer Dealt Prison Term In Thefts (BOS)

By David Abel, GLOBE STAFF

The Boston Globe, September 28, 2006

A well-known dealer who stole at least 98 rare maps from the Boston Public Library, Harvard College, and such institutions as Yale University and the British Library in London was sentenced Wednesday to three years in prison and ordered to pay more than $1.9 million to clients he swindled.

E. Forbes Smiley III, 50, of Chilmark on Martha's Vineyard, admitted that over an eight-year span he stole more than 30 maps from Boston and New York public libraries, eight from Harvard's Houghton Library, and 10 from Yale's Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library in New Haven, prosecutors said. The British Library has said Smiley took centuries-old maps that told the story of the New World.

''I have hurt many people,'' Smiley said in US District Court in New Haven, according to the Associated Press. ''I stole very valuable research materials from institutions that made it their business to provide those materials to the public for valuable research. I am deeply ashamed of having done that. I cannot imagine the pain and the anger that I made them suffer.''

The judge ordered Smiley to report to prison in January, at a facility to be designated by the Federal Bureau of Prisons.

Beth Brainard, a spokeswoman for Harvard College's library system, said some of the maps have been damaged and that Harvard contends 13 maps, five more than Smiley admitted to. ''We are always gratified to see individuals who steal and destroy valuable library materials brought to justice,'' she said.

Antique Map Thief Gets 3 1/2-Year Jail Term (AP)

By John Christoffersen, The Associated Press

AP, September 28, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- A renowned antique map dealer who admitted stealing nearly 100 rare maps was sentenced Wednesday to 3 1/2 years in prison, after one librarian described him as a "thief who assaulted history."

E. Forbes Smiley III, 50, also was tentatively ordered to pay restitution of $1.9 million. He is scheduled to report to prison Jan. 4.

Smiley, who faced up to six years in prison under federal sentencing guidelines, stole the maps over eight years from the New York and Boston public libraries, the Newberry Library in Chicago, the Harvard and Yale university libraries and the British Library in London. The oldest maps dated back to the 1500s and some are the first records of settlements, territories and discoveries in America, experts said.

"Your honor, I have hurt many people," Smiley said in court. "I stole very valuable research materials from institutions that made it their business to provide those materials to the public for valuable research. I am deeply ashamed of having done that."

Smiley, who pleaded guilty in June, was arrested after a Yale librarian found a razor blade on the floor. The arrest prompted Yale and other top map libraries to review their security procedures.

Authorities say Smiley acted out of resentment toward the prestigious libraries and to pay for his expensive tastes and mounting debts.

U.S. District Judge Janet Bond Arterton said she wanted to send a dual message with the sentence. Prosecutors did not ask for a specific a sentence, but recommended Smiley be given credit for his cooperation with the investigation.

"If you steal human treasurers, then you will go to prison, but if you help recover them, this will be taken into account and weighed in the balance," Arterton said.

Leaders of the prestigious libraries urged a stiff sentence, saying he took world treasures and left a trail of victims.

"It will go down in criminal and library history as one of the largest, most prolonged, premeditated and systematic of all thefts from libraries, and with no mitigating circumstances," British Library Director Clive Field said during the sentencing hearing.

The maps marked the discovery of new lands, traced wars and peace treaties, new settlements and disappearances of people, said David Ferriero of the New York Public Library.

DOJ_NMG_0070664

"I am here today to talk about the actions of a thief _ a thief who assaulted history, betrayed personal trust and caused irreparable loss of treasures whose value to future scholarship will now never be known," Ferriero said.

Field and other librarians said Smiley stole world treasures, hurt staff morale, mutilated the maps, harmed scholars who count on the documents, and shattered the trust that is essential between libraries and their patrons.

Smiley sought a sentence of up to three years, saying his extensive cooperation with authorities led to the recovery of most of the maps.

"It is not a slap on the wrist," said Richard Reeve, Smiley's attorney.

Baton Rouge Woman Pleads Guilty In FEMA Fraud Counts (BRADV)

Baton Rouge Advocate, September 28, 2006

A Baton Rouge woman pleaded guilty Tuesday in federal court to two counts of fraud related to hurricane disaster relief programs.

Keosha Martin, 24, pleaded guilty to making two false and fraudulent claims to the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

According to the indictment, Martin was employed by FEMA between October 2005 and November 2005 as an applicant assistant whose duties included assisting disaster victims in applying for benefits.

At the time, Martin filed a claim on her behalf for damage from Hurricane Katrina and later filed a claim for damage from Hurricane Rita.

Martin could be sentenced to 10 years in prison, a $500,000 fine or both, per count.

The number of people who have been charged in the Baton Rouge based Middle District of Louisiana with violations related to hurricane disaster relief funds stands at 74.

In September 2005, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales formed the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force to deter, investigate and prosecute disaster-related crimes such as charity fraud, identity theft, procurement fraud and insurance fraud. The task force includes the FBI, the U.S. Inspectors General community, the U.S. Secret Service, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service, the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys and others.

FEMA Workers Charged With Fraud (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

Two Hurricane Katrina recovery workers hired last year by the Federal Emergency Management Agency have been charged with trying to defraud the government by filing a false claim for damage to a houseboat, which resulted in an award of $25,500 in disaster assistance. One of the FEMA employees, Duane Adams, claimed to own the houseboat in Moss Point, Miss., and the other, Emily Fuqua, helped Mr. Adams file the false claim. The two, who worked in clerical administration and disaster recovery programs, have been placed on unpaid leave, a FEMA official said.

'It's Over,' Says Ex-prosecutor (DEN)

By Paul Egan, The Detroit News

Detroit News, September 28, 2006

DETROIT -- Former Macomb County Prosecutor Carl Marlinga burst into tears, embraced his wife, Barbara, and whispered, "It's over," after a federal jury acquitted him Wednesday of public corruption charges.

Marlinga, 59, who loudly proclaimed his innocence even before the federal government indicted him on bribery and fraud charges in 2004, was ecstatic but not bitter after the jury forewoman read the words "not guilty" five times.

"I'm speechless, probably for the first time in my life," Marlinga told reporters immediately after the verdict. "I want to thank God, I want to thank my wife, and I want to thank two of the greatest lawyers and friends that I could have ever met."

Marlinga, who was represented by Mark Kriger and N.C. Deday LaRene, said he ignored his lawyers' advice when he repeatedly agreed to be interviewed by investigators and twice testified before a federal grand jury investigating his conduct. At his trial, Marlinga found his own words forming a central part of the government's case.

Now a lawyer in private practice, Marlinga would not rule out a return to politics. His future could test whether a politician, once cleared, can cleanse the stain of an indictment and return to public life.

It also represents the latest in a series of setbacks for the federal government in high profile cases in Detroit.

The case is another prominent defeat for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Detroit.

The government does not appeal jury acquittals in criminal cases. "We respect the jury's decision, I congratulate Mr. Marlinga's attorneys on the defense, and we're moving on," said U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy.

DOJ_NMG_0070665

Marlinga, a Democrat who served nearly 20 years as Macomb County prosecutor, was accused of giving favorable treatment to the accused in two sexual assault cases in return for campaign donations in 2001 and 2002, when he ran unsuccessfully for a seat in Congress.

The government's case was based largely on circumstantial evidence related to the proximity in timing between campaign donations from advocates for the accused, and Marlinga's actions and promises in connection with the cases. In addition to Marlinga's statements, the government relied on taped telephone calls between Marlinga and Warren businessman Ralph Roberts, who routinely taped his own business calls.

Roberts, who believed Jeffrey Moldowan was wrongly convicted of a brutal 1991 sexual assault and was pushing Marlinga to help get Moldowan a new trial, donated $2,000 to Marlinga's congressional campaign and promised additional fund-raising help. But Roberts, who was briefly charged with bribery before the charges were dropped, maintained there was nothing incriminating if his conversations with Marlinga were heard in their entirety.

Prosecutors and investigators "should be filled with regret for what they've done," Roberts said Wednesday. "They were just trying to further their careers by bringing down a politician and a prominent businessman in Macomb County."

Robert Cares and Jonathan Tukel, the assistant U.S. attorneys who prosecuted the case, were not available for comment after the verdict. But Murphy said his office strives to do the right thing in all cases and commended the efforts of those involved in the Marlinga case.

"We will continue to investigate allegations of public corruption and we will prosecute when the facts and evidence warrants," Murphy said.

Murphy rejected the view that Marlinga's acquittal represents the latest in a series of defeats by his office, including a botched terrorism case prosecuted shortly after the attacks of Sept. 11 and a massive Detroit police corruption prosecution that resulted in the dropping of most charges against police officers indicted and a raft of legal actions by those the indicted officers had arrested.

Murphy noted the recent successful prosecution by his office of former Detroit city councilman Alonzo (Lonnie) Bates on public corruption charges.

"We've had a strong record of success, especially in the last two years," Murphy said. "Any prosecutor's office is not going to win 100 percent of the time."

Marlinga's trial before U.S. District Judge Victoria Roberts began Sept. 12. A jury of 10 women and two men began deliberating Tuesday morning and signaled they had reached a verdict at about 2:40 p.m. Wednesday.

Marlinga was acquitted of two counts of bribery, one count of wire fraud, one count of making false statements to the Federal Election Commission, and one count of exceeding campaign contribution limits. He faced up to 20 years in prison if convicted.

Macomb County Prosecutor Eric Smith, who succeeded Marlinga, said he could not be happier for his former supervisor.

"We, as in our office, have been very supportive of Carl," said Smith, adding he did not think Marlinga's prosecution would leave any lasting scars on his office.

Marlinga said he felt no bitterness toward the authorities and commended for their diligence the FBI and Michigan State Police officers involved in the case. But he expressed disappointment in that the U.S. Attorney's Office chose to bring the charges after both he and Roberts passed polygraph tests.

"As a prosecutor, I know that sometimes you make mistakes," Marlinga said.

Marlinga acknowledged he sometimes changed his positions -- which itself was an issue in his criminal case, and said, "I wasn't the smartest politician, but I always prided myself on my integrity."

To him, only a charge such as child sexual abuse could be worse than being charged with public corruption, Marlinga said.

"The emotional cost was incalculable," he said. "It was the worst thing I've ever gone through in my entire life."

Marlinga said his decision to give so many voluntary statements to authorities may not have been wise and he would not recommend such a move to his own clients, but he said he does not regret what he did.

"You can't have too much truth," he said. "Eventually, the truth of what you are saying has got to rise to the top."

Among those surrounding Marlinga after the verdict were his wife, stepsons John and Michael, and his sister-in-law, Donna Nicholson, who pushed a rosary into Marlinga's hand to hold while he awaited the verdict.

"This is as sweet as it gets," said Kriger, Marlinga's co-counsel.

Detroit News Staff Writer Santiago Esparza contributed to this report. You can reach Paul Egan at (313) 222-2069 or pegan@detnews.com.

MARLINGA ACQUITTED: 'Thank God' For The Verdict (FREEP)

By Amber Hunt And David Ashenfelter, Free Press Staff Writers

Detroit Free Press, September 28, 2006

Ex-prosecutor overjoyed

With the first "not guilty," former Macomb County Prosecutor Carl Marlinga bent his head forward and began to cry softly.

By the time the jury forewoman said those words for the fifth time -- acquitting Marlinga of all federal corruption charges that have dogged him for two years -- he sobbed.

"I'm speechless for probably the first time in my life," Marlinga, still tearful, said after spectators left the courtroom.

But he wasn't.

"I want to thank God, my wife and two of the greatest lawyers and friends I could ever have in my life," Marlinga said, referring to defense lawyers Mark Kriger and N.C. Deday LaRene. "They just didn't stop working on the case."

Marlinga, 59, had faced up to 10 years in prison and $250,000 in fines for allegedly swapping prosecutorial favors in two rape cases for contributions to his failed 2002 congressional campaign. The five charges included two counts of bribery, deprivation of honest services, making false statements to the Federal Elections Commission and exceeding campaign contribution limits.

The charges derailed Marlinga's political career, causing the popular Macomb County Democrat to step aside shortly after the indictment was issued in April 2004, after 20 years as the county's chief prosecutor.

As they filed out of the courthouse, jurors said federal prosecutors weren't convincing.

"We felt the government didn't prove its case and Mr. Marlinga's attorneys did," said jury forewoman Mary Shultz of Rochester.

"There were way too many loose ends," said juror Megan Bowman, an Ortonville homemaker. "There wasn't a whole puzzle."

Jurors said it took two days to reach a verdict because they carefully reviewed the evidence to make sure they weren't overlooking anything.

Bowman and juror Sue Kramer, a Rochester teacher, said the single best witness was Marlinga, who convinced jurors that he was honorable and ethical. They said he did the right thing when he intervened in one of the rape cases -- that of Jeffrey Moldowan, who was convicted in 1991 of raping and mutilating an ex-girlfriend.

"We all felt that it was the greatest thing that Carl Marlinga got on the stand," Kramer added. "You could get a real sense of who he is and what was in his heart."

Marlinga, reversing his office's long-standing position on the Moldowan case, filed a brief in January 2002 to the Michigan Supreme Court citing discredited bite-mark evidence and new witnesses that ultimately led to Moldowan's 2003 retrial and acquittal.

Prosecutors said that because Marlinga accepted contributions from Ralph Roberts -- a Warren real estate broker and Moldowan supporter -- just days before the brief was filed, Roberts had bought Marlinga's prosecutorial influence.

They also accused him of accepting $26,000 from defense lawyer Dennis Johnston -- including $4,000 prosecutors said was funneled through then-state Senate candidate James Barcia, a Bay City Democrat -- while discussing possible plea deals for one of Johnston's clients. The client, James Hulet, was accused of drugging and raping a teenage girl.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Cares, who said during the trial that Marlinga's political ambition caused him to sell his influence, declined comment. His cocounsel, Jonathan Tukel, said later: "We always respect the jury's verdict."

U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy said it was a difficult case and congratulated Marlinga's lawyers.

Although the office had a string of high-visibility losses in the months before Murphy took the helm in 2005, he said: "No prosecutor's office in America will or should have a 100% batting average. We strive to do the right thing in every case."

Kriger gave Marlinga a hearty hug after the verdicts were announced.

"This is as sweet as it gets," Kriger said. "Ninety-nine percent of the time, the jury gets it right," he said, adding that Wednesday's verdict was one of those times.

As soon as the verdicts were read, a sobbing Marlinga reached behind him to clutch his wife of 13 years, Barbara, who doubled over in tears.

"I kept telling her to have confidence in the system," Marlinga told reporters as he and his wife continued to cry.

Barbara Marlinga hugged her two sons -- Marlinga's stepsons -- and said, "I can finally sleep tonight!"

She managed to get through the ordeal, she said, because strangers frequently said they were pulling for Marlinga.

Marlinga said the case took a huge toll on his family and that it will leave him with a substantial legal bill, even though his lawyers gave him a discounted rate to represent him in the case because they believed in his innocence.

If he could do anything over again, Marlinga said, he would never have gone to the Dec. 18, 2001, Christmas party where he ran into Roberts and asked him to contribute to his campaign. Marlinga said in trial that he also promised to update Roberts on the Moldowan case.

Shortly after learning of the verdict, Roberts -- who initially had been indicted alongside Barcia before charges were dropped against both of them last summer -- said he was thrilled Marlinga was cleared.

"The jury was the hero for the Roberts family and the Marlinga family today," Roberts said. "This was four years of reckless destruction."

Thomas Cranmer, a former assistant U.S. attorney and prominent criminal defense lawyer, said the legal community kept close watch on the two-week trial.

"The case was hard-fought in terms of there certainly being a dogged prosecution and a vigorous defense as well," Cranmer said. "The system does work. The prosecution didn't prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. That's the message you take from the verdict."

The Michigan State Police and the FBI began investigating Marlinga in late 2002. The investigation prompted Marlinga to drop out of the 2004 prosecutor's race, ending his 20-year run as a top vote-getter in Macomb County.

He proclaimed his innocence and said his faith in being acquitted never wavered. Some Macomb County residents said their belief in him also never wavered.

Sheriff Mark Hackel described the case as absurd.

"Carl does not have a criminal bone in his body. It was absurd to even think about -- or fathom -- Carl committing some kind of crime," Hackel said Wednesday night.

"

Marlinga praised FBI Agent Ronald Loch and Michigan State Police Detective Sgt. David Kelly for their work, but he said federal prosecutors chose to believe only part of the truth.

Macomb County Prosecutor Eric Smith said his office is happy that Marlinga, his former boss, can move on.

"This has been hanging over their heads in excess of four years," Smith said.

Besides potential prison time and fines, Marlinga also would have lost his license to practice law, which he's been doing privately since he stepped out of public office.

Judgment For Marlinga (FREEP)

Detroit Free Press, September 28, 2006

Carl Marlinga may have exercised poor judgment or been naive about how things would look, but a federal court jury decided Wednesday that the former Macomb County prosecutor was not guilty of a crime. The verdict clearing him on five corruption charges rewarded Marlinga's faith in a system that he served pretty well for 20 years.

The allegations that he swapped favors in criminal cases for contributions to a failed congressional campaign effectively ended Marlinga's political career.

But he has always been a pretty straight shooter as a public official and took the witness stand to declare his innocence with the same earnest demeanor that made him a favorite of Macomb County voters. This time, Marlinga got all the votes he needed.

Figure In New Orleans Corruption Probe Avoids Prison (AP)

AP, September 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — A figure in a federal investigation targeting corruption in the New Orleans transit authority was put on three years of probation on Wednesday.

John S. Keller pleaded guilty in August 2005 to failing to report a felony. U.S. District Judge Ginger Berrigan also ordered him to perform 200 hours of community service and pay $10,000 in restitution to the Regional Transit Authority, along with a $5,000 fine.

Keller was the business partner of Glenn Haydel, who pleaded guilty in May to stealing $550,000 from the RTA. Haydel, the brother of former Mayor Marc Morial's mother, had a lucrative consulting contract with RTA when Morial served two terms.

Haydel admitted to diverting $550,000 from an RTA trust account to his own company and then taking $350,000 for his personal use. Cancellation of Haydel's contract was one of Mayor Ray Nagin's first acts after he took office in 2002.

The federal investigation also has targeted other aspects of City Hall during the Morial years. Three men with close ties to Morial — businessman Stan "Pampy" Barre and Reginald Walker, along with former city property manager Kerry DeCay — face charges stemming from the largest city contract let during Morial's tenure.

The three are accused of orchestrating a plan to skim hundreds of thousands of dollars from a $65 million contract to upgrade energy-related fixtures in city buildings. All three have pleaded not guilty and are awaiting trial.

Morial, now head of the National Urban League, has not been accused of wrongdoing.

DOJ_NMG_0070668

On Sept. 21, another member of Morial's inner circle, political consultant William Schultz, agreed to plead guilty to federal tax charges and pay nearly $187,000 in back taxes, including levies on money he made from companies run by Barre and Walker.

Under terms of that deal with prosecutors, Schultz faces a year in prison, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said.

Feds Ask Judge To Shield Evidence In Probe Of Fumo, Nonprofit (SCCD)

By Maryclaire Dale

The State College Centre Daily, September 28, 2006

PHILADELPHIA - The federal grand jury investigating whether state Sen. Vincent Fumo extorted corporate donations for a charity in his district should wrap up its work by February, prosecutors disclosed Wednesday.

"The grand jury is sorting out potential defendants, potential charges," Assistant U.S. Attorney John Pease said at a hearing in a related case. "It's at a very sensitive stage."

Two ex-Senate staffers, computer technicians Mark C. Eister and Leonard P. Luchko, are charged with obstructing the investigation by deleting years worth of e-mail about Fumo's ties to the charity from office and other computers.

Prosecutors managed to recover much of it, however, and told the presiding judge they have gathered 100,000 pages worth of e-mails.

At the hearing Wednesday, they asked the judge to order defense lawyers to keep under lock and key the e-mails, grand jury transcripts and other evidence that prosecutors must turn over to the defense.

Some of it involves "scandalous" and perhaps criminal information about numerous third parties who may never be charged, Pease said.

"If these interviews and grand jury transcripts fall in the hands of someone who wants to write a (news) story, it's going to cause extreme embarrassment," Pease argued.

Defense lawyers promised not to distribute the material to third parties but objected to the demand from prosecutors that they keep a log of everyone who sees it and swear those people to secrecy.

"I'm just worried I'm going to get in trouble," said defense lawyer Brian McMonagle, who represents Eister.

U.S. District Judge William H. Yohn Jr. asked the sides to try to narrow the scope of the documents that would come under a protection order, and scheduled a telephone conference with lawyers on Monday.

Defense lawyers argue that prosecutors themselves have courted the press, with dramatic pre-dawn arrests and the public filing of a 65-page FBI affidavit that spells out the focus on Fumo and includes colorful e-mail excerpts about the senator.

"From the outset of this case, the government has used its power and the media to isolate and embarrass Luchko in an attempt to scare him into testifying," defense lawyer James C. Schwartzman wrote in opposing the government's secrecy motion.

Luchko and Eister are the only people charged to date in the investigation of the Philadelphia power-broker. Federal authorities are investigating whether Fumo extorted millions in corporate donations for Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods and used the South Philadelphia charity for political purposes, according to an FBI affidavit.

A call to Sprague & Sprague, the law firm that represents Fumo, rang unanswered after business hours Wednesday.

Prosecutors - in a heightening war of words - have also suggested that the technicians' lawyers are more concerned with protecting Fumo than their clients, and question who is paying their fees.

The Senate paid the legal costs of Luchko and Eister until June, when they were indicted.

Since then, a trust fund has been set up by unnamed "independent trustees and a well-respected Philadelphia law firm," to pay to defend Luchko and other former Senate staffers, Schwartzman disclosed in a recent court filing.

Prosecutors want to know just who controls those purse strings.

"The revelation ... cries out for investigation by the court," they wrote. A hearing on the conflict-of-interest question is set for Oct. 12.

Luchko, 50, of Collingdale, is charged with 30 criminal counts, including conspiracy, destroying evidence and obstructing a federal investigation. Eister, 36, of Camp Hill, faces five counts.

They have repeatedly offered to cooperate but want immunity, a condition that prosecutors reject, according to defense filings.

Yohn has scheduled a Jan. 8 trial date, but the date could be postponed, the judge suggested Wednesday.

Judge Bars Full Gag On Fumo Case Info (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070669

A federal judge yesterday ordered prosecutors and defense attorneys to work out a dispute over whether to disclose some evidence in the case of two former computer aides to Sen. Vince Fumo who are charged with obstructing a federal probe of Fumo.

U.S. Senior District Judge William H. Yohn Jr. said he would not grant prosecutors a blanket order prohibiting defense attorneys from disclosing information in the case.

He told prosecutors and defense attorneys to accommodate each other's concerns over the next few days and report to him on Monday.

At a hearing yesterday, Assistant U.S. Attorney John Pease said the feds wanted to safeguard the privacy of witnesses and make sure an ongoing grand-jury investigation is not compromised.

At issue are summaries of FBI and IRS interviews with witnesses, grand-jury transcripts and two search-warrant affidavits that have been filed under seal.

"We think the defense counsel should have that under discovery obligations," Pease said, "but some of it is scandalous, even criminal, and would be extremely embarrassing to the persons involved" if it were made public.

Prosecutors have not yet turned over all the evidence they have accumulated against the two ex-Senate aides, Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister, but they must deliver it soon.

Pease identified 15 interview summaries by investigators, nine grand-jury transcripts and two search-warrant affidavits that prosecutors don't want to appear in newspaper stories.

One suggestion was for defense attorneys to keep a log of people they interview and then get them to sign an affidavit that they won't divulge any information to a third party.

But James C. Schwartzman, attorney for Luchko, said that could restrict his ability to prepare a defense.

"If we have to get people to sign a document, I know we'll get little cooperation," he said.

He also asked for a delay in the trial start date, now slated for January.

Yohn permitted the Daily News and Inquirer to weigh in on the government's motion.

Michael Baughman, a lawyer representing the two papers, argued against any order that would restrict access to discovery materials.

He said that unless the feds could show that disclosure would result in "intensified pain" to third parties, the public's right to know outweighed privacy interests of witnesses, especially if they are public employees and the case involves allegations of public corruption.

"This has to be done on a document-by-document basis, and there has to be a finding of intensified pain," he said.

Luchko and Eister are charged with deleting Fumo's e-mails to thwart the federal investigation of the senator. Both have pleaded not guilty.

The feds have been investigating Fumo since 2003 to determine whether he committed extortion when he solicited contributions for the Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, a nonprofit organization with ties to Fumo, and whether he used any of the contributions to benefit himself personally or politically.

Fumo has denied any wrongdoing.

Prosecutor Says U.S. Probe Of Fumo To End This Year (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 28, 2006

The three-year federal corruption and extortion investigation of State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo should be resolved by Christmas, a prosecutor said yesterday.

"We're nearing a conclusion," Assistant U.S. Attorney John Pease said during a related court hearing. The case, he said, is at "a sensitive stage."

Authorities have been investigating whether the powerful Democrat illegally used a South Philadelphia nonprofit for political or personal gain.

In May, two former Senate computer technicians were charged with obstruction of justice for allegedly deleting e-mails as part of an effort to thwart the FBI and IRS probe. Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister have pleaded not guilty and are scheduled for trial Jan. 8.

During a pretrial hearing in their case yesterday, Pease said that he expected the Fumo investigation to conclude before the Luchko and Eister trial begins. Grand juries typically do not meet in late December.

U.S. District Judge William H. Yohn Jr. convened yesterday's hearing to hear arguments on a proposed order that prosecutors said is necessary to prevent leaks to the media.

As part of the routine pretrial discovery process, prosecutors are poised to disclose hundreds of FBI and IRS reports and thousands of pages of grand jury transcripts to Luchko's and Eister's lawyers. Such material contains "shocking, scandalous... embarrassing" information about people who may never be charged in the case, Pease said, and should remain confidential.

To support this assertion, Pease said he had prepared a sealed 10-page document, which he said contained 26 examples of potentially embarrassing disclosures - detailed in 15 FBI investigative reports, nine grand jury transcripts, and two search warrants, including one executed at Fumo's district offices in Philadelphia.

Yohn indicated that he didn't need to review the 10-page document - at least not yet.

Lawyers for Luchko and Eister - as well as a lawyer for The Inquirer and Philadelphia Daily News - opposed the so-called protective order, which would require anyone with access to the material to swear not to divulge its contents, except to prepare for trial.

Lawyers James Schwartzman and Brian McMonagle said such an order would make it difficult to prepare a defense, because people identified in the material - especially potential witnesses - would be reluctant to sign such an agreement.

Michael Baughman, a lawyer for the newspapers, cited a 1994 decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit in Philadelphia that says protective orders are less appropriate in situations involving public figures or public issues.

Yohn did not rule yesterday. He urged the lawyers involved to compromise.

2 Ad Men Admit Pay-to-play Scheme (PHI)

By George Anastasia

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 28, 2006

A former advertising-company executive and a consultant for that company each pleaded guilty to fraud charges yesterday, bringing an end to one phase of an ongoing federal corruption investigation at Philadelphia International Airport.

Joseph Evans, 51, the former chief executive officer of Sky Sites Inc., and Joseph Moderski, 69, a consultant, entered their pleas during hearings before U.S. District Judge James T. Giles.

Evans, under terms of a plea agreement, pleaded guilty to one count of mail fraud. Moderski pleaded guilty to conspiracy, mail fraud and wire fraud.

Both men are to be sentenced in January.

Evans and Moderski were charged in a pay-to-play scheme in which they conspired to funnel money out of the company to finance illegal campaign contributions to Mayor Street.

The mayor has not been charged with any wrongdoing, but his office was briefly bugged by the FBI as part of a broad corruption probe that focused on city contracts, campaign contributions, and allegations of quid-pro-quo arrangements between elected officials and businessmen.

Evans and Moderski were charged in a scheme in which money was siphoned out of Sky Sites and its parent company, JCDecaux, to cover the cost of campaign contributions Moderski and others made to Street's campaign.

It is illegal for corporations to make such contributions.

The government alleged that Moderski orchestrated the plan, claiming that the contributions would help the company win new advertising contracts and retain existing contracts at the airport.

JCDecaux specializes in indoor, back-lit advertising displays in airport terminals throughout the world.

Two others charged in the case, former Sky Sites vice president Eric Selby, and architect Terry Crockett, who did subcontracting work for the company, had entered guilty pleas earlier and were cooperating with the government.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Joan L. Markman, in outlining the charges against Moderski and Evans, told Giles that the scheme involved a $10,000 "sham bonus" paid to Moderski in August 2000 and a phony $30,000 payment to Crockett in 2001.

The bonus payment was made to cover a $10,000 contribution Moderski had made to Street's campaign, Markman said. The $30,000 invoice for work that was never done was used to cover contributions of $10,000 each made by Selby, Crockett and Moderski to a PAC run by Ronald A. White, one of Street's chief fund-raisers.

White was indicted in a broader racketeering case. He died before his case came to trial.

Evans pleaded guilty yesterday to one count of mail fraud filed this week as part of a plea agreement. In exchange, prosecutors agreed to drop three additional charges.

Moderski, on the other handed, pleaded guilty to conspiracy, wire fraud and mail fraud - charges contained in the original indictment handed up against him and Evans earlier this year.

Markman would not comment on whether the government had tried to negotiate a plea agreement with Moderski, a Bryn Mawr-based political and business consultant.

"The investigation is continuing," she said when asked about the status of the corruption probe at the airport.

Polygamist Sect Leader Will Stay Jailed (AP)

By Jennifer Dobner, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

(ST. GEORGE, Utah (AP) -- Polygamist sect leader Warren Jeffs, a fugitive for nearly two years, appeared in a Utah courtroom Wednesday and said he was willing to wait several weeks for a judge to decide whether to send him to trial on charges of arranging an underage marriage.

"Yes, sir. Yes, your honor," Jeffs replied when Judge James Shumate asked if the delay was acceptable.

The judge set a Nov. 21 probable cause hearing and said he would address Jeffs' bond status at that time. He remains in jail.

The hearing lasted less than 10 minutes for the self-proclaimed prophet who heads the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. Jeffs is charged with two counts of rape as an accomplice, a first-degree felony that carries life in prison.

Under his suit, tie and white shirt, Jeffs was wearing a bulletproof vest. There was tight security inside and outside the Washington County courthouse, including SWAT teams.

Prosecutors claim Jeffs, 50, forced a teenage girl to enter a spiritual marriage with an older man and submit to sex to produce children.

The girl twice told Jeffs she didn't want to marry or have sex, but was told it was her "spiritual duty" to submit because the marriage had been arranged by God, according to court filings.

"The victim is doing well," Brian Filter, chief deputy county attorney, said outside court, adding that he expects the victim will testify at the hearing.

Defense attorney Walter Bugden said "absolutely" when reporters asked if this was religious persecution.

"Let's wait until we can have a trial in this matter before we jump to the conclusion that Mr. Jeffs is guilty of anything," Bugden said.

Named to the FBI's 10 Most Wanted list in May, Jeffs was arrested last month during a traffic stop near Las Vegas. He had been a fugitive for nearly two years.

Jeffs, who took over the leadership of the church from his father in 2002, is also facing two felony charges in Arizona for a similarly arranged marriage. He'll face those charges after the Utah case.

A lawyer who has represented members of Jeffs' sect said before the hearing that finding a jury with impartial — or even mild — views on polygamy may be difficult in Washington County.

"There's a real skepticism brought to bear on their claims," said Rod Parker, who believes sect members are perceived differently than other clients he's defended. "It's very subtle, but it's there."

For nearly 100 years, members of the sect, which numbers nearly 10,000, have lived a quiet, insular life in the border towns of Hildale, Utah, and Colorado City, Ariz. The sect broke away from the Mormon church more than a century ago and has been disavowed by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

Parker represented Rodney Holm, a Hildale police officer convicted of bigamy in 2003, and last year tried unsuccessfully to persuade the Utah Supreme Court to keep a polygamist judge on the bench.

In the Holm case, questionnaires that asked about polygamy revealed a strong bias among prospective jurors, said Parker, who is not acting as Jeffs' attorney.

"I thought going into it, that being in southern Utah where people had a little more interaction with the fundamentalists, that it would be better," he said. "We were surprised."

Whether prosecutors state it or not, polygamy will be an underlying factor at Jeffs' trial, said John Bucher, who represented a client on charges of bigamy and child rape in 2001 in a different county.

"I don't think you can say, 'The perpetrator is a member of a polygamist organization,' and try to separate that out from the crime in the jurors' mind," Bucher said.

Jeffs' Attorney Says Case Is 'religious Persecution' (SGS)

By PATRICE ST. GERMAIN

St. George Spectrum, September 28, 2006

ST. GEORGE – Warren Jeffs' attorney Walter Bugden said his client views the case against him as religious persecution.

"Absolutely," Bugden said in response to the question.

Bugden, along with his partner Tara Isaacson, Las Vegas attorney Richard Wright and investigator Doug Maack, appeared in court for Jeffs' scheduling conference this morning.

DOJ_NMG_0070672

The court appearance lasted less then five minutes. Following his court appearance Jeffs met with his attorneys before Bugden gave a brief statement to the media outside the courtroom.

"We're going to have a preliminary hearing, with one step at a time. We intend to confront the witnesses against us and there will be cross-examination at the preliminary hearing," Budgen said.

The preliminary hearing has been scheduled for 8:30 a.m. on Nov. 21.

Jeffs, the self-proclaimed prophet of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, faces two first-degree felony charges of rape as an accomplice in Utah.

He is also charged with several counts of sexual conduct with a minor and conspiracy to commit sexual conduct with a minor in Mohave County, Ariz.

Bugden said he cannot represent Jeffs in Arizona but that Jeffs has retained council for the charges against him there. He said he does not know who that attorney is.

Jeffs In Jail Until November (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, September 28, 2006

FLDS leader waives right to have hearing within 30 days

ST. GEORGE — Captured polygamist leader Warren Jeffs said he is willing to remain in jail until his preliminary hearing in November.

"Is it all right with you?" Shumate asked.

"Yes," Jeffs said softly, nodding his head in agreement.

Appearing in person, Jeffs was brought in under heavy security. The Fundamentalist LDS Church leader wore a crisp black suit, a starch-white dress shirt and a white tie. Underneath, a bullet-proof vest was faintly visible.

Jeffs was flanked by his defense lawyers. There were so many of them, the judge had to ask deputies to move to accommodate them.

"Mr. Bailiff, would you step over just to the side of Mr. Jeffs there so Mr. Bugden can have a spot?" Shumate asked, waving a Washington County sheriff's deputy over. Jeffs was surrounded by deputies.

Outside the courtroom, deputies carrying assault rifles were standing guard. The St. George Police Department deployed its SWAT team outside the courthouse.

During the seven-minute hearing, the judge set a preliminary hearing for Nov. 21, when he will also review the issue of bail. The judge said it was "troublesome" that Jeffs had remained behind bars for so long without bail being addressed.

The courtroom was packed with news reporters, investigators, observers, ex-FLDS members and even a pair of Jeffs' faithful followers. As Jeffs was being led out the courtroom, his brother Nephi Jeffs and FLDS member Lindsey Barlow stood in what appeared to be a show of respect for their prophet.

The men bolted from the courthouse after the hearing, refusing to answer reporters' questions.

Ezra Draper, who left the FLDS Church several years ago, said he wanted to see Jeffs for himself.

"The ironic thing about this situation is that he will have the opportunity to present his defense," Draper said. "In his administration in the FLDS Church, people were tried without a trial, found guilty and cast away."

Jeffs is accused of purging dozens of people from within the FLDS Church in Hildale, Utah, and Colorado City, Ariz., re-assigning polygamous wives and children to other families. It was allegations of child-bride marriages to older men that began putting him under intense focus of law enforcement.

A representative from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Utah was also in the courtroom Wednesday, observing the proceedings.

"We remain interested in the case. We're preserving the options that we may have," U.S. Attorney's spokeswoman Melodie Rydalch told the Deseret Morning News as she left the courthouse.

Federal prosecutors have refused to drop an unlawful flight to avoid prosecution warrant against Jeffs and have threatened to indict him on it should he be granted bail.

Jeffs, 50, is charged here with two counts of rape as an accomplice, a first-degree felony. He is accused of forcing an underage girl into a polygamous marriage with an older man. When she objected, prosecutors allege the FLDS leader threatened her "salvation."

The girl, identified in court papers only as "Jane Doe IV" will testify at the preliminary hearing in November.

"The victim is doing well. She is looking forward to testifying and looking forward to having her day in court," said deputy Washington County attorney Brian Filter.

Prosecutors have told the Deseret Morning News they are screening more possible charges against Jeffs. Filter said it is also possible Jane Doe IV's husband could also face rape charges.

Sarah Ause, Deseret Morning News

Wally Bugden, Warren Jeffs' defense lawyer, is questioned by the press after a hearing Wednesday. "There is a possibility he will be charged," he said Wednesday.

Defense lawyers suggested this may be a case of religious persecution against Jeffs and his followers.

"Absolutely," attorney Wally Bugden said to that question as he left the courthouse after meeting behind closed doors with the judge.

Moving quickly through a throng of reporters, Bugden said he will vigorously defend Jeffs.

"We're going to have a preliminary hearing, just one step at a time. We intend to confront the witnesses against us and there will be cross-examination at the preliminary hearing," he said.

Jeffs was on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list until he was arrested during a traffic stop outside Las Vegas last month.

Warren Jeffs Trial: Witness Set To Testify In Rape Case (SLT)

By Brooke Adams, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, September 28, 2006

Polygamist leader in courtroom; preliminary hearing set in November

ST. GEORGE - The state's key witness in the case against polygamous sect leader Warren S. Jeffs will testify in court for the first time during a day-long hearing set for mid-November.

At the Nov. 21 preliminary hearing, the young woman identified only as Jane Doe No. 4 is expected to describe her assigned marriage to an older man she alleges later raped her, as well as Jeffs' alleged instructions that she submit "mind, body and soul" to her husband.

Based on that and other evidence offered by the state, 5th District Judge James L. Shumate will decide whether there is enough evidence to believe Jeffs committed a crime and should be tried.

The woman, who was between 14 and 18 at the time of her spiritual marriage, is looking forward to her day in court, according to Brian Filter, spokesman for the Washington County Attorney's Office.

He also said other witnesses and evidence will be presented.

Jeffs uttered a single word Wednesday during a six-minute scheduling hearing attended by a few supporters and curious onlookers. He has previously appeared via videolink from the Purgatory Correctional Facility, where he has been incarcerated since Sept. 5.

Unshackled and wearing a suit, white dress shirt and white tie - and a bullet-proof vest beneath his clothes - Jeffs was brought into the courtroom from a rear hallway.

He warmly shook hands with his legal team, quietly exchanging greetings with Las Vegas attorney Richard A. Wright and the Salt Lake attorneys Walter F. Bugden and Tara Isaacson.

The 50-year-old polygamist softly answered, "Yes," when Shumate asked if he was willing to postpone his preliminary hearing to November.

Jeffs faces two first-degree felony charges of being an accomplice to rape for allegedly conducting the spiritual marriage between the girl and a then-28-year-old man. The charges are punishable by five years to life in prison.

Washington County Prosecutor Brock Belnap

Advertisement

has not said when the crime occurred. If reported to police, rape charges may be brought up to eight years later.

That deadline may be put on hold if a defendant moves out of Utah and then resume if he or she later returns.

Belnap has said previously the state has not brought rape charges against the woman's husband - who also has not been publicly identified - for strategic reasons, but may do so in the future.

Jeffs, arrested during a traffic stop on I-15 north of Las Vegas on Aug. 28 after a year as a fugitive, is the leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

The sect is based in the twin cities of Colorado City, Ariz., and Hildale, Utah.

Shumate said Wednesday he was troubled that Jeffs has not had a bail hearing, but Bugden said he will raise the issue later.

Two FLDS members attended the hearing: Nephi Jeffs, a younger brother of and secretary to the sect leader, and Lindsay Barlow, who runs a moving crew that helps relocate families within the FLDS.

Leaving the courthouse amid a swarm of journalists, Bugden responded to a shouted question about whether this is a case of religious persecution.

"Absolutely," he said. "Let's wait until we can have a trial in this matter before people jump to the conclusion that he's guilty."

Judge Urged Not To Release Intel Reports (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

The Associated Press, September 27, 2006

Federal prosecutors went into a private hearing Wednesday to urge a judge not to release sensitive intelligence reports at the upcoming trial of a former White House aide.

Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, wants to use President Bush's daily terrorism briefings as evidence at his obstruction and perjury trial in January.

Libby says the records from 2003 and early 2004 will show he did not lie to investigators about his role in the leak of a CIA officer's identity. He contends he had important things on his mind and may have forgotten details about the leak.

Prosecutors and defense lawyers will not discuss the contents of the classified briefing summaries. But the dates overlap with the military's hunt for Iraq's Saddam Hussein, the death of his two sons, and continuing discussions about nuclear programs in North Korea and Iran.

The documents also contain information about covert operations and informants. The details are so sensitive that they are not released even to many intelligence officials.

Shortly before the hearing was to begin, the courthouse was evacuated because a suspicious package was discovered outside the building. That left Fitzgerald and Libby, along with several other lawyers in the case, to wait outside with more than 100 others.

The package turned out to contain a homeless person's clothes.

After the private hearing, which was expected to stretch into next week, U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton will decide what information Libby should be allowed to use as evidence. Walton then will hold a second round of hearings to decide whether to black out or summarize the records.

Intelligence officials still can refuse to declassify the documents, even in the blacked-out form Walton orders. That refusal could lead to the case being dismissed.

Prosecutors have said that is precisely Libby's plan. Requesting classified data in an effort to sabotage a case is a legal tactic known as graymail.

Libby is the only person charged in Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's three-year, $1.4 million investigation into the leak of Valerie Plame's identity. Nobody was charged with violating the law by discussing her job with the CIA, but authorities say Libby lied about his discussions with reporters regarding Plame.

Plame's husband, Joseph Wilson, criticized the Bush administration's intelligence leading up to the Iraq war. The couple has accused Libby and others of leaking Plame's identity as retribution.

House Suspends Hill Telecom License (WP)

By James V. Grimaldi

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

House leaders have suspended a multimillion-dollar wireless communications license that federal prosecutors say was corruptly awarded to a Dulles telecommunications firm by Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) in exchange for gifts from lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The award of the license was one of a series of acts that Ney said he performed for Abramoff in exchange for campaign contributions, expensive meals, luxury travel and sports tickets. Ney agreed this month to plead guilty to corruption charges and is set to enter his plea Oct. 13.

The license to install antennas for cellular and wireless telephones in House office buildings was awarded in 2002 to MobileAccess, formerly known as Foxcom Wireless, which was based in Israel. The company, now based in Vienna, Va., later paid Abramoff $280,000 in lobbying fees and donated $50,000 to a charity operated by Abramoff that paid for a golf junket to Scotland for Ney.

Rep. Zoe Lofgren (D-Calif.) said the license "has been suspended pending review," which could affect the wireless contract for the congressional visitors center now under construction.

"I think a company should not profit from corrupt actions," said Lofgren, who is on the House Administration Committee. "Obviously, what happened in awarding the contract was wrong, illegal, corrupt. The question is what role did the company have? Was the company a knowing participant?"

Salley Collins, a spokeswoman for the committee, said the review was underway but provided no more information. Congressional sources who spoke on condition on anonymity because the issue is under consideration said a review was prompted by the Abramoff corruption investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0070675

MobileAccess employees "have cooperated fully in the investigation," said MobileAccess attorney Douglas A. Fellman, of Hogan & Hartson. "There has never been a suggestion of wrongdoing or improper conduct on the part of MobileAccess or its personnel, and after a very thorough investigation, that continues to be the case."

Abramoff and Neil G. Volz, who went to work for Abramoff as a lobbyist after serving as Ney's top aide, admitted in plea agreements this year that the wireless license was a favor for Abramoff in exchange for gifts.

Prosecutors said in charging papers that Ney took a variety of official actions for Foxcom, "including meeting with representatives of the client on or about May 10, 2001, leaking to Abramoff a copy of a letter from the client's competitor complaining about the selection process in or about September 2002, and issuing a license to Abramoff's client."

The decision had long-term implications for Foxcom competitor LGC Wireless Inc. of San Jose. The Senate also uses MobileAccess to remain consistent with the protocols of the House. LGC uses a different technology, though wireless and cellphone companies say both firms provide service that meets their standards.

An LGC official said yesterday that his company was pleased by the news of the House review.

"Given that it is public record that the House wireless job was awarded to Foxcom/MobileAccess due to Jack Abramoff's improper influence, and MobileAccess has subsequently been the recipient of follow-on business on the Hill in large part due to that initial award, we feel that it is appropriate that the license be reviewed," LGC spokesman John Spindler said. "Only in this way can competitiveness and fairness in any future government awards be ensured."

Cellphone coverage is a sore point with many members of Congress, who complain about dropped calls, particularly in the Capitol. It was a topic at the Administration Committee meeting.

House Reviews Foxcom License (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 28, 2006

The House Administration Committee is reviewing a $3 million license awarded by its former chairman, Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), to a client of former lobbyist Jack Abramoff in late 2002, according to the panel and House insiders.

Ney's alleged influence peddling in granting the license to provide cell phone antennas in House office buildings to Foxcom Wireless, now Mobile Access Networks, was part of the plea agreement that the Ohio Republican recently reached with the Justice Department. Ney admitted to accepting "things of value" from Abramoff in return for official actions, including granting the Mobile Access license.

Abramoff's own plea deal in January with federal prosecutors also referenced the Mobile Access episode.

"There are issues with the license agreement," said Salley Collins, spokeswoman for the House Administration panel. "Those issues are under review by the committee at this time." Collins declined to offer any further details on the committee's action.

House insiders said that the Administration Committee and Jay Eagan, the Chief Administrative Officer for the House, jointly made the decision to conduct the review following Ney's plea deal. House officials declined to say whether they were considering taking legal action against the company.

Douglas Fellman, an attorney representing Mobile Access, said no one at the firm had ever engaged in illegal activity in obtaining its license with the House.

"There has never been a suggestion of wrongdoing or improper conduct on the part of Mobile Access, after a thorough investigation by the Department of Justice and others, that continues to be the case," Fellman said.

"Mobile Access and its employees have always been, and continue to be assured, that there are no issues as to the company's conduct."

Foxcom, as Mobile Access was then known, donated $50,000 to a charity controlled by Abramoff in 2001. Abramoff used the charity to pay for a Scotland golf junket the following year attended by Ney and several of his aides, including Neil Volz. Volz pleaded guilty to corruption charges this summer.

According to Ney's plea deal, "From in or about April 2001 through or about November 2002, Ney supported the application of and ultimately issued a license to one of Abramoff's lobbying clients, allowing that client to win a multi-million dollar contract with wireless telephone companies to install wireless telephone infrastructure" in the House.

Mobile Access formally hired Abramoff's former lobbying firm, Greenberg Traurig, in January 2003, two months after it already had been granted the license by Ney, to represent it. Greenberg Traurig was paid $280,000 for its lobbying work in 2003 and 2004, according to lobbying disclosure records.

In obtaining the licensing agreement from the House, Israeli-based Mobile Access won the right to millions of dollars in payments from wireless carriers, who would be using equipment installed by the company to route cell phone calls throughout the House complex.

DOJ_NMG_0070676

A rival bidder complained in 2002 that Mobile Access was unfairly awarded the license thanks to its political connections, but even after his relationship with Abramoff was publicly exposed, Ney denied that he had acted improperly in handling the matter.

Ney checked into an alcohol rehabilitation facility right after signing onto his plea deal with Justice and has made no public statements during the last two weeks. His attorneys and federal prosecutors have agreed to recommend a 27-month prison sentence for Ney. Ney is scheduled to appear in federal court on Oct. 13.

Woman Charged In Porn Case (PTR)

By Tony LaRussa, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, September 28, 2006

A Washington County woman has been accused of using the Internet to distribute stories that describe children -- some as young as 2 years old -- being kidnapped, sexually molested and murdered.

Karen Fletcher, 54, of Meldon Avenue, Donora, was indicted by a federal grand jury Tuesday on six counts of transportation of obscene matters, U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said.

"This case is a very important part of our efforts to prosecute people who exploit children," Buchanan said. "Use of the Internet to distribute obscene stories like these not only violates federal law, they embolden sex offenders who would target children."

Free speech specialists, however, question whether the charges will stick because there don't appear to be any child victims.

Contacted at her home Wednesday, Fletcher said federal authorities "didn't like my site." She said she was not aware of the indictment and otherwise declined comment on the charges.

Fletcher is accused of operating a Web site featuring excerpts of "extremely explicit and graphic stories" that could be downloaded by purchasing a $10 monthly subscription, according to investigators.

The indictment against Fletcher alleges that on Aug. 8, 2005, she used an interactive computer service to distribute half a dozen stories about adults having sex with children between 2 and 9 years old.

Fletcher told a pair of FBI agents who interviewed her at her home on Feb. 11, 2005 that she owned what she described as a "fantasy site" on which she posts "sexually explicit stories about adults having sex with children," according to court papers.

Ken Vandevelde, a law professor at Thomas Jefferson School of Law in San Diego, questioned whether prosecutors could win a case if they attempted to prove that Fletcher trafficked in child pornography.

"The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 2002 that so-called 'virtual porn' -- drawings or computer generated images of children engaged in sex -- cannot be treated as child pornography because no child was involved in its production," said Vandevelde. "It seems reasonable that the same would apply to the written word."

"I find it very troubling that a fictional account, somebody's fantasy, could be considered a crime when there is no indication that anybody has been exploited," said Joan Bertin, executive director of the New York-based National Coalition Against Censorship.

"I can't defend this material because I haven't seen it, but I question the role of government in deciding when material, even if most people would consider it over the top, is appropriate for adults to write or read," Bertin said.

Fletcher is scheduled to be arraigned in federal court on Oct. 17. If convicted, she could face up to 30 years in prison and a $1.5 million fine.

In the past several years, the U.S. Justice Department has intensified its prosecution of obscenity cases.

Last year, Buchanan asked a federal appeals court to reinstate charges against a California couple whose company, Extreme Associates, was accused of violating federal law by using the U.S. Postal Service and the Internet to send videos depicting graphic scenes of rape and murder into Western Pennsylvania. A 10-count indictment against the company and its owners had been dismissed by a federal judge.

In December, the court ruled that the charges against Robert Zicari and Janet Romano and their company be reinstated. The couple's attorney, H. Louis Sirkin, subsequently filed a petition asking the U.S. Supreme Court to hear the case. The petition, however, was denied.

Town's Residents Say They Were Targets Of Big Mortgage Fraud (WSJ)

By James Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070677

MARTINSVILLE, Va. -- Federal and state authorities are investigating allegations of an elaborate mortgage fraud involving about 100 people living in or near this small factory town who say they unwittingly took out loans to buy houses at inflated prices in Indiana.

The borrowers, who include truck drivers, factory workers, a pastor and a hair stylist, say they were duped by acquaintances into signing stacks of documents and didn't know they were applying for loans. Instead, they thought they were joining a risk-free "investment group."

Now, many of the loans are in default, the borrowers' credit ratings are in ruins, and lenders are pursuing the organizers of the purported investment group in court. Companies stuck with the defaulting loans include Countrywide Financial Corp., the nation's largest home lender, and Argent Mortgage Co., another big lender.

A lawsuit filed by Countrywide accuses the organizers of acquiring homes and then fraudulently selling them for a quick profit to the Virginia borrowers. Representatives of the borrowers put the total value of loans involved at about $80 million, which would make it one of the largest mortgage-fraud cases ever.

Mortgage fraud, involving loans obtained by providing false information, has mushroomed in recent years as lenders have pushed for speedier loan approvals in an effort to remain competitive and milk maximum profits from the now-fading housing boom. The Federal Bureau of Investigation reported that mortgage fraud led to losses of $1 billion in 2005, up from $429 million a year earlier. Some of the fraud that slipped through during the boom is only now starting to surface.

Attracted by the ability to obtain large sums quickly, some criminal gangs involved in drug dealing and other street crimes have branched out into mortgage fraud, says Chip Burrus, assistant director of the FBI's criminal investigative division. "It's more profitable and less risky," he says.

Part of the problem, say critics inside and outside the industry, is that -- in their haste to earn commissions and fees -- loan officers and brokers are asking fewer probing questions. "We aren't asking questions, and we aren't verifying like we used to," says Bob Simpson, president of Investors Mortgage Asset Recovery Co., Irvine, Calif., which helps lenders recover losses from fraud. "For legitimate, honest consumers, that's a good thing," but it creates opportunities for crooks, Mr. Simpson says.

Kurt Pfotenhauer, a senior vice president at the Mortgage Bankers Association in Washington, says the pursuit of efficiency in making loans has made the industry more vulnerable to fraud. But he said his trade group is educating members on the risks and on preventive measures, and urging Congress to provide more money for cracking down on mortgage scams.

The case involves about 400 loans averaging $200,000 each, according to Tony and Robin Pickett, a married couple who work as real-estate agents at Prudential Ron Matthews Realtors in Indianapolis. Ms. Pickett says she and her husband represent 39 of the borrowers and are trying to help them sell the houses, which are scattered among rough inner-city neighborhoods and new subdivisions.

Lenders and others involved in the case say a task force of federal and state agencies is investigating, including the Internal Revenue Service. An IRS spokeswoman declined to comment. A spokesman for the FBI said the agency is aware of the case but declined to elaborate.

A lawsuit filed in June by Countrywide in the Circuit Court in Marion County, Ind., says that the investment group was organized by people led by Robert Penn. Acquaintances say Mr. Penn, believed to be in his early 40s, grew up near Martinsville, joined the Navy and then moved to the Indianapolis area. He couldn't be reached for comment, and his lawyers didn't return calls.

In recent years, the Martinsville area has been hit hard by closures of furniture and textile factories. Timothy Jacobs, 29 years old, one of the scores of local residents caught up in the case, lost his job in a textile plant several years ago and was unemployed for nine months before finding a new job, working overnight at a telecommunications-cable plant more than an hour's drive from his home. About two years ago, a friend told Mr. Jacobs about an investment group organized by Mr. Penn and some of his relatives in the area.

Mr. Jacobs says he was soon introduced to Mr. Penn's sister, Sharon, a hairdresser who lives in the area. Ms. Penn couldn't be reached for comment. Mr. Jacobs says she explained that the group needed people with good credit ratings to be used for real-estate investments that would be made as a group, not individually. Mr. Jacobs, who was living with his mother at the time and says he couldn't afford to buy a home of his own, says he understood that he wouldn't have to make any payments or assume any financial obligations but would receive payments for letting the group use his credit record.

"It sounded pretty good," Mr. Jacobs says. "Everything I asked them, they had an answer for."

Mr. Jacobs and others who joined the group say they were rushed into signing documents without being given time to read them. Within weeks of signing those papers, Mr. Jacobs says, he received two payments, totaling $7,000, from the Penns. After a few more months, however, he began to get calls from Countrywide representatives demanding mortgage payments. Mr. Jacobs says it turned out that two loans, totaling more than $200,000, had been taken out in his name and that he owned two houses. He says he now thinks the houses might be worth only around $40,000 apiece.

Others who signed up for the group say their credit ratings have been so devastated that they can no longer buy anything on credit. "My dad brought me up to pay my bills before I eat," says Nancy Muse, who heard about the group from a friend who used Ms. Penn as a hairdresser. Months later, Ms. Muse found out she was in trouble when she inquired about buying a modular home for herself. A representative of the home-building company checked her credit and told her she already owned four homes.

In its lawsuit, Countrywide said it acquired some of the loans from the original lender, People's Trust Mortgage LLC, Erlanger, Ky. Countrywide alleges that a loan officer for People's Trust "conspired" with Mr. Penn and associates to apply for loans using false information about the borrowers' incomes and financial assets. Representatives of People's Trust couldn't be reached for comment. A lender who formerly had dealings with People's says he believes it is no longer in business.

The Countrywide suit says companies associated with the Penns acquired houses and then quickly resold them for much higher prices to the Martinsville borrowers. That allowed the Penns and associates to profit from the quick sale while leaving the people in Martinsville stuck with loans they couldn't pay, the suit says. One church secretary, who says she heard about the investment group from her pastor, says she and her husband, a building-maintenance worker, learned that they were the owners of 14 homes in Indiana, a state they had never visited.

Countrywide, based in Calabasas, Calif., is suing Mr. Penn and others allegedly involved in the program for unspecified damages. Its suit doesn't say why the lender didn't raise questions earlier about why so many people in a struggling area of southern Virginia would be investing in houses in Indiana. The suit does, however, suggest that a closer review of some of the home-purchase documents might have prompted questions; one such document failed to identify the seller.

A Countrywide spokesman said: "We have a zero-tolerance policy against fraud and put a great deal of time and expense into identifying and investigating possible cases."

Some of the loans were made by Argent, based in Irvine, Calif. An Argent spokesman said the company is investigating what he described as a sophisticated scheme. Fannie Mae, the government-sponsored provider of funding for mortgages, acquired some of the loans from Countywide and has reported its findings in the case to law-enforcement officials and regulators, a spokeswoman said.

Fraud has proliferated as lenders increasingly deal with borrowers through brokers and other intermediaries rather than having face-to-face relationships. "Lending is becoming more anonymous," says Rachel M. Dollar, a Santa Rosa, Calif., attorney who runs a Web site that provides mortgage-fraud information. In addition, better computer equipment has made it easier to forge or alter documents.

Borrowers' attorneys and other consumer advocates say many problems arise simply from greed or haste on the part of loan officers and brokers motivated by commissions to push for high volumes. A lawsuit filed in December 2004 in federal court in New York by South Brooklyn Legal Services, a nonprofit law clinic, alleged that Argent Mortgage made a $425,000 loan arranged by participants in a foreclosure fraud scheme even though the application was incomplete and a title-insurance company warned the lender something was amiss with the deal.

"The red flags were as strong as you can get," says Jessica Attie, a staff attorney with the clinic's Foreclosure Prevention Project. In court papers, Argent denied it was at fault in the case, which it settled in April.

In a lawsuit filed in May 2005 in state court in Dayton, Ohio, ABN Amro Mortgage Group Inc., a unit of ABN Amro Holding NV, claims it lost $2 million after a convicted felon and other conspirators arranged as many as 23 mortgages in the names of dead people. In court papers, however, two title insurance companies named among the defendants claim ABN Amro failed to conduct due diligence on the loans and, as a sophisticated lender, knew or should have known about the fraud. The case is still pending. Andrea Lewis, a spokesperson for ABN Amro, said no one with knowledge of the case was available to comment yesterday. The case is still pending.

Other lenders also appear to have overlooked some suspicious borrowing patterns. According to a mortgage-fraud indictment against several people filed by the U.S. attorney's office in Atlanta in U.S. District Court there in January, the defendants took out loans in the names of "straw borrowers" based on inflated prices for real estate. One of those borrowers -- identified in the court filing only as Justin Z -- obtained loans from National City Corp.'s mortgage arm to finance purchases of 20 condominiums in the Atlanta area between Feb. 1 and March 26, 2001, according to the indictment.

A spokesman for Cleveland-based National City said: "We are currently in litigation to recover our losses and we continue to cooperate with authorities on the matter." As part of "continuing efforts to further enhance our mortgage-fraud protection," he adds, National City is tracking individual customers to monitor how many properties they finance, among other measures.

Mortgage Suit Says 'Trust Us' Led To Fleecing (NYT)

By John Leland And Tom Zeller Jr.

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070679

MARTINSVILLE, Va., Sept. 27 — In a tightknit neighborhood, where people's social lives often revolve around their churches, Beulah Penn and her daughter, Sharon, were well-connected and trusted. Beulah Penn was a lay minister in a local church; her daughter, Sharon Penn, dressed hair.

Using these connections, according to a recent lawsuit, the two women and another relative in Indianapolis perpetrated one of the largest mortgage frauds in American history, victimizing dozens of local residents and, according to sources with knowledge of the accusations, at least $40 million in fraudulent loans — perhaps even twice that amount.

"Looking back, maybe it sounded too good to be true, but everyone knew them, and my friends went to church with them, people I been knowing for 10 years," said Timothy Jacobs, a 29-year-old worker in a fiber-optics factory who discovered recently that he owed $200,000 on two houses in Indiana. "They said they'd be responsible for everything. Now everyone's probably going to end up filing for bankruptcy."

The civil lawsuit, filed in June by one of the nation's largest mortgage lenders, describes an elaborate confidence game in which Martinsville residents with good credit ratings were enlisted last year to join what they believed was a risk-free investment in Indiana real estate. Instead, they found themselves responsible for hundreds of thousands of dollars in unpaid mortgages.

While no criminal charges have been filed, federal grand jury subpoenas are being prepared in Indiana, and further civil action at the federal level is expected to be filed against the investment group soon.

Repeated calls and e-mail messages to people named as defendants in the lawsuit, both in Martinsville and in Indiana, as well as to some of their lawyers, were not returned.

The F.B.I. called mortgage fraud an "epidemic" last December, noting that losses associated with the crime had jumped to more than $1 billion last year from $429 million in 2004. Although the hot housing market that may have at least partly given rise to the fraud boom is cooling, officials say mortgage fraud losses are on pace to increase again this year.

Martinsville, a small Piedmont city of 14,925, once known for its Nascar track and its thriving textile mills, has lost both population and its economic base since the mills and furniture industries moved overseas in the 1990's. Small older houses and often empty businesses cluster in the center of town, with larger, more expensive developments — like the ones the Penns moved to — on the fringes.

The median household income is about half the state average. Mr. Jacobs, who was out of work for nine months after a mill closed, said he and his friends saw the real estate venture as a chance to get back on their feet after setbacks. "Now we don't know what to do," he said.

Court papers filed by Countrywide Home Loans, the residential mortgage lender, say the Penns invited people to join an "investor's club" that would buy properties in Indiana and sell them at a profit. Club members were told they faced no risk.

According to court papers and to four participants, the investors were told they would not have to contribute any money but would simply allow their credit ratings to be used in acquiring the properties, which would be owned and managed by the group. Each were promised checks of at least $2,000.

But Mr. Jacobs and others were, by all appearances, the pawns in a quick-flip mortgage scheme, designed to gain control of a property at a low price and sell it quickly at a profit. The game is often rigged at every level — from doctored applications, to bogus property appraisals, to the loan approvals themselves.

Documents reviewed by The New York Times suggest that even independent parties associated with closing the sales on the properties may have played a role in perpetrating the fraud, or demonstrated negligence in overseeing the transactions.

The Countrywide suit asserts, for instance, that the founder of the group, Robert Penn (the son of Beulah Penn and brother of Sharon Penn), acting through a variety of companies, secured purchasing agreements for Indiana properties at market value, then had them appraised at substantially higher rates.

Mr. Penn's group then bought the homes, according to the lawsuit and documents reviewed by The Times, in the names of the Martinsville residents at the inflated prices — or even higher — but paid only the agreed-to market price to the seller. Mr. Penn's companies then received the substantial difference, the documents contend.

Often the group closed on several properties in the same buyer's name on the same day, documents show. Kelvin Thompson, 44, a tire worker, said he discovered he was in trouble when he tried to borrow $1,000 from his credit union to buy presents last Christmas.

That is when Mr. Thompson learned that he owned five houses in Indiana, all in default, with mortgages totaling close to $1 million.

He said he could not have been more surprised. The Penns, he said, did not seem "sophisticated enough" to pull something like this off. "We're very angry," he said, "and also embarrassed for being suckered."

Many of the investors contacted were unwilling to discuss their cases — some out of embarrassment, some out of suspicion of a stranger asking questions about their finances. Some said they had known the mother and daughter for so long that they still did not know what to think.

Mildred, a municipal employee who said she was too embarrassed to be identified by her last name, said she trusted Sharon Penn "because she was my girlfriend."

She added, "She did my hair for four years."

Although she was not a member of Mrs. Penn's church, Mildred said, she knew that Beulah Penn was "a minister, a woman of the cloth," and so she let down her guard. Even so, she said, when Sharon Penn approached her about joining the investment club, she resisted at first. "But I saw people coming and going, this one got a check, that one got a check," she said.

She also saw that the Penns were making a lot of money and talking about how "blessed" they were, she said. She agreed to join, she said, on promises that she was part of a no-risk partnership in a development of brand-new houses on which payments were guaranteed by the federal government.

From a leather valise in the back of her car his week, she produced documents showing that two of the three houses she owned were built in 1950 and 1917. The outstanding mortgages on the three homes total more than $500,000. The houses, she said, were worth about $30,000 each.

"I thought I was smarter than that," she said. "But they were so smooth, and I saw so many people getting checks."

Repeated calls to Beulah Penn's home went directly to her voice mailbox, which was full.

William Stern, the mortgage fraud coordinator at the F.B.I. said the agency would not comment on whether it was investigating the Martinsville case. But he said the agency had uncovered similarly ambitious schemes recently.

In August last year, he said, the largest federal sentence for mortgage fraud — 30 years — was handed down to Chalana McFarland of Atlanta, for her role in a major flipping operation that netted $20 million from 1999 to 2002. As a testament to the elaborate nature of the modern mortgage fraud operation, also indicted were two paralegals, six loan originators, one broker, three real estate agents, three appraisers, three straw borrowers, one bank employee, an identity thief, and a property manager.

"This represents an approach to mortgage fraud whereby an entire mortgage fraud ring is targeted and addressed," Mr. Stern said.

A Martinsville area minister who also lost money in the Penn investments expressed exasperation, but caution. Like others in town, he said he knew Beulah Penn professionally and Sharon Penn as an occasional visitor to his church.

"Nobody has been charged here," he said, declining to be named because he did not want to embarrass his church. He said he was still holding out hope, "that they just got caught up in this, just like I did."

Good Cybercitizens Keep Watch Over ID-theft Victims (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

USA Today, September 28, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — For a few hours a day, Steven Peisner calls strangers across the USA — sometimes at night — and reads to them their Social Security numbers and credit card data.

Though many recipients immediately suspect he is an ID thief, Peisner's intent is just the opposite: He is a digital whistle-blower.

"My motivation is to be a good citizen and put a dent in (fraudulent e-mail) phishing scams," says Peisner, president of SellitSafe.com, which provides anti-phishing services for online merchants. He works closely with law enforcement and computer-security experts. Peisner, 43, is one of several avenging angels nationwide looking out for the well-being of ID-theft victims. They share a fervent desire to publicize the widespread availability of stolen personal data on the Internet.

·Betty "BJ" Ostergren, a former insurance-claims supervisor in Virginia , occasionally warns consumers that their Social Security numbers are posted on public government websites. For the past four years, she has spent several hours a day digging through sites for Social Security numbers. So far, she's uncovered 18,000 records.

·Janice Forster, 50, a paralegal in North Carolina, this year started FindMyId.com, a website devoted to educating consumers about ID theft. In the past week, she mailed more than 100 letters to North Carolina residents informing them that their personal information is available on the Internet.

"I just want to make a difference," says Forster, who had never before been involved in a grass-roots movement. "In good conscience, I can't watch this happen to people."

That's why Peisner called Christopher Buckley, a high school teacher in Los Angeles, late at night during Labor Day weekend to inform Buckley that his credit card number was on the ccpower forum, a black-market website where criminals deal in stolen personal data. "I was shocked he called but glad he did," says Buckley, 31, who mistakenly forked over information via e-mail to someone claiming to be from PayPal.

There is a method to Peisner's madness. As phishing continues to escalate, the safest course for consumers may be to warn them over the phone. There is little in the way of software to warn consumers they have been phished.

DOJ_NMG_0070681

"We need to take control of the situation," says Peisner, who does not profit from his advice to consumers but sells his company's services to businesses. "The police have their hands full with these type of cases. It's up to consumers like me to take action."

Since May, good Samaritan Peisner has scoured the Internet forums of cybercrooks, looking for the names of ID-theft victims whose personal information is for sale online. The same day, he informs victims that their names — not to mention Social Security numbers, credit card information and phone numbers — are floating in cyberspace. Peisner calmly tells them he has come across their filched profiles and they should immediately close their credit card and/or bank accounts. To make his point resonate, he reads to victims their stolen information as it appears in the forums.

Symantec detected 157,477 unique phishing messages during the first half of 2006, up 81% from the last six months of 2005. Home PCs were targets of 86% of security threats in the first six months of 2006, according to a Symantec report released Monday.

The incidents have soared as attacks become more sophisticated. Tried-and-true scams aimed at customers of AOL, eBay, PayPal, Citibank, Bank of America and other high-profile companies continue. But the deceptive e-mail messages and websites have gotten much craftier. Customer names and addresses now routinely appear in phishing e-mail. Previously, scams were addressed to "Dear valued (company name) member," say security experts.

"This is slick stuff," says Ron O'Brien, senior security analyst at Sophos. He says recent phishing attempts actually warn customers about phishing and ask them to update their information for security reasons. To assure wary users, the 800 phone number of a targeted company is included in the e-mail. The scam often works, he says.

The scam is just the latest iteration in an evolving cycle of phishing attempts that surface every few months, says Dennis Maicon, executive vice president of financial-services solutions at computer-security firm Digital Resolve. Late last year, phishers typically preyed on customers of large financial institutions, warning them in e-mails to update their accounts or risk losing them. Early this year, phishers used the same scam but on customers of regional banks and credit unions.

Phishers also are ensnaring corporate customers with bogus phone trees that ask consumers to enter personal information. How the scam works: An e-mail advises victims to call a number to verify basic data. But the number is actually recording data with the intent to steal it, according to law enforcement officials. The stolen information often winds up on cybercrime forums, websites that function as digital marketplaces.

The speed of transactions on those forums can be quick, victims say.

Scott London, an attorney in Santa Barbara, Calif., can vouch for that. Soon after he surrendered personal data to a PayPal-targeted phishing scam on Aug. 18, it was posted on the CardersMarket forum.

In less than one minute, $100 was pulled from his bank account. An e-mail receipt from the real PayPal confirmed the withdrawal seconds later. Another 15 minutes later, more than $1,200 in airline tickets, electronic equipment and two other items were charged to London's Chase-issued MasterCard.

By the time Peisner called to warn London, the charges had been made. But London took Peisner's advice and notified his bank and credit card issuer. "It could have been worse if not for Steven," London says.

Peisner admits it can be a thankless job, rousting strangers at night and telling them their innermost financial secrets. "One guy in Florida wants to kill me," he says.

But those are the occupational hazards of being a do-gooder.

For many victims, Peisner is the first line of defense. Most software doesn't notify the consumer until after an illegal purchase. Peisner tells them as soon as he spots their information in carding forums.

On a typical day, he contacts more than a dozen victims. To gain their trust, he explains who he is and what he has found online — usually the victim's name, address, Social Security number and credit card number. He advises them to contact their credit card issuer and bank and to monitor their credit reports for two to three years. Victims range in age from 19 to 88, and they are universally shocked when he calls, Peisner says.

"Steven scared me to death, but he saved me a lot of grief," says Stephen Sanders, 55, a retiree from Carmel, Calif., who was the victim of phishing scam tarageting eBay/PayPal users last month. Sanders closed his bank account and discontinued his credit card the next day. He also flagged credit reports.

Absent consumer advocates, there is little that tech vendors can do to immediately alert phishing victims.

AOL, Yahoo, Microsoft and other providers of Internet service continue to refine their anti-phishing filters. Yahoo this month rolled out a service that better protects consumers from phishing sites. Future versions of Microsoft Internet Explorer and other browsers such as Opera and Firefox will include built-in phishing filters.

Still, newer phishing attacks can slip through.

DOJ_NMG_0070682

AOL offers free features that inform users whenever a financial transaction is made over their AOL account. Customers can set up e-mail spending alerts for themselves, based on the amount of a transaction and when it occurs, says Michael Jones, technical director of AOL's anti-spam operations.

But until phishing is eviscerated, and short of directly warning intended victims, consumers will continue to be hooked by phishing attempts. Even though Buckley was quickly tipped off by Peisner, cybercrooks rang up $1,000 in charges to his credit card before he could cancel it. “Just think of the damage they could have done if Steven didn't call me,” Buckley says. “For that, I'll always be grateful to him.”

Louisiana Renews Call For Dicks’ Extradition (FT)

By Andrew Ward In Atlanta

Financial Times, September 28, 2006

Kathleen Blanco, governor of Louisiana, has voiced support for the state's clampdown on online gambling and renewed an extradition request for Peter Dicks, former chairman of Sportingbet.

The governor's intervention came as Mr Dicks prepared to attend a court hearing in New York to learn whether he will be sent to Louisiana to face illegal gambling charges.

Lawyers for Mr Dicks, who was arrested in New York three weeks ago on a Louisiana warrant, had hoped to halt the extradition process before Thursday's hearing.

But a spokesman for Ms Blanco said she was still pushing for his extradition as part of efforts to enforce the state's law against online gambling.

"If we do not enforce this law, online gambling would be completely unregulated and that would clearly be an expansion of gambling which is unacceptable," she told the FT.

Barry Slotnick, lead defence lawyer, acknowledged that Louisiana had “dug in” over recent days, raising the prospect of a courtroom battle over Mr Dicks' fate.

“They are not backing off,” he said, in an interview. “We’re preparing our argument to rebut what Louisiana says.”

Thursday’s hearing in New York comes amid increasing alarm among online bookmakers about the legal threat posed to the industry by US anti-gambling laws.

William Hill, the UK bookmaker, on Wednesday said it would no longer accept casino and poker business from clients with a US address or credit card, pending clarification of US laws.

The company had already stopped accepting online sports bets from US customers.

Congress is considering the introduction of tough new federal laws against online gambling in addition to existing state laws such as those used by Louisiana to arrest Mr Dicks.

Louisiana’s Police Gaming Enforcement division told the FT this week that arrest warrants had been issued for four Sportingbet representatives, including Mr Dicks, after state police placed a bet with the company.

UK-listed Sportingbet said on Wednesday that it had banned board members from travelling to the US.

Mr Dicks may still be spared prosecution in Louisiana because of legal questions over the legitimacy of the state’s extradition request.

Defence lawyers have argued that Mr Dicks cannot be extradited to Louisiana under New York law because he was not in either state at the time of the alleged crime.

Mr Dicks was allowed to return to the UK on bail two weeks ago while the case was reviewed but he was ordered to return for Thursday’s hearing.

George Pataki, New York governor, has withdrawn a warrant needed for Mr Dicks’ extradition because of doubts about the case. That warrant would need to be reinstated before Louisiana could take custody of him.

“Louisiana has taken a position where they are demanding extradition. Our position is that extradition is not a proper remedy,” said Mr Slotnick.

2nd Emergency Crime Law Eyed (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams' plan to extend emergency anti-crime legislation appears to violate a city statute barring passage of the same law more than once on an emergency basis.

City officials are trying to determine whether extending by 90 days anti-crime legislation enacted in July would violate the statute.

DOJ_NMG_0070683

If it is found to violate the statute, 48 surveillance cameras placed in neighborhoods would have to turned off until permanent anti-crime legislation could be enacted, which would be December at the earliest.

In addition, police no longer would have access to criminal juvenile records and would not be able to hold robbery suspects and handgun offenders until the permanent legislation is passed. And the 10 p.m. curfew for minors would revert to 11 p.m. on weeknights and midnight on weekends.

Charlotte Brookins-Hudson, legal counsel for the D.C. Council, said that the intent of the statute is to prevent city officials from circumventing the congressional review period to which D.C. laws are subject.

Mrs. Brookins-Hudson said that she will review the mayor's emergency submission and that changes to it will have to be more than cosmetic.

"It will have to be a very substantial modification," she said. "If it is identical, I will inform the chairman of the council, and she will make her ruling."

Mr. Williams said that a spate of four killings in 24 hours spanning Sunday and Monday proves the need to extend the crime-fighting legislation.

"I think what we've seen in the last couple days, the youth violence, this uptick of it, is all the more reason we need to continue it," the mayor said. "Technically, you can't reintroduce an emergency measure exactly like the preceding, but substantively ... I think we should continue this strategy while the council looks at the long term."

Among the four killings were three juveniles:

·Andre Pee, 14, was shot in the back Sunday night in a Southeast public housing complex. Curtis Watkins, 32, was found dead nearby.

· Dominick A. Dixon, 15, was found dead Monday near a construction site in Northeast. Police arrested Robert Crosby, 51, late Tuesday and charged him with second-degree murder in that case.

· CeQuawn Brown, 16, was shot in the head Monday in Southeast.

Ed Reiskin, interim city administrator and deputy mayor for public safety and justice, said that city officials are moving forward "as if we can" get the council to extend the emergency legislation.

"I haven't seen what the council's counsel's concerns are," he said. "I mean, if it's not legal, it's not legal, but I'm hopeful that we can find some legal way of allowing the council to consider an extension."

Mr. Reiskin said that the worst-case scenario would be a "gap" in which four programs authorized by the crime emergency would be suspended until permanent legislation that has already been submitted to the council is addressed.

Karr Lawyers Ask To Have Porn Charges Dropped (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, September 28, 2006

LOS ANGELES — Lawyers for John Mark Karr asked a judge Wednesday to dismiss child pornography charges against the onetime suspect in the JonBenét Ramsey case because authorities lost a computer that allegedly contained illicit photographs of children.

Arguments on the issue in Santa Rosa, Calif., were so extensive that Sonoma County Superior Court Judge Cerena Wong continued the hearing until Friday. She could also decide then to unseal evidence in the 5-year-old case.

Karr, 41, a former teacher, is due to go on trial Monday. He faces five misdemeanor charges of possessing child pornography.

Sheriff's deputies seized the computer from Karr's home when he was arrested in April 2001. The sheriff's department said it copied the contents of the computer's hard drive and printed out five pornographic photographs.

Saying that new technologies might reveal additional photos on the hard drive, deputies launched a two-week search for the computer late last month but didn't find it.

Karr is being held in Sonoma County jail on $200,000 bail. If convicted, he could face a maximum of a year in jail on each count.

He spent six months in jail awaiting trial in 2001 but skipped a court date and fled the country.

Karr was arrested Aug. 16 in Thailand after suggesting that he killed JonBenét, a 6-year-old beauty pageant star, in her Boulder, Colo., home in 1996.

He was returned to Colorado, but the Ramsey case collapsed Aug. 28 after DNA failed to link him to the crime.

Karr has rejected a plea deal that would have waived three of the five child pornography charges if he pleaded guilty to two.

He would have been placed on probation for three years and would have been required to register as a sex offender.

DOJ_NMG_0070684

Sex Offender Admits Killing Teen In NE (WP)

By Allison Klein And Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

A 51-year-old convicted sex offender admitted that he killed a 15-year-old boy and dumped his body at a construction site in Northeast Washington, telling police the two had fought over a $10 purchase of crack cocaine, according to the prosecution's charging documents.

Robert J. Crosby has been charged with second-degree murder in the death of Dominick A. Dixon, who was found at the construction site Monday afternoon wearing only his boxer shorts. Crosby was ordered held without bond yesterday by D.C. Superior Court Magistrate Judge Richard Ringell.

The D.C. medical examiner's office said yesterday that Dixon was killed by asphyxiation and ruled the case a homicide. D.C. police have been treating the case as a homicide since Dixon's body was found in the 1000 block of 51st Street.

Crosby has spent most of his adult life in Maryland prisons after being convicted in the mid-1970s of raping a 14-year-old girl in Baltimore, records show. He was released in 2004, and as a condition of his parole, was not permitted to have contact with anyone younger than 18 or to leave Maryland without permission, authorities said.

The D.C. medical examiner's office has not completed Dixon's autopsy, which would indicate whether he was sexually assaulted.

Dixon was one of five people, including three juveniles, found dead in a 24-hour stretch Sunday and Monday in the District. Last night, D.C. Council member Marion Barry (D-Ward 8) and others gathered for a vigil to remember the victims and decry the violence.

In the Dixon case, Crosby told police that on Sunday, he and Dixon were in a vacant house in the 5000 block of Lee Street NE, which is next to the site where Dixon's body was found, according to charging papers.

Crosby was buying $10 of crack from Dixon, but he believed that Dixon was shorting him and protested, the documents said. Crosby said Dixon drew a knife and tried to stab him, which sparked a fight that ended when Crosby wrapped a television cable around Dixon's neck and strangled him, according to the prosecutors' documents.

The charging papers quoted Crosby as saying he removed Dixon's clothes because he feared that his blood might have been left on them.

Crosby said he bit one of Dixon's ears and a finger during the fight, the documents said.

The charging papers provided other details about Crosby's alleged actions after the crime. Crosby told police that he left Dixon's body in the abandoned house until Monday morning, when he pushed it over a brick wall into a courtyard at the construction site. Crosby said he got rid of the knife in a sewer drain. Police later found it. They also found a coaxial cable in the vacant house.

Police took Crosby into custody after stopping him for a traffic violation Tuesday in the 5000 block of Lee Street. When they took him to the police station, he said he killed Dixon, charging documents said.

According to a report by the D.C. Pretrial Services Agency, Crosby has worked for a contractor in Silver Spring for six months.

After he was released from prison, Crosby told his Maryland parole agent that he wanted to move to the District, but D.C. officials denied the request, according to court authorities. It appears that he moved to the District without letting his parole agent know. D.C. police list his address as the 1000 block of 51st Street NE, and he was registered to vote in the District at that address.

Maryland parole workers believed that they were supervising him in Baltimore and that he was still living there, said Elizabeth Bartholomew, a spokeswoman for the Maryland Division of Parole and Probation.

Crosby is on Maryland's sex offender registry, with his home address listed in Baltimore.

Crosby last reported to his parole agent Aug. 24, Bartholomew said. She said he was to report Sept. 14 but did not. His next appointment was to be today, and had he not reported, a warrant would have been issued for his arrest, she said.

Gloria Dixon has said she last saw her son Saturday. She reported him missing at 4 a.m. Monday, and a friend of the family found the body about seven hours later.

Dixon said she had talked to Crosby for about a half-hour after her son's body was found.

Crosby told her that he knew her son and that he was a good kid, she said. He then tried to comfort her, saying "If I hear anything, I'll let you know," Dixon said.

Dixon added, "He couldn't understand why anyone would do that to a nice young man."

Mid Now Faces Rape Charges (BSUN)

DOJ_NMG_0070685

By Bradley Olson, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, September 28, 2006

Ex-football player could get life sentence if convicted of assault on 2 fellow students

The Naval Academy has charged a former football player with drugging and raping two female midshipmen on separate occasions, including at a party attended by at least four teammates.

Kenny Ray Morrison, 24, is accused of raping one woman in a Georgetown hotel room at the rowdy, boozy party Feb. 4, and the other in Annapolis on April 21, according to charging documents.

The senior had been scheduled to stand trial Tuesday at a special court-martial, a midlevel form of military trial, only on charges of indecent assault and indecent acts in the Georgetown incident. If convicted of those charges, he would receive no jail time.

If found guilty in a military court of the new charges of rape, distribution of a controlled substance and assault in both cases, as well as conduct unbecoming an officer in the Feb. 4 incident, he could receive a maximum of life in prison. Such a sentence is unprecedented in recent history, according to military law experts.

An academy spokesman declined to discuss the case, including the reason for the upgraded charges, because it's part of a continuing investigation.

William Ferris, Morrison's civilian attorney, said the academy can't prove the charges and accused the academy and Navy lawyers of acting unethically in the case. He said his firm is exploring legal challenges based on the argument that his client's rights to a speedy trial and to see evidence against him were violated.

"The whole handling of this, I think, is completely improper, and we're investigating all those issues," he said.

The latest charges could prove embarrassing to the Annapolis military college and the football team, whose former star quarterback was acquitted in July of rape. Lamar S. Owens Jr. was convicted of lesser charges and is awaiting notice from the academy on whether he will be allowed to graduate and be commissioned in the Navy or be kicked out and owe $140,000 for his education.

Owens and Morrison have been temporarily reassigned to the Washington Navy Yard.

According to charging documents, which offer no details about the Annapolis incident, Morrison gave both of his alleged victims gamma-hydroxybutyric acid, also known as GHB, without their knowledge. It is a common date-rape drug that is also used recreationally.

The Sun is not identifying either woman because they are alleged victims of sexual assault.

The documents say that at the Feb. 4 party at the Embassy Suites in Washington, he lifted the woman up from the bed in which she was sleeping, carried her to another bed, took her clothes off and "engaged in multiple acts of sexual intercourse without her consent."

According to the documents, he also had sex in front of now-Ensign Jason Monts and exposed his and the alleged victim's nude body to midshipmen Zachary Gallion and Trey Hines and 2005 graduate Kyle Eckel.

A star fullback at Navy, Eckel's mark of 2,906 career rushing yards is the fourth-best in academy history. He was signed as an undrafted free agent by the New England Patriots but was waived and then picked up by the Miami Dolphins, who have him on their reserve/military list.

"This has nothing to do with our program," Navy Athletic Director Chet Gladchuk said. "This is about charges against Kenny Ray Morrison, who was a walk-on on our team and will have an opportunity to defend himself."

In preliminary hearings on the Feb. 4 incident, attorneys on both sides revealed that Morrison's DNA was recovered from a rape kit examination of the alleged victim.

A judge threw out evidence that the hair of the alleged victim in the Feb. 4 incident tested positive for GHB. Prosecutors could not link the drug to Morrison, and the tests could only prove that the drug was administered in a six-week period that included the time of the alleged assault.

The Feb. 4 incident was originally investigated by Washington's Metropolitan Police Department and turned over to a civilian grand jury. Prosecutors and defense attorneys have declined to comment about the grand jury's findings, how the case was turned over to Navy investigators or why Morrison was not originally charged with rape.

The new charges will be referred to a military evidentiary hearing, akin to a civilian grand jury; if an investigator determines that there is enough evidence, the case will go to the most serious court-martial forum.

Charlotte Cluverius, a former academy law instructor and officer who now works in private practice in Washington, said the way this case has been prosecuted has been unusual, although it's not unprecedented in military trials to bring more serious charges after finding new evidence while preparing for the trial.

Cluverius said the upcoming evidentiary hearing, called an Article 32, would reveal whether the new evidence will hold up in court.

"They throw up every charge they can find that is even remotely tied to the evidence," she said.
bradley.olson@baltsun.com

Former Soldier Charged With Smuggling Machine Guns (ARMYT)

By Michelle Tan, Staff writer
Army Times, September 28, 2006

A former North Carolina National Guard soldier has been charged in federal court for smuggling four machine guns into the United States from Iraq and then trying to sell them.

Robert James Clymore, 38, was arraigned in federal court Sept. 21 in Atlanta, Ga. He was indicted June 13 by a federal grand jury on charges of unlawful importation, possession, transportation and transfer of machine guns, according to a press release from the Justice Department.

Clymore, of Wade, N.C., is accused of acquiring four machine guns while on active duty in Iraq and smuggling them home in his gear.

Clymore, who served in the Navy, joined the Guard on Aug. 29, 2003, said Maj. Matt Handley, a spokesman for the North Carolina Guard.

He was a sergeant with C Company, 120th Combined Arms Battalion, in Parkton, N.C., and he served in Iraq from early 2004 to early 2005, Handley said. Clymore was honorably discharged from the Army on April 15, Handley said.

According to documents filed in federal court, Clymore brought to the United States a Sterling, model MK4, 9mm submachine gun; a Carl Gustav, model 45, 9mm submachine gun; a Zastava, model M72 LMG, 7.62 x 39mm machine gun; and a Soviet, model PPSH-41, 7.62 x 25mm submachine gun. The Carl Gustav did not have a serial number.

In December 2005, Clymore brought the weapons to a gun dealer in Taylorsville, Ga., and negotiated a deal to trade an all-terrain vehicle and a pistol for the machine guns, according to the Justice Department. The gun dealer informed the FBI about the machine guns, and FBI agents set up surveillance to record the transaction, which was scheduled for the following day, Dec. 15, 2005. When Clymore returned, the FBI seized the four machine guns.

The six-count indictment against Clymore charges him with violating federal firearms and tax laws. The charges carry up to 25 years in prison and a fine of up to $1.25 million.

Prison For Man Who Assaulted Feds (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, September 28, 2006

A state inmate was sentenced today to nearly 12 years in federal prison for assaulting two deputy U.S. Marshals.

Andre L. Jacobs, 24, formerly of Harrisburg, attacked the marshals in March 2005 inside a 9th floor elevator at the federal courthouse, Downtown. After a jury ruled against Jacobs in a civil trial, the inmate struck one marshal with his handcuffs and grabbed the other marshal. The first marshal suffered ligament damage to his wrist, which required surgery.

Jacobs was convicted by a jury in April and was sentenced to 210 months in prison yesterday by U.S. District Judge Gustave Diamond. Jacobs is already serving 5 to 18 years in SCI Fayette on an unrelated conviction.

Inmate Who Assaulted Federal Deputy Gets 17-year Prison Sentence (PPG)

By Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette
Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, September 28, 2006

Andre Jacobs grew up with no parental figures. He witnessed domestic violence between his mother and father as an infant and toddler. Then his father left, and his mother, an alcoholic, pretty much abandoned her son.

Mr. Jacobs spent the majority of his youth in juvenile psychiatric facilities and was certified as an adult offender at age 15.

He has a steep history of violence, including assaults on corrections officers. Since 1998, when he began serving a state prison sentence, he has received 91 misconduct reports, guaranteeing that he will remain in disciplinary custody until at least 2011.

Yesterday, Mr. Jacobs, now 24, was sentenced to serve more than 17 years in prison for assaulting a U.S. marshal last year as he was being escorted out of the federal courthouse following a civil case. That amounts to 10 additional years in prison since he will serve the first seven years concurrently with previous sentences.

In an effort to avoid any repeats of the attack in which Mr. Jacobs slammed his handcuffed arms down onto a marshal's wrist, he was led into Senior U.S. District Judge Gustave Diamond's courtroom by six marshals.

Deputy U.S. Marshal Robert Potter, who was injured in the attack, underwent surgery and was placed on light duty for 47 days while recovering, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen R. Kaufman.

DOJ_NMG_0070687

The short, slender man wore leg irons, and his wrists were handcuffed to his waist. A large bandage stretched across his forehead.

Mr. Jacobs previously has been convicted of firearms violations, escape and aggravated assault, and currently has five "serious" cases pending, Mr. Kaufman said.

The prosecutor acknowledged Mr. Jacob's troubled childhood but countered it with the need for public safety.

"He's a damaged individual," he said. "Unfortunately, he's a very dangerous individual."

Mr. Jacobs' sentence was enhanced by several factors, including that his victim was a federal law enforcement officer; that he caused "serious bodily injury;" and because he is considered a career offender.

"This is probably the saddest, most tragic case I've ever been involved with," said public defender Jay Finkelstein. "I think it's absolutely heart-breaking."

The only person to speak on Mr. Jacobs' behalf was Dr. Jolie Brams, a clinical and forensic psychologist, who evaluated him.

"In many ways, he would have been better off being an orphan," she said.

Dr. Brams talked about Mr. Jacobs' background, his profound, uncontrolled anger, his feelings of abandonment, and the lack of treatment.

But she also noted that he basically taught himself how to read, passed the high school equivalence test, and has taken and passed correspondence classes to be trained as a paralegal.

"I believe there is still room for growth and development," she said, "especially if he gets the help he so desperately needs."

Mr. Jacobs begged for that help when it was his turn to speak to the judge.

"I want to be given a chance -- to work things out; look forward to a future," he said, trailing off. "Just have a life, man."

Then Mr. Jacobs began to cry.

"I just feel like I never had a chance," he continued. "Everybody gave up on me before I ever had a chance. I can't do it by myself."

Man Helped By Priests Is Charged With Fraud (NYT)

By Anthony Ramirez

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

The voice on the line would beg the priest, Help me, Father; I'm in trouble.

My mother is facing eviction, the voice would say. Sometimes she needed money to pay for assisted living, or for a down payment on a new home, federal prosecutors said.

In the end, the man behind the voice, whom the authorities identified as Robert Riggio, 60, of Manhattan, bilked numerous priests around the country of at least $200,000, federal prosecutors said yesterday

Priests in North Carolina, Texas and Kentucky were victimized, prosecutors said, adding that the priests often drew on personal savings to send money to Mr. Riggio, and that some priests were bilked twice.

The scheme, which began in March 2004 and lasted until this month, involved more than 150 wire transfers from guileless priests to Mr. Riggio and a partner who was not named in court papers. In some cases, Mr. Riggio pretended to be a member of the priest's parish seeking help, the papers said.

The scheme was undone by an undercover agent posing as the niece of a priest, prosecutors said.

Mr. Riggio appeared yesterday at a hearing in Federal District Court in Manhattan, where he was advised of his rights and informed of the charges against him, but not formally arraigned. He has not been indicted.

He is charged with one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud and one count of wire fraud. If convicted, he faces up to 25 years in prison.

He surrendered to federal marshals at 9 a.m. yesterday and was ordered released on a $100,000 personal recognizance bond after surrendering his passport.

Dressed in a pink polo shirt, blue polyester warm-up pants and white running shoes, Mr. Riggio answered questions from Magistrate Judge Henry Pittman with a "yes" or "no" in a clear voice, and made no statement.

Mr. Riggio's lawyer, Chris Flood, and Nicholas Goldin, an assistant United States attorney, declined to comment on the case.

Mr. Riggio has an extensive criminal history on Long Island and in New Jersey. According to the New Jersey Department of Corrections, for example, he served nearly two years in a New Jersey prison for "theft by deception." He was released on May 2, 2001.

In court papers released yesterday, a special agent with the F.B.I., Tina M. Taylor, said Mr. Riggio used the aliases William Kelley and Timothy Ryan. Agent Taylor appeared in court but did not make a statement.

Agent Taylor said in court papers that she was part of a special squad investigating Mr. Riggio and his partner. She cited telephone surveillance recordings, Western Union and MoneyGram records, and the testimony of an undercover agent posing as the niece of a priest in Kentucky who had sent $25,600 to a William Kelley.

As part of the investigation, the undercover agent telephoned Mr. Riggio last Thursday. At the same time, Agent Taylor said, she observed Mr. Riggio answering his cellphone.

Mr. Riggio identified himself to the undercover agent as William Kelley and said he was a member of the priest's Kentucky parish trying to obtain housing in Manhattan for his mother.

"Mr. Kelley" said that he needed more funds for his mother but that he was in West Virginia at the moment, according to Agent Taylor's court papers.

Crime Lab Probe Tab To Grow By $1.5 Million (HC)

By Alexis Grant

Houston Chronicle, September 28, 2006

The City Council on Wednesday approved spending an additional $1.5 million to complete an independent investigation of the police crime lab that has already cost the city nearly $4 million.

After months of delay, during which Mayor Bill White, several council members and a high-ranking police official questioned whether more money should be allocated to the project, the panel approved the funding without discussion.

White said after the meeting he is confident this will be the last time the city puts money toward the investigation, which began in March 2005.

"I wanted to make sure that we were going to get value for what we asked for and that this would not be perpetual," White said.

The city hired lead investigator Michael Bromwich, a former U.S. Justice Department official, to investigate the crime lab more than two years after problems there came to light. Two men had been released from prison because of inaccurate work on evidence from their cases.

The independent team of lawyers and scientists conducting the project have reviewed about 2,300 cases from the Houston Police Department crime lab. HPD's conclusions about evidence in 93 cases may be inaccurate, they say.

The project initially was expected to cost about $3.2 million. City Council first allocated $2.2 million, then agreed to pay $1.6 million more.

In June, Bromwich asked for an additional $1.5 million to complete testing. It was needed because the scope of the project expanded at the request of council members after scientists found widespread problems, he said.

The most recent payment brings the total cost of the probe to $5.3 million.

Some Lethal Injections May Have Been 'Excruciating' (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein And Maura Dolan

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

SAN JOSE — Inmates executed by lethal injection in California may have been conscious when they were administered a drug that induces suffocation and an "excruciating" experience comparable to drowning or strangulation, an anesthesiologist who has reviewed state execution logs testified today.

Mark Heath, a professor of anesthesiology at Columbia University Medical School, said the logs showed that some of those executed were still breathing several minutes after prison personnel administered pancuronium bromide, a paralytic agent and the second of three drugs used in lethal injections in California and three dozen other states.

"If someone is breathing like that, they may not be in a deep plane of anesthesia. They may not even be unconscious," Heath said on the second day of a hearing before U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel on a challenge to California's lethal injection procedures by death row inmate Michael Morales.

His attorneys contend that the state procedure violates the U.S. Constitution's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. As Heath was testifying, attorney Ginger Anders displayed a copy of a prison log of the execution of Robert Massey, which showed that Massey continued to breathe for four minutes after the pancuronium was administered.

Heath also presented a withering portrayal of California's procedures for executing condemned prisoners, based on his review of prison records, depositions of execution team members and other material obtained by attorneys for Morales.

Among other things, Heath said members of the execution team were ignorant about the properties of the drugs they were using and failed to administer the required dose of the anesthetic sodium thiopental, which is meant to deaden the inmate to the pain of the paralytic.

DOJ_NMG_0070689

In response to a question about what she knew about the anesthetic, a registered nurse on the execution team said, "I don't study. I just do the job. I don't want to know about it," according to a deposition read by Anders.

Heath said he was very disturbed by the response: "You can't understand and appreciate the dangers if you don't know how the drug works."

Heath also said he was troubled by a discussion between corrections officials and the governor's representatives about changing the lethal injection protocol to address concerns Fogel voiced when Morales' execution was postponed last spring. According to notes taken by attorney Bruce Slevin, a doctor who works for the Corrections Department suggested that the state use a different, longer-lasting and more effective anesthetic.

But lawyers in the meeting spurned Dr. Robert Singler's idea, saying they believed the state should not change course because the three drug protocol had been upheld by courts. Instead, they suggested that the procedure be "tweaked," according to Slevin's notes.

Heath said this was "not a medically valid reason." Heath added: "The priority should be to make sure it is humane. If we make sure it is humane, a court is not going to stop" the state from conducting lethal injection executions, Heath concluded.

On Tuesday, an expert on pharmacology said the drug used to anesthetize inmates wears off "extremely fast" and potentially exposes prisoners to painful deaths.

The four-day trial here is one of several court proceedings around the nation in which lethal injection is under challenge as a violation of the U.S. Constitution's ban on cruel and unusual punishment. Executions have been put on hold in California pending the outcome of the litigation, brought by Morales, who was sentenced to death for the 1981 murder of Terri Winchell, 17, in Lodi.

Judge Fogel has stressed that condemned inmates are not entitled under the Constitution to a painless death.

CIVIL LAW:

S.J. Nursing Home Guilty Of Defrauding Medicare (MERCN)

By Rodney Foo

The San Jose Mercury News, September 28, 2006

An East San Jose nursing home was convicted Tuesday of filing false Medicare claims, and its corporate owner also has agreed to pay $14.7 million to settle a related federal lawsuit instigated by a whistle-blower, prosecutors said.

Representatives for Parkview Nursing Center agreed to plead guilty in U.S. District Court in Oakland to two counts of submitting inflated nursing hours related to patients' reports to Medicare. No individuals were charged, U.S. Department of Justice spokesman Luke Macaulay said, only the business entities.

The crimes occurred in November 1997 and September 1998, prosecutors said. The complaint against Parkview was filed earlier this month.

Parkview also was ordered to pay a $500,000 fine. The 99-bed nursing home was closed in 1998 by its owner and operator, Horizon West Healthcare, a wholly owned subsidiary of Horizon West, based in Rocklin.

A Horizon West spokeswoman, Susan Bitar, said the reporting errors were the result of a ``complex and outdated system" used to record nursing hours.

``These errors could not and would not be made today," she said.

The conviction follows an August agreement by Horizon West to pay $14.7 million to settle a 2000 lawsuit brought by a former employee, Julia Lee, and the Justice Department. The settlement will be paid out over five years, according to the agreement.

Lee originally filed the action under a federal law that permits whistle-blowers to sue on behalf of the government, alerting prosecutors to the inflated Medicare reports.

Lee and the government are in negotiations over her percentage of the settlement, Macaulay said.

Neither Lee nor her attorney could be reached for comment Tuesday.

House Panel Moves FOIA Bill Forward (AP-Y)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, September 28, 2006

A House panel advanced a bill to close gaps in the Freedom of Information Act and speed the release of government documents, but the legislation seemed unlikely to pass this year.

DOJ_NMG_0070690

The legislation, approved unanimously by a House Government Reform subcommittee, would penalize federal agencies that fail to respond to FOIA requests in a reasonable period of time.

The subcommittee added a provision not in a similar measure passed last week by the Senate Judiciary Committee. The amendment by Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., would revoke two Bush administration memos that directed agencies to withhold information from FOIA requests when that information would threaten national security.

The House bill awaits action by the full committee, the Senate's by the full Senate.

The legislation appears likely to fall victim to Congress' end-of-session rush to recess this week so lawmakers can head home to campaign for re-election.

Given the workload, House and Senate Republican officials said no plans have been made to take up the FOIA bill during a weeklong session now scheduled between the Nov. 7 election and Thanksgiving.

Nonetheless, it was significant that the Republican-led subcommittee adopted Waxman's amendment on reversing the White House's memos.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft shifted from the Clinton administration's policy of "maximum responsible disclosure" to one emphasizing "institutional, commercial and personal privacy interests" when considering FOIA requests.

In 2002, then-White House chief of staff Andrew Card sent a memo to agencies to "safeguard" information that could help in the development or use of weapons of mass destruction, or that could be used "to harm the security of our nation."

The Bush administration has removed thousands of documents from public access on the basis of those two actions, according to government watchdog groups and federal agencies.

The new legislation restates the 1966 act's "strong presumption in favor of disclosure."

Court Doesn't Intervene In 'Electioneering' Case (RC)

By Matthew Murray

Roll Call, September 28, 2006

A federal court Wednesday refused to intervene in a dispute between a Maine nonprofit organization and the Federal Election Commission regarding the group's right to air a television advertisement during a federally restricted blackout period.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia ruled that the FEC was correct in determining that claims by Christian Civic Life off Maine, Inc., were "not ripe" and "too speculative."

The group had sought to run an issue-based advertisement identifying Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) within 30 days of a primary election. Running the ad could have been a violation of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002.

In May, the same court denied the group's request for preliminary injunctive relief.

"We are very pleased that this case has been dismissed, and the 'electioneering communication' provisions of BCRA stand in place as written by Congress and upheld by the Supreme Court," said Fred Wertheimer, president of the campaign-finance watchdog group Democracy 21.

Jan Baran, a GOP election lawyer, said the ruling's significance is limited, but that the court will ultimately have to address the issue again.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Discrimination Case Opens Door To Internet ADA Claims (LAW)

By Sheri Qualters, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, September 28, 2006

Judge's ruling moves case forward against Target Corp.

A federal judge's decision not to dismiss a discrimination case against retailer Target Corp. for operating a Web site inaccessible to the blind opens the door to Internet-related Americans with Disabilities Act claims.

The recent order is believed to the first ruling from a judge that the ADA can apply to the Internet, and lawyers from both sides of the bar anticipate more cases.

"To limit the ADA to discrimination in the provision of services occurring on the premises of a public accommodation would contradict the plain language of that statute," wrote U.S. District Judge Marilyn Hall Patel, who sits in San Francisco. "To the extent defendant argues that plaintiffs' claims are not cognizable because they occur away from a 'place' of public accommodation, defendant's argument must fail."

DOJ_NMG_0070691

Patel declined the National Federation of the Blind's request for a preliminary injunction requiring Target to immediately update its site. She said that there is no emergency to address and that more discovery is needed to investigate Target's claim that the average blind person is able to access its Web site now. National Federation of the Blind v. Target, No. 06-01802 (N.D. Calif.).

COMPANIES UNAWARE

There will be continued exploration of the applicability of the ADA and certain state laws to commercial Web sites, predicted Daniel F. Goldstein of Brown, Goldstein & Levy in Baltimore. Goldstein represents the plaintiff in the case, Baltimore-based National Federation of the Blind. "It's too important of an economic activity for the blind to be excluded," Goldstein said.

The federation, which filed the lawsuit as a class action on behalf of all blind people unable to access Target's site, encourages members to report inaccessible Web sites. Companies are often unaware of the problem and usually quick to update their Web sites, but Minneapolis-based Target was one of the exceptions, said spokesman John Pare.

The federation's dispute with Target is not its first lawsuit seeking Internet access, but it's the first to reach such an advanced stage, Pare said.

Several years ago, the federation dropped an earlier lawsuit against America Online (before its absorption by Time Warner Inc.) when the company agreed to update the site. Although the federation declined to publicly name other potential lawsuit targets, it's prepared for other court battles, Pare said.

Although "disappointed" that the case was not entirely dismissed, Target said it is heartened by the court's decision to deny the federation a preliminary injunction, according to a company statement.

"We believe our Web site complies with all applicable laws and are committed to vigorously defending this case. We will continue to implement technology that increases the usability of our Web site for all our guests, including those with disabilities," Target said.

Al Mohajerian, whose Los Angeles-based Mohajerian Law Corp. handles many ADA cases, said "common sense" leads him to believe that making Web sites accessible to the blind will be required if compliance is not too expensive.

"If you're opening doors one way or the other for the public to do shopping, you have to consider the disabled," Mohajerian said.

The federation estimates that Target would need to spend between $20,000 to $40,000 to retrofit its Web site, but Pare said the extra work to make Web sites accessible at the beginning is "negligible."

Blind users need screen-reading software installed on their own computer to read accessible Web sites. Accessible sites include alt-text code, which allows the software to recite a description of graphic images. Pare also noted that offering online shopping is important to the blind, who often would otherwise need to rely on other people for rides or pay for transportation to get to a store.

Plaintiffs' lawyers with ADA experience also say the case may go in favor of the federation. Web sites for stores like Target are closely tied to their retail operation, which is defined by the law as a place of public accommodation, said attorney Barry Weintraub of Stafford, Va.

Weintraub also noted that the ADA requires access rather than specific architectural features.

"Just because you don't have a per se violation like a ramp with too much of a slope, that doesn't mean you can't bring an action under the general provision of no discrimination," Weintraub said.

Voting Is Tricky Mission For Troops Waiting For Ballots In Battlefield (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Election year after election year, tens of thousands of overseas voters fail to complete the time-consuming process of registering to vote, requesting a ballot, receiving it and mailing it back before polls close. As a result, their votes aren't counted.

Pentagon officials say the situation is particularly troublesome for troops in battle, who often are redeployed before mail reaches them. Michael Dominguez, principal deputy undersecretary of Defense for personnel and readiness, calls it “the special challenge of reaching the deployed warrior on the battlefield.”

Again this year, many states are still preparing their fall ballots after recent primaries:

·In Wisconsin, a Sept. 12 primary prevented election officials from readying the fall ballot. Kevin Kennedy, executive director of the state Elections Board, says it will be mailed out about 30 days before the elections Nov. 7, rather than the preferred 45 days. The state is among at least 17 that will accept returned ballots later this year.

·In Minnesota, scene of another Sept. 12 primary, officials hope to get ballots sent to overseas voters about 35 days before the elections. “There is no question that the timetable puts their votes at risk,” Secretary of State Mary Kiffmeyer says.

·In Washington, scene of a Sept. 19 primary, the Legislature has voted to move future state primaries to August. That would help in cases like the governor's race in 2004, which was so close it took seven months to determine Christine Gregoire's 133-vote victory.

Scott Wiedmann, deputy director of the Federal Voting Assistance Program at the Pentagon, says at least six states have begun mailing out overseas absentee ballots. The elections are 40 days away.

The Department of Justice has won consent decrees from several states to get more time for overseas votes to be counted.

The Federal Voting Assistance Program is working with post offices to get mail to the 142,000 troops in Iraq and 21,000 in Afghanistan.

Until 2004, Pentagon officials considered Internet voting, but its security was in doubt. The Pentagon pushes alternatives such as faxing and e-mailing.

"We want to make sure that they have some options out there if the mail doesn't get through," says Polly Brunelli, director of the Federal Voting Assistance Program.

Susan Dzieduszycka-Suinat, executive director of the Overseas Vote Foundation, says those solutions will improve timing at the expense of voters' right to privacy. "I find it offensive that to be able to vote and have our ballots counted on time, we have to give up confidentiality," she says.

Robert Carey, a senior fellow with the National Defense Committee, a grass-roots group that lobbies for a stronger military, says Internet voting should be reconsidered.

While stationed in Bahrain with the Navy, he says, mail usually took two weeks to reach him and two weeks to get back to the USA. If the Internet is secure enough for financial transactions and classified military documents, he says, it should be good enough for votes.

Ray Martinez, former vice chairman of the commission, sees both sides of the debate. Using e-mail and fax machines compromises ballot secrecy and is "not the long-term solution," he says. "But at least it ensures that these voters don't get disenfranchised."

Overseas Voting A Concern — Again (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Six years after problems counting overseas votes clouded the 2000 presidential election, U.S. troops and other Americans abroad face tight timetables and emerging technologies that still make it difficult to have their votes counted.

·Fourteen states with September primaries risk getting absentee ballots out too late for remote voters to return them in time.

·Efforts to speed things by using e-mail and fax machines pose a risk to voters' confidentiality.

·Websites intended to help overseas voters navigate the process are not widely used. A private group's site was taken down earlier this month in a contract dispute.

The problems with timing and technology concern federal election officials, who try to ensure that overseas votes are counted on time. An estimated 29% of troops who wanted to vote did not get absentee ballots in 2000 or received them too late.

About 3.7 million Americans live overseas, and more than 400,000 members of the military are stationed or deployed overseas. In 2004, Pentagon officials estimate, 58% of Americans abroad voted, compared with overall turnout of 60%. Military participation overseas was estimated at 75%.

Those figures are disputed by the federal Election Assistance Commission (EAC) and the Government Accountability Office because of the sample size and response rate.

"You cut the time so short that people start getting disenfranchised," says Paul DeGregorio, chairman of the EAC, which held a hearing in St. Louis last week on issues concerning overseas voting. "This problem needs to be addressed nationwide."

The Senate Armed Services Committee has scheduled a hearing on the issue for today.

The biggest problem is timing. Polly Brunelli, director of the Pentagon's Federal Voting Assistance Program, and other experts say there should be 45 days between the time ballots are sent to voters and when completed ballots are received at election offices. Only 40 days remain until the Nov. 7 general election.

Congress has approved $2.5 million for the expansion of Web technologies, including e-mail and secure-server transactions. Those methods risk voters' privacy.

DOJ_NMG_0070693

Fewer than one in five uniformed military personnel know about Pentagon websites, according to a March report by the Pentagon's inspector general. And the Overseas Vote Foundation's website, which helps users register and request ballots, recently had to be taken down and reconfigured.

DeGregorio says the problems may require legislation setting deadlines for states to send out ballots. Internet voting deserves another look, after a $22 million project was scrapped in 2004, he says. "I believe the technology can be found to fix this problem," he says.

Restore Voter Confidence (USAT)

By Henry Hyde

USA Today, September 28, 2006

The Constitution guarantees every citizen the right to vote. The integrity of elections is central to our democracy. Because of increasing concern over electoral fraud, the House passed the Federal Election Integrity Act (FEIA) mandating that voters present proof of citizenship and a valid photo ID when registering to vote. A valid photo ID would also be required at the polling place.

Not surprisingly, FEIA has met strong opposition from the majority of Democrats, who support amnesty, a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants. The vote in the House was 228-196, mostly along party lines.

Contrary to false claims, the federal government would provide funding for people who proved they can't afford a valid ID card.

FEIA follows the REAL ID Act of 2005, which requires citizenship status on driver's licenses starting in 2008. This measure was recommended by the bipartisan Carter-Baker Commission on Federal Election Reform.

Objections were made that people in rural areas would not have access to photo services, but these can be provided at driver's license facilities, township offices, municipal offices or any local facility designated by the election board.

We are required every day to present valid identification when applying for Social Security, Medicare, Medicaid, township services such as food stamps or housing, driver's licenses, insurance, entering a nursing facility, or opening a bank account.

When the bill reaches a House-Senate conference committee we can, by amendment, permit people objecting to photos on religious grounds to have retinal scans.

Overseas active duty military personnel absent from the USA on Election Day are excepted from this provision.

This proposal would not disenfranchise anyone who wants to vote. Our purpose is to stop fraud and to ensure every citizen the right to vote.

In Washington state 1,678 illegal votes were cast in the 2004 general election, which exceeded the margin of victory. Some voters have been told at the polls that they have already voted! Residents of cemeteries vote. A member of the New York City Council proposed allowing illegal immigrants to vote in local elections.

By enacting this bill, we can help restore confidence in our system and thereby encourage voter participation.

Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., is chief sponsor of the Federal Election Integrity Act.

ANTITRUST:

Mittal Prefers To Sell Weirton (BSUN)

By Allison Connolly, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, September 28, 2006

For Sparrows Point, 'it's good news,' plant manager says

Mittal Steel Co. NV said yesterday that it plans to sell its Weirton, W.Va., mill rather than Sparrows Point if it's compelled to dispose of a U.S. property to settle antitrust issues.

Netherlands-based Mittal said it had identified at least 10 potential buyers for the West Virginia property, easing concerns at the Baltimore County plant, which Mittal acquired in 2005. Sparrows Point employs nearly 2,500 salaried and hourly workers.

Mittal must sell either Weirton, Sparrows Point or Canadian steelmaker Dofasco in the wake of its $38 billion merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA to appease Justice Department officials, who say the combined company, Arcelor Mittal, would have a monopoly on tin production in the United States.

Mittal has promised to sell Dofasco to German-owned ThyssenKrupp AG, but despite the merger agreement, Arcelor officials refuse to let it go. In one of a series of moves to fend off Mittal's nearly six-month hostile takeover bid, Arcelor transferred Dofasco to a Dutch trust, making a sale without Arcelor's consent impossible.

DOJ_NMG_0070694

The Justice Department has given Mittal until Nov. 28 to sell Dofasco, with the option of a 60-day extension. If Mittal is unable to sell Dofasco, the Justice Department will give Mittal 90 days to sell either Sparrows Point or Weirton.

In a slide presentation posted on Arcelor Mittal's Web site yesterday, Mittal's Chief Financial Officer Aditya Mittal said the company still wants to sell Dofasco but has begun discussions with the Justice Department about Weirton.

Sparrows Point was not mentioned in that slide, but later in the presentation, the Point was listed as a "key facility" in the "largest and most efficient industrial network in the Americas."

Ultimately, the Justice Department must sign off on which plant is sold and to what buyer.

Employees at Weirton and Sparrows Point were cautiously optimistic yesterday about the development.

"Overall, it's good news for us," said Sparrows Point General Manager Thomas Russo. "Not knowing who the potential buyer would be, it wasn't a good place to be."

"We've been going through a period of uncertainty," echoed John Cirri, president of United Steelworkers Local 9477, which represents production workers at the plant.

Sparrows Point isn't out of the woods entirely. Justice Department officials toured Sparrows Point last week, Russo said.

"It's not a done deal until the Department of Justice says it is, but it's a good sign they're leaning that way [toward Weirton]," Russo said.

A Justice Department spokeswoman declined comment.

In Weirton, workers have been lobbying Mittal to sell the plant to an investor who will restart the steelmaking furnaces. Mittal idled them last year and sent the hot-metal work to Sparrows Point because the Baltimore County plant was more efficient. About 1,000 workers in Weirton lost their jobs, and the plant was reduced to a finishing mill.

"They're good facilities, and we're willing to make it as efficient as we possibly could make it," said Mark Glyptis, president of the Independent Steelworkers Union, which represents workers at the Weirton plant.

Glyptis said Weirton has more capacity to produce tin than either Sparrows Point or Dofasco and would be a valuable acquisition. He said the union proposed a plan to Mittal to reduce costs by $90 million a year before Mittal decided to shut down the furnaces.

Mitchell Hecht, a former executive at International Steel Group, which sold Weirton and Sparrows Point to Mittal, has expressed interest in buying Weirton and restarting its furnaces, Glyptis said.

Steel analyst Charles Bradford, of New York City-based Bradford Research Inc., is skeptical that there are 10 serious buyers for Weirton. But he said there is room for another player in the tin market: Mittal and U.S. Steel Corp. control more than 80 percent of tin plate production in the United States. The rest is made by Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel. The tin is used to make cans for food and hairspray, among other products.

"The market for tin plate is a good market," he said.

Bradford said ThyssenKrupp is not interested in tin, and wants Dofasco because it provides high-grade steel sheet for the lucrative auto market

Also yesterday, Arcelor Mittal announced that it would distribute 30 percent of its profits to shareholders, promising a minimum annual dividend of $1.30 a share.

allison.connolly@baltsun.com

Federated Stores Says Icahn Plans To Increase Stake (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Cotten Timberlake

Bloomberg, September 28, 2006

Sept. 27 (Bloomberg) -- Federated Department Stores Inc., owner of Macy's and Bloomingdale's, said billionaire investor Carl Icahn plans to buy $113.4 million to $500 million of additional stock, sending the retailer's shares to a record.

If Icahn purchases $500 million of Federated stock, he would be acquiring about 11.5 million shares at today's price and boosting his stake to 2.5 percent. Icahn, 70, notified Federated of his plans to seek regulatory approval for the purchase, the company said today in a statement.

Icahn is known as a corporate raider, taking stakes in companies and forcing management to take steps to improve stock prices. Federated shares have more than tripled since February 2003.

``Carl Icahn is almost never a passive investor," said Pat McGurn, executive vice president and special counsel at Institutional Shareholder Services. ``He traditionally has gone after companies whose stock prices are weak, so it will be interesting to see what his take will be in this situation." McGurn's Rockville, Maryland-based firm advises investors on how to vote proxies.

Federated, the second-biggest U.S. department store company after Sears Holdings Corp., converted more than 400 stores to the Macy's name earlier this month, doubling the total. The stores were acquired as part of last year's $11 billion purchase of May Department Stores Co.

Shares Jump

Shares of Federated jumped $1.48, or 3.6 percent, to $43.13 at 2:11 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. It earlier reached a record $43.90. The stock had already rallied 26 percent this year through yesterday, more than triple the 7.1 percent gain in the Standard & Poor's 500 Index. Federated has a market value of $23.4 billion.

Federated said in a statement today that it welcomed Icahn's plans. ``We're glad Mr. Icahn sees value in our company," Chief Executive Officer Terry Lundgren said. Icahn didn't return phone calls seeking comment.

Icahn Management LP held 2.01 million shares, or 0.37 percent, of Cincinnati-based Federated's outstanding stock, as of June 30, Bloomberg data shows.

Regulators

Anyone who purchases more than $58 million in a company must report it to antitrust enforcers at the U.S. Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission. The requirement gives the government an opportunity to determine if the transaction poses any antitrust problems. The government has 30 days to decide whether to open an antitrust investigation.

Icahn earlier this year tried and failed to take control of Time Warner Inc., the world's largest media company. He pushed the company to boost its stock-buyback program to $20 billion from $12.5 billion, and slash $1 billion in costs. He also urged a break up of Time Warner in an effort to boost the stock price.

On Sept. 7, Icahn agreed to sell the oil and natural-gas unit of his American Real Estate Partners LP to Riata Energy Inc. for $1.52 billion, 10 times what he paid for the business three years ago.

Icahn informed Federated ``very recently" that he intended to make the regulatory filing, spokesman Jim Sluzewski said, declining to be more specific. ``We were notified and we felt the obligation to report it," said Sluzewski. ``This is consistent with what other companies have done and potentially a material development."

To contact the reporters on this story: Cotten Timberlake in New York at ctimberlake@bloomberg.net

Judge Dismisses Key Part Of AMD Antitrust Lawsuit Against Intel, Sets Trial Date (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, Ap Business Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

(AP) - SAN JOSE, California-A federal judge dismissed a major portion of Advanced Micro Devices Inc.'s antitrust lawsuit against archrival Intel Corp., ruling that AMD cannot sue in the U.S. for Intel's alleged monopolistic tactics overseas.

The judge also set a trial date of April 27, 2009 for AMD to argue that Intel forced major customers into exclusive deals and offered secret rebates to undercut AMD in the market for microprocessors that act as the brains of computers.

U.S. District Judge Joseph J. Farnan Jr. set the 2009 trial date Wednesday, a day after stripping a key component from AMD's lawsuit, which alleges anticompetitive practices in several countries including Britain, Germany and Japan.

On Tuesday, the Delaware-based judge ruled that AMD failed to prove that Intel's alleged strong-arm tactics abroad had "direct, substantial and foreseeable effects" on AMD's operations in the United States.

Santa Clara-based Intel, the world's largest computer chip maker, argued that AMD should not be able to sue in the U.S. for alleged lost sales of microprocessors that were made and sold in other countries. It also argued that part of AMD's case should be dismissed because AMD was seeking redress abroad for "foreign commerce claims."

AMD, which filed its lawsuit in June 2005, maintains that the market for microprocessors is global and that Intel's conduct domestically and abroad are inextricably linked.

The ruling was a big win for Intel but much of the case remains intact.

"We are pleased that the judge understood and agreed with our argument and analysis of the law," said Intel spokesman Chuck Mulloy. "Nonetheless, we plan to vigorously defend ourselves on the remaining portions of this case."

AMD has not yet decided whether to appeal the ruling, said company spokesman Michael Silverman.

"Intel cannot escape antitrust scrutiny for its conduct," Tom McCoy, AMD's executive vice president for legal affairs, said in a statement. "As this U.S. litigation is joined by global antitrust investigations, it is clear that Intel cannot escape the consequences of its illegal monopoly abuses."

Symantec: Microsoft Won't Give Us Key Vista Tech (CNET)

By Tom Espiner, Special to CNET News.com

CNET News, September 28, 2006

Security rival says Microsoft is withholding spyware APIs for Windows update, but software giant denies it.

Symantec has accused Microsoft of withholding key information about its upcoming Vista operating system in an attempt to gain an advantage in the security market.

The security specialist said this week that Microsoft is refusing to hand over the application programmable interfaces (APIs) for Windows Defender, the spyware product that will be included in Windows Vista. Without the APIs, Symantec contends that it's unable to ensure that its own security products are compatible with the update.

"Microsoft is affirmatively introducing bottlenecks to funnel customers to their products," said John Brigden, Symantec senior vice president for Europe. "It's all about control and dominance. They are deliberately delaying giving us the APIs."

Microsoft responded to Symantec's concerns on Wednesday, and said it had made the APIs for Defender available earlier this week.

"As a result of our ongoing dialogue with partners and our customers, Microsoft decided in August this year to add the ability for any security software company to programmatically disable Windows Defender access through an API," a Microsoft representative said.

"Availability of the Defender APIs was announced to security partners on Friday, Sept. 22, 2006, and we understand Symantec requested and received the go-ahead to develop on that API on Monday, Sept. 25," Microsoft said.

Microsoft added the functionality to disable Windows Defender in Release Candidate 1 of Vista, or RC1, which came out early this month. There may have been some confusion in the industry because the accompanying information for developers, called a software development kit, or SDK, did not provide details on the functionality, the company said.

"Two weeks after releasing RC1, we provided the follow-up documentation, which was released out-of-band; normally we release it with major milestones," said Adrien Robinson, business development manager at Microsoft. "The confusion, I think, that people are having is that the functionality is not in the RC1 SDK, and the reason for that is that we added it just before RC1."

Symantec, though, insists that the APIs still aren't available.

The timing of the release of APIs is crucial for Symantec, as it is due to ship a Vista-compatible Norton antivirus product to PC makers in October.

"No one has received any information about Defender, and we're coming up to an OEM (original equipment manufacturers) shipment date in October. It's three weeks away," Brigden said.

Symantec has partnerships with equipment manufacturers Dell, Fujitsu, Hewlett-Packard, IBM, Sony and Toshiba, among others. The antivirus vendor is worried that Microsoft will hand over the APIs so late that Symantec won't be able to make its antivirus software compatible with Vista in time.

"Microsoft will provide information about two days before the October shipment date, and say, 'We've given you the APIs.' Now, we're good, but we're not good enough (to integrate Norton with Defender) in that time," a Symantec representative said.

Symantec hopes the APIs will be supplied before that. It would not comment on the potential damage to its relationships with PC partners should it not have enough time to integrate Norton into Vista.

The entry of Microsoft into the security market has put incumbents on their guard, given the software giant's $34 billion cash pile and a hefty presence on desktops. On top of this, European Commission regulators and Microsoft are in the middle of a tussle over the potential antitrust impact of security components in Vista.

Security vendor McAfee is also irked that Microsoft has not provided APIs for Defender. Sources close to the company confirmed that Microsoft has not provided the APIs, and that senior McAfee executives "really have a bee in their bonnets" about the situation.

McAfee is concerned that there will be compatibility problems between its security systems and Vista, and that customers will not be able to remove Defender from their systems, CNET News.com sister site ZDNet UK has learned.

Symantec and McAfee are battling Microsoft for the ability to replace the Windows Security Center with their own security consoles. Additionally, the security companies also claim the PatchGuard feature in 64-bit editions of Vista excludes them but lets in hackers.

Tom Espiner reported for ZDNet UK in London. CNET News.com's Joris Evers contributed to this report.

Johnson & Johnson Charges Leak To Competitor Subverted $24B Acquisition (LAW)

By Martin C. Daks, New Jersey Law Journal

New Jersey Law Journal, September 28, 2006

Johnson & Johnson has filed suit in federal court against Abbott Laboratories and two medical device manufacturers, seeking at least $5.5 billion for alleged tortious interference and breach of a merger agreement.

The New Brunswick, N.J.-based health care company charges that a planned $24.2 billion acquisition of Guidant Corp. of Indianapolis was scotched in early January after Guidant leaked confidential information to another manufacturer, Boston Scientific Corp., which ultimately bought Guidant for $27 billion.

Harold Paul Weinberger of Kramer, Levin, Naftalis & Frankel in New York, represents J&J in the suit, filed Monday in the Southern District of New York.

In December 2004, J&J announced it had structured an agreement to buy Guidant, a heart device manufacturer. To ease antitrust regulators' fears, the companies agreed to grant a nonexclusive license for certain Guidant patents to Abbott Labs, a competing health care company based in Columbus, Ohio.

J&J says the terms of the deal prohibited Guidant from providing confidential information to any other company unless the third party was making a superior, unsolicited takeover offer. That caveat was designed to keep Guidant from using its agreement with J&J to shop around for higher offers.

Last December, Boston Scientific made a $25 billion offer for Guidant, later upped to $27 billion, and, as part of its formal offer on Jan. 8, said it would ease antitrust fears by selling certain Guidant businesses to Abbott. Abbott in turn agreed to make a $700 million loan to Boston Scientific.

J&J alleges that Abbott was induced to cooperate when it received confidential information about Guidant. The complaint contends that J&J was alerted to the alleged breach by a comment Boston Scientific CFO Lawrence Best made during a Jan. 9 conference call about its deal with Guidant. The complaint quotes Best as saying, "We had the opportunity to do a certain level of due diligence. Abbott had the opportunity to do a much deeper dive on due diligence."

J&J charges that at some point between the announcement of Boston Scientific's bid on Dec. 5 and submission of its formal proposal on Jan. 8, "Guidant not only allowed Boston Scientific to conduct due diligence on it [sic] business but also disclosed even more confidential business information to Abbott -- which had no independent right to receive any information."

J&J claims that, based on the disclosures, Abbott agreed to enter into a divestiture and financing agreement with Boston Scientific that allowed the company to make an offer for Guidant that "would not require a lengthy and uncertain antitrust review." In turn, that advantage gave Guidant the opening to accept Boston's offer as "superior" to J&J's.

Paul Donovan, a spokesman for Boston Scientific and Guidant, said Wednesday, "We believe the suit is meritless. ... Throughout this process, we complied with all the terms of the J&J/Guidant merger agreement."

Melissa Brotz, a spokeswoman for Abbott, likewise said the suit is "without merit."

Some outside observers, however, say J&J's case may have merit, though it won't be an open-and-shut decision. "We think the prepackaged asset sale was needed to complete the deal financially and to gain FTC [Federal Trade commission] okay," Robert Gold, a Standard & Poor's analyst who covers Boston Scientific, said in a research note dated Tuesday. "But we think ABT's [Abbott's] due diligence may have violated terms of JNJ's offer for Guidant. We think BSX [Boston Scientific] investment risks are raised by this development."

Late Wednesday, Boston Scientific stock traded at $14.85 a share, up a nickel from Tuesday's close but off from the 12-month high of $27.82 reached last Dec. 2.

E.On Closes In On Endesa Deal (WSJ)

By KEITH JOHNSON And JASON SINGER

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

German utility E.On AG's richer offer for Endesa SA is expected to clinch an approval from the Spanish power company's board, according to people close to the matter, a move that could close an acrimonious 13-month takeover battle and open the door to a broad remodeling of the European energy sector.

Should E.On's €37 billion ($47 billion) all-cash offer go through, one of the first effects could be an acceleration of a merger between Iberdrola SA and Union Fenosa SA, Spain's second- and third-biggest electricity companies. That would create another Spanish company big enough to fend off foreign suitors and even make acquisitions abroad. It would also leave smaller regional power companies, such as Spain's Gas Natural SDG SA or Energia de Portugal SA, prey to a second wave of consolidation.

E.On's offer comes as energy companies are rushing to bulk up ahead of a full liberalization of Europe's electricity sector next summer, when power companies from any European Union country will be allowed to operate in any other member state.

So far, cross-border deals have been limited, often by national governments. High oil prices and energy shocks, such as a natural-gas dispute between Russia and Ukraine last winter, have also stoked fears in Europe regarding the security of energy supplies, leading to a rise in protectionism. Still, major European power companies such as E.On and Italy's Enel SpA have built up sizable war chests of cash and grown by expanding into Eastern Europe.

In recent years, Spanish utility companies were forced to watch this game from the sidelines, as a succession of Spanish governments handcuffed their efforts to consolidate, even as their European competitors bulked up.

Now, however, as the European Union has started knocking down obstacles to a single market, Spanish companies are being drawn into the action. On Tuesday, the EU executive body, the European Commission, struck down the Spanish government's conditions designed to block E.On's bid. That ruling is expected to hasten the creation of pan-European energy titans, following in the path of industries such as banking, telecommunications and infrastructure management, which have already seen a wave of consolidation across the Continent.

DOJ_NMG_0070698

If completed, E.On's bid for Endesa would be Europe's biggest cross-border electricity deal, and would create one of the Continent's largest power companies.

Endesa will not be free to study E.On's improved offer until it is approved by Spanish authorities, which could take as long as six weeks. Spain's Industry Ministry must first rule on a legal complaint by Endesa against an earlier, €21 billion hostile bid by Gas Natural SDG. Endesa's legal maneuvers have paralyzed both takeover bids. Analysts say Gas Natural, a company roughly a third the size of Endesa by market cap, will be hard-pressed to sweeten its cash-and-share offer to compete with E.On's new bid of €35 a share, 38% higher than its previous offer.

E.On's improved bid for Endesa won't be trouble-free. It comes one day after Spanish builder and energy company Acciona SA purchased a 10% stake in Endesa for €3.4 billion at €32 a share. E.On Chief Executive Wulf Bernotat said that he sweetened the offer in reaction to the Acciona purchase, and that it was meant "to send the right signal, so everybody concerned knows we mean business."

Mr. Bernotat said that Acciona officials indicated a desire to talk to the German company, and that he was open to a discussion. He suggested E.On wouldn't be opposed to Acciona remaining a shareholder in a combined company, but said it is too early to say for sure what the shareholder structure would look like. E.On's bid is contingent on securing at least one share more than 50% of Endesa.

E.On's bid is also conditioned on overturning bylaws that limit voting rights in Endesa to 10%, regardless of the size of any holder's stake. Acciona could be hoping to rally other big Endesa shareholders, and be in a position to block any change in Endesa's bylaws at a shareholders' meeting that would be called if E.On's bid goes ahead. That would defeat the E.On bid and allow Acciona to focus on its stated goal of "leading" Endesa as part of its aggressive push into electricity generation.

"Our plans haven't changed" despite the new E.On bid, said Acciona spokesman Javier de Mendizabal. "We are still the leading player," he said.

Acciona's swoop on Endesa was followed quickly by another builder's move on Iberdrola, which people close to the deal say could be a prelude to another merger. Actividades de Construccion y Servicios SA, or ACS, said yesterday it had paid €2.1 billion for a 6.3% stake in Iberdrola. The builder asked banks to secure a 10% stake, at €37 a share, on Tuesday afternoon, but ACS couldn't find sellers for the full 10%. ACS already is the biggest shareholder in Fenosa, with a 35% stake.

ACS said yesterday that it "had not taken any decision to promote a merger" between the two companies. An Iberdrola spokesman said, "We have not had any negotiations with Fenosa" regarding a merger. Fenosa declined to comment.

Endesa shares rose 7.7% to €35, and Iberdrola shares soared 14% to €38.16 in Madrid yesterday.

Speculation about a deal involving Iberdrola spilled over into Portugal, where the Spanish company has a 9.5% stake in state-controlled Energia de Portugal. Shares in the utility rose 6.2% yesterday. Analysts said EDP would be a likely takeover target by one of the big Spanish groups.

Rural Areas Left In Slow Lane Of High-Speed Data Highway (NYT)

By Ken Belson

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

CANAAN, Vt. — For most businesses, the goal is to attract as many customers as possible. But in the fast-changing telephone industry, companies are increasingly trying to get rid of many of theirs.

Bill and Ursula Johnson are among the unwanted. These dairy farmers in bucolic northeastern Vermont wake up before dawn not just to milk their cows, but to log on to the Internet, too.

Their dial-up connection is so pokey that the only time they can reliably get onto the Web site of the company that handles their payroll is at 4 in the morning, when it is less busy. Mr. Johnson doubles as state representative for the area, and he doesn't even bother logging on to deal with that. He communicates with colleagues in Montpelier, the capital, by phone and post instead.

The Johnsons' communication agony could soon get worse. Instead of upgrading them to high-speed Internet access, Verizon, their local phone company, is looking to sell the 1.6 million local phone lines it controls in Vermont, New Hampshire and Maine. The possible sale is part of an internal plan called Project Nor'easter, according to a person with knowledge of the details.

A Verizon spokesman, John Bonomo, would not comment on the plan, but said the company "continually evaluates the assets and properties in our portfolio for strategic fit and financial performance."

Verizon is not alone in its desire to reduce the number of landlines it owns. Big phone and cable companies are reluctant to upgrade and expand their networks in sparsely populated places where there are not enough customers to justify the investment. Instead, they are funneling billions of dollars into projects in cities and suburbs where the prospects for a decent return are higher.

DOJ_NMG_0070699

But those projects are unlikely to reach rural areas of Vermont and other states, leaving millions of people in the Internet's slow lane, just as high-speed access is becoming more of a necessity than a luxury. The United States already lags behind much of the industrialized world in broadband access.

The lack of broadband has preserved places like Bessie's Diner as Canaan's de facto meeting hall. Over burgers and turkey club sandwiches, local residents swap tidbits that, in a more wired world, might end up in e-mail and instant messages.

Helen Masson, who lost her job at an Ethan Allen furniture factory a few years ago, grumbles that the lack of broadband has made it harder for her to find work, despite taking computer classes. Mr. Johnson, sitting nearby, nods in agreement. "The staff at the statehouse shudder when I'm on a committee because they have to lick a stamp instead of pressing a send button," he said.

Verizon has sold phone lines before. In 2005, the Carlyle Group bought its business in Hawaii. Verizon also sold 1.3 million lines in Alabama, Kentucky and Missouri in 2002.

Others have followed. In May, Sprint Nextel spun off its local phone division with 7.1 million lines and renamed it Embarq. In July, Alltel spun off its local phone group and merged it with Valor Communications.

If Verizon does sell the New England lines, it would most likely be to a smaller company or private equity group that could be even less capable of offering fast Internet access. That prospect has Vermonters fearful that the exodus of jobs and employers from the state could accelerate.

"We have companies that lose money because they don't have broadband," said Maureen Connolly, a director at the Economic Development Council of Northern Vermont. "We're not a third world country. We shouldn't have to beg for service."

While selling off slow-growing landlines in New England may please Verizon's shareholders seeking higher returns, the company's plan has reignited long-simmering political and economic debates about whether the region is being left behind as wealthier states nearby pull further ahead.

The proceeds from any sale of New England lines would help Verizon pay for the potentially more lucrative fiber optic network it is building in and around cities like New York and Boston.

The network is part of Verizon's push to transform itself into a fast-growing technology company and shed its image as a stodgy utility.

The possibility that Verizon would sell local lines is another sign of how much the phone business has changed in the last half decade. Verizon and other former local phone monopolies argue that since the cellphone, cable and Internet companies that are luring away millions of their customers are not compelled to serve remote and rural places, then they should not have to bear that burden either.

In Vermont, Verizon has broadband available on just 56 percent of its 330,000 lines, compared with 95 percent for most local phone companies, which receive substantial federal subsidies. Without the same aid, Verizon must bear more of the financial burden to upgrade its network.

"Vermont — like all rural states — has higher fixed costs of providing service," said Polly Brown, president of Verizon Vermont, where the number of landlines has declined 9.1 percent since 2002. "You're spreading those costs over fewer customers, who are located far and wide, and you're dealing with topographical challenges such as mountains and a rock base."

Residents, unions and politicians in Vermont do not dispute that the phone business is a challenging one, but they say that residents will have a harder time telecommuting or home-schooling their children. Towns like Canaan will not have access to the growing number of government records kept online, they say, and hotels and other tourist attractions will have a harder time attracting outsiders.

Take Michael and Louise Kingston, who have had a summer home in nearby Averill for the last 35 years. Owners of a grape-growing company with vineyards in Chile and California, they often cut their vacations short and return home to New Jersey because they cannot run their business on the 26-kilobit dial-up line — a speed considered fast in 1993 — in Averill.

"It means we can spend less time here, which means you spend less money here at a time when the local economy needs it," Mr. Kingston said.

Connections are so slow that their son drives 25 miles south to Island Pond to find a broadband line. There is no cellphone service either, so when locals go to areas where there is reception, they take along other peoples' phones to retrieve their voice mail for them. In places where Verizon does not sell high-speed Internet, some people have the option of getting broadband from their cable provider. But in Vermont, cable companies have focused on more populous towns like Montpelier and Burlington, the state's largest city. Cable coverage in the northeast part of the state is spotty.

Several rural phone carriers have spoken to Verizon about its lines in New England, including Fairpoint Communications, CenturyTel and Citizens Communications, according to people with knowledge of the discussions. Buyout firms may also be considering the business.

DOJ_NMG_0070700

Rural phone lines can be profitable because the basic infrastructure was paid for years ago, there are often few competitors and subsidies from the Universal Service Fund, which helps carriers provide service to hard-to-reach consumers, can be substantial.

But the subsidies do not benefit all carriers equally. For example, Vermont Telecom, which has 21,000 phone lines in the state, will receive $24.34 a month per line in the fourth quarter from the fund, money that is credited to customers on their bills.

But as a larger carrier, Verizon will receive one-tenth the subsidy, or $2.42 per phone line. Any company that buys Verizon's lines will inherit the same subsidies, making such a deal a less attractive investment. Verizon could compensate by lowering its sale price, at the risk of disappointing shareholders.

The economics of providing broadband in rural areas are discouraging, too. The cost of upgrading an existing copper line that runs from switching stations to remote homes can be as much as $5,000, according to the National Exchange Carrier Association. Such costs are prohibitive for phone companies, which typically want to make back their money within three years, said Victor Glass, the director of demand forecasting at the carrier association.

Though frustrations with Verizon run high in places like Canaan, the alternatives are more alarming. Since it took over Verizon's lines in Hawaii, the Carlyle Group has had billing problems that caused a fourfold spike in consumer complaints.

Carlyle's experience could presage what rural areas like northern Vermont might face if Verizon departs, particularly if the buyer sharply cuts costs and jobs.

"We would rather deal with Verizon because there's a process in place and people up and down the food chain that we know," said Darlene Stone, an operator at a Verizon call center in South Burlington and chief steward in the Communications Workers of America, which represents 135 Verizon employees in Vermont. "Private equity funds are not people who are going to be interested in our opinions."

The possibility that a sale could lead to worse service has put regulators in the uneasy position of trying to pressure Verizon to do more while not alienating the company, which invested 37 percent less in its network in Vermont last year than in 2001.

In 2005, the Public Service Board fined Verizon $8.1 million for providing inadequate customer service in Vermont. This year, regulators also got Verizon to agree to expand its broadband coverage to 80 percent of its phone lines by 2010.

That holds out some hope for isolated areas, but there is no guarantee that any particular customer, like the Johnsons, will be among the 80 percent and there is no guarantee that Verizon will still be in Vermont by then.

Alternative broadband providers who could fill that gap face problems, too. Jake Marsh, who runs Island Pond Wireless, a company that beams high-speed Internet signals over strings of antennas, has signed up 250 customers and has a waiting list just as long. But to expand, he is counting on towns getting state funds to help defray the installation costs.

Yet officials in Norton, 15 miles west of Canaan, could not download the 20-page grant application because their dial-up line was so slow.

Cable Guys (WSJ)

By JAMES K. GLASSMAN

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

In an era of partisan nastiness and gridlock, the California legislature did something on Aug. 31 that was shockingly harmonious, reasonable and beneficial to consumers. Both parties voted overwhelmingly to allow competition into a sector -- cable television -- where prices have been elevated and service depressed by the most pernicious monopoly in America.

When Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signs the bill, as expected, companies that want a statewide video franchise can go straight to the Public Utility Commission and get approval to operate within 44 days. In the past, in California, as in other states, cable companies had to make separate deals with America's 33,760 municipal units -- a process that can take years. The local licensing agencies "would often drag their feet and demand unrelated favors such as building parking lots and planting trees," writes Sonia Arrison of the Pacific Research Institute.

The effect was to create cable monopolies that often infuriated captive customers. According to a 2004 study by the Government Accountability Office, "cable subscribers in about 2% of all markets have the opportunity to choose between two or more wire-based operators." As cable rates rose in the 1980s, the federal government tried to fix the market with more regulation. That attempt, of course, failed. For the five years ending January 2004, the Federal Communications Commission reports that average cable rates increased 7.8% annually, compared with a 2.1% increase in the Consumer Price Index.

Very quietly, things are changing. Seven states, comprising about one-third of the U.S. population, have now passed video franchise laws, which will not only lower monthly subscriber costs but also create new technology jobs -- 10,000 in California alone, according to one estimate -- as Verizon and AT&T, along with cable overbuilders like RCN, jump in with both feet. To bring high-quality video to the home over a technology called Internet protocol, the telcos will make major investments to drive the fiber -- which carries the data -- much more deeply into their networks. Broadband service will improve; state and local governments will still get their franchise fees. All that will end is a monopoly that drives consumers nuts.

DOJ_NMG_0070701

Bills bringing competition to cable have been outrageously popular. In Kansas and South Carolina, the vote in each state house was unanimous; in California, it was 33-4 in the Senate and 68-7 in the House. Supporters range from the National Association of Manufacturers to the Communications Workers of America.

With a national election coming up, you would expect Congress to get on the bandwagon and embrace a version of the state bills, killing the monopoly and taking the credit. Instead, federal legislation is slowed down by measures promoting "net neutrality" -- the concept that telecom companies should be barred from asking content providers, like Amazon, to pay extra for higher-speed service the telcos develop -- the way that an airline asks more for a first-class seat. The House, after rejecting a net-neutrality amendment, passed a video-choice bill, as it's called, by a 3-1 margin in early June. But net neutrality lives in the Senate, and the debate has become tendentious. Moveon.org has taken up the cause, claiming on its website that a tiered system that gives faster delivery to some customers "would end the free and open Internet." Such claims are nonsense, and irrelevant when a federal bill to liberate cable TV is otherwise at hand.

How much will consumers save? A 2004 study by the GAO looked at six markets with cable competition and found that rates were 15% to 41% below similar markets with no competition. Annual savings for U.S. households through competition will total $8 billion, says the Phoenix Center for Advanced Legal and Economic Public Policy.

In Texas, where a statewide franchising law went into effect last year, a study by the American Consumer Institute surveyed consumers and found that 22% switched cable providers and saved an average of $22.30 per month. Subscribers who stayed with incumbent providers saved $26.83 per month because of the downward pressure on prices. Verizon rolled out a service in Keller, Plano and Lewisville, charging $43.95 a month for 180 video and music channels. "Shortly thereafter," writes the Heartland Institute's Steven Titch, Charter, the erstwhile monopoly cable provider, "began offering a bundle of 240 channels and fast Internet service for $50 a month, compared to $68.99 Charter had been charging for the TV package alone." Savings in Texas this year alone will total $599 million, according to the Phoenix Center. Yale Braunstein, an economist at the University of California at Berkeley, estimates that Californians will save between $692 million and $1 billion a year.

Yes, Americans can choose satellite TV, but, for reasons of convenience and service, many find it an inadequate substitute. There's a reason that cable families far outnumber satellite families. "Overall customer satisfaction among satellite subscribers has declined," says Steve Kirkeby, senior director of telecommunication research for J.D. Power and Associates. But if satellite TV improves and becomes a more attractive alternative, what's wrong with having enhanced cable competition, too? The more the merrier is, apparently, an economic concept that some folks in Congress still don't get.

Mr. Glassman is a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute and editor of its new magazine, "The American." He is also a senior adviser to AT&T Corp.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

No Charges In Sound Oil Spill (SEAPI)

By ROBERT McCLURE AND PAUL SHUKOVSKY, P-I REPORTERS

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, September 28, 2006

ConocoPhillips ship suspected in '04

After a mysterious midnight oil spill turned central Puget Sound beaches into a stinky mess, the Coast Guard proudly proclaimed that investigators had tracked down the spiller. The oil's chemical fingerprint clearly implicated a ConocoPhillips tanker, the agency said.

That was more than 1 1/2 years ago.

But now, federal prosecutors in Seattle are declining to press criminal charges against ConocoPhillips, even though the chemical fingerprint showed that the substance spilled was crude oil, which is usually carried by tankers such as ConocoPhillips' Polar Texas.

The Polar Texas was in the vicinity of the spill in Dalco Passage, near Vashon and Maury islands, on the night of the October 2004 spill. It was the only oil tanker there that night.

The decision by U.S. Attorney John McKay's office not to prosecute ConocoPhillips, which hasn't acknowledged guilt, doesn't mean the firm is totally off the hook. Federal and state environmental officials are still pushing civil cases against the Houston-based oil company.

And a grand jury in Alaska investigated allegations of criminal conduct by the company in unrelated episodes, including the apparent cover-up of another oil spill. It's unclear whether criminal charges will be brought in that case.

DOJ_NMG_0070702

In Seattle, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jim Oesterle would not elaborate on why McKay's office is declining to prosecute, saying commenting might interfere with ongoing negotiations between the company and environmental officials regarding possible civil penalties.

"I'm not prepared at this point to give all the reasons for (declining prosecution), and the reason for not providing more information is I don't want to get ahead of the state or the (Department of Justice) on their resolutions, because I know they're in the midst of those negotiations," Oesterle said.

The state Ecology Department said it and other agencies had been waiting for the outcome of the criminal investigation to launch an effort to recoup damages from the company for the environmental harm done.

The environmental agencies hoped that the company would admit that it spilled the oil and outline how it might have happened, so that the agencies could estimate how much oil spilled, said Dale Davis of the department's oil-spills unit. The oil spill's volume is a key factor in how much the company would have to pay.

"I don't think (waiting for the criminal investigation) helped us any," Davis said. However, there is no time limit on seeking environmental damages.

But there is a two-year time limit for the Ecology Department to pursue a separate process that penalizes the company by making it pay a fine. That expires next month.

"We are aggressively pursuing every option available to make sure justice is done as a result of the Dalco Passage spill," the agency said in a written statement.

The Coast Guard, which investigates oil spills, said it would continue to coordinate possible civil action against the company with a Justice Department unit in San Francisco.

The Coast Guard has declined to provide information about the investigation, rejecting a Freedom of Information Act request by the Seattle P-I on the ground that it has not finished investigating the case.

Lt. Cmdr. Andre Billeaudeaux, a Coast Guard spokesman, said that while he cannot comment on this decision by the U.S. Attorney's Office, "We are true believers in the U.S. attorney's methods."

"They have a measured approach, and they have their methods," Billeaudeaux said. "We do our best and we do a quality job. ... We have so many missions we do and so many irons in the fire. We do our best and move on. If there's process improvements (needed) in hindsight, we take a look at things we could have done better and sharpen the knife."

ConocoPhillips spokesman Rich Johnson said the company had no comment because it would be "inappropriate to discuss" the ongoing negotiations.

"We're continuing to cooperate with the authorities," Johnson said.

While a grand jury in Seattle was investigating the spill in June 2005, a memo distributed by the union representing ConocoPhillips' shipboard workers said, "So far the company is very pleased with the way our members have handled themselves and hope they will continue to be open and honest should they be called to testify in the future."

Members of the Polar Texas crew and the company have steadfastly maintained that they did nothing wrong when the ship took on additional seawater for ballast the night of the spill after unloading some crude oil in Tacoma.

If that operation were done incorrectly, it would be possible for the ship to disgorge oil in its cargo hold into Puget Sound. However, officers and crew members aboard the ship said the operation went well. Ballast water is taken on to keep a ship riding low enough in the water that it will be stable. The forecast on the night of the spill called for 10-foot swells and 30 mph winds in the North Pacific.

A former chief engineer of the Polar Texas and a former president of the Polar Texas fleet have told the P-I that it would be possible for crew members to flub the ballasting operation without knowing it, resulting in a spill.

At the time of the spill, the Polar Texas was just two months from being sent to the scrap yard. It left Tacoma about 6 p.m. that night, but the spill was not discovered until a tugboat captain passed through the area after midnight.

A P-I investigation in March 2005 documented numerous problems aboard ConocoPhillips tankers, including use of alcohol by crew members in apparent violation of company policy and an unreported explosion aboard one of the company's vessels.

The Alaska grand jury investigated problems aboard other ConocoPhillips tankers, including a spill aboard the Polar Discovery in mid-ocean in January 2004, caused when crew members mistakenly piped sludge oil from the engine room onto the ship's deck. Some got onto the side of the ship.

Later, the captain and other officers lowered a crew member over the ship's side with a power sprayer that could be used to clean up the oil.

Crew members said the purpose was to clean off oil on the vessel's side, although officers denied that. An entry in the logbook described it as a man-overboard drill. The captain offered no explanation for that entry.

The oil spill was not reported until a whistle-blower came forward four months later.

Failure to report an oil spill to the Coast Guard immediately is a federal crime.

P-I reporter Eric Nalder contributed to this report. P-I reporter Robert McClure can be reached at 206-448-8092 or robertmcclure@seattlepi.com.

State's Greenhouse Gas Bill Signed (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan And Marc Lifsher

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

California moved to the front of local government efforts to fight global warming today when Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed legislation calling for a reduction of greenhouse gases.

The bill commits the state to reduce the emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases by 25% by 2020. Greenhouse gases trap heat in the atmosphere and cause global warming.

At an elaborate signing ceremony at Treasure Island in San Francisco Bay, Schwarzenegger put pen to paper, a scene he repeated at a second ceremony at Pepperdine University in Malibu.

"We simply must do everything we can in our power to slow down global warming before it is too late," Schwarzenegger said at Treasure Island.

Both ceremonies were grandiose, bipartisan affairs, heavily laced with the exchange of compliments. The only difference was the weather, with bright sun in Southern California.

At Treasure Island, Schwarzenegger signed the bill into law at an outdoor ceremony under overcast skies with a chilly breeze and the San Francisco skyline as a backdrop. On one side of the stage were 114 flags from nations around the world; on the other, a giant video screen.

Among those onstage with Schwarzenegger were San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom, New York Gov. George Pataki, and the bill's cosponsors, California Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez (D-Los Angeles) and Assemblywoman Fran Pavley (D-Agoura Hills).

The signing ceremony gave Schwarzenegger a platform to display his environmental credentials weeks before voters decide whether to give him another term.

The Schwarzenegger camp touted the signing as a major policy step, and included a live satellite video message of congratulations from British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

"You are showing brilliant leadership that will inspire and excite a lot of people worldwide," Blair said. He expressed hope that leadership on the issue would come from "states within the United States of America" and "hopefully, in time, from the whole of America."

A Japanese diplomat read a letter to Schwarzenegger from Japan's outgoing Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, who commended the governor for "taking a leadership role in protecting the Earth's environment."

"As the world's two biggest economies, Japan and the United States share common responsibility to lead the world in its effort to fight global warming," the letter said.

The bill, AB 32, authorizes the California Air Resources Board and other agencies to begin measuring greenhouse emissions from electric power plants, oil refineries and other sources.

Beginning in 2012, emitters will be assigned firm limits on the amounts of carbon dioxide they can release into the atmosphere. Those caps will be gradually lowered to meet the 2020 target.

The new law relies on a variety of tools to reduce greenhouse gas emissions:

· Direct government regulation.

· Development of new technology, energy efficiency and alternative fuels.

· Creation of a market for companies that have met their emissions targets to sell credits on an open market to other firms. Buyers of pollution credits could continue to release carbon dioxide in excess of their limits.

Supporters of the global warming law concede that California, which is responsible for only about 2.5% of the world's greenhouse gas production, won't make a major difference in combating global warming alone.

Nevertheless, they contend that passage of the bill sets an example for the federal government, other states and countries that shows that action can be taken now to deal with climate change.

Critics, mainly mainline business groups, argue that California, acting on its own, will drive manufacturers and jobs to other states and countries that require less stringent regulation of greenhouse gases.

California: Schwarzenegger Signs Gas Emissions Act (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070704

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed into law a global warming initiative that imposes the nation's first cap on emissions of heat-trapping gases. "We simply must do everything we can in our power to slow down global warming before it is too late," Mr. Schwarzenegger said before signing the bill on Treasure Island, in San Francisco Bay. California's efforts on global warming have been in the spotlight since the governor and the state's legislative Democrats reached an accord last month on the bill to cut emissions.

Warming Trend Is Hatching A Business (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

U.S. governors, impatient with federal inaction on global warming, are taking matters into their own hands. The result could add impetus to an emerging industry.

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) yesterday signed legislation to cap greenhouse gas emissions. And seven Northeastern states, which together emit as much greenhouse gas as Germany, have banded together to set rules that would cut their emissions by 10 percent by 2019. Other states may join them.

"There isn't an actor at the table who wouldn't prefer a national program, but we can't afford to wait," says Franz Litz, climate change coordinator at the New York State Department of Environmental Conservation.

So the state leaders are modeling their efforts on the European Union, which has turned limits on greenhouse gas emissions into a multibillion-dollar worldwide industry.

Companies are already scrambling to take advantage of the E.U. system, which is an outgrowth of the global environmental accord known as the Kyoto Protocol. Arlington-based AES Corp. has dispatched teams to negotiate with Asian palm oil plantations over installing equipment to suck methane -- one of the most potent of a half-dozen greenhouse gases -- out of waste lagoons. The electric power company wants to convert it into energy and less harmful gases. In return, the firm would get credits it could use or sell in Europe.

The European system sets a cap for the continent's emissions of greenhouse gases, such as carbon dioxide. Every company producing significant amounts of greenhouse gases is issued a designated number of "allowances." If power plants and factories spew out more than their quotas, they have to buy allowances from firms that spew less than their allotments. Polluting companies can also buy credits from firms that are cutting emissions in the developing world.

The result: Gases that were once worthless now have a commercial value every bit as solid as coal, pork bellies or Treasury bills -- only with this commodity, companies are paid for what they do not deliver. According to Point Carbon, a research firm, $12.6 billion of greenhouse gas emission rights, called European Union Allowances, were traded in the first half of this year. The value of all existing allowances exceeds $70 billion.

The Northeastern U.S. governors' Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative plans to begin a similar type of carbon trading by 2009. Schwarzenegger, who appeared last month beside British Prime Minister Tony Blair, said that linking a West Coast plan to Europe's was one option.

The idea of creating a market for trading air pollution rights began in the United States. Legislation passed in 1990 and implemented in 1995 established an acid rain program, which capped sulfur dioxide emissions and let companies trade their assigned shares. Sulfur dioxide emissions fell 30 percent. Economists say such plans meet environmental goals efficiently, without choosing between technologies.

The United States insisted that other countries adopt a cap-and-trade approach for greenhouse gases in the Kyoto accord but then never signed on while Europe moved ahead. Back then, the United States agreed to reach a target 7 percent below 1990 emissions by 2012. Now, the country is churning out 16 percent more than it did in 1990 and 25 percent more than either China or the E.U.

"It is ironic that 10 years after Kyoto was signed, there is a vibrant market in Europe, an emerging market in the developing world, and the U.S. is sitting on the sidelines," says VÃ©ronique Bugnion, Point Carbon's research director.

No one is on the sidelines in Europe. Power generators now count greenhouse gases -- measured in metric tons of carbon dioxide -- as one of their costs. "It's going to change the way you make decisions about deploying capital," says Garth Edward, trading manager for environmental products at Royal Dutch Shell PLC, which has 25 installations in the E.U. system. Energy efficiency projects, he said, "are going to move up the ladder faster."

Stockholm-based Vattenfall, Europe's fourth-largest utility, is building a pilot zero-emissions coal-fired plant in Germany using sequestration, which injects carbon dioxide into the earth instead of releasing it into the air. Vattenfall chief executive Lars G. Josefsson says removing the carbon dioxide will cost more than $25 a metric ton, but he says, "If we're going to have a problem with carbon dioxide, this is a good investment."

DOJ_NMG_0070705

While the E.U. carbon trading scheme has given birth to an industry, it has also created controversy over how quotas are assigned and who gets stuck paying the bills. In Germany, utilities raised electricity rates, treating carbon emissions as a cost to pass along. Four utilities made $3 billion to $5 billion in windfall profits, Bugnion says.

There are disputes between countries as well as within them. Britain and Germany are cutting their greenhouse emissions sharply, while Spain's are still growing. Sweden relies mostly on hydro- and nuclear power for electricity; Germany relies overwhelmingly on coal. Countries are currently drawing up new caps for 2008-2012.

Setting baselines for emissions has been tough. Quotas are based on a company's emissions over the five years before the program began. Firms have sought higher baselines to get more allowances. In most nations, utilities were squeezed while industrial firms were given more than enough.

The numbers didn't add up the way people expected. In May, the E.U. revealed that actual emissions were well below the quotas, suggesting that baseline levels were set too high. That shocked the carbon trading market. The price of a ton of carbon dioxide crashed, dropping by two thirds and erasing $36 billion of value. Prices crept back up but tumbled in recent days.

The credits bought in developing countries pose other challenges. So far, companies find it cheapest to cut the most potent greenhouse gases, mostly in the developing world. A ton of methane, common in landfills and farms, equals 21 tons of carbon dioxide; a ton of hydro-fluorocarbons, a refrigerant byproduct, is worth as much as 11,700 tons of carbon dioxide.

Independent firms and investors are getting into the act. Ecosecurities, whose chief executive Bruce Usher is a former Wall Street derivatives trader, has become a broker and developer of projects in 26 countries, ranging from one to capture methane at a Chinese landfill to small hydropower dams in Honduras.

A London firm called Climate Change Capital has raised $830 million to reduce greenhouse gases for credits to be sold in Europe. AES is putting $325 million into a joint venture to produce 50 million tons of credits by 2012.

These credits need the blessing of the Clean Development Mechanism (CDM), a United Nations agency in Bonn. That process could get messy, and political. One criterion: "additionality," the buzzword for a project that wouldn't have happened without the credit system. That can be hard to figure out when high oil prices make conservation and alternative energy attractive. In July, the CDM rejected four projects, including two proposed by Ecosecurities, without saying why.

Not surprisingly, most credits are generated in countries with the worst environmental track records. China accounted for 62 percent of the CDM credits sold during the first half of this year. That raises a sensitive question: Should Europe be effectively subsidizing investments in pollution control that its economic competitor China hasn't bothered to make? Moreover, China is collecting a 65 percent tax on the sale of credits.

"Scientifically, it makes sense to take [greenhouse gases] out wherever you can do it most cheaply, but politically, it might be better to do it in your country," said AES chief executive Paul Hanrahan.

There is one functioning U.S. carbon market. On Earth Day 2005, Richard Sandor founded the Chicago Climate Exchange, but participation is voluntary. Member companies must trim 6 percent of their emissions by 2010. "The only ones who opt in know they'll meet the targets," says Point Carbon's Bugnion. Members include Ford Motor Co., DuPont Co., Motorola Inc., International Business Machines Corp., American Electric Power Inc. and half a dozen municipal governments.

Mandatory carbon trading may still be adopted in the United States. Cap-and-trade measures have been drafted by a handful of lawmakers. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) co-sponsored an earlier bill.

"This is a big global problem, and we have a deficit in global governance," says Vattenfall's Josefsson. "If we could solve this, it could be a model for global governance."

Heed This Warning (WP)

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

BENEATH ITS dry scientific lingo, a new analysis of global climate change by a group of NASA scientists is terrifying. Headed by climate specialist James E. Hansen, the group argues that recent global warming has been quite rapid -- about 0.2 degrees Celsius over each of the past three decades -- and has largely tracked climate models that predict more dramatic warming in the decades to come. If the world continues increasing carbon emissions at its current pace, by about 2 percent a year, the authors argue that the resulting warming will cause the extinction of about 60 percent of species around the world and "sea level rise of several meters per century with eventual rise of tens of meters, enough to transform global coastlines."

The scientists posit an alternative scenario as well, one predicated on dramatic reductions of carbon emissions. In that case, sea levels would still rise substantially and "cause problems for humanity," and 20 percent of species would still go extinct -- but the most catastrophic effects of warming might be averted. Most distressingly, they contend that humanity doesn't have long to make up its mind whether to pursue policy changes; another decade without emissions being reduced, they said, would probably make the alternative scenario infeasible.

DOJ_NMG_0070706

The likely consequences of global warming are a hotly debated subject, and one has to be cautious about predictions concerning hugely complicated systems -- such as average global temperature over time. But there is at least a decent chance that this and the many similar analyses by other reputable climatologists will prove correct. And that means that global warming represents a policy crisis responsible politicians can no longer ignore -- one as potentially existential as the threat of global terrorism, only in slow motion.

Countering that threat will require regulatory initiatives and societal investments. It will require significant changes in American attitudes toward energy use and conservation. But these may prove far less wrenching than many people imagine. What it certainly also will require is a great deal of political will -- political will of precisely the type the Bush administration has dedicated to a host of other issues but has assiduously avoided devoting to climate change. Most of all, it will require an end to denial -- denial that the problem exists, denial that anything can be done about it if it does and denial that the problem is urgent and requires immediate attention.

Number Of Smoggy Days Falls, Study Says (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

The number of dangerously smoggy days in the Washington area has declined by more than 40 percent since 2003, but the region still does not meet federal standards for healthy air, according to data released yesterday.

From 2003 to 2006, the region has had 63 days in which the levels of ground-level ozone -- a harmful gas formed when the sun heats polluted air -- was high enough for Code Orange, Code Red or Code Purple warnings. From 1999 to 2002, there were 114 such days, according to the Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments.

Officials said yesterday that they were encouraged, believing the reduction in bad air days was a sign that local and national anti-pollution measures were having an effect.

"The air's cleaner," said D.C. Council member Phil Mendelson (D-At Large), chairman of COG's air quality committee. "But not clean enough."

That's because the Washington region, which has exceeded smog limits repeatedly since 1977, still hasn't improved enough to meet the smog standards the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency will begin enforcing in 2009. At that point, a violation could trigger a loss of federal transportation funding.

Moreover, local environmental groups were wary of the report, wondering whether cooler weather, not reduced smog, was partly responsible for the improvement.

This might seem like an odd year to tout progress in reducing air pollution. An early August heat wave caused several Code Orange days, with residents warned against exercising or working outside. In July, the region had a Code Purple day -- the worst rating and its first in more than a year.

Jeff King, an air quality planner at COG, said this summer offered some confirmation that progress was being made: Although it was far hotter than in 2005, it had the same number of unhealthy air days -- 19. That appeared to mean that less smog was around for the sun to heat.

"We did have some pollution problems, but it wasn't as severe as we'd had in the past," King said.

The pollutants that help create bad air days come from sources as diverse as power plants, cars, gas pumps and paint fumes. In explaining the reductions in bad air, local officials cited changes almost as varied.

Mendelson credited new federal rules limiting the amount of nitrogen oxide in power-plant emissions and curbing auto pollution, as well as several local policy changes. Montgomery County bought more energy from wind power. The District required power companies to derive more of their electricity from renewable sources. Fairfax County retrofitted its school buses to produce cleaner emissions.

Mendelson said moves such as those could continue to reduce smog, even as the region adds millions of residents and thousands of miles of roads.

"So far, the region has continued to grow significantly, and yet we're polluting less," he said.

Frank O'Donnell of Clean Air Watch said the apparent good news was tempered by the fact that the Washington area still regularly suffers through Code Orange days and worse.

"If we're still seeing eight or 10 dirty air days in the area, that to me is still a sign that we're not there yet," O'Donnell said.

American Indians Await Trial On Lawsuit (AP-Y)

By James Macpherson, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070707

American Indian rancher Keith Mandan says he could double the size of his black Angus herd if he had the money — or if he were white.

Mandan, 53, and his wife, Claryca, 52, say they've struggled financially to keep their ranch in North Dakota's Badlands since the late 1970s because of a pattern of discrimination by the federal government.

The Mandans are among the plaintiffs in a lawsuit that accuses the U.S. Department of Agriculture of discriminating against American Indians in the granting of loans since 1981. During that time, Claryca Mandan said, the federal government "wiped out a whole generation of Indian farmers and ranchers because of racism."

USDA officials refused to respond to specific questions from The Associated Press about the allegations. In a statement, J. Michael Kelly, an attorney for the USDA, said the case is still ongoing and the agency is working to provide documentation requested by the Indians' attorneys.

Earlier this month, attorneys for the American Indian ranchers and farmers filed a motion to bring the case to trial next year — eight years after the lawsuit was filed.

A hearing on their motion is set for Thursday.

Keith Mandan said if he could get the financing, he'd buy about 300 more cows and build a calving barn and a machine shed to keep his cattle and farm implements protected from the harsh North Dakota winters. Instead, Mandan uses a heavily wooded gulch for calving. His machinery is exposed to the elements.

"My white counterparts across the road don't have the problems we have," he said. "We just don't receive the subsidies that non-Indian farmers and ranchers do."

The USDA's Farm Service Agency lends to farmers and ranchers who can't get credit from commercial lenders. The agency, known as the lender of last resort, is the largest agricultural lender in North Dakota.

Mandan believes the USDA has denied and delayed loans to American Indians to squeeze them out of business.

"They just want to close you out and take the land and put it in their inventory," he said.

The lawsuit was granted class-action status in 2001 but the case has floundered in federal court since.

Attorneys estimate the number of Indian farmer and rancher plaintiffs could be in the tens of thousands. A settlement figure has not been calculated, but would likely be in the "hundreds of millions," said Joe Sellers, the American Indians' lead attorney in Washington, D.C.

The lawsuit mirrors a civil rights case brought by black farmers in 1997 that settled two years later.

The federal government has paid out about $930 million to about 14,000 black farmers so far, said Anurag Varma, a Washington, D.C., attorney who helped represent the farmers and is involved in the American Indians' lawsuit.

"The underlying bad acts by the defendants are virtually identical," Varma said.

Sellers accuses the government of delaying resolution of the lawsuit filed by the American Indian ranchers and farmers.

"They have employed every tactical maneuver I can conceive of to postpone the day of judgment," he said.

But government attorneys said the case has been delayed in part by their appeal of the class action decision.

"We do take exception that we are dragging our feet," said Charles Miller, a spokesman for the Justice Department, which is representing USDA.

Meanwhile, Sellers said, the USDA continues to foreclose on Indian property.

"They have accelerated debt collection," Sellers said. "It seems to me it's an effort to drive the final nail in the coffin."

Three Affiliated Tribes Chairman Tex Hall, who also is a rancher, calls it economic racism.

"It's illegal, racist and discriminatory," Hall said. "Every day this continues, we lose another native farmer or rancher."

FBI Agent (DESERET)

By Lucinda Dillon Kinkead, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, September 28, 2006

MONTEZUMA CREEK — From the northernmost tip of the massive Navajo Nation, 13-year-old Elsha Black surveys the arid expanse of his grandmother's property in San Juan County.

Lucinda Dillon Kinkead, Deseret Morning News

Elsha Black, age 13, on the Navajo Indian Reservation. Black has strong ties to Utah's Indian Country. He is one of the few young people who speak fluent Navajo. He learned it living with his grandmother on the land where she was born. He says he'd prefer to live here now and swears he will come back. But for now, this young man must live off the reservation. He needs a good education. His mom needs a good job. His family says neither can be found here today.

A few years ago, Black was attending the local school in Montezuma Creek and living with his grandmother. Back then, his mom was living off the reservation in Farmington, N.M., during the week and coming home to the Navajo Nation on weekends. Sue Philemon's security job at a local college paid a better wage than anything she could find on the reservation.

Black remembers fifth-grade, when his fellow students were learning remedial words like "cat" and "bat." The textbooks were ancient, and even at age 10 Black knew he wasn't getting a good education.

So his mom moved him to New Mexico. Now she carts him to the Curtland community west of Farmington to the best public school she could find. The boy is flourishing in middle school, his mom says, getting good grades and making plans for his future.

Black wants to be an FBI agent. He wants to work out of the Shiprock, N.M., office to help members of the tribe and solve crimes.

"I want to be close to my people. I don't want to be anywhere else," he says. "This is still my homeland."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Chargers Safety Kiel Arrested On Drug-Related Charges (ESPN)

ESPN, September 27, 2006

San Diego Chargers safety Terrence Kiel was arrested Tuesday on drug-related charges.

Kiel was arrested on two charges of transporting a controlled substance and three charges of possession for sale of a controlled substance — Codeine-based cough syrup.

The law enforcement sources told ESPN's Chris Mortensen that several plain clothes DEA agents appeared at the Chargers' facility Tuesday morning with an arrest warrant, searched his locker and car, and took Kiel away.

The Chargers, who are coming off a bye week, were on the practice field at the time.

In a statement, team spokesman Bill Johnston said: "We're aware of an off-the-field situation involving Terrence Kiel and we're monitoring the situation. Due to the personal nature of the ongoing legal investigation, the Chargers are withholding further comment until the matter is resolved legally."

Kiel was booked and released after posting $150,000 bond.

Chargers officials were not returning phone calls Tuesday night. Kiel and his agent also could not be reached for comment.

Kiel, a fourth-year veteran from Texas A&M, is the starting strong safety for the 2-0 Chargers, who play the 3-0 Ravens on Sunday. Kiel's status for the game is unclear.

Drafted in the second round in 2003, Kiel was expected to start that season for the Chargers before he was shot three times in an attempted carjacking in Houston in July of that year.

Kiel is making $500,000 this year and has two years left on his contract.

This is the second major off-field incident of the season for the Chargers. Linebacker Steve Foley was shot three times Sept. 3 when he confronted an off-duty police officer who had followed his vehicle on suspicion of drunken driving.

Chargers' Kiel Arrested For Trafficking Of Prescription Drugs (BLOOM)

By Mason Levinson

Bloomberg, September 27, 2006

(Bloomberg) -- Terrence Kiel, a starting safety for the San Diego Chargers, was arrested yesterday for trafficking prescription drugs by U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents.

Kiel, 25, was arrested at the team's practice facility and charged with two counts of transporting Codeine-based cough syrup and three counts of possession with intent to sell the controlled substance, the agency said in a statement.

Kiel admitted to shipping to Texas two packages containing the substance, according to the release. He was released on $150,000 bond, said DEA spokesman Dan Simmons, and will be arraigned in District Court on Oct. 3.

``How unfortunate, once again, that a professional athlete makes a choice which detracts from his talent and ability, drawing attention instead to poor decision making," DEA Special Agent in Charge John Fernandes said in a statement. ``Actions like those of Mr. Kiel simply add fuel to the already raging fire of prescription drug abuse in our country."

A telephone message left at the office of Vann McElroy, Kiel's agent, was not returned.

``Due to the personal nature of the ongoing legal investigation, the Chargers are withholding further comment until the matter is resolved legally," the team said in a statement.

The DEA in Texas said there has been widespread abuse of Codeine-based cough syrup. When mixed with soft drinks, a pint bottle, known as ``lean," can cost between $200 and $325 on the street, the DEA said in its release.

Kiel, a fourth-year veteran out of Texas A&M and a native of Lufkin, Texas, was the Chargers' fourth-leading tackler last season despite missing four games with an ankle injury.

DOJ_NMG_0070709

It's the second time this month a Chargers' player has been involved in an off-field incident. On Sept. 3, linebacker Steve Foley was shot three times by an off-duty police officer who suspected him of driving under the influence of alcohol.

The Chargers, who are 2-0 this season, face the Ravens in Baltimore on Oct. 1.

Kiel Is Arrested In Cough Syrup Case (AP)

AP, September 27, 2006

Chargers strong safety Terrence Kiel admitted to shipping two parcels of prescription cough syrup to Texas, DEA officials said Wednesday, a day after the player was arrested at team headquarters.

While Kiel did not tell the DEA his motive, the agency in Texas has found widespread abuse of codeine-based cough syrup mixed with soft drinks or drugs and referred to as "lean," said John S. Fernandes, the special agent in charge of the San Diego office. A pint bottle of "lean" can cost between $200 and $325 on the street, he said.

Kiel was arrested on two counts of transporting a controlled substance and three counts of possession for sale of a controlled substance.

The DEA is investigating where Kiel got the cough syrup, who else may be involved and the intent.

An arraignment was scheduled for Tuesday.

Team officials have not commented, beyond a statement released late Tuesday night.

"We're aware of an off-the-field situation involving Terrence Kiel and we're monitoring the situation," the statement said. "Due to the personal nature of the ongoing legal investigation, the Chargers are withholding further comment until the matter is resolved legally."

Kiel's status for Sunday's game at Baltimore was not immediately known

It was the fourth run-in with the law by a Chargers player since April.

Outside linebacker Steve Foley was shot outside his suburban home by an off-duty Coronado police officer on Sept. 3. Foley will miss the entire season and forfeit at least $775,000 in pay.

Foley and linebacker Shaun Phillips were each arrested for scuffling with San Diego police officers a week apart in April. Neither was charged.

Copyright 2006 Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed

Charger Kiel Admits Shipping Illegal Drugs (UPI)

UPI, September 27, 2006

SAN DIEGO, (UPI) -- Federal authorities say San Diego Chargers strong safety Terrence Kiel has admitted to shipping prescription cough syrup from California to Texas.

Kiel did not say why he shipped two parcels of the syrup, but Drug Enforcement Agency officials said there has been widespread abuse in Texas of codeine-based cough syrup mixed with soft drinks, a combination referred to as "lean."

A pint of "lean" can cost between $200 to $325 a bottle on the street, the agency said.

Kiel was arrested Tuesday on two counts of transporting a controlled substance and three counts of possession for sale of a controlled substance.

He is scheduled to be arraigned next Tuesday.

The Chargers did not give Kiel's status for Sunday's game at Baltimore.

DEA: Kiel Arrest Linked To Codeine Diversion (SDUT)

By Brent Schrotenboer And Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writers

The San Diego Union-Tribune, September 27, 2006

SAN DIEGO – The investigation that led to the arrest Tuesday of San Diego Chargers safety Terrence Kiel targeted his role in the diversion of codeine-based cough syrup, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Authorities said Kiel, 25, was arrested on two charges of transporting a controlled substance and three charges of possession for sale of a controlled substance based on his having shipped at least two parcels containing the substance to his native Texas.

The DEA said in a statement released Wednesday that Kiel admitted to shipping the two parcels and to knowing their contents.

Kiel did not comment on the motive behind the shipments. But the DEA noted widespread abuse of codeine-based cough syrup in Texas, mixed with soft drinks and referred to as “lean.” A pint bottle can cost between $200-$325 per bottle on the street, according to the DEA.

Kiel was arrested on two counts of transporting a controlled substance and three counts of possession for sale of a controlled substance.

The DEA is investigating where Kiel got the cough syrup, who else may be involved and the intent.

Two federal law enforcement officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation, said quart bottles full of what appears to be prescription cough syrup were found at Kiel's house. Both officials said Kiel admitted to financial difficulties when interviewed by agents.

Kiel first drew attention after FedEx officials here opened a package he shipped June 2 and found 15 pint bottles of codeine-based cough syrup, according to a search warrant affidavit filed in San Diego Superior Court.

But FedEx officials didn't tell agents who work on intercepting drugs shipped out of San Diego until Aug. 1 because of their "busy schedule," a DEA agent said in the affidavit.

People who use the shipping service must allow their packages to be opened for inspection.

The package also contained a airline boarding pass with the name of a woman who lives with Kiel, the DEA agent said.

FedEx workers told the DEA agents that the package was shipped by a man who looked like Kiel, a frequent customer.

A FedEx manager called the San Diego Narcotics Task Force last Thursday after Kiel shipped another package, and DEA agents took custody of it.

Kiel paid cash to ship the package and used a fake return address and name, according to the affidavit.

When agents opened the package they discovered three pint bottles of the cough syrup with codeine, which is a controlled substance.

If convicted of possession and transportation of a controlled substance, Kiel could face up to five years in state prison, a prosecutor for the District Attorney's office said.

Advertisement

First-time offenders without a criminal record in cough-syrup cases are typically sentenced to probation with some local jail time, said prosecutor Damon Mosler.

Kiel is scheduled to be arraigned in San Diego Superior Court Tuesday, according to a court clerk.

In its court filing, the DEA said that Kiel was arrested in Texas on charges of aggravated assault on a public servant, theft and evading arrest. It's unclear whether he was prosecuted or when the arrest occurred.

Kiel is making $500,000 this year, his fourth with the Chargers.

Chargers general manager A.J. Smith said Kiel would be paid even though he will miss Sunday's game at Baltimore.

"He's been informed to stay home and take care of personal business," Smith said, adding that Kiel is due back with the team on Monday.

"I'm really not interested at this point in commenting on anything about the matter," coach Marty Schottenheimer said.

Clinton Hart, who will start in Kiel's spot, said the defensive backs met Wednesday morning.

"We have to regroup and make that fist a little bit tighter. Kiel's still our boy and we're supporting him 100 percent," Hart said. "We're going to go out there and win this game with him on our backs."

"How unfortunate, once again, that a professional athlete makes a choice which detracts from his talent and ability, drawing attention instead to poor decision making," DEA Special Agent in Charge John S. Fernandes said in a statement. "Actions like those of Mr. Kiel simply add fuel to the already raging fire of prescription drug abuse in our country."

The DEA noted that "doctor shopping," forged prescriptions and pharmacy theft are the most common methods of procuring controlled substances by those with no true medical need.

"We're aware of an off-the-field situation involving Terrence Kiel and we're monitoring the situation," the Chargers said in a statement Tuesday. "Due to the personal nature of the ongoing legal investigation, the Chargers are withholding further comment until the matter is resolved legally."

Kiel's agent, Vann McElroy, said he couldn't comment on specifics of the case.

"Terrence is a good kid. We just have to wait and see," McElroy said.

Fernandes said the two shipments Kiel admitted to sending to Texas each contained prescription cough syrup that had been repackaged in pint-sized water bottles.

On Tuesday, Kiel was called off the practice field after authorities arrived at Chargers headquarters. Kiel was taken into the locker room, detained and read his rights, Fernandes said. His locker wasn't searched, but authorities searched his car, then took him to his house to execute a search warrant.

Fernandes said codeine-based cough syrup can be used to enhance, mitigate or temper other drugs, including cocaine and PCP.

"It goes right to the heart of what really is fueling an already out-of-control, raging fire of abuse of pharmaceutical drugs," Fernandes said.

Feds Arrest Chargers Safety During PracticeInvestigators Say Packages Shipped By Kiel Contained Controlled Substance (KNBC)

KNBC-TV, September 27, 2006

SAN DIEGO, Calif. -- Two FedEx packages shipped by Chargers safety Terrence Kiel contained a controlled substance identified as a Codeine-based cough syrup, according to search warrant affidavit released Wednesday.

Images

Federal agents arrested Kiel, 25, Tuesday during a team practice and booked him on suspicion of three counts of possession of a controlled substance for sale and two counts of transportation of a controlled substance.

He was released on $160,000 bail.

If charges are filed, Kiel could be arraigned Tuesday, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the San Diego County District Attorney's Office.

According to the affidavit, FedEx customers consent to have their parcels opened and examined by the company at any time.

On June 2, management at FedEx conducted an audit of a parcel which contained 15 bottles of Prometh with Codeine, considered a controlled substance, according to the affidavit.

FedEx employees told DEA Special Agent Dean Henderson that the shipper of the parcel was a large, muscular, black man, but couldn't positively identify him because it had been a month since the package had been sent.

FedEx employees know who Kiel is because he makes shipments regularly using his FedEx account, according to the affidavit.

Last Thursday, the manager of a FedEx office called Henderson when Kiel shipped a parcel similar to the one shipped on June 2, according to the affidavit.

The return address on the parcels showed an address on Santo Road, not Kiel's real address, and the return name on the shipping label was not the athlete's, the affidavit states.

Kiel paid cash to ship the Sept. 21 parcel, even though he has an account with FedEx, the affidavit states.

Henderson said it is common for drug smugglers to use a different name than their own to avoid detection by law enforcement.

Both the June and September parcels were being shipped to Kiel's home state of Texas, where he was previously arrested for aggravated assault on a public servant, theft and evading arrest, according to the affidavit.

Employees at FedEx copied the license plate of the vehicle Kiel was driving, and a DMV record check showed it was registered to the football player at a residence on Juneberry Court in San Diego, according to the affidavit.

Kiel, a second-round draft pick out of Texas A&M in 2003, was hospitalized that summer after being shot three times in an attempted carjacking in Houston.

The Chargers released a statement, saying they were aware of Kiel's arrest and wouldn't comment further until the case was resolved legally.

It was the second headline-grabbing, off-the-field incident involving a Chargers player this month.

Linebacker Steve Foley was shot three times outside his Poway home Sept. 3 during a confrontation with an off-duty Coronado police officer.

He will miss the entire season.

Feds Reveal Details About Charger Drug Arrest (KNSD-TV)

KNSD-TV, San Diego, September 28, 2006

Player Was Taken Into Custody On Tuesday

SAN DIEGO -- Justice Department officials announced Wednesday that Charger Terrence Kiel, who was arrested Tuesday, is accused of shipping codeine-based cough syrup to Texas.

Codeine-based cough syrup is a Schedule V controlled substance, according to the Justice Department.

"Actions like those of Mr. Kiel simply add fuel to the already raging fire of prescription drug abuse in our country," said Special Agent in Charge John S. Fernandes of the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Kiel, a 25-year-old who plays strong safety, admitted to shipping two parcels of prescription cough syrup to Texas, DEA officials said Wednesday. While Kiel did not tell the DEA his motive, the agency in Texas has found widespread abuse of codeine-based cough syrup mixed with soft drinks or drugs. The mixture is referred to as "lean," said Fernandes, who is in charge of the San Diego office. A pint bottle of "lean" can cost between $200 and $325 on the street, he said.

Kiel was arrested on two counts of transporting a controlled substance and three counts of possession for sale of a controlled substance.

The DEA is investigating where Kiel got the cough syrup, who else may be involved and the intent.

Two federal law enforcement officials said that quart bottles full of what appears to be prescription cough syrup were found at Kiel's house. Both officials said that Kiel admitted to financial difficulties when interviewed by agents.

DEA agents went to Chargers Park with an arrest warrant, reported NBC 7/39. They searched Kiel's locker and car before taking him into custody, according to a report published on ESPN.com.

Neighbors told NBC 7/39 that they saw agents at Kiel's apartment in the 4900 block of Juneberry Court in Kearny Mesa on Tuesday.

Kiel was booked and released after posting $150,000 bond.

Kiel is a four-year veteran with the Chargers. He was a second-round draft pick from Texas A&M in 2003. He has been in the Chargers' starting lineup for the last several years. He is making about $500,000 this year.

In a statement, team spokesman Bill Johnston said: "We're aware of an off-the-field situation involving Terrence Kiel and we're monitoring the situation. Due to the personal nature of the ongoing legal investigation, the Chargers are withholding further comment until the matter is resolved legally."

Chargers general manager A.J. Smith and coach Marty Schottenheimer did not immediately return phone calls from The Associated Press on Tuesday night. DEA spokesman Dan Simmons didn't return a call placed to his cell phone.

It was the fourth run-in with the law by a Chargers player since April.

Outside linebacker Steve Foley was shot outside his suburban home by an off-duty Coronado police officer on Sept. 3. Foley will miss the entire season and forfeit at least $775,000 in pay.

Foley and linebacker Shaun Phillips were each arrested for allegedly scuffling with San Diego police officers a week apart in April. Neither was charged.

Feds Rounding Up Suspected Immigrant Drug Dealers (ADN)

Aspen Daily News, September 27, 2006

The federal Drug Enforcement Agency and Immigrations and Customs Enforcement have been targeting suspected illegal-immigrant drug dealers in the Roaring Fork Valley this week.

Agents with the DEA and ICE are not commenting on the downvalley roundups except to say they are happening and that more information will be released today. A spokesman with ICE said the DEA was the lead agency on the investigation and that ICE was asked to provide assistance.

Marie Munday, the Pitkin County Sheriff Office's liaison to the Latino community, said word of the roundups spread quickly throughout the Latino community and that an announcement of the roundups was made on a Spanish-language radio station.

"Everyone is in a panic again," Munday said. "A lot of employers are calling me because a lot of people aren't showing up for work."

At least one Aspen business was affected. Toppers restaurant did not open Wednesday because its kitchen staff did not show up for work.

Munday said the roundups are targeting illegal immigrants suspected of dealing drugs and that many arrest warrants are being served. Munday said she believed the crackdowns happened on Monday and Tuesday.

"There's more to come," she said.

She said she did not believe anyone without a warrant would be arrested.

Pitkin County Sheriff Bob Braudis said his agency was not asked for assistance in the operation but he believed one person had been arrested as of Wednesday afternoon.

Less clear is if Monday's arrest of a suspected drug dealer is tied to this week's arrests by the DEA and ICE.

On Monday the DEA, with the assistance of the Pitkin County Sheriff's Office, arrested Jose Jesus Sanchez-Ceja, 53, on four counts stemming from allegations he was supervising a cocaine-distribution ring. During the suspect's advisement hearing Tuesday in Pitkin County District Court, Deputy District Attorney Gail Nichols suggested that more arrests would be made based on information in the affidavit.

Later that Tuesday, Judge Erin Fernandez-Ely sealed the affidavit supporting the arrest of the suspect, an attendant at a car wash at the Aspen Airport Business Center.

Two weeks ago, ICE agents rounded up 34 alleged illegal immigrants throughout the valley as part of a nationwide initiative called Operation Return to Sender that led to thousands of illegals being deported. This week's roundups are not connected to Operation Return to Sender, Munday said.

Munday noted a shift in the political climate that has led to more stringent immigration enforcement.

DOJ_NMG_0070713

"People are demanding that," Munday said. "Federal agencies are working hard to prove they aren't going to let people get away."

Bill To Criminalize Border Tunneling Easily Finds Support (SDUT)

By Jerry Kammer, Copley News Service

The San Diego Union-Tribune, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON – At first blush, a bill to criminalize the construction of tunnels under the U.S.-Mexico border seems almost ludicrous.

"It seems like a law that says the sky must be blue," said Frank Sharry of the National Immigration Forum, whose principal border interests center on much more controversial efforts to expand legal immigration and provide legal status to 12 million illegal immigrants in the country.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein said, "It is hard to believe that there is not already a federal (statute) to punish those involved with the financing, construction and use of these tunnels."

But Feinstein, D-Calif., is one of the main advocates of a tunnel-criminalization effort that is reaching fruition with the inclusion of the measure in legislation to fund the Department of Homeland Security.

The Border Tunnel Prevention Act would impose criminal penalties of up to 20 years in prison for those who construct or finance tunnels, which have proliferated in recent years in San Diego County and other border areas. It would permit a 10-year sentence for people who allow their property – including the buildings where the tunnels meet the surface – to be used by the tunnel builders.

The bill would solve a fundamental problem for federal law enforcement authorities. Under current law, they can only prosecute tunnel builders who are implicated in the smuggling of contraband or illegal immigrants through the underground passage.

Rep. David Dreier, R-San Dimas, who carried the bill in the House of Representatives, called it "a common sense reform."

"We have a problem that needs to be addressed, and it's being addressed in a bipartisan way," he said during debate on the measure.

Over the past five years, according to Feinstein's office, at least 44 border tunnels have been discovered, all but one between the United States and Mexico.

While officials suspect the tunnels are primarily used to smuggle drugs, they have raised other concerns about them.

"A tunnel can be used to smuggle drugs, illegal aliens, weapons and possibly weapons of mass destruction into the United States," said special agent Steve Robertson of the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Paul Charlton, U.S. attorney for Arizona, said that Justice Department policy bars him from commenting directly on pending legislation. But, he said, "As we are more successful apprehending those who come (illegally) above ground, there will likely be more people interested in coming across below ground."

Last March, Charlton's office won a conviction against Mexican architect Felipe de Jesus Corona-Verbera, who masterminded the construction of a tunnel between a house in the Mexican border town of Agua Prieta to a warehouse in Douglas, Ariz.

But Verbera was convicted on smuggling charges for his involvement in the movement of 2 tons of cocaine that were brought through the tunnel and shipped to Phoenix, where authorities seized the contraband.

The new legislation is one of the least controversial border measures ever brought before Congress. It sailed through the House of Representatives last week, 422-0. It was then added to a House-Senate conference report for Homeland Security funding, which is expected to sail through both houses on a final vote.

Efforts by Republican lawmakers to pass more comprehensive immigration legislation foundered on intraparty disagreements over whether to get tougher on illegal immigration or create a pathway to citizenship for millions of undocumented immigrants. The border tunnel bill may be one of the only measures to survive the debate before Congress breaks for a pre-election recess.

Plan Colombia: Big Gains, But Cocaine Still Flows (CSM)

By Danna Harman

The Christian Science Monitor, September 28, 2006

CALI, COLOMBIA

Margarita Consuela Gomez Ricardo and Carlos Murillo met during a police raid on a warehouse of pirated DVDs seven years ago. Later that evening, after they swooped in and made the arrests, he asked her out for coffee. And six months later they were married.

DOJ_NMG_0070714

Now, at age 31 and with two small children, Ms. Gomez is a widow. The last time she spoke to Murillo was on Friday, May 19. He said he was coming home that weekend. Their 2-year-old son was watching Power Rangers on TV at full volume and she could barely hear her husband's goodbye.

She went out to get her hair done, and dressed up the kids nicely, but Murillo never showed. She was disappointed, but that wasn't unusual.

On Monday night, as she channel-surfed in their Cali apartment, she caught a newsflash: An elite police unit had been shot in Jamundí. She called the station, but she knew.

Murillo, along with 10 others, most of them US Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) trained counternarcotics specialists, had been killed by a military unit. Colombia's attorney general says the soldiers were on the narcotraffickers payroll.

In the weeks and months ahead there would come the questions, suspicions, accusations, and fears. But right then, with the TV remote in hand, all that Gomez felt was despair.

"What is wrong with this country?" she thought. "Nothing ever changes."

* * *

Sitting in his Washington office a block from the White House, John P. Walters, President Bush's 'drug czar,' sees a different picture. "There is absolutely no question we are winning," he states flatly.

The "winning," in this case, is against narcotraffickers. And the "we" is the US and Colombian governments, inexorably bound together in a multibillion dollar war against the drug trade.

In 1989, when the US drug czar's post (officially, the Office of National Drug Control Policy, or ONDCP) was created, Pablo Escobar, the notorious head of the Medellín cartel, was the kingpin. "Escobar and other drug lords were the most powerful and violent people in the world. They could buy or kill anyone. They could go anywhere. They could do anything," says ONDCP director Walters. Those days, he stresses, are patently over.

"Through years of systematic efforts, and not always without obstacles and setbacks, the Colombians have reconstructed their police, military, judicial, and political institutions," he says, giving much credit, as many in the administration do, to Colombian President Alvaro Uribe, Washington's conservative ally in Bogotá. Mr. Uribe's success in bringing stability to the country, says Mr. Walters, is nothing short of "astounding."

But Walters doesn't downplay the U' role. "You can't build capacities without metal detectors and armored cars and radios and people who are going to teach personnel to use all those things effectively," says Walters. "It could not have been done without our assistance."

The US Embassy in Bogotá, since the launch of the $4.7 billion Plan Colombia in 2000, has grown into the second largest US diplomatic mission in the world, after Baghdad. It employs over 2,000 people, including some 350 US military personnel and 750 contractors.

The cornerstone of Plan Colombia is the massive effort to eradicate Colombia's coca plants before they are processed into cocaine. Some 20 aircraft, piloted by contractors with DynCorp International, headquartered in Falls Church, Va., take turns carrying out daily spray missions. Army and police units assist these efforts by clearing the ground of coca farmers, guerrillas, or traffickers below, and by protecting the spray mission from above - with a fleet of 71 US provided helicopters. The majority of the State Department's counternarcotics and law enforcement budget in Colombia is dedicated - directly or indirectly - to these endeavors.

In 2005, a record-breaking 170,000 hectares (419,000 acres) of coca were destroyed: 138,000 sprayed and 32,000 pulled out by hand or plowed under.

In total, since the program began in 1994 (and particularly since it was ramped up in 2000), 986,925 hectares of coca plant and opium poppy have been eradicated - an area almost equivalent to the size of the states of Rhode Island and Delaware combined.

Drug seizures are another pillar of the plan, and here too, there are results. Two hundred and twenty-five tons of cocaine hydrochloride and cocaine base were seized in 2005, up from 125 tons in 2002, and the number of clandestine drug labs destroyed soared to nearly 2,000 last year from 317 in 2000, according to a July study by Colombia's National Narcotics Directorate (DNE). Meanwhile, the number of traffickers extradited to the US in the last four years is climbing toward 400.

"We are squeezing them. We are forcing them to change their drug trafficking routes and their methods," says Walters.

A better-trained and -equipped military and police, meanwhile, has meant that overall security in Colombia has vastly improved, especially in the urban areas. From 2002 to 2005, the murder rate fell 35 percent - from 28,837 murders to 18,111 - and kidnappings have dropped from nearly 3,000 in 2002 to 800 last year, according to Uribe's office. As a consequence, nearly 1 million foreigners visited last year, a 21 percent jump compared with 2004, and foreign investment hit $10 billion last year, a fivefold increase since 2002. Microsoft's Bill Gates is scheduled to visit in March, to take a look, he said last week, into business opportunities.

DOJ_NMG_0070715

"Plan Colombia," says Michael Shifter of the Inter-American Dialogue, a think tank in Washington, "....has manifestly helped the government restore some measure of authority in a country that was on the verge of being a failed state six years ago."

* * *

But even Plan Colombia advocates admit the impressive statistics do not a complete victory make.

"We're making first downs," US Ambassador to Colombia William Wood is fond of saying, "...but we're not sure how long the football field is."

President Uribe is often even more circumspect. "It is clear we cannot abandon Plan Colombia," he said while in New York last week."But it is also clear that, in comparison to our efforts, we should be seeing better results."

Sometimes, it seems the harder Colombians and Americans fight, the more the drug lords push back and the coca fields reproduce.

When Escobar was shot to death on a Medellín rooftop in 1993, some expected the industry in which he had played such a key role would contract. But, the Medellín cartel was soon replaced by their Cali rivals. And when key Cali cartel leaders were jailed a few years later - the trade was divided up by competing factions of the Norte del Valle cartel and a host of smaller "cartelitos." Mexican cartels meanwhile, moved quickly to fill remaining voids.

Uribe's government, meanwhile, is being criticized for allowing some top drug traffickers to avoid extradition by surrendering themselves as part of the government's peace deal with the paramilitaries. And the rebel Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), in turn, may have been pushed into more remote zones - but they are estimated to still be earning hundreds of millions of dollars a year from their involvement in the drug trade.

There is no lack, after all, of coca. Despite the unprecedented eradication efforts, coca cultivation actually increased last year by 8 percent, according to a study released in June by the UN Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC). More significantly, the amount of cocaine being produced from coca leaves is also increasing. According to DNE, Colombia produced 776 metric tons of cocaine last year, 231 more than previous US estimates, and enough to supply almost 80 percent of the world market.

Why? Growing techniques have improved over the years and farmers in some regions are now able to harvest coca leaf six times a year, instead of the usual four harvests, according to UNODC. Also, aerial spraying has pushed farmers to smaller, more isolated plots deeper in the countryside, making spray operations more complicated and less effective. While coca was concentrated in three provinces at the start of Plan Colombia, today, it has spread to at least 23 of the country's 32 provinces.

This geographical expansion also feeds a different problem, explains Pablo Casas, a security expert at the Security and Democracy Foundation in Bogotá. In the past, counternarcotics work was concentrated in a few areas, he says, but "everyone touches drugs now. Which means there are more police, military, and local authorities for the narcos to try to corrupt."

Even worse - as far as Washington is concerned - is that the most expensive US foreign aid program outside the Middle East has apparently failed to significantly change the availability, price, or quality of cocaine on American streets.

The question of cost and purity of street cocaine in the US remains contentious, due both to methods of gathering statistics, and ways in which those statistics are interpreted. When the White House drug czar's office announced last November that the price of a gram of cocaine was slightly higher (a sign of less availability), it was quickly attacked with statistics showing the opposite.

Sen. Charles Grassley, (R) of Iowa, chairman of the Senate Caucus on International Narcotics Control, in an April letter to Walters, even suggested the White House was selecting data to paint "a rosier, but not necessarily more accurate, picture" of the achievements of Plan Colombia.

Most sides to the debate agree however with the findings of the 2005 US National Survey on Drug Use and Health released this month. The study shows youth rates of cocaine use have fallen slightly since 2002 - but the number of first-time users is up, as are the number of hard-core addicts. Overall, according to the survey, levels of cocaine use and addiction are at least as high as they were in 2000.

"We need a new a new approach to drug policy," says John Walsh, a drug policy expert at the Washington Office on Latin America (WOLA), an advocacy group. "A reevaluation is long overdue."

* * *

Gomez quit the police force when she got married and lost interest, over time, in the drug war shop talk. But Murillo, her husband, remained a member of the counternarcotics unit, and "he loved being part of the big game ...working with the Americans," she says.

Once, she says, he called her from San Diego, Calif., where he was testifying in a big case. "He was so excited. He felt he was doing something important," she remembers.

In the year before his death, Gomez admits, they had begun to argue a lot. He would say he was going to do something with her and the kids, and would be called away by the unit. He would promise to call, and then be out of touch. When he missed their sixth wedding anniversary because of a drug operation, she had just about had enough: "Tell your Gringo masters I want my husband back!" she had screeched down the phone line.

DOJ_NMG_0070716

They talked of separating. She berates herself most now for not telling him she still loved him, the last time they spoke.

Lately, after speaking out in the press against the Colombian military, Gomez has been receiving menacing phone calls late at night. "Prepare coffins for the rest of the family," a muffled voice told her last week.

She is scared to take the kids to the park across the street. She rarely goes out herself. "If I could just speak to Carlos one more time, I would tell him I was never angry with him," she says. "I was just angry with the way everything was being done... I would tell him we needed to do it over again, differently."

· Next part: Is there a better way?

IMMIGRATION:

Armey Blasts Republicans Over Opposition To Guest-worker Plan (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - As the No. 2 man in the Republican-controlled House of Representatives for nearly eight years, former Texas congressman Dick Armey never hesitated when it came to assailing Democrats.

But three years after leaving Congress, the former House majority leader is now savaging conservatives in his own party for what he calls "knee-jerk" opposition - "emphasis on jerk" - to the Bush administration's efforts to create a temporary guest-worker program and overhaul the nation's immigration system.

Armey, who is chairman of a Washington-based grass-roots organization called FreedomWorks, was a leading architect of the Republican takeover of the House in 1994 and remains a prominent and outspoken advocate for conservative causes.

But when it comes to the immigration debate that's raged in Congress for much of the past two years, he takes an almost polar-opposite position from many of his former Republican House colleagues, who are pressing for tough border security measures, including a 700-mile fence along the Southwest border.

"This has been rallied up by a lot of people that are very visible, make a lot of noise and have never been guilty of any deep thinking," Armey told reporters Tuesday after an appearance with Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, and Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., co-sponsors of a proposed immigration compromise that includes a privately managed guest-worker program.

Unabashedly naming names, Armey described Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., as the "cheerleader of jerkiness in the immigration debate" and said conservative commentator Pat Buchanan "is content to be a rock star" for "10 percent of the most militant voters in America."

Tancredo leads a coalition of House Republicans vehemently opposed to the president's guest-worker plan. Buchanan, who ran for president in 2000 as a Reform Party candidate, wants to defend the borders with U.S. troops and has said that the United States is in danger of becoming "MexiAmerica."

Armey also said he was "disappointed" with House Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., chief sponsor of an enforcement-only immigration plan passed by the House in December.

Several provisions, including the border fence, are being recycled as piecemeal border security measures that House leaders hope will clear Congress before a pre-election recess this week.

"I would have expected more deep thought from Sensenbrenner," Armey said.

Tancredo and Bay Buchanan, Pat Buchanan's sister and the president of his foundation, The American Cause, both fired back with withering responses. Sensenbrenner's office had no comment.

"In Dick Armey's search for relevance in today's political environment, it's disappointing that he has managed to find it as a patriot for profit," said Tancredo, chairman of the Immigration Reform Caucus. "Someone should remind him that the jerks he is speaking of happen to be the heart and soul of the Republican Party."

"Unfortunately, it's Republicans like Dick Armey that did not do the job of securing this nation when they were in office," said Bay Buchanan. "Dick is on the sidelines where he belongs."

Visas For Skilled Workers Still Frozen (WP)

By S. Mitra Kalita

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

For technology companies and research institutions that have spent recent autumns lobbying for permission to hire more foreign workers, this was supposed to be the year that ended the annual rite of desperation.

DOJ_NMG_0070717

A bill that passed the Senate this spring would have doubled the number of visas issued every year for highly skilled professionals, such as scientists and engineers. And it would have helped clear a backlog of applications for permanent residency from such workers.

But the attempt by Congress to rewrite the nation's immigration laws has bogged down in controversy over border security and illegal immigration. That means changes in the skilled-worker programs, while less controversial, are also in limbo.

With Congress due to recess tomorrow, advocates of the programs have given up on winning immediate change. Now they're hoping members of Congress will focus on the issue in the lame-duck session late this year.

"It is incredibly difficult to pass major legislative reforms in any areas, and they tried to bite off a lot," said Jenifer Verdery, a policy director for Intel Corp., which has lobbied for more skilled foreign workers. "We've made a strong case, and we're hoping to take that to the finish line . . . if there is any policymaking left to do after the election."

For years, many of the country's largest technology companies and most prestigious research laboratories have said they are unable to find enough U.S.-born scientists and similar workers to fill their openings. They have depended on the H-1B visa to bring overseas talent into the United States. The companies also sponsor such skilled workers for green cards, which allow them to live and work here permanently.

But only 65,000 H-1B visas are issued each year, and demand has been so high recently that all of them are taken instantaneously -- mostly with tech workers from India and China. People from those countries also face among the longest waits for green cards.

The Senate plan would have nearly doubled the H-1B quota to 115,000 a year, and it would have helped clear a backlog of green-card applications.

The technology industry mounted a huge push on the issue this year. Microsoft Corp. Chairman Bill Gates met with members of Congress. A group of computer programmers hired a lobbying firm. An industry coalition handed out fake green cards imprinted with their demands.

A few professional associations and anti-immigrant groups oppose expanding the skilled-worker programs, contending that they can depress wages, but the programs have historically drawn support from both political parties.

At Microsoft, H-1B and green card reform has emerged as the "top legislative priority right now," said Jack Krumholtz, the company's managing director for federal government affairs. "We are really at a crisis in terms of the industry's ability to hire the best and the brightest and retain them."

A company spokeswoman estimated that about 7 percent of Microsoft's hires over the past five years had H-1B visas. Of the company's H-1B employees, 20 percent a year obtain green cards. The company said the low number stems from delays in processing green cards. An estimated 500,000 green-card applications are pending nationwide.

The employees describe agonizing, life-altering waits. In some cases, marriages, home purchases and retirement investments are put off. Graduates of master's and doctorate programs describe stringing together fellowships and one-year appointments to stay in this country. A spokesman for the National Institutes of Health said those on temporary work visas have trouble qualifying for federal research grants.

Immigrant scientists call the policies crippling and said they had expected relief from a provision in the Senate bill that would have allowed favorable treatment for graduates in the sciences, technology, engineering, and mathematics.

"In the midst of this whole debate, very little is said about legal immigration. And even within legal immigration, little about PhDs and scientists," said Jai Pathak, a research scientist who lives in Washington. "There are a lot of very fine scientists the government would like to keep, but their citizenship status impedes it."

Pathak cited the Hungarian roots of Intel Corp. co-founder Andrew S. Grove, whose work helped create the modern computer industry that employs millions of Americans.

"What would have happened if the United States had decided to close the doors on him?" Pathak said.

In Immigrant Fight, Grass-Roots Groups Boost Their Clout (WSJ)

By Miriam Jordan

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

SAN BERNARDINO, Calif. -- Armed with a computer and less than $100, Joseph Turner two years ago formed a group called "Save Our State." His goal: save California from turning into a "Third World cesspool" of illegal immigrants, he says. The group doesn't have a formal membership, and Mr. Turner counts barely 2,000 people on his email list and message board.

Yet this meager base has proved to be a powerful springboard. Through his Web site, Mr. Turner has recruited supporters to hold confrontational protests outside Home Depot stores, where unauthorized workers often gather to seek jobs. He has also helped ignite a nationwide movement by local governments to crack down on illegal immigration. So far, about 10 towns have passed ordinances to drive out undocumented immigrants after getting the idea from Mr. Turner. Dozens of other towns are considering such measures.

DOJ_NMG_0070718

"My idea of activism is aggressive, street-level and in-your-face activism," says Mr. Turner, who strikes a clean-cut look with slicked-back black hair and icy blue eyes. He adds: "I don't believe in turning the other cheek."

Mr. Turner is part of an anti-immigrant brushfire that is gathering force at the grass-roots level around the U.S. Small groups like Mr. Turner's Save Our State are cropping up from coast to coast, recruiting members and devising tactics to tackle illegal immigration in their communities. Critics call many of these groups racist, a charge organizers deny. What no one disputes is that they are tapping into widespread frustration over the federal government's failure to adopt a national immigration policy while a deeply divided Congress clashes over how to deal with 12 million illegal immigrants.

The Center for New Community, a Chicago organization that tracks immigration issues, says there are 211 so-called nativist groups -- groups that advocate protecting the interests of native inhabitants against those of immigrants -- across the U.S., up from 37 two years ago. The Southern Poverty Law Center, which tracks extremist groups, also says nativist groups are on the rise and that several are hate groups, including Mr. Turner's Save Our State. The law center defines a hate group as one that singles out and promotes hatred of another group, based on ethnicity, language, religion, sexual inclination or immigration status. Mr. Turner denies he runs a hate group.

These grass-roots organizations are having an impact. In North Carolina, state legislators say the fierce opposition of one anti-illegal immigration group torpedoed a bill proposed last year that would have allowed undocumented students who graduate from state high schools to pay in-state college tuition. In Georgia, another group's mobilization efforts were crucial to passing a bill last spring to curb illegal immigration. In Arizona, a group called Protect Our City is pushing for local officials, including police officers, to help federal authorities enforce immigration laws within Phoenix.

The groups are often one-man shows, steered by tech-savvy leaders who creatively use the Web to mobilize support for immigration protests, boycotts, legislation and media coverage in their areas. Their influence is amplified as they find each other online and coordinate their efforts. Save Our State has occasionally joined forces with a North Carolina group as well as the volunteer group Minuteman Project, which patrols the border with the goal of stopping illegal immigrants from entering U.S. soil.

Several budding groups receive funding from older, well-endowed national organizations, such as the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which has been battling immigration for decades. Ron Woodard, head of NC Listen, a North Carolina group, says he improved his public-speaking skills in courses sponsored by FAIR. The Washington, D.C.-based national group, which advocates curbing legal immigration as well as stopping illegal entries to the U.S., also provided his group with "minor" financial support, he says.

Striking a Chord

These groups often strike a chord in small towns and areas where Hispanics are relative newcomers. Immigrants are increasingly bypassing traditional Hispanic centers in big cities, California and the southwest. Instead, they're settling in smaller, homogeneous towns and in Middle America, where many residents are still unaccustomed to them and fear that wages are being undercut by immigrants taking blue-collar jobs in their community.

"The financial costs to Georgia taxpayers of supplying [bilingual] education, incarceration, medical care and social benefits to the hundreds of thousands of people who are here in violation of our laws is becoming impossible to ignore," declared one Web site run by a Georgia grass-roots group, the Dustin Inman Society. "Someone please point to a case of wages in Georgia having gone up because of illegal immigration!"

Anti-immigrant sentiment has swept the U.S. before, targeting Irish, Italian, Jewish, Chinese and Japanese newcomers. In response to public outcry against the influx of immigrants from Southern and Eastern Europe after World War I, Congress passed the Quota Act of 1921 and then the even more restrictive Immigration Act of 1924. These days, hostility is directed at Spanish-speaking immigrants, especially illegal immigrants who are decried as a burden on taxpayers and a threat to national security.

William Gheen, a former conservative campaign strategist and legislative assistant, formed the Americans for Legal Immigration-PAC, or ALIPAC, on Sept. 11, 2004, the anniversary of the terrorist attacks. Hispanic illegal immigrants aren't blowing up skyscrapers, "but they steal American jobs, depress American wages and can wreck American lives," Mr. Gheen says. "They're the enemies in our streets." He says his group, run from his home in Raleigh, N.C., boasts supporters from all 50 states and has raised $40,000 so far this year. "Most contributions come from concerned individuals, checks for $25 to $50," Mr. Gheen says.

The money comes from people like Lisa Mercier, a Hartselle, Ala., homemaker and devout southern Baptist who says the issue piqued her interest when Latino gangs moved into her former neighborhood on the outskirts of Washington, D.C. "With terrorism the way it is, we can't have our border wide open," she says, adding: "All the poor would like to come here."

DOJ_NMG_0070719

Last year, four North Carolina lawmakers introduced a bipartisan bill that would entitle undocumented students who graduate from North Carolina high schools to attend universities paying in-state tuition. Mr. Gheen mounted an opposition campaign on the Web, lobbied in the halls of the state legislature and spread his message on a conservative radio talk show.

Several state legislators who signed the bill subsequently asked to remove their names from it. The bill never moved out of committee.

"This little organization got it on talk radio and created a firestorm," says North Carolina State Representative Paul Luebke, a Democrat and a primary sponsor of the bill. "Right-wing talk radio amplified the message. They hammered away on it incessantly. This enraged large numbers of people."

Mr. Luebke also says Mr. Gheen preyed on the discomfort felt by many white North Carolinians over the increased visibility of Latinos -- the spread of Mexican restaurants and stores, Spanish-language signs and Spanish-language movies at video stores. With manufacturing jobs also moving overseas, "the brown immigrant was an easy scapegoat," says Mr. Luebke.

Mr. Gheen says his is a "moderate group" and denies trying to stir up racial animosities.

In Marietta, Ga., the local grass-roots group is the Dustin Inman Society, named for a teenage boy killed several years ago in a car accident that allegedly involved an illegal immigrant. The group is led by D. A. King, a 54-year-old former Marine who sports a close-cropped haircut and says he was snubbed by Mexicans who moved into a house in his neighborhood in the 1990s. He says he grew even more frustrated when local and immigration officials ignored his calls to take action against the house, which he believed was overcrowded with illegal immigrants.

Mr. King shuttered his insurance business of 20 years in 2003 to devote himself full-time to educating Georgians about the adverse impact of illegal immigration, organize rallies around the issue and work the halls of the Georgia state legislature.

The crowning of his efforts was the passage in April of the Georgia Security and Immigration Compliance Act, a state bill chockablock with provisions to stop illegal immigration that will begin to go into effect in July 2007. "We were sliding down a slippery slope on the way to 'Georgiafornia,' " says Mr. King, referring to California, which is often used as the poster child of excessive Latino immigration.

Effective Weapon

A key proponent of the immigration bill, his single most effective weapon was organizing protests at the Capitol "for the media and state governments to see," says Mr. King. He also praised the bill on radio and in newspaper columns. "I made it impossible for politicians to ignore the issue," he says.

Republican State Senator Chip Rogers, who wrote the Georgia bill, says Mr. King was "instrumental in ensuring people interested in illegal immigration were aware of the bill. He sent lots of email, went on radio often and wrote in local papers about it. He touched just about every potential media outlet."

In the network of anti-illegal immigrant activists, few have risen higher or faster than Joseph Turner. He still relishes a moment 12 years ago, when he took the stage at his half-Hispanic high school in working-class Riverside, Calif., to endorse a controversial ballot initiative to ban illegal immigrants from receiving state benefits. The senior drew such a heated response that he was sequestered in a gym afterward until tempers were calmed.

"I believe in the superiority of America and American culture," he says. If the federal government isn't doing its job, he says, direct democracy should provide solutions. He calls for deporting all illegal immigrants, saying, "the net benefit of illegal aliens is negative."

Mr. Turner grew up in Southern California's so-called Smog Belt, which includes San Bernardino and other working-class towns. His biological father, an alcoholic, walked out of his life when he was about eight years old, he says. His mother remarried a Mexican-American, whom Mr. Turner considers his father. He heard a lot of Spanish growing up. Mr. Turner says his mother was a drug addict who spent time incarcerated, and describes his stepfather as a "former gang banger" who abused drugs and was imprisoned. Both have since been rehabilitated, he says. Mr. Turner's mother, Janice Aguayo, confirms his account.

Incensed by the outcry of civil-rights and Hispanic groups against roundups of undocumented immigrants by U.S. authorities in southern California in 2004, Mr. Turner started his own group to battle illegal immigration, Save Our State. His first target was Home Depot, where immigrants often wait for homeowners seeking an extra hand at gardening or painting.

"With as little as five people you can shut down a day-laborer center," says Mr. Turner, because employers will be too intimidated to stop and hire them. Contractors have been deterred from hiring from these sites during the protests and in several days that followed. Home Depot declines to comment on Mr. Turner.

At a rally outside the day-laborer center in the ritzy coastal town of Laguna Beach, neo-Nazis and white supremacists waved Nazi and confederate flags. Mr. Turner says they weren't welcome at the event but that he couldn't stop them and that Save our State members left shortly after they arrived. Mr. Turner says he also deletes white-supremacist rhetoric when it pops up on his Web site's message board.

DOJ_NMG_0070720

About a year ago, Mr. Turner drafted a three-page ordinance -- the "City of San Bernardino Illegal Immigrant Relief Act." Although it was derailed before it could come to a citywide vote, the ordinance went on to be imitated, and passed, by several towns and cities across the country.

The law as proposed in San Bernardino would have revoked the license of any business deemed to aid or abet illegal immigrants, even unknowingly. It also would have banned landlords from renting to an illegal immigrant, and required that all rental agreements be filed with the city for verification. One provision would have prohibited the city from conducting business in any language other than English.

Over four months, Mr. Turner spent evenings and weekends gathering signatures outside grocery stores and knocking on doors in the more-affluent northern end of San Bernardino. As fear spread in Hispanic-heavy communities, the Archbishop of San Bernardino called an emergency meeting of all parish priests and dioceses to discuss how to counter the measure. Community leaders, interfaith groups and town officials gathered soon afterward. "We wanted to portray this as a human issue, not a political or religious issue," says Auxiliary Bishop Rutilio del Riego.

Before the ordinance could go to a citywide vote, a judge ruled that Mr. Turner hadn't collected enough signatures and granted him 10 days to make up the difference, or nearly twice the original number of signatures. Concluding he couldn't achieve that, Mr. Turner let his hometown effort die.

But over the next few weeks, it sprang back to life -- in the form of copycat initiatives taken up in small towns across the country, including Valley Park, Mo., Riverside, N.J., and Hazleton, Pa. Hazleton Mayor Louis Barletta was searching for ways to crack down on illegal immigration when he found Mr. Turner's petition on the Internet, though he says he isn't familiar with the views of Mr. Turner or his group. Hazleton now prohibits anyone from renting to or hiring illegal immigrants, and has made English the town's official language. Civil-rights groups are challenging the legislation in court.

Mr. Turner, who has a young son with his girlfriend, recently decided to run for the local San Bernardino school board. He says that he plans to challenge the Supreme Court ruling that allowed all children living in the U.S. to attend school, regardless of their immigration status. He also works as a field representative for Republican state assemblyman Ray Haynes, who represents a district on the Mexico-California border about an hour's drive from San Bernardino.

Mr. Haynes says he doesn't agree with all of Mr. Turner's views and rhetoric but admires his work ethic and energy. "He's on fire," says Mr. Haynes.

Herndon Zeroing In On Illegal Immigrants (WP)

By Bill Turque

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Herndon's decision Tuesday night to seek federal training for some of its police officers so they can enforce federal immigration law is part of a long-term effort by a new mayor and Town Council to aggressively curb the presence of residents who are in the country illegally.

Two proposals on the draft agenda for next week's council session would intensify the town's scrutiny of private employers. One would require anyone seeking a business license to prove legal immigration status. The other would compel contractors doing business with the town to provide evidence that their employees live in the United States legally.

The measures are likely to enlarge Herndon's role as a crucible in the national debate on immigration policy -- a position that town officials say they were forced into because of inaction by the federal government. The proposals also add fuel to charges from immigration advocates and some residents that Herndon, which has the largest proportion of foreign-born residents of any locality in the Washington area, has become implacably hostile to all immigrants, legal and illegal.

Illegal immigration has been the dominant issue in town politics since summer 2005, when the council voted, after bitter debate, to open a publicly funded center to help workers connect with employers. Before the Herndon Official Workers Center was established, laborers had gathered each morning in a 7-Eleven parking lot to find jobs -- an arrangement that neighbors and officials said was chaotic and confusing. Opponents of the center said that by opening it, the town was abetting illegal immigration.

In May, Herndon voters unseated Mayor Michael L. O'Reilly and two council members who supported the publicly funded facility and replaced them with challengers, including new Mayor Stephen J. DeBenedittis, who were highly critical of the idea.

Vice Mayor Dennis D. Husch, one of two council members who voted against the labor center last year, said that the new proposals are still "notional" at this point but that the council intends to send a message that illegal immigrants are not welcome in Herndon.

"These [proposals] may never see the light of day," Husch said. "But we need to do something."

DOJ_NMG_0070721

Business licenses have traditionally served as revenue-raising instruments, with governments charging owners a set percentage of projected gross sales. But in an advisory opinion this summer, Virginia Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell said local governments can withhold licenses from applicants who are not living legally in the United States.

What the contracting measure would accomplish is less clear. Federal law already establishes penalties for employers who knowingly keep illegal workers on their payroll. Herndon's own standard contract language also forbids companies that employ the undocumented from working on major projects. Town Attorney Richard B. Kaufman said the council was interested in "beefing up" the language so that it applied to all contractors who provide services to the government.

The council's 6 to 1 vote late Tuesday authorizes town officials to contact U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement to express interest in enrolling some officers in the agency's "287 (g)" program, a provision of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

If the town is accepted into the program, it would negotiate an agreement covering the scope of the training officers would receive -- often in the areas of document identification and cross-cultural communication -- and what the law would empower them to do. In general, those who pass the five-week course are authorized to question or detain people they believe to be in the country illegally, according to ICE descriptions of the program.

In a hearing preceding the vote, supporters of the program said it would take criminals off the streets.

"You guys were elected because you said you would take action," Brenda Kelley, a 21-year resident of the town, told the council. "We all want safe, secure, happy, respectful neighborhoods."

"Herndon has a chance to lend a helping hand to federal immigration agents," Stacey Brooks said.

Jorge Rochac, a Salvadoran immigrant and former translator for the Herndon police department who ran unsuccessfully for a council seat this year, said adoption of the federal program "would tend to alienate the Hispanic community and makes them less apt to cooperate and trust the police."

Former council member John DeNoyer was also critical. "Would I be profiled as a suspected terrorist or illegal alien because I have a beard and often turn brown toward the end of an outdoor summer?" he asked. "Please do not glorify and nurture the xenophobic hysteria that is affecting our town."

TAX:

How Merck Saved $1.5 Billion Paying Itself For Drug Patents (WSJ)

By Jesse Drucker

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

SOUTHAMPTON, Bermuda -- Merck & Co.'s medications Zocor and Mevacor have been used by millions of people to help lower their cholesterol. But Merck also used the drugs to lower something else: its U.S. tax bill.

Thirteen years ago, Merck set up a subsidiary with an address in tax-friendly Bermuda, in partnership with a British bank. Merck quietly transferred patents underlying the blockbuster drugs to the new subsidiary, according to documents and people familiar with the transaction. Merck then paid the subsidiary for use of the patents.

The arrangement in effect allowed some of the profits to disappear into a kind of Bermuda triangle between different tax jurisdictions. The setup helped Merck slash $1.5 billion off its federal tax bills over roughly the next 10 years.

Now, the complicated transaction -- never publicly disclosed -- has sparked one of the largest tax disputes ever involving a U.S. corporation. The Internal Revenue Service is challenging the tax benefits from the arrangement, which the company code-named "Project Ryland," after a fancy restaurant near the company's New Jersey headquarters. Merck anticipates it will be ordered to hand over a total of $2.3 billion in back taxes, interest and penalties, according to its filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission, which give the amounts in dispute but virtually no other details.

Merck says it did nothing wrong and that the deal was simply a way of raising financing for its 1993 acquisition of a pharmacy-benefits management firm, Medco Containment Services Inc. "We believe the partnership transaction is in full compliance with IRS rules and regulations and we vigorously disagree with the proposed IRS adjustments," says Merck spokesman Raymond Kerins, who declines to discuss details of the dispute.

The IRS won't discuss its objection to the Merck partnership. But it is pursuing actions against Dow Chemical Co. and General Electric Co. over similar arrangements they set up within a few months of the Merck deal. Those, federal tax authorities have argued, weren't real partnerships with foreign banks but just well-disguised loan agreements, designed to avoid taxes by maneuvering between the tax laws of different countries, with no economic substance.

The Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last month reversed a trial court and declared that foreign banks in the GE deal were not "bona fide equity partners," a victory for the government in its battle over $62 million in back taxes. GE is seeking a rehearing. Meanwhile, in a little-noticed dispute in U.S. District Court in Baton Rouge, La., the IRS claimed last year that Dow improperly lowered its tax bill by about $130 million by shifting income, through a partnership, to a consortium of German, Dutch, U.K. and Belgian banks. Dow says the arrangement was legitimate financing and is suing the government to try to keep the money.

DOJ_NMG_0070722

As part of that case, the Justice Department says in a court filing it anticipates taking "extensive discovery" from investment bank Goldman Sachs Group Inc., which helped structure both the Dow and Merck deals. Goldman spokesman Peter Rose said, "We take enormous efforts to ensure our transactions comply with applicable tax laws."

The cases are part of an attempt by U.S. authorities to crack down on what is often called "tax arbitrage." The usual strategy: lower a company's tax bills by structuring transactions so certain types of income or expenses are classified as one thing by the IRS, but something very different by another country's tax regulators.

Often the strategies are aided by overseas banks or nonprofit organizations that use complex legal structures to effectively share their tax advantages with U.S. companies. U.S. and U.K. banks also have teamed up to devise structures that lower each other's taxes. IRS Commissioner Mark Everson warned a U.S. Senate panel in June that strategies like those are "on the rise."

Mr. Everson named tax arbitrage as among the most significant enforcement problems the agency faces. He said the IRS has formed a team to consider crafting new international treaties, as well as performing tax audits that would simultaneously look at a company's tax obligations in multiple countries.

Proponents of the deals say it's only smart business to take advantage of U.S. loopholes and the differences among tax rules around the world. Technology and pharmaceutical companies, for instance, are aggressively shifting intellectual-property assets to countries with far lower tax rates, such as Singapore and Ireland.

Merck's potentially costly dispute with the IRS comes as the company battles more than 14,000 lawsuits related to its now-withdrawn Vioxx pain reliever, with its projected liability topping $4 billion. Like other big drug makers, Merck's biggest sellers are losing patent protection while its newer drugs are not expected to make up the lost revenue.

Many of the strategies like the ones used by Merck, Dow and GE were inspired by one man.

In 1988, longtime tax attorney and New York University law school professor R. Donald Turlington published an influential article in the proceedings of a tax conference. Subtitled "The Art of Tax Avoidance," the article began with a 1931 quote from the late Chicago Mafia boss Al Capone: "A good lawyer with a briefcase can steal more than ten men with machine guns."

In the article, Mr. Turlington laid out ways companies could lower their taxes by exploiting a loophole in the way income was allocated within partnerships for tax purposes. He focused on the concept of depreciation, a key tool to lowering taxes.

For example, in the U.S. a factory is considered to have a finite life of 39 1/2 years and loses its value gradually during that life. An owner is allowed to deduct a portion of its cost each year, so if the factory cost $39.5 million, the company can deduct $1 million a year from the plant's taxable income. But after that, a company can end up with considerable income from the asset and no offsetting deductions. In the case of pharmaceutical patents, tax write-offs generally are used up during research and development.

Mr. Turlington pointed to a way around such problems by putting the already-depreciated asset into a partnership, and allocating some of its taxable income to a member of the partnership that for one reason or another wouldn't mind shouldering it. That could reduce the tax bill for the company contributing the assets.

Closing the Loophole

Mr. Turlington called on the government to close this loophole, and in December 1992, the U.S. Treasury Department decided to do just that, proposing an "anti-abuse" regulation. But before the government finalized the new regulations a year later, several companies moved to shift assets and establish partnerships to exploit the loophole.

Mr. Turlington himself helped structure the Merck deal, counseling Goldman Sachs on the transaction, despite his call for the law to be changed.

Merck, GE and Dow Chemical also were aided by some of the country's most prominent partnership tax lawyers, who also once served in high government tax posts. William Nelson, a former IRS chief counsel, advised Merck and GE on their deals, according to people with knowledge of his involvement. The firm he founded with William McKee, a former University of Virginia law professor and U.S. Treasury Department tax legislative counsel, litigated the GE dispute with the government at trial. The firm also is representing Dow in the litigation over its disputed partnership. Mr. Nelson and Mr. McKee declined to comment on the Merck deal.

In July 1993 -- about six months after the government identified the partnership loophole -- Merck announced a $6 billion deal to acquire Medco, the pharmacy-benefits manager. It had cash on hand to fund only part of the giant purchase, and said at the time it would need additional financing.

Sometime before the Medco deal was announced, a Goldman banker named David Ackert, along with Mr. Turlington, presented Merck officials with the partnership idea as a way to raise financing and enjoy significant tax savings. Mr. Ackert, who no longer works for Goldman Sachs, referred questions to the investment bank.

DOJ_NMG_0070723

At the time, Merck's Mevacor and Zocor were two of the company's biggest-selling drugs. Merck no longer had deductions to write off against the patents, according to a person familiar with the matter.

A few weeks before the Medco deal was announced, Merck transferred ownership of the patents to a new Delaware subsidiary, MSD Technology LP, and then registered other Merck subsidiaries that were partners in MSD to do business in Bermuda, according to U.S. patent records and Bermuda company records.

For its deal to work, Merck needed a partner willing to absorb taxable income. It chose a midsized British bank, a unit of Abbey National PLC. The negotiations with Abbey took place in London, Toronto and Bermuda, according to people familiar with the talks. They were held overseas to forestall any issue about whether the partners and the partnership were doing business in the U.S., which could jeopardize the deal's tax treatment. Merck and Abbey's lawyers and investment bankers hammered out much of the complex structure between bowls of fish chowder at Bermuda's posh Southampton Princess hotel.

According to a document filed in an unrelated lawsuit, Abbey took a limited partnership interest in MSD. The arrangement, according to people familiar with the situation, involved Abbey contributing several hundred million dollars in cash to the partnership in exchange for a minority stake. Merck then began paying royalties to the MSD partnership to use the patents covering the anti-cholesterol drugs, these people said.

In effect, Merck was paying itself -- its subsidiaries still owned a majority of MSD -- for the right to use drugs its own scientists had developed. The royalties it paid then largely went straight back into its own coffers, as much of the money was lent to Merck through another subsidiary, according to the people familiar with the transaction. A subsidiary of MSD collected the interest, most of which effectively was returned to Merck when the partnership was liquidated.

The convoluted arrangement gave Merck a sizable tax reduction for roughly a decade. On MSD's internal books -- and only there -- a portion of the incoming royalty payments were allocated as taxable income to Abbey. That reduced Merck's tax liability.

Crucial Element

In a crucial element of the deal, Abbey wasn't liable for those taxes either, because U.K. authorities didn't recognize tax allocations within the books of U.S. partnerships.

In return for its initial cash contribution, Abbey received a stream of payments from MSD. Mr. Turlington and companies that have set up similar transactions liken the payments to preferred dividends. The government has called deals like these loan agreements, not partnerships with the foreign banks, and argued that the cash payments to the banks are really loan interest. In that case, the tax burden can't legally be shifted.

Mr. Turlington, now retired, says the Merck deal with Abbey was a tax-advantaged way to raise significant capital, and not simply a tax-saving measure. "In my mind the question with a deal like Merck was, and still should be, 'Can a taxpayer who decides to do something for a legitimate business reason, like raising [money], do it in a way that's tax efficient by taking advantage of a rule that the government wrote?'" He added: "Merck's obligation is to do the best it can for its shareholders. If you were going to write that Merck is under some higher social obligation to maximize its taxes, that would probably catch Merck by surprise."

The deal also had another benefit: The money raised from Abbey wasn't recorded as debt, so didn't jeopardize the company's stellar credit rating.

Abbey, which has since been purchased by Spain-based Banco Santander Central Hispano SA, said it had no comment on the transaction.

In April 2004, the IRS gave Merck a preliminary notice that it was disputing the company's taxes for four years beginning in 1993, the year the Bermuda partnership was established. Late last year, the tax agency finalized that decision for 1993, and proposed disallowing tax benefits from the following three years, according to Merck's SEC filings. Merck says in the filings that it expects similar final notices for subsequent years.

Write to Jesse Drucker at jesse.drucker@wsj.com1

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Congress To Approve Defense Bill Rivaling Vietnam-Era Spending (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congress is poised to send President Bush a record $447 billion Pentagon budget that anticipates defense spending next year will exceed annual expenditures at the height of the Vietnam War.

The huge costs weigh heavily on the political landscape this fall and contrast with the more limited Republican domestic agenda before the midterm elections..

DOJ_NMG_0070724

With Mr. Bush slated to come to the Capitol today, the party leadership is confident it can deliver both a defense bill and a White House-backed measure authorizing military tribunals to try suspected foreign combatants in the war against terrorism. The House approved the tribunal bill 253-168 yesterday; the Senate, after rejecting an early challenge 54-43, expects to complete action today.

But hopes of some bold pre-election initiative, such as making the child tax credit permanent, have faded. None of the major domestic-appropriations bills will be completed before lawmakers go home. New Internal Revenue Service estimates show 19.2 million taxpayers will be left hanging because of Congress's failure to extend expired tax breaks, such as college-tuition deductions.

Yesterday's action illustrated this mood. An offshore-drilling bill was in jeopardy. And even as the House voted to adjourn this weekend, a $34.8 billion domestic-security measure was stymied by a dispute over language that could delay implementation of post-Sept. 11 border-crossing rules requiring a new passport card for U.S. citizens.

Going into last night, Republicans were hopeful of resolving their differences, but the fact that such a major bill was in any jeopardy at this stage was surprising.

Meanwhile, business allies aren't hiding their impatience with the failure to renew the corporate-research tax credit, which expired at the end of last year. "By standing still, the U.S. is falling behind," said John Engler, Michigan's former Republican governor and president of the National Association of Manufacturers, which released a report estimating that without the credit, the corporate-tax burden on manufacturers could rise 9% annually.

Republican leaders promise to resolve these and other issues in the post-election session. In trying to avoid fights and protect its majority, the leadership risks appearing content to play it safe. "We are playing not to lose, instead of to win," a top Republican said.

By contrast, the defense-spending bill, which passed the House on Tuesday, is expected to clear the Senate easily today. Its $447 billion total includes $70 billion in emergency funds to pay for operations in Iraq.

Together with earlier Pentagon appropriations, which are to be spent in the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1, the new bill will bring total defense outlays to about $464 billion. That number will surely increase before the end of fiscal 2007, since the administration anticipates another supplemental request in the spring.

The Vietnam War era's high-water point came in 1968, when defense outlays rose to about $470 billion when adjusted to 2006 dollars -- a level unmatched even during the Reagan defense buildup.

Passage of the tribunal bill was never in doubt in the House, and in the Senate, Republicans appeared united and in control. The strongest remaining challenge is an effort by Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) proposing to delete a portion of the legislation that would strip terror suspects of their ability to challenge their detention with a habeas corpus petition.

Costs Of The Wars In Iraq And Afghanistan Could Reach $549 Billion (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - The total cost of military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and enhanced security at military bases since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks could reach $549 billion this year, a new report to Congress concludes.

The projection by the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service is based on an update in July from the White House Office of Management and Budget, which estimated that war costs will total $110 billion for fiscal year 2007, which begins Sunday.

In fiscal year 2005, the Pentagon spent an average of $6.4 billion a month in Iraq and $1.3 billion a month in Afghanistan. During fiscal year 2006, it's projected that those costs will have increased to about $8 billion a month in Iraq and $1.5 billion per month in Afghanistan.

"Everybody expects that troops will come home and that next year will be cheaper, but it just never happens that way," said Winslow Wheeler, the director of the Straus Military Reform Project at the Center for Defense Information, a policy-research group in Washington.

The report says war costs are expected to continue to grow in the next decade.

Even if U.S. forces were reduced from 258,000 today in Iraq, Afghanistan and other military operations around the globe related to the war on terrorism to 74,000 by 2010, the Congressional Budget Office estimates that war costs would still grow by $371 billion from fiscal year 2007 to fiscal year 2016.

Given the amount already spent, total war funding could reach $808 billion by 2016, according to the Congressional Research Service report to Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0070725

But the true figure may prove to be higher, if current trends hold. The Pentagon had hoped to reduce its troop presence in Iraq to fewer than 100,000 by the end of this year, but military commanders are planning to keep at least 140,000 troops there through the spring because of the high level of violence.

Congress has appropriated about $437 billion so far for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and other anti-terrorism efforts around the world, according to the Congressional Research Service.

This includes money for military operations, base security, reconstruction, foreign aid, embassy costs and veterans' health programs related to the war. Another $2 billion is in fiscal 2007 spending bills for foreign aid and diplomatic operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and veterans' medical programs, the agency reported.

The House approved a record $448 billion in defense spending for 2007 late Tuesday, including $70 billion as a down payment, or bridge fund, for military operations during the next fiscal year. Final passage by the Senate could come Thursday.

The White House expects to ask for at least $50 billion in bridge funding to pay for the war in fiscal year 2008, according to the Congressional Research Service.

The Pentagon hasn't provided Congress with the individual costs of each operation. However, the agency report estimated that Iraq accounts for about 75 percent of all war spending and Afghanistan accounts for 20 percent. Increased base security takes the remaining 5 percent.

Operating, maintenance and procurement costs account for the biggest increases in spending from 2003 to 2006, according to the agency.

Total operating and maintenance costs reached almost $200 billion by fiscal 2006, primarily because of purchases of more body armor, the jump in oil prices, increasing bills to repair aging equipment and money to train Afghan and Iraqi security forces.

The amount spent on replacement weapons and equipment reached almost $61 billion during the same period.

Congress is allocating $23 billion this year to replace worn-out or damaged military equipment. Most of that is going to the Army. Wheeler said the expense could be even higher, and that these costs were likely to climb each year that the war continued.

109th Congress Gets Props For Creativity, If Nothing Else (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Democrats have a full slate of proposals they would implement if they gain control of Congress in November, but one of their highest priorities will be the acquisition of a new ink pad.

House and Senate Democratic leaders met yesterday to highlight what they call the GOP "Rubber-Stamp Congress" -- by stamping half a dozen posters with the words "Yes, Bush" in red ink. But when they went to perform the deed, in an ornate room off the Senate floor where portraits of John Adams and Thomas Jefferson gazed down on them, there was a prop malfunction.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) attempted to stamp a poster labeled "Social Security Privatization," but the resulting imprint was too faint to read. "I need more ink!" she called. "I need more ink!" She got more ink and tried again, stamping a poster titled "Medicare Part D" -- and got the same illegible result.

Senate Minority Whip Richard Durbin (Ill.) stepped up. "It's time to see if I can get this rubber stamp to work," he said. He could not. His first stamp, on a poster titled "Budget Cuts," came out upside down. Inverting the stamp, he struck the poster anew, this time knocking it off its easel.

"These are tough acts to follow," quipped Rep. Steny Hoyer (Md.), the House minority whip. He held a poster titled "Estate Tax Giveaway" and slammed the stamp on it with all his might. A blurred image appeared.

Batting cleanup was Rep. James Clyburn (S.C.). "I'm gonna make this thing work," he promised. He gave the stamp an extra dab on the ink pad and pressed it firmly to the final poster. But one of the letters failed to appear, leaving the words "Yes, Bus" on the poster.

Durbin promised that the Senate will get better ink pads if Democrats regain the majority. "In the first hundred days," he vowed.

There are just a couple of days left in the life of the 109th Congress, and lawmakers are getting a bit punch-drunk.

The legislature has yet to agree on a single one of its 12 annual spending bills, but the House managed to find time yesterday to consider H. Res. 748, "Recognizing the 225th anniversary of the American and French victory at Yorktown."

Congress still hasn't worked out immigration legislation or lobbying reform, but the House yesterday moved to embrace H. Res. 991, "Congratulating the Columbus Northern Little League Baseball Team from Columbus, Georgia."

There's nothing doing on port security or Social Security, but there was broad agreement yesterday on H. Res 973, honoring "the financial planning profession for their adherence and dedication to the financial planning process."

DOJ_NMG_0070726

Measured by days in session or legislative output, this Congress has secured its place as one of the most lethargic of all time. But if historians choose to award points for creativity, the 109th could go down in the books as a most prolific body.

Consider Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.), the dapper chairman of the House Rules Committee. On Tuesday, his committee ruled that the House would not consider some 15 amendments the Democrats had proposed to legislation on military commissions. Then, on the House floor yesterday, Dreier scolded the Democrats for not offering an alternative.

Or consider Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), who, in front of the microphones yesterday, quarreled with the Democrats' characterization of this as a "do-nothing Congress." Asked for tangible achievements, Frist responded with a 650-word answer that listed only two items that had cleared Congress: the confirmation of Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito and Chief Justice John Roberts.

Democrats, shut out of legislative deliberations this week as they have been for most of the session, looked for other ways to draw attention to themselves. Frequently, this involved the use of props.

Sen. Patty Murray (Wash.) went to the Senate floor with a poster about veterans. Sen. Patrick Leahy (Vt.) followed with a poster about Colin Powell. Sens. Frank Lautenberg (N.J.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) went to the Senate television studio with a poster about chemical plant security.

Topping all efforts was Rep. Cynthia McKinney (Ga.), who sponsored a session in the Capitol basement at which participants displayed posters of naked and hooded prisoners with dogs. An aide to McKinney, reading an academic paper, provided the narration. "The legs swelled, the skin erupted in suppurating lesions, the kidney shut down, hallucinations began," he read.

But if McKinney had the best props, Sen. Kent Conrad (N.D.) and Rep. John Spratt (S.C.) had the most. They arrived in the television studio toting no fewer than 13 foam-board posters in six bright colors. As aides hurriedly raised and lowered the posters, the lawmakers read the titles. After Conrad displayed his posters and Spratt showed off his, Conrad realized he had forgotten one and ordered it hung.

"How 'bout putting a chart up?" Spratt retaliated, instructing an aide to hang one about a "Bleak Outlook" that Spratt said was a favorite of his 6-year-old granddaughter.

And the sight gags continued. Each reporter received a manila envelope containing a "Report Card" awarding the GOP Congress one D, five F's and one "incomplete." "You're a pretty generous grader there, John," Conrad remarked.

"I'm on a curve," Spratt explained.

Bush Visits Hill To Rally Senate Troops Before Election (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, September 28, 2006

With most analysts predicting an uphill battle for the GOP in November's mid-term election, President Bush plans to rally Senate Republicans this morning as they prepare to leave town and hit the campaign trail.

A Senate Republican aide said the president would likely discuss the GOP's accomplishments, particularly in the realm of national security, an issue the White House is trying to draw attention to in the six weeks before the election.

As 2 Bushes Try To Fix Schools, Tools Differ (NYT)

By Sam Dillon

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. — Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida has long played the dutiful younger brother.

Well before President Bush signed his No Child Left Behind law, Jeb Bush poured his own ideas into a school improvement program for Florida.

Over the years since, Governor Bush has mostly held his tongue about the president's very different law, even as detractors of all stripes have attacked it.

But in recent weeks — perhaps seeking to cement his legacy as a school-policy expert as he prepares to leave office — Governor Bush has been speaking out about the federal law, mixing dollops of praise with measured criticisms — and taking an occasional potshot. He has been caustic, for instance, about the requirement that 100 percent of the nation's students be proficient in reading and math by 2014.

"I mean perfection is not going to happen," Mr. Bush said Sept. 12 at a news conference in Orlando, arguing that achievement targets are important but that unrealistic ones discourage educators. "We're all imperfect under God's watchful eye, and it's impossible to achieve it."

He followed up in an interview with criticisms of other provisions.

"With all due respect to the federal system," the governor said, "our accountability system is really the better way to go."

DOJ_NMG_0070727

Other figures also say the federal law, which comes up next year for Congressional reauthorization, could use some improvement. But Bush vs. Bush may be the most striking part of the debate.

It is natural, of course, that the brothers might feel a bit of fraternal rivalry on this topic, because each built a political career — George in Texas, Jeb in Florida — around promises to improve their states' schools.

Still, this is more than a brotherly squabble, as Governor Bush's comments could well provide the president's opponents with ammunition against his signature law.

No Child Left Behind and the Florida law, the A-Plus plan, differ in many ways. For one, the federal law grades schools pass-fail, while Florida's gives schools A to F grades.

One reason the governor may be wading into the debate over the federal law is that every year since it took effect in 2002, the school-grading systems have contradicted each other. Hundreds of schools have received an A from Florida while flunking under the federal system, often because they narrowly missed testing targets.

At the Orlando news conference, Paul E. Peterson, a professor of government at Harvard, urged Congress to make the federal law more like Florida's.

"Florida's school-grading system is clearly superior to the one used under No Child Left Behind," said Dr. Peterson, who with a colleague, Martin R. West of Brown University, expands on that argument in the current issue of Education Next, an academic journal.

In the article, Drs. Peterson and West described the federal system as so "badly flawed" that it might err with nearly 3 of every 10 schools it classifies as low performing.

The federal law also puts sanctions on schools that do not meet testing goals, but does not reward ones that do. The Florida law, on the other hand, gives large cash bonuses to schools that help low-performing students improve their scores.

"Punitive actions don't work nearly as well," Governor Bush said in the interview. Accountability, he added, "works better when it's viewed as a reward."

In criticizing No Child Left Behind, Governor Bush signaled disagreement with the position staked out by Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, who told reporters on Aug. 30, "There's not much needed in the way of change."

"I talk about No Child Left Behind like Ivory Soap," Ms. Spellings said. "It's 99.9 percent pure."

Governor Bush said that when he had lunch in early September with Ms. Spellings in Washington "I was loaded for bear, to go in and say, 'What was that quote about?' "

"But she disarmed me completely before I got around to my attack," he recalled. "She is eager to reform, to reauthorize N.C.L.B. There's still work to do, and she knows it."

In an interview, Ms. Spellings said that in characterizing the law as "99.9 percent pure" she meant to convey only that no changes were needed to its "core principles." She cited several changes she hoped for, including extending the reach of the law into high schools.

Months after Governor Bush took office in 1999, the Florida Legislature approved his education plan. It requires schools to administer tests in reading and mathematics every year in Grades 3 through 10 and assigns grades based mainly on the results.

Two years later, a legislative audit found that the A-Plus plan was improving student performance, but noted a weakness in its comparing scores at each grade with the previous year scores from the same grade, measuring a different set of students.

Florida overhauled the plan to track the achievement of individual students from grade to grade, allowing the state to calculate how much specific students had learned in a given year. That has made it possible for the state, for instance, to reward schools for raising the achievement of the lowest-performing 25 percent of students.

No Child Left Behind has broad similarities with the A-Plus plan, but the two plans also differ in important ways.

Rather than tracking individual students, the federal plan measures whether schools have made "adequate yearly progress," based on whether the percentage of students who demonstrate proficiency at each grade level, and within racial and other groups, increases by a required amount. For example, the system, like A-Plus before its revision, compares scores this year from fourth graders with those from last year. The federal law took effect just as Florida was rolling out its revised plan. Sharp contradictions emerged almost immediately in many states between the federal and state ratings given to local schools.

These contradictions became especially notable in Florida in the summer of 2003, when 1,200 of the state's 3,050 schools earned A's from the state. At the same time, more than 950 of the top-rated schools failed to make adequate yearly progress under the federal law. Similar discrepancies re-emerged in 2004, 2005 and 2006.

R. J. Longstreet Elementary School here in Daytona Beach is an example. The tidy one-story building near the Atlantic Ocean has fallen short on the federal yardstick every year, but Florida has given it an A for five years straight.

It earned its latest A because on tests in spring 2006 tests 80 percent of students met "high standards" in reading, math and writing, and because 60 percent of students, and nearly 80 percent of the lowest-performing students, increased their scores. In August, the school received a $42,800 reward check.

DOJ_NMG_0070728

"Congratulations on your outstanding performance," Governor Bush wrote to the school.

But it fell short on 2 of 17 federal requirements, and that was enough to fail under the federal system. On a writing test administered to 55 fourth-grade students, 50 needed to show proficiency; 48 did. On math tests administered to 42 disabled students, 21 needed to score at grade level; 20 did.

Having failed the school four years running, each time because it barely missed a target or two, the federal law requires the Volusia County District to make plans this year to replace the staff at Longstreet or to undertake another form of corrective action, said Chris Colwell, a deputy superintendent.

"We're not opposed to measuring achievement in our schools, but our point is, measure accurately," Dr. Colwell said. "Longstreet has a high-performing faculty. Why would we change them?"

In their Education Next article, Drs. Peterson and West used test figures to calculate how much students learned, on average, in each school in Florida in the 2003-4 school year and compared the gains in schools with adequate yearly progress with those in schools that did not.

Their conclusion?

The federal accountability system does not perform as well as Florida's "in distinguishing schools where students are learning more from those where they are learning less," the professors wrote.

At the Sept. 12 news conference, called to publicize a broad review of education initiatives, Governor Bush listened approvingly as Dr. Peterson praised the A-Plus plan and criticized No Child Left Behind. But the governor has been careful to note what he considers to be the federal law's contributions.

Florida, for instance, began focusing increased attention on disabled and limited-English students after the federal law required states to improve those students' achievement, Governor Bush said.

He approaches the law, he said, "not from the standpoint of saying it's bad, but that it's good and needs to be better."

Connecticut Lawsuit Is Cut Back (NYT)

By Sam Dillon

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

A federal judge yesterday dismissed much of Connecticut's closely watched legal challenge to President Bush's education law, No Child Left Behind, but allowed the state to go forward with its claim that Washington treated the state unfairly in negotiations over how to carry out the law.

"The court has decided that it lacks jurisdiction over most of the state's claims, though one claim will remain pending after this ruling," the judge, Mark R. Kravitz of Federal District Court in New Haven, wrote.

Connecticut's lawsuit, filed in August 2005, challenged the federal law as an unfunded mandate that was costing the state tens of millions of dollars more to carry out than it was receiving from Washington. It was the first legal challenge to the federal law by a state.

Both sides expressed satisfaction with Judge Kravitz's ruling.

"The Department of Education is pleased that the federal district judge dismissed three of Connecticut's claims in its lawsuit," said Katherine McLane, the department's press secretary. "The goal of No Child Left Behind is nothing more than what parents deserve and are demanding: that their children read and do math at grade level."

Judge Kravitz ruled that Connecticut could not challenge the law's constitutionality until it had exhausted all available administrative appeals to the Department of Education.

The judge permitted the state to proceed with a separate argument that the secretary of education "acted arbitrarily" in denying Connecticut's request for an exemption from the law, after the state had concluded that it would receive insufficient financing to carry out the law's testing mandates.

The Connecticut attorney general, Richard Blumenthal, said, "The judge has preserved our rights to pursue our claim that the secretary is violating our rights, so we're alive and well."

The nation's largest teachers union filed a similar challenge last year, which a federal judge in Michigan dismissed outright last November.

Judge Dismisses Most Of No Child Lawsuit (AP)

AP, September 28, 2006

A federal judge dismissed most of the claims in Connecticut's challenge to the No Child Left Behind law Wednesday on jurisdictional grounds, the state's attorney general said.

DOJ_NMG_0070729

Connecticut became the first state to try to block the 2002 law when it filed the lawsuit in August 2005. Attorney General Richard Blumenthal argued that the law was unconstitutional, an unfunded federal mandate costing more than the state received in federal aid.

Judge Mark Kravitz dismissed three counts, saying state officials can't challenge the law until they have violated it, Blumenthal said.

The judge is allowing the state to proceed with a fourth claim that the U.S. Department of Education unfairly denied Connecticut's proposed amendments to testing rules, he said.

The law, the cornerstone of President Bush's education platform, requires annual standardized tests for students in grades 3 through 8, but Connecticut wants to continue its program of testing students every other year, in grades 4, 6 and 8.

"This is a jurisdictional ruling," Blumenthal said Wednesday. "Our challenge is alive and well."

Attorneys for the U.S. Department of Education had asked for a dismissal of the entire lawsuit, arguing that the state understood the law when it accepted hundreds of millions of dollars in education funding.

Key Democrats Blast GOP For Failure To Rein In Budget (MCT)

By James Rosen

McClatchy Newspapers, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sen. Kent Conrad, senior Democrat on the Senate Budget Committee, said Wednesday that some of the tax cuts enacted under President Bush might get "trimmed" if his party regains control of Congress.

Conrad and Rep. John Spratt, ranking Democrat on the House Budget Committee, sharply criticized Republicans for failing to adopt a budget or to pass any of the 12 annual appropriations bills.

"We face red ink as far as the eye can see, with the nation's debt continuing to grow out of control," Conrad told reporters at the Capitol. "The debt is skyrocketing, and there's been a failure among the Republicans themselves to arrive at a budget."

Conrad responded cautiously when asked whether Democrats would extend the tax cuts that Congress passed in 2001 and 2003 if they gain control of the House of Representatives or the Senate in the Nov. 7 elections.

The North Dakota Democrat said his party would likely retain "middle-class tax cuts" such as the child tax credit started under President Clinton and the repeal of the "marriage tax penalty" enacted under Bush.

But the senator added that Democratic lawmakers might have to revisit the broader income tax reductions that Bush pushed through Congress during his first 30 months in office.

"Maybe some of the tax cuts that go to the wealthiest among us are going to have to get trimmed because, you know, we've got to pay our bills," Conrad said.

A broad series of disputes, some of them among Republicans, has stymied movement of the 12 appropriations bills, which fund most government programs. The Senate has passed only the defense and homeland security spending measures, with more progress possible during a lame-deck session later this year after the elections.

Federal spending is projected to increase this year by 9 percent to about $2.7 billion, according to the White House budget office. It's the largest percentage increase since 1990.

While Conrad and Spratt, a South Carolina Democrat, said the budget surplus Bush inherited in January 2001 has turned into a sizable deficit, their figures show that the deficit is shrinking, from a high of $413 billion in 2004 to a projected $260 billion this year.

Tony Fratto, White House deputy press secretary, said strong economic growth is fueling increased federal tax receipts, which are helping reduce the deficit.

Bush's pledge to cut the deficit in half by 2009, Fratto said, is being fulfilled ahead of schedule.

"We're bringing the deficit down from where anyone would have anticipated it would have been," he said. "We inherited a recession and a collapsing equity market, and the impacts of those and September 11th and the corporate scandals were really shocks to the economy. Then having to deal with the war on terror - it's all obviously had an impact on necessary spending and on tax receipts."

Spratt said the accumulated federal debt has increased from almost $6 trillion when Bush took office to almost $9 trillion this year, with an increasing share - now more than $2 trillion - held by foreign countries and other overseas investors.

"Foreigners are amassing more and more of our debt and therefore control over our fiscal and financial future," Spratt said.

Nov. 15 Set For Vote On House GOP Leaders (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070730

House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) has set the date for GOP lawmakers to elect their leaders for the next Congress, Republican aides said yesterday.

The Speaker and other GOP leaders have scheduled an organizing conference for Wednesday, Nov. 15, the week Congress resumes after the hotly contested midterm election.

The elected leaders made their decision earlier this week after wavering on the date of the post-election contest in the face of a potentially devastating midterm, even though the conference was already scheduled to meet that Wednesday.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) has already sent a letter to the Clerk of the House to notify that office of the date for the elections. Once the Clerk has confirmed the receipt of that letter, the office of Republican Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) will notify members officially.

"Leadership has decided to hold the election on Nov. 15," Conference spokesman Geoff Embler confirmed yesterday. "Once it's official with the Clerk, the conference office will send an official notification to the members."

Each of the eight elected leaders must stand for reelection for the new Congress. The Speaker and Boehner should be safe, even if Republicans lose the House by a narrow margin, but other posts could be up for grabs even if the GOP holds the House.

The announcement of leadership elections is part of a coordinated effort to project confidence before members leave town for the stretch run heading into the November election.

With many Republicans fighting for their political lives this fall, Hastert laid out a few of his legislative priorities for the next Congress. They include simplification of the tax code, increased energy independence and legislation to "give Americans more individual control over their healthcare, lowering costs and increasing choices," an aide said afterward.

Hastert has not definitely indicated that he will serve in the next Congress.

"It's our last legislative week, ladies and gentlemen," the Speaker told his Republican colleagues during yesterday's regularly scheduled conference meeting, according to the notes of leadership aide in attendance. "Just one more week to set the tone for October. Just 41 days until Election Day. Just a little over a month until we defeat the Democrats – AGAIN."

"We've got to get back home and remind people why it matters that we maintain the majority," Hastert said. "We've had many successes this Congress, but we still have work to do together next year."

During that same meeting, Republican National Committee (RNC) Chairman Ken Mehlman contrasted the current election cycle with that of 1994, when the GOP upended the Democratic majority in the House for the first time since 1954, to ease Republican concerns that Democrats will retake the House this fall, members and aides present said afterward.

In addition, Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), a former Republican National Committee executive director, assured members that the national committee's voter turnout program will be even more effective this year than it was in 2004 when it effectively drove Republicans to the polls to reelect President Bush.

In preparation for the elections, GOP lawmakers continue to raise big dollars as part of the National Republican Congressional Committee's (NRCC) Battleground Program.

Rep. Eric Cantor (R-Va.), who chairs the effort on behalf of the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) Chairman Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), has already eclipsed his initial goal of $17.5 million by raising $18.6 million as of yesterday, numerous aides said. That total includes the $2.7 million members gave Cantor during yesterday's closed-door conference meeting.

Rep. Thad McCotter (R-Mich.) was this week's surprise contributor by offering the NRCC $250,000, and Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton (R-Texas) exceeded his own promised target of $4.2 million by presenting Cantor and Reynolds with a large novelty check for $4.4 million to represent the money he and the members of his Energy and Commerce Committee have contributed to the reelection drive. Barton and his committee members contributed much of that before today's meeting.

In addition, Hastert and Boehner upped their own pledge amounts, vowing to raise $850,000 for the program. Boehner is raising that money in addition to the $70,000 he has pledged to contribute on behalf of Ohio Reps. Steve Chabot (R), Deborah Pryce (R) and Jean Schmidt (R).

The other big surprise was the revelation that Rep. Ron Paul (R), the iconoclastic Texan who rarely sides with his own leadership on tight votes, is on a monthly payment plan to contribute "a significant" amount to the Republican election drive. Cantor would not disclose an exact dollar amount.

Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.) contributed another $150,000 to bring his Battleground total to $650,000, GOP aides said.

Although most polling and pundits suggest the GOP will lose significant seats in the House this year – and potentially its majority – many members are now projecting more confidence on their prospects.

Republicans circulated polling yesterday by GOP pollster David Winston that showed a sharp jump in the confidence suburban voters have with regard to the economy.

Since July, the right-track/wrong-track numbers have swung 24 points in a positive direction among the suburban voters polled, from 38-57 to 50-45.

That jump coincides with the steady decline of gas prices during September. The suburban voters polled still give Democrats a 10-point advantage on the issue of "energy and gas prices," 38-48, but the September poll represents a 13-point jump for the GOP since July, when Democrats had a 23-point advantage over Republicans on the issue.

"One of the problems that Republicans were having was that they were highlighting their successes with the economy and people were going to the gas pump and seeing the opposite was true," Winston said. "Now, what you're seeing is that message is working."

Other polls from the beginning of the month showed voters are believe the country is still going in the wrong direction.

An NBC/Wall Street Journal poll of 1,000 registered voters conducted by Peter D. Hart Research from the beginning of the month, just as gas prices started to fall, showed the right-track/wrong-track numbers were still at 31-54.

Even Winston's poll suggested suburban voters believe the country overall is heading in the wrong direction, 35 percent to 55 percent, although that is a 5-point jump from July.

Boehner Looks Secure In 110th (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, September 28, 2006

One year ago today, then-Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) announced he would temporarily step down as Majority Leader after he was indicted by a Texas grand jury. Now, the man who was elected to replace him in that post, Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio), appears to be on solid ground to keep his seat at the leadership table in the 110th Congress — even if it's in the minority.

Boehner has been Majority Leader for eight months in a session of Congress marked by leadership upheavals, ethical and criminal scandals and few major legislative victories, and yet — in the estimation of his colleagues — he has emerged largely unscathed.

A number of potential leadership shake-ups could present themselves after the results of Election Day come down. Depending on the outcome, there could be surprise retirements, upstart challenges and calls for retribution.

But of the nearly two-dozen Members and aides across the ideological spectrum of the House Republican Conference interviewed for this story, not one said they believed Boehner would be left without a seat at the table when the GOP Conference gathers on Nov. 15 — the date that has now been chosen to hold leadership elections.

"I have not heard one complaint about him," said Rep. Jo Ann Emerson (R-Mo.) who publicly backed Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) in the contest between Blunt, Boehner and Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) for Majority Leader earlier this year.

"The one thing that [Boehner] does that is quite good is he listens to all sides. It's not as much a top-down style, it's like a breath of fresh air," she said.

Members frequently cited Boehner's mid-session elevation as a reason to give him another chance to make his own mark in the 110th Congress.

One senior House Republican with ties to Boehner said there is a growing sense in the Conference that Boehner will "exert himself more" next year, whereas this year has been spent navigating problems that existed before he took over the job.

"We were just drifting for several months," observed another House Republican, in reference to the period between when DeLay stepped down and Boehner was elected to replace him. "Boehner walked into a very difficult situation."

Education and the Workforce Chairman Howard McKeon (R-Calif.), a loyal Boehner ally and his predecessor to the committee's gavel, said he was confident Boehner would remain in leadership next year. "I don't think there is any question," McKeon said, who credited Boehner's role in passing the fiscal 2007 budget in the House.

"He didn't want to twist any arms, that's not his style. ... He keeps his word, and he builds consensus."

While it is no surprise that Boehner's public supporters in the leadership race still back him, he also has reached out to Blunt supporters as well.

One public Blunt supporter, who asked not to be identified, said they were surprised at how gracious Boehner was after the leadership election.

"His attitude towards everything is like, 'Well you weren't with me that time, but can you be with me next time?'" the Member said. "He doesn't hold grudges — or at least he doesn't show it."

Rep. Patrick McHenry (R-N.C.), another Blunt supporter, also credited Boehner for sending the message that there would be no hard feelings held over from the leadership race.

"Based on both on style and performance, Boehner has secured his position in the next Congress," McHenry said, "In a tough environment he's excelled, and I think Members see his ability to get stuff done."

DOJ_NMG_0070732

While DeLay's and Blunt's offices often clashed behind the scenes, leadership sources insist that Boehner and Blunt — and their aides — have more or less put rivalries aside.

Even those House sources sympathetic to Blunt acknowledged that Boehner is most likely to survive the GOP's worst-case scenario if they lose the House majority on Nov. 7.

It is widely believed on Capitol Hill that Hastert will not remain in Congress under that scenario — although Hastert has shown no indication of that publicly — and there are already leadership elections anticipated for the Republican Conference posts.

Sources suggested that Blunt could be vulnerable to a challenge as well if he chose to run for Minority Whip, yet Chief Deputy Majority Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.), like Boehner, is widely viewed as a current leader who could survive in the minority, if he chose to run.

And while it is possible that a Member could step up to challenge Boehner, particularly if Republicans lose the majority, there is a general consensus that Boehner would be difficult to defeat in a leadership race.

One caveat to that scenario is if Republicans lose the majority by a massive margin, similar to when Republicans swept control in 1994. "Then all bets are off," observed a senior GOP aide. But at this point, a majority of House Republicans do not believe a tidal wave is on the horizon.

And if Republicans can hold control of the House, Boehner would be re-elected easily to his current post or — if Hastert decides to retire next year — potentially to the Speakership.

Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.), an active member of the Republican Study Committee who initially supported Shadegg in the leader's race, said Boehner would "absolutely" be reelected to leadership.

"John inherited the environment we've got today, he didn't cause it," Feeney said, adding that win or lose, Boehner is likely secure. "If things go poorly, he'll get none of the blame, and if things go well, he'll get a great deal of credit."

Stylistically, Boehner runs his operation in stark contrast to how DeLay did business —which is a welcome relief to many Members who were tiring toward the end of DeLay's tenure of his heavy-handed manner.

"John Boehner's leadership brings some of the vision back from when we first got here," said Rep. Zach Wamp (R-Tenn.), referencing the 1994 takeover. Wamp similarly credited Boehner's affability and media-friendly style. "His stock is extremely high among House Republicans right now," he said.

Boehner is the only member of the top elected leadership since Republicans won in 1994 who has served as a committee chairman — experience that Members say has provided for a more inclusive approach to moving legislation.

A GOP leadership aide noted that Boehner has worked diligently on "Member management," to build consensus for the agenda and to avoid forcing vulnerable Members into tough votes before the election.

For instance, Boehner pulled a trade package from the floor this week involving African and developing nations because Members from textile states, particularly North Carolina, did not want to face a trade vote seven weeks out from an election.

On Tuesday, Boehner offered this self-evaluation: "I feel good about doing over the last several months exactly what I told Members I would do in terms of bringing us back to the basics, being more inclusive, involving more Members, and, frankly, lowering the temperature around here. And I guess to sum it all up, I would say so far, so good."

'Concern' In Murtha Camp (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, September 28, 2006

Liberal House Democrats are not lining up behind Rep. Jack Murtha's (D-Pa.) leadership candidacy in the numbers he had hoped despite his outspoken stance against the Iraq war.

Murtha's failure to line up staunch opponents of the war could prove a blow to his hope of denying the majority leadership to Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) in the event of a Democratic takeover of the House in the 110th Congress.

Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.), a friend of Murtha who has been helping him with the race, said tepid support among some progressives was a worry to him. "It does concern you when people you think are going to be with you turn out not to be. Some of that's cultural issues, guns and abortion," he said. "But we still have the votes."

Liberal Reps. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.), Barney Frank (D-Mass.), Bill Delahunt (D-Mass.), Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), John Lewis (D-Ga.), Jerry Nadler (D-N.Y.), Lucille Roybal-Allard (D-Calif.), Diane Watson (D-Calif.) and Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) are all backing Hoyer even though many admire Murtha's stance on the war. All but Lewis opposed Hoyer in a 2001 leadership race against House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

Some liberals believe Murtha's record on social issues is too conservative, especially on such topics as gun rights, gay marriage and abortion. Others avow that they are happy with Hoyer's performance as minority whip and want to maintain the status quo in their leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0070733

Until now, many liberals had been wary of giving Hoyer a promotion. Many took a dim view of him in previous leadership races, opposing his failed campaign against Pelosi in 2001 and voting against his chosen candidate in the caucus vice-chair race earlier this year.

Some saw him as harboring a continuing desire to undermine Pelosi even years after their race, while others were upset when he sided with party centrists on such legislative issues as the 2005 overhaul of bankruptcy laws. Murtha, meanwhile, has been a key Pelosi backer in spite of their ideological differences.

But for Nadler, none of those factors mattered.

"I was annoyed. I am annoyed," he said of Hoyer's support of the bankruptcy bill.

"But so what?...He's done a great job as whip. Between Nancy and Steny, we've had an extraordinarily united caucus. If we win, we're going to need that same unity next year."

Nadler called Hoyer an "attractive spokesman" for the caucus who could speak on a wide range of issues.

Waters, a nationally known liberal who founded the Out of Iraq Caucus in 2005, said she was supporting Hoyer but declined to comment further. She serves as a chief deputy whip in Hoyer's whip operation but was appointed to the post by Pelosi. She was so opposed to Hoyer in 2001 that she served as a nominator for Pelosi.

Waxman pointed to ideological differences as his reason for backing Hoyer.

"When you look at the two on contrast, there are distinct differences between them on abortion, on the environment, on guns. I expect Hoyer will win. I think he's way ahead," he said.

Lewis called Hoyer a "bridge-builder" who was working "for the whole Democratic caucus." Roybal-Allard said he was "a Democrat in every positive sense of the word."

But not all progressives will do the same about-face. Liberal Rep. Mike Capuano (D-Mass.), a Murtha backer, said he thought the "majority of the Progressive Caucus" would end up supporting Murtha, as would, he said, "a majority of the Blue Dogs" and "a majority of the New Democrats," two groups of moderates.

He had "no concern at all" about defections to Hoyer. "Everyone's going to be split 100 ways to Sunday."

Moran said Murtha would lead from the center.

"If Jack were majority leader, he is obviously going to provide every opportunity for people, where they feel there's a difference, to have their voices heard on abortion or other issues," he said.

He added that Murtha had "a slight advantage" among current House Democrats, not including members who refused to weigh in yet on the race and those that could be elected in November.

Both sides acknowledged that the race was shaping up far differently than Hoyer's 2001 contest against Pelosi.

Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.), an ardent Hoyer ally, said Hoyer had support among the progressives and among his usual base of Blue Dog centrists.

"Steny's support is broader than ideology, broader than region. That's the problem from a tactical perspective for John Murtha. Where does he find his base? This is not a Pelosi-Hoyer race."

Big Cuts At NASA Threaten Aviation (USAT)

By Alan Levin

USA Today, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — A series of steep cuts in aeronautics research at NASA threaten to undermine the nation's aviation industry and delay a new air traffic system needed to prevent gridlock in the skies, according to members of Congress, industry officials and scientific leaders.

Groups of lawmakers from both parties, academics and aerospace leaders say the reductions are hampering NASA's ability to develop new aviation technology.

"I think its almost criminal," said Roy Harris, retired head of aeronautics at NASA's Langley Research Center in Virginia. "We are dropping the ball."

NASA has lost hundreds of millions of dollars in aviation funding over the past decade and is struggling to pay for repairing the space shuttle and for President Bush's plan to send people to the moon and Mars. Next year, the agency faces a proposed 20% cut in aviation research. That means that, after adjusting for inflation, it could lose nearly two-thirds of that research funding since it peaked in 1994 at the equivalent of nearly $2 billion.

The agency is planning to cut $54 million — or 31% — from its effort to study emerging technologies required for a new national air traffic system. NASA is the primary agency researching the Next Generation Air Traffic System, an ambitious program to replace radars with satellite-based technology. Without increased capacity from the new system, airlines can expect increasing flight delays, according to government estimates.

DOJ_NMG_0070734

Current NASA funding falls as much as $200 million to $300 million a year short of what is actually needed, according to the Aerospace Industries Association. Retired Air Force major general William Hoover, who co-chaired a government study on aeronautics research needs, told the House subcommittee on space Tuesday that NASA must boost work on the air traffic system now or face problems in the future.

NASA's leaders insist that the agency has the money it needs to help modernize the air traffic system and to maintain its place as a leading research institute, said Lisa Porter, NASA's aeronautics head.

"I consider myself an advocate for a strong aeronautics program within NASA, and I believe that's what we have," she told the House subcommittee.

Though known primarily for putting people into space, NASA has been the birthplace of many of aviation's greatest innovations. The products of its labs and wind tunnels include more efficient wing designs, quieter jet engines and widely copied pilot safety training.

Rep. Mark Udall, D-Colo., part of a bipartisan coalition that is trying to restore funding to the agency, said the cuts threaten to make NASA "irrelevant" to the aviation world.

According to more than 20 lawmakers, academics and industry and government officials, much of the agency's work has been severely curtailed.

Among the issues:

·NASA programs that study pilot fatigue and how people make critical safety errors are being trimmed. The budget for all aviation safety programs is being cut by about one-third.

·While European nations are increasing funding on aviation research, NASA is cutting back. Porter is reorganizing the agency to focus on what she calls "fundamental research."

Veterans' Group Wants Larger Raise For Military (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Concerned that Congress is moving toward providing a 2.2 percent pay raise for the military next year, a leading veterans' group said that with troops fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan, this is not the time to skimp on a raise.

The House approved a fiscal 2007 defense appropriations bill late Tuesday that would raise military pay by 2.2 percent, effective in January. Senate negotiators have signed off on the raise, but the full Senate has not voted on the spending bill.

More than just the military raise may be at stake because the military raise usually spills over into the civil service. Congress in most recent years has adopted a "pay parity" policy that calls for equal raises for the two workforces.

The Military Officers Association of America, known as MOAA, yesterday urged Congress to approve a 2.7 percent across-the-board raise for the armed forces. "As a nation, we ought to do better for our military than we are about to do," said Norb Ryan Jr. , president of MOAA and a retired vice admiral.

MOAA and other military groups made some progress toward a 2.7 percent military raise earlier this year when the House approved it as part of a fiscal 2007 authorization bill for defense programs. The Senate version, however, stuck with the White House's recommendation for a 2.2 percent raise.

The bill moving this week through Congress, for appropriations, provides funds for defense operations for the coming year. The authorization bill, in contrast, sets broad policy and spending guidelines. In most years, they are in sync on raise and other personnel issues.

House-Senate negotiators on the defense authorization bill will not comment on the status of the pay raise or any other item until they have wrapped up their agreement, known as a conference report, a spokesman for the Senate Armed Services Committee said.

Ryan said that regardless of which proposed raise gets adopted, it would be the smallest military raise in 11 years. Over much of the past decade, MOAA and other advocates for military personnel have pushed to close a salary gap with the private sector, and from 2000 through 2006 Congress approved increases slightly higher than the average wage growth in the private sector, as measured by a Labor Department index.

Approving the proposed 2.2 percent raise for 2007 will send the wrong message to military families, Ryan said, noting that some U.S. forces in Iraq have been extended involuntarily and that some troops are being asked to return to Iraq after less than a year at home.

The raise issue is also complicated by a separate appropriations bill that covers federal workforce issues. The House approved a 2.7 percent raise for the civil service in that bill. The Senate version, which awaits a floor vote, recommends the same size raise.

DOJ_NMG_0070735

The chairman of the key Senate subcommittee, Sen. Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.), has warned that, given the difference with the proposed 2.2 percent military raise, there could be pressure to "bring civilian pay down to that level."Curbing NSPS

In a move that may be more about symbolism than substance, House and Senate negotiators on the defense spending bill have prohibited the Pentagon from spending money on disputed parts of the new National Security Personnel System (NSPS).

The provision, sponsored by Reps. Jay Inslee (D-Wash.), Walter B. Jones Jr. (R-N.C.) and Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), would prevent the Defense Department from carrying out plans to restrict union rights and revise procedures for disciplining civil service employees.

A federal district court has blocked those parts of the NSPS on grounds that they fail to ensure collective bargaining rights, do not provide an independent third-party review of labor relations decisions and would leave employees without a fair process for appealing major disciplinary actions. The case is on appeal.

The Pentagon has contended that the Inslee amendment is unnecessary because NSPS officials are complying with the court's injunction.

After Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii) and others proposed a compromise, House and Senate negotiators narrowed the original Inslee amendment so that the Pentagon can go ahead with changes in how the department's civil service employees are evaluated on their job performance. If the Pentagon wins on appeal, the spending ban would be lifted, according to the provision.

"The Defense Department never should have implemented a personnel system that denies basic worker rights," Inslee said.

Gregory Junemann , president of the International Federation of Professional and Technical Engineers, said the funding ban "is reflective of key lawmakers' growing frustration that management's unilateral creation of NSPS has been one fiasco after another."

Diary associate Eric Yoder contributed to this report. E-mail Stephen Barr atbarrs@washpost.com.

Goodbye, Dr. Frist (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The Hill, September 28, 2006

Dick Morris

If Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) were still in his former occupation, he could well be sued by his 54 fellow Republicans, 99 senators, and the American people at large for malpractice. When he took the job as majority leader, I wrote in this space that the only thing in common between his new and old occupations was breaking ribs. But he failed to do even that!

Running the House of Representatives is like commanding the Prussian Army. All you need is a sense of discipline, a well-used firing squad, and a mentality that will allow you to march congressmen at double time across mine fields in order to clear them. The House political leadership's monopoly on power, money, policy, and, through the state leadership, on district lines, makes these demands easy to get fulfilled. The only problem in the House is that discipline will be too tight and will allow the kind of corruption that appears to flourish in an environment in which nobody can ask any questions.

But the traditions and procedures of the Senate are quite different. When Americans speak of congressional gridlock and frustrating inaction, they usually mean the Senate. Sen. Trent Lott's (R-Miss.) memoir is aptly titled, Herding Cats. The task requires a delicate mix of political sensibility and a capacity to tolerate but also to discipline the cranky needs of 54 prima donnas and 45 part-time adversaries and potential allies. One has to have a deft political hand and an instinct for such things.

Frist performed about as well as a heart surgeon with mittens on. He failed utterly to provide the leadership necessary and managed to so mangle the reputation of the legislative wing of the Republican Party in the process that it may take several elections, and perhaps a Hillary Clinton presidency, to recover.

Trying to respond to the conflicting demands of the white angry men and women who oppose illegal immigration and the sensitive Hispanics who worry about racism, he succumbed to the temptation to load up a bill with everything, from both sides, which stood no chance of passage. Then, he was so incapable of engineering consensus that he couldn't even convene a conference committee to iron out the differences with the House.

Asked to lead the ethically challenged House in lobbying reform, he did nothing.

He managed, despite a compliant House, a supportive president, and 55 votes, to pass very little and achieve almost nothing.

Now he leads his majority into the general election virtually certain of losing four seats and hoping desperately not to lose six. That's some record!

He couldn't even use the job as a springboard to a presidential candidacy. He failed in this regard not the same way Howard Baker or Bob Dole did (doing so good a job in the Senate that they sullied their chances for the White House) but by acquiring a reputation for ineffectuality and inability.

So what is the lesson for the future? A majority leader must not just be from the Senate. He must be of the Senate. He or she need not only sit in the body, but they must ooze its traditions, savor its tempo, grasp its inhibitions, and challenge its institutional lethargy. A good leader needs to grasp that each Senator is really more like a head of a country than a legislator. House members travel in groups. Senators walk alone and above it all. He needs to grasp what their political needs are and figure out how to appease them while, at the same time, leading them.

Indeed, it may be impossible, in this age of minute media coverage, to have one person fill the dual roles of presenting the majority's public face and organizing its private operations. There may need to be a Mister Inside and a Mister Outside – perhaps with the former as whip and the later as leader.

But, in any case, the leader and the whip both need to be politicians, not doctors.

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of "Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race."

With Love To Dear Ol' Dad (WP)

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

The Senate majority leader's wife, Karyn McLaughlin Frist, was at the White House, at a small dinner for the king of Spain. President Bush's daughter Jenna walked in late. At first, the president seemed irritated. But one look at Jenna as she hurried into her seat, and Bush "absolutely melted," Frist recalled. "He broke into a big, proud smile."

Fathers and daughters captivated Frist, in part because she missed her own father, who had died. Frist invited women -- senators, heads of state, Olympic medalists and a soldier -- to write about their fathers, in a book to be published next week, "Love You, Daddy Boy: Daughters Honor the Fathers They Love."

Many of the essays peek into the foyers of political homes. President Lyndon B. Johnson's daughter Lynda Johnson Robb writes that she sold Girl Scout cookies door to door in the Senate. H. Ross Perot's daughter Nancy Perot Mulford recounts ski trips "with Dad always in the lead, racing ahead." And Frist, whose father signed letters to her while she was away at college "Love U, Daddy Boy," confesses: "On a starry evening I often walk to a dark spot on the lawn and look at the full moon and say, 'I love YOU, Daddy Boy.' "

-- Laura Blumenfeld

* * *

When other three- and four-year-olds were taken to the playground, I went to the Senate Rackets Committee Hearings.

-- Former Maryland
lieutenant governor
Kathleen Kennedy Townsend, about Robert F. Kennedy

* * *

When I was about seven or eight years old, my father wanted me to perform in my elementary school talent show. He hired the drama teacher to give me tap dancing lessons and bought me a costume. . . . I was embarrassed because I was not very good. But on the day of the show, there was my father -- with all of his imposing height, and weight, and strength -- standing at my side and staring at the audience, as if daring them to laugh. No one made a sound.

-- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, about John Rice Jr.

* * *

Squandering time was not appreciated. My hours of playing with a "Betsy Wetsy" doll were greeted by my father's question, "How can you waste so much time with a doll whose sole function is to wet her pants?"

-- Hadassah Lieberman,
wife of Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), about Rabbi Samuel Freilich

* * *

When my mother, sisters and I, finally arrived in America [from Taiwan], I entered the third grade not speaking a word of English. Every day, I copied whatever was on the blackboard into my notebook. Every night, after his long and exhausting day of work, my father sat with me at the kitchen table, trying to decipher my childish scribbles so he could explain that day's lessons to me. That was how I learned English!

-- Labor Secretary Elaine L. Chao, about James S.C. Chao

* * *

DOJ_NMG_0070737

Profoundly devoted to family, he also provided firm discipline. When my family moved into a new house that Dad had designed, I decided to paste thirteen valentines on the walls. . . . He took me to each valentine and asked, "Who did this?"

At first, I blamed it on my imaginary playmate, Denaw. "No," Dad said, "Denaw hasn't been here today."

"Johnny did it," I said, blaming my brother John, who is 13 years my senior and stands six feet, two inches tall. "No, Johnny would have put them way up high," Dad replied.

Finally, I had to admit, "Elizabeth did it." At each valentine, as I acknowledged responsibility, Dad gave me a few pats with a switch from the back yard hedge -- a simple lesson in honesty I have never forgotten.

-- Sen. Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.), about John Van Hanford

* * *

Daddy told me that there were only three things you really give your children: 1. The best education you can. 2. set a good example. 3. all the love in the world.

-- Former first lady Barbara Bush, about Marvin Pierce

* * *

One night my parents were watching a television show that featured gay characters. When my father expressed his disapproval of homosexuals, my mother said, "What about Dillard and Larry?"

"What do you mean?" he asked. So my mother explained to my father that his dear friends and neighbors were a gay couple in a long-lasting committed relationship. One of my father's last stereotypes fell. Larry and Dillard visited my father in the hospital as he lay in a coma. One night Larry relieved my mother for a few hours so she could go home and get some rest.

And it was Larry who held my father's hand and said good-bye as he died.

-- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), about Hugh Rodham

* * *

My father was a professor of surgery at the University of California Medical Center. . . . He used to say, "Get to your work a half hour early; don't take a coffee break; and be the last one out at night."

When I held my first job in "Notions" at the Emporium Department Store at the age of sixteen, that's exactly what I did."

-- Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), about Leon Goldman

* * *

Once upon a time, in a land far away and a time long ago, before speed records, space flights, and political campaigns, lived a young girl. She had auburn hair and freckles like her father's. He told her that if someone asked, "Where did you get all of those freckles, little girl?" she could reply, "It rained and I rusted."

-- Lyn Glenn, about John Glenn

* * *

Da expected not only the cowboys but also his children and any visiting cousins to do a share of the ranch work. . . . I offered to drive the truck with the lunch to the place the crew would be in the late morning, branding cattle. . . .

As a result of a flat tire I arrived at the round-up destination about two hours later than expected, but I was rather proud of myself for having been able to change the tire. . . .

"You're late," said Da. "I know," I said. "I had a flat tire and had to change it."

"You should have started earlier," said Da.

"Sorry, Da. I didn't expect a flat."

I had expected a word of praise for changing the tire. But, to the contrary, I realized that only one thing was expected: an on-time lunch. No excuses accepted.

-- Former Supreme Court justice
Sandra Day O'Connor,
about Harry A. Day

* * *

One of my most treasured photos of my father is not one of him with me, but one of him with my two oldest girls snuggling in his arms, as he sits in his most comfortable recliner reading "The Night Before Christmas" to them, something he never had time to do with me!

-- Lynda Johnson Robb, about President Lyndon B. Johnson

DOJ_NMG_0070738

* * *

I have never been able to talk about my dad in public speeches -- when I would so like to pay public tribute to him. . . . I always get a catch in my throat.

-- Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Tex.),
about Allan Bailey

How To Deploy Paulson Might Be Bush's Biggest Economic Policy Decision (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

President Bush faces a big decision in coming weeks: how best to deploy his energetic, impatient new Treasury secretary, Henry Paulson, after November's congressional elections.

Although his presidency will be defined by Sept. 11, 2001, and the Iraq war, Mr. Bush and his chief of staff, Josh Bolten, surely are beginning to ponder whether they can accomplish anything economic in the two years Mr. Bush has left in office. If they decide to be ambitious -- and that is a big if -- Mr. Paulson is eager to be the field marshal.

"When there is a big problem that needs fixing, you should run toward it, rather than away from it," Mr. Paulson said in his first speech. "That is one of the reasons I decided to come to Washington."

Humble, he's not. But Hank Paulson is emerging as the brightest bulb in a Bush cabinet with a few dim ones and a few others (think Don Rumsfeld) who have lost their luster. He has mastered the easy stuff: managed to avoid rattling financial markets, figured out that courting Congress takes as much time and care as courting customers at his former employer, Goldman Sachs, and marched through China triumphantly, greeting old acquaintances and posing for photographs as if he were at a Dartmouth reunion.

Now what?

China obviously looms large in the Paulson portfolio, and he plans to return there before year end. But that is a long-term investment, not one likely to pay dividends in the next two years. Mr. Paulson, alarmed that so many companies are choosing to make their initial public offerings outside the U.S., is serious about making America's capital markets "more competitive," a goal widely welcomed by business as a way to roll back some rules imposed after corporate scandals. But that isn't presidential-legacy material.

For now, the White House is paralyzed by the prospect of losing control of one or both houses of Congress. If Republicans lose big, recriminations will begin immediately, and the party may abandon Mr. Bush for a new leader -- perhaps Sen. John McCain -- unless the president takes the initiative. Even if Republicans end up with thinner majorities, accomplishing anything substantial will require courting Democrats, not this administration's strength.

As a newcomer, Mr. Paulson has the advantage of being unscarred by the partisanship of the past few years. (He also is rich, which gives him credibility with politicians who tend to equate net worth with intelligence.) In contrast to predecessor John Snow, Mr. Paulson is neither campaigning nor fund raising for Republicans -- and making sure everyone knows it, especially Democrats with whom he will have to do business.

"If you see me in Ohio, I'll be there for reasons other than political," Mr. Paulson quipped while in China. "And I've got no plans to go to Ohio in the immediate future."

Whether Mr. Paulson can do anything depends largely on the president.

One bold stroke would be to team Mr. Paulson with Trade Representative Susan Schwab to resuscitate the stalled Doha Round of world trade talks, sending him around the world to do what he did at Goldman Sachs: Close the deal.

After all, Mr. Paulson has called the Doha Round "an historic opportunity to generate economic growth, spark development and raise living standards across the world" and "just too important to let slip away." He isn't versed in the intricacies of trade, but then those so-versed have failed. And he could invite television cameras to the Barrington, Ill., farm where he grew up to sell a deal to U.S. farmers, a major political obstacle to compromise.

An even bolder stroke would be for the president to tell Mr. Paulson to tackle long-term budget issues, reopening the conversation about fixing Social Security, perhaps tying it to some kind of tax reform.

Moving on fiscal issues, though, would require Mr. Bush to give Mr. Paulson negotiating authority to consider things the president, so far, has sworn to avoid. Without that, Mr. Paulson would be well-advised to spend more time in China and less in Washington.

The odds of success are long. But even some administration insiders are growing uneasy about proclaiming for two more years that the nation faces a terrifying demographic tsunami that will overwhelm its budget and doom its children unless something is done, and then insisting that there is only one way to fix it -- our way -- and that everything is on the table except tax increases.

DOJ_NMG_0070739

Seared by its close encounter with Paul O'Neill, the first Bush Treasury secretary, the White House fortified itself against the Treasury and kept John Snow on the road, on TV and out of the inner circle. The question now is whether Mr. Bush will use the third corporate chief executive to take the job to get something done or relegate him to making speeches for two years.

Prescription For A Stronger F.D.A. (NYT)

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

A prestigious advisory group has put its weight behind criticism that the Food and Drug Administration is pitifully weak when it comes to removing dangerous prescription drugs from the market. Last week, a panel appointed by the Institute of Medicine, part of the National Academy of Sciences, issued a slew of recommendations to strengthen the beleaguered F.D.A. as it struggles to regulate a huge array of medications whose ill effects sometimes show up only after years of wide use.

The institute's report, which was requested by the F.D.A., deplores the big imbalance between the money and staff devoted to approving new drugs and the much smaller resources for monitoring drugs after they are on the market. The imbalance results in part from the pharmaceutical industry's providing user fees that pay for expediting the approval process, but not for monitoring the aftereffects. Worse yet, even when it spots a problem, the agency has very little power to regulate drugs on the market unless there is overwhelming evidence that they are unsafe, which is seldom the case.

Although the nation is mired in budget deficits, the institute was wise to call for a large increase in financing and personnel for this crucially important regulator of public health. If Congress is too stingy to ante up more money, it should at least divert some of the drug industry's user fees to surveillance after a drug's approval.

The panel calls for the F.D.A. to evaluate the safety and effectiveness of drugs that are truly new, not just copycats, at least once every five years. It wants the agency to be given explicit power to compel post-marketing studies and to impose fines, injunctions and withdrawals to enforce its decisions. In a departure from conventional wisdom, the panel also urges the F.D.A. to require that a substantial majority of the members of each of its advisory panels be free of significant financial involvement with companies whose interests might be affected. That undercuts the agency's claims that there are not enough experts without ties to the drug industry.

OTHER NEWS:

11,722.98 (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, September 28, 2006

Dow still trying to pierce record close from 2000, before the bubble burst

The Dow is still one rally away from making history.

The Dow Jones industrial average made a gallant but unsuccessful run at an all-time high Wednesday, coming within 2.21 points of its record close before sellers spoiled the party. The 30-stock barometer ended less than 34 points short as buying exhaustion set in amid a nearly $2 rise in oil prices and news that orders to factories that make durable, big-ticket items such as refrigerators and dishwashers fell a second straight month.

"It was a big tease," says Price Headley, chief market analyst at BigTrends.com. "But I think it will get through the record soon because the market is acting so strong."

The iconic Dow is trying to become the first major U.S. stock index to recoup all its losses suffered during the painful 2000-2002 bear market that followed the bursting of the technology stock bubble. The Dow fell almost 38% in the three-year market swoon and is much closer to breaking even than the Standard & Poor's 500, still down 12.5% from its high, and the Nasdaq composite, off 55.2%, from its peak.

Posting its third-straight day of gains, the Dow rose 19.85 points to close at 11,689.24, just 33.74 points shy of its record close of 11,722.98 hit on Jan. 14, 2000. The blue-chip index, which is filled with well-known U.S. companies such as Wal-Mart, McDonald's, IBM and JPMorgan Chase, is up 9.1% for the year.

The celebration was put on hold as one of the main culprits that have put a lid on stock prices the past year — rising energy prices — again gave investors a reason to sell. A barrel of crude rose $1.95 to $62.96.

Investors have bid stock prices up recently due to a growing belief that the Federal Reserve, which has raised its target for short-term interest rates 17 times since June 2004, is finished raising rates. Wall Street also is betting that the Fed will be successful in slowing the economy without causing a recession or taking a big bite out of corporate profit growth.

DOJ_NMG_0070740

Market experts say it's not unusual for major indexes such as the Dow to have trouble breaking through previous highs. One explanation is what Wall Street calls the “get-even” syndrome. In short, it is investors who bought at the top finally getting a chance to get out with their initial investment intact.

“To get through an old high, you have to go through all the people who are just thanking the Lord that they are back to even,” says Gary Kaltbaum, president of money management firm Kaltbaum & Associates.

Hugh Johnson, chief investment officer at Johnson Illington Advisors, says the market, which has been taking small steps forward and small steps back in the current rally, just couldn't “take the big step to a new high in (Wednesday's) negative news environment.”

Blue Chips Inch Closer To Record (WSJ)

By E.S. BROWNING

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

Stocks took a swing at a record for the Dow Jones Industrial Average, but didn't quite connect.

After surging Tuesday to their second-highest finish ever, the Dow industrials edged up another 19.85 points, or 0.17%, leaving them at a second-best close of 11689.24. The Dow industrials are up 9.1% for 2006, 33.74 points short of the record close of 11722.98 hit in January 2000. The industrials are up 2.7% in September and 4.8% for the quarter, with two trading days left.

The day's gains came despite disappointing economic news. Orders for durable goods -- long-lasting items such as appliances and machinery that people and companies buy when they are investing in the future -- unexpectedly fell in August.

Perhaps even more worrisome, crude-oil futures surged $1.95 to $62.96 a barrel. Falling energy prices have been one of the underpinnings of the rally that has been going on since midsummer. Hopes have spread that lower oil, gasoline and natural-gas prices would take pressure off consumers and spur spending. Some investors thought the Dow industrials were headed for a record yesterday until oil prices reversed early declines and headed up.

Early in the day, the Dow industrials were 2.21 points short of a record, but they never moved higher.

One bit of good energy news: Natural-gas prices fell 7.2% to $4.201 a million British thermal units, the lowest finish since 2002. Traders said weak demand and heavy supplies are holding back natural-gas prices, while continued worries about the Middle East and about refining capacity supported oil prices.

Traders took the market's ability to rise in the face of negative news as a sign that investors have at least temporarily put aside worries about the economy, and have concluded that the Federal Reserve is succeeding in slowing economic expansion without causing a recession.

In addition, many fund managers are required to be fully invested at quarter's end, which can lead them to buy stocks late in the month. That, together with the Dow industrials march toward a record, is helping to spur buying.

"People wanted to take stocks higher, but they had to deal with the durable-goods orders and the oil going up," said Todd Leone, head of listed trading at New York brokerage firm Cowen & Co. He said the market mood remains optimistic. Many investors consider a new Dow industrials record a foregone conclusion.

"Everyone is reading the economic numbers to say it is going to be not too hot and not too cold," Mr. Leone said. "Goldilocks is good for the market. People figure the Fed is done raising rates and think they have done it right."

Some traders recalled the dance the market performed in March 1999, when the Dow industrials approached 10000 for the first time. It took several days of backing and filling to clear the barrier, as some investors used the landmark number as a reason to take some profits and consider how much higher the market could go. During the following years, the Dow industrials bounced up and down around 10000, something that many are hoping wouldn't be the case with this milestone.

Aside from the Dow industrials, which were the focus of speculation on the part of short-term traders, major indexes were little changed. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index inched up 0.02%, or 0.25 point, to 1336.59, ahead 7.1% this year and up 5.2% for the quarter.

The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.09%, or 2.05 points, to 2263.39. It is up 4.2% for the quarter, which has pulled it back into the plus column for the year, with a gain of 2.6% for 2006.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 1.22%, or 2.65 points, to 219.87.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.75 billion shares, as 2,066 stocks rose and 1,285 fell.

Bond prices declined. The 10-year Treasury note fell 4/32, or $1.25 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.602%. The 30-year bond was down 12/32 to yield 4.743%.

DOJ_NMG_0070741

The dollar was mixed. Late in New York, it traded at 117.50 yen, up from 117.15, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2703 from $1.2690.

Write to E.S. Browning at jim.browning@wsj.com1

URL for this article:

http://online.wsj.com/article/SB115940927092976275.html

Hyperlinks in this Article:

(1) mailto:jim.browning@wsj.com

Copyright 2006 Dow Jones & Company, Inc. All Rights Reserved

This copy is for your personal, non-commercial use only. Distribution and use of this material are governed by our Subscriber Agreement and by copyright law. For non-personal use or to order multiple copies, please contact Dow Jones Reprints at 1-800-843-0008 or visit www.djreprints.com.

Orders For Big-ticket Items Fall, Indicating Cooling Economy (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — More evidence of a slowing economy came Wednesday as the government said orders for costly manufactured goods fell in August while sales of new homes rose, but remained at a subdued level.

New orders for durable goods, such as cars, computers and machinery intended to last three years or longer, fell 0.5% in August after adjusting for seasonal fluctuations, the Commerce Department said. That followed a 2.7% plunge in July and marked the first back-to-back monthly drops in the often volatile data since spring 2004.

Also in August, sales of new homes rose 4.1% at a seasonally adjusted annual rate after falling in the prior three months, Commerce said. But the sales data for July were revised lower, tempering enthusiasm. Despite the increase, sales of new homes last month were down more than 17% from August 2005.

The report followed data Tuesday that showed a drop in both sales and prices of previously owned homes, a much bigger segment of the housing market.

“The economy has cooled off and we're heading for a sustained slowdown,” A.G. Edwards chief economist Gary Thayer says. “But we don't expect that things are going to get a lot worse.”

Investors shrugged off the data. After flirting with the record earlier in the day, the Dow Jones industrial average finished up 19.85 points at 11,689.24.

Thayer noted there were several reasons to be confident the economy is slowing, not falling off a cliff. Notably, energy prices have recently dropped sharply from record levels, giving businesses and consumers more money to spend on other things. Despite rising Wednesday, oil prices are down nearly 20% from the record, not adjusted for inflation, hit during the summer.

The decline in oil prices has pushed down gasoline costs. The U.S. average retail price for a gallon of unleaded was $2.356 Wednesday, according to motor club AAA. That was down more than a penny from Tuesday and nearly 50 cents lower than a month ago.

The price of natural gas trading for October delivery, meanwhile, has dropped sharply to the lowest level since late 2002 in response to high inventory levels. Lower prices could help the millions of U.S. households that use natural gas to heat their homes.

Also providing a boost to consumers are lower mortgage rates. The U.S. average rate on a 30-year fixed mortgage was 6.18% last week, down from 6.36% in the prior week and the lowest in seven months, the Mortgage Bankers Association said Wednesday.

Lower rates are encouraging homeowners to refinance their mortgages. The MBA said the percentage of mortgage activity that was related to refinancing last week was the highest in a year.

Durable-Goods Orders Fall But New-Home Sales Rise; A Hard Or Soft Landing? (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena Morales

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

The latest readings on business investment and housing muddied the economic picture: Orders for big-ticket goods fell unexpectedly in August as new-home sales rose unexpectedly.

The Commerce Department reported that durable-goods orders declined 0.5% in August to a seasonally adjusted $209.75 billion, following a revised 2.7% decline in July. That marked the first back-to-back decline since April and May 2004. Orders for non-defense capital goods excluding aircraft -- a barometer of business equipment spending -- fell 0.3% in August, following a 0.9% gain the two preceding months.

The durable-goods report was "far more bearish than anticipated," said Jason Schenker, an economist at Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, N.C. "This raises concerns about how much economic growth is poised to slow. ... We'll need more data to see if the economy is coming in for a hard or soft landing."

The durable-goods report showed that demand fell for machinery, computers and electronics, primary metals and commercial aircraft, although motor-vehicle orders were up. Durable goods are items intended to last three years or more, such as cars and computers. While durable-goods orders can be volatile, economists closely monitor them because they are considered an indicator of future production activity.

Consensus Among Analysts

Many economists are counting on business investment to help offset the effect of a cooling economy and housing market, and softer consumer spending. The consensus among analysts is that second-half economic growth will slow to below 3%, at a seasonally adjusted annual rate, following a 2.9% advance in the second quarter and a 5.6% gain in the first quarter.

Meanwhile, the Census Bureau reported that sales of new homes rose 4.1% in August from a month earlier, to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.050 million. The unexpected jump ran counter to other recent data depicting slowing sales. But analysts cautioned not to focus too much on a one-month statistic. Indeed, compared with August a year ago, new-home sales were down 17.4%. And earlier this week, the National Association of Realtors said existing-home sales in August fell for the fifth consecutive month, while the national median price fell, year over year, for the first time in 11 years.

"It's hard to get overly excited about an increase like this," said David Seiders, chief economist at the National Association of Home Builders. "The weight of evidence shows that the housing market was trending downward in August."

The NAR sales data are based on closings of previously owned homes. In contrast, Mr. Seiders said, the new-home sales data are based on a relatively small sample of sales contracts or deposits and fail to capture cancellations on contracts, which home builders say have been surging in recent months.

Frequent Revisions

New-home sales are frequently revised. (On average, the Census Bureau says preliminary estimates are revised by about 3%.) July sales were revised yesterday to 1.009 million from a preliminary estimate of 1.072 million.

In fact, some builders say conditions got worse in August, not better. On Tuesday, Stuart Miller, the chief executive of Lennar Corp, one of the nation's largest home builders, said in a conference call, "August might have been the weakest month yet." The Miami builder said that its cancellation rate was running at more than 30% and that it was using incentives to drive sales. Lennar cut its earnings guidance for the fourth quarter.

Similarly, the National Association of Home Builders/Wells Fargo Housing Market Index declined in August and September, reaching the lowest reading since February 1991.

Economists say new-home sales may have gotten a slight bounce last month as mortgage rates eased and builders offered more incentives to entice buyers. The median price of a new home was $237,000 in August, compared with the median price of $240,100 in August 2005. The average price of a new home was $304,400 in August, compared with the average price of $295,000 in August 2005.

However, analysts noted yesterday that durable goods orders are volatile and can offer imprecise monthly readings. Moreover, some economists said durable goods orders remain healthy on a year-over-year basis: In the eight months through August, orders were 8.5% higher than the same period a year ago, on an unadjusted basis, and business equipment spending is up nearly 10% from a year ago.

Report Shows Home Sales Rising, But Skeptics Abound (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

A report yesterday showing that sales of new homes rose for the first time since March was — at first glance — welcome news for homebuilders.

But economists warned that underneath the headline numbers, signs of a weakening housing market were more prevalent than ever.

The Commerce Department reported yesterday that new-home sales in August rose to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.05 million, 4.1 percent higher than in July.

That helped push down the inventory of unsold new homes 5.7 percent, to a 6.6-month supply, meaning that at the current selling rate, it would take 6.6 months to sell all the new homes currently on the market.

DOJ_NMG_0070743

But sales figures for July were revised to show that fewer homes were sold than the government first reported. As a result, the August sales data probably exaggerates the resiliency of the market.

Stuart Hoffman, chief economist with PNC Financial, called the August increase a "dead-cat bounce."

The August numbers could also be inflated. Because new-home sales are recorded when the contract is signed, not when the deal is closed, the data does not factor in cancellations. Builders have said recently that cancellation rates are running as high as 30 percent, suggesting that the Commerce Department's numbers make the housing market appear healthier than it actually is.

Yesterday's report showed that builders are indeed having more and more difficulty selling homes. The median price of a new home fell to $237,000, down 1.3 percent from August 2005.

Prices for previously owned homes are also falling. This week, the National Association of Realtors reported that for the first time in 11 years, the median price of a previously owned home fell from the price a year earlier.

In August, prices slipped to $225,000, down 1.7 percent compared with August 2005. Sales of previously owned homes, which make up about 85 percent of all home sales annually, fell for the fifth consecutive month.

Few experts express confidence that these trends will reverse anytime soon.

"It certainly is possible that for a variety of reasons you could have a one-month upturn, but I doubt that will reverse the trend that seems to be occurring," said Kenneth Simonson, chief economist for the Associated General Contractors of America.

Mr. Simonson noted the possibility that the August sales numbers could be revised downward, just as the July numbers were. "I think we could still wind up seeing that this month is a continuation of the downturn."

Although it is unwelcome news for anyone trying to sell a home, the slowdown in the housing market is just what policy makers at the Federal Reserve have been looking for.

As inflation quickened over the last several months, members of the Fed, led by the chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, have said that a slowing economy, led by cooling in the housing market, would be essential to holding prices down. So far, the Fed's economic forecast has been realized, with inflation slowing and home sales and prices falling.

There was further evidence yesterday that the economy was slowing, as the Commerce Department reported an unexpected drop in orders for durable goods, a wide-ranging category that includes household appliances and factory machinery. The orders, a closely watched barometer of business investment, fell for the second consecutive month, dropping 0.5 percent, to $209.7 billion. It was first back-to-back decrease in more than two years.

Economists disagree on whether the decline in August suggests a looming slowdown in business investment.

"Today's report points to a slowing in the manufacturing sector," wrote Peter E. Kretzmer, senior economist with Bank of America. "Capital spending momentum remains solid but nonexceptional."

Still, others said the disappointing numbers were a result of the pessimistic business climate in the second half of the summer, fed by high energy prices and worries over inflation.

"There has been a significant improvement in the overall investment climate in the past several weeks," wrote Brian Bethune, an economist with Global Insight. "Steep declines in gasoline and diesel fuel prices should relieve recent downward pressure on margins, and provide a second wind to the profitability cycle. This should provide a lift to business confidence."

Hispanic Unemployment Down, Study Finds (WP)

By Karin Brulliard

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Unemployment among Hispanics fell sharply this year, and their wages rose after a two-year decline, according to a national study released yesterday.

Bolstered by immigration, the Hispanic labor force is growing rapidly, and those workers are having little trouble finding jobs -- especially in construction, said the report by the Pew Hispanic Center.

"In terms of employment, there are strong gains for Hispanics," said Rakesh Kochhar, the center's associate director for research and author of the report.

Latinos, who represent 13 percent of the U.S. labor force, accounted for 40 percent of all new workers in the year ending June 30, the report said. Eighty percent of jobs filled by Hispanics went to immigrants, who make up the biggest share of the Latino labor force.

The findings come as Congress debates proposals for immigration laws, some addressing the immigrant workforce and the hiring of illegal immigrants, and immigration authorities step up work site arrests and border security.

Kochhar said the number of immigrant workers and the market for them seem to be "stronger than what we may do at the borders."

DOJ_NMG_0070744

Although the report did not examine labor trends for illegal immigrants, it noted that previous studies have found that many new Latino immigrants are in the country illegally.

The Latino labor force is growing about three times the rate for all workers, the report found. Hispanic unemployment fell this spring to 4.9 percent from 5.8 percent in the same period last year. Median weekly wages for Latinos rose from $423 in 2005 to $431 in 2006 -- still lower than those of any other ethnic group.

This decade's construction boom drove the Latino job growth, particularly for the foreign-born, the report said. Half the new jobs for Latinos in the past year were in construction, and nearly all those jobs were generated in the South and the West, according to the report, which did not examine trends at the state or city level.

Since 2003, nearly 90 percent of Latinos workers hired in construction have been immigrants, the report found.

That came as no surprise to Hugo Carballo, business manager for Laborers International Union Local 11, which organizes construction workers in Northern Virginia.

"You just go through any job. That's all you see right now. A majority of them are Latino who are working on construction," Carballo said. "It might be that in a couple of years it'll be somebody else, but right now we are the ones."

Yet the labor landscape was not all rosy for Latinos. Although they landed more jobs, wages dropped for foreign-born Hispanic workers. Hispanic immigrants' median weekly wages declined from $400 to $389.

That is probably because as more immigrants have arrived, competition for the jobs they perform has stiffened, Kochhar said.

"High growth in employment may have come at the price of wages," Kochhar said.

The report also noted that the nation's construction industry appears to be slowing. That is especially true in places such as the Washington region, which were booming a year ago but are now "screeching to a halt," said Mark Zandi, an analyst with Moody's Economy.com.

Growth in commercial construction is softening the blow for workers, Zandi said, but will probably not make up for all the jobs lost as home building cools.

Carballo said he has seen that play out locally.

"On the residential part, like houses and condominiums, that's where I see that it's the most people getting laid off," Carballo said. "On [commercial] buildings, we are at least pretty good right now. Buildings are going up everywhere."

The report, based on recent data from the U.S. Census Bureau and the Labor Department, found that unemployment dropped over the fiscal year from 4 percent to 3.5 percent for Asians, from 4.1 percent to 3.9 percent for non-Hispanic whites and from 9.9 percent to 9 percent for blacks.

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

With 'Dragon Fire,' Can Cohen Slay Hollywood?

Former defense secretary Bill Cohen is an expert on Washington, but he's a rookie when it comes to Hollywood. The author of "Dragon Fire" knows all the power players of Capitol Hill, the White House and Pentagon, but missed the perfect chance to team up with megabucks producer Jerry Bruckheimer.

Shortly after he left the Clinton administration in 2001, Cohen and his wife, Janet Langhart , wrote a proposal for a television series set in the Pentagon-- think "West Wing" goes to Arlington. They called it "E-Ring," a DOD insider term for the Pentagon's outer offices, and sent it to their agent. No bites. Two years ago, they flew to L.A. and pitched it to several studios, while Bruckheimer ("Top Gun," "The Amazing Race," "CSI") shopped a similar Pentagon-based show. Cohen's proposal went nowhere; Bruckheimer's turned up on NBC's 2005 schedule with a familiar name: "E-Ring." Cohen thinks someone at NBC nabbed his title: "It's hard to protect an idea."

Bruckheimer's rep said his version was inspired by a visit to the Pentagon in 2004, and wasn't aware of Cohen's proposal until after the show aired. "Had he known about Bill's project, he would have gone with [it]," said spokesman Paul Bloch. (Probably should have: "E-Ring" was canceled after one season.) Ah, the what-ifs . . .

Cohen has higher hopes for "Dragon Fire." His 10th book is a geopolitical thriller (fictional defense secretary dies in anthrax attack, former POW modeled after John McCain hunts the bad guys) full of Inside-the-Beltway color. "It's the old axiom: You write what you know," says Cohen. "I don't have a lot of time for research."

Next up: in February, "Love in Black and White," a memoir authored with his wife about their interracial marriage. In the meanwhile, Cohen is in serious talks with producer Thomas Schuhly for a movie version of "Dragon Fire." And yes -- he's getting smarter about show business: "I've learned about copyrights," he said with a chuckle.Red and Blue and Green All Over

DOJ_NMG_0070745

We knew this would happen sooner or later -- Tuesday night, secluded Whitehaven Street in Northwest was clogged by dueling fundraisers. President Bush and Karl Rove mingled with donors at the home of White House social secretary Lea Berman and husband Wayne, raising $1.5 million for the GOP in Iowa, Arkansas and Wisconsin. Two doors down, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton presided over a low-key event for about 50 $2,000 donors to her senatorial reelection bid. Limo lock!HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

Â· Mya getting her hair flat-ironed at Bang Salon on U Street yesterday between a shopping trip and a workout. The D.C.-born singer-actress, who was in town visiting friends, tipped $30 on a $30 treatment.

Â· Bruce Willis , wearing baseball cap and jeans in downtown Baltimore, between takes while filming "Live Free or Die Hard." Huge blocks of Charm City are cordoned off for shooting these days. The Sun reported yesterday the star was spotted at the "business casual" Morton's wearing jeans and T-shirt.SURREAL ESTATE

Seller: Jim Dunning

Asking price: $1.1 million

Details: For 15 years, this four-bedroom brick Colonial in Alexandria's trendy Del Ray neighborhood was the home of prominent real estate agent Nancy Dunning and her husband, the city's longtime elected sheriff. In December 2003, she was found shot to death in their home, in what remains one of Alexandria's most notorious unsolved murders. Jim Dunning, who ended the last of his five terms in office last year, still lives in the house and put it on the market early this month.THIS JUST IN . . .

Two different men are claiming to be the father of Anna Nicole Smith 's newborn daughter. Howard K. Stern , a lawyer for the former Playboy model, told CNN's Larry King Tuesday that the baby is his -- which prompted photographer Larry Birkhead , who has made similar claims, to demand a DNA test yesterday, according to Us magazine.

Also yesterday, People reported that Smith's 20-year-old son, Daniel , who was found dead by her bedside in a Bahamas hospital three days after his sister's birth, was killed by a lethal combination of methadone and the antidepressants Lexapro and Zoloft. The magazine cited a pathologist hired by Smith.

John Danforth (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, September 28, 2006

Posted September 28, 2006 - http://www.csmonitor.com/2006/0928/p25s01-usmb.html John Danforth By David Cook

John Danforth looks like a quintessential Republican insider but he is calling for a radical change in how his party operates.

During his appearance at Wednesday's Monitor-sponsored breakfast, the tall, silver-haired, deep-voiced, impeccably tailored Danforth looked and sounded like Hollywood's vision of a senator.

He comes with an impressive resume. Danforth's career includes two terms as Missouri's attorney general, three terms in the US Senate, heading the federal investigation into the Waco siege in 1999, serving as President Bush's special envoy to Sudan, and being named US ambassador to the UN. An ordained Episcopal priest, Danforth presided with eloquence and grace over memorial services for Katherine Graham, Ronald Reagan, and John Chafee.

But beneath the polished and calm exterior is a man upset with his party. Danforth is traveling the country promoting his new book, "Faith and Politics: How the Moral Values Debate Divides America and How to Move Forward Together." The book argues that Republicans have transformed their party into a political arm of conservative Christians.

"The name of the game has been not to compete for the center of American politics but to appeal to the base of each party and to attempt to energize the base," Danforth told reporters over breakfast. "For the Republican party, the base of our party now is the Christian conservatives.... The Republican party has done everything it can to appeal to that part of the base ... I think this is bad for the country and ultimately it is going to be bad for the Republican party because I think when the American people reflect on this they do not want a sectarian political party in this country. So what I am trying to do is encourage them to reflect on it."

Would his call for Christians to stress reconciliation and humility lead to a squishy version of Christianity with hard demands and radical stands removed? Danforth says it wouldn't.

"I think [Christianity] is basically reconciling. I don't think there is anything squishy about following the admonition of St. Paul to be ministers of reconciliation," he said. "I don't think there is anything squishy about believing in a God who is bigger than our political agendas and who is the judge of our political agendas.... What is weak is the notion that our faith is the servant of our politics."

Danforth, a graduate of Princeton, and both Yale's law and divinity schools, says he will not leave the party despite his unhappiness with its current course. "I am a Republican," he said. "I am a well-established Republican. I am not going to give up on my party. I just want it to get back to its moorings ... I just want them to disengage themselves from the Christian right."

DOJ_NMG_0070746

A key issue for Christian conservatives recently was the Marriage Protection Amendment to the Constitution, which the Senate considered and rejected earlier this year. It would have defined marriage as the union between a man and a woman.

"The gay marriage issue is an issue that on its merits has no real substance," Danforth said. "That is an issue that is brought forward simply in order to make people angry.... If it is a political issue, it is an issue at the state legislative level. It is clearly not a constitutional issue. The constitution is about the structure of government and the relationship between government and the American people. The constitution is not about addressing social issues. We tried that with prohibition. That lasted 13 years. This is not a constitutional issue and to try to raise this as a constitutional issue is to be simply pandering and gay bashing."

With President Bush now in the final two years of his term, Danforth offered some observations on what direction the party should take next. "I would like to see our party debate whether or not we are a religious party ... I would like you in the media to raise that," he said. "Do we attempt to energize a base or reconstitute a center in American politics? Is there any possibility of creating a center on a bipartisan basis where we can help to resolve real issues?... The real questions do not concern whether there are crèches on public premises or whether gays in Massachusetts get married.... I would like to have a more centrist party and I would like to have a party that is less interested in making its election points than in trying to improve our way of dealing with very serious questions."

Danforth Warns Of Christian Right But Says Tide Will Turn (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

CHICAGO. Sept. 27 -- The potency of the Christian right in the Republican Party is limited, former senator John C. Danforth of Missouri is telling audiences this month. A lifelong Republican moderate disturbed by his party's direction, he contends that the political center has a future.

Describing himself as a "a Republican for the old reasons," Danforth, 70, is promoting a new book that describes religion as a divisive force in the United States today and accuses the religious right and its political supporters of creating a sectarian party.

The GOP leadership habitually strives to please its base at the expense of meaningful compromise, he maintains, proving to be neither humble Christians nor effective politicians. His reasoning holds that social conservatives cannot prevail because a majority of Americans do not share their views or appreciate their style.

"I'm trying to shed light on it," Danforth told a gathering of more than 100 people at Chicago's Union League Club on Tuesday, ". . . but I'm really encouraging people to get mad, to speak out on this and express themselves. That's when politics will change."

Danforth is an ordained Episcopal priest and onetime Bush administration ambassador to the United Nations. He is probably best known for ushering Clarence Thomas through the grueling nomination process to become a Supreme Court justice. Danforth served in the Senate when Republicans were outnumbered and outmaneuvered by Democrats, a point noted dismissively by opponents who dispute his argument.

Richard Land, a prominent conservative at the Southern Baptist Convention, said in an interview earlier this year that Danforth is "what was wrong with the Republican Party and why they were a minority party."

Danforth is getting some radio and television airtime since the Sept. 19 release of "Faith and Politics: How the 'Moral Values' Debate Divides America and How to Move Forward Together." He has spoken to audiences in Texas and New York and gave a lecture Wednesday night at the Washington National Cathedral, where he had presided over the funerals of former president Ronald Reagan in 2004 and longtime Washington Post publisher Katharine Graham three years earlier.

His book emerged by design in a political season in which the organizing strength of conservative Christians is expected to be tested by motivated Democrats and moderates dismayed by the country's direction.

This year, there have also been revealing speeches about personal faith and politics by Democratic politicians, notably Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.), Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) and Robert P. Casey Jr., who is seeking to unseat religious conservative Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.).

"The problem with many conservative Christians is that they claim that God's truth is knowable, that they know it, and that they are able to reduce it to legislative form," Danforth writes. "The popular question, 'What would Jesus do?' can be difficult enough to contemplate with respect to everyday interpersonal relations. It is mind boggling when applied to the complex world of politics."

Although an opponent of abortion, Danforth has become an activist for a Missouri ballot initiative that would explicitly legalize embryonic stem cell research, an issue adopted increasingly by Democrats and some Republicans to show their differences with the Christian right.

DOJ_NMG_0070747

He also favors government recognition of "committed same-sex partnerships." He believes the proposed constitutional amendment to outlaw same-sex marriage amounts to gay-bashing.

Criticizing Republicans and Democrats at extreme ends of the political spectrum, Danforth told his Chicago audience that "most people don't want it to be this way." In allowing it to happen, he said, "the rest of us have been too silent."

Thomas has a place in Danforth's book. A questioner asked if he has changed his view of one of the court's staunchest conservatives.

Danforth, who has said he never questioned Thomas about serious allegations of sexual harassment, replied: "I have exactly the same view of Clarence Thomas that I have had for 30-some years. . . . I know him, and I love him as a human being. I stood by him, and I am proud of that."

Big Openings For Democrats (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, September 28, 2006

While predictions of a Democratic wave on Nov. 7 may be overblown, Republicans are clearly on the defensive in three open seats that could prove key to their ability to retain the House majority in the 110th Congress.

Until recently, Republican-held seats in Arizona, Colorado and Iowa were seen as major battlegrounds. But now they are in serious jeopardy of going Democratic, with the 7th district in Colorado and the 1st district in Iowa, in particular, signifying the decline of the GOP brand name in the eyes of voters this cycle.

"I think districts like that are still winnable [for Republicans]. But they are definitely a bigger challenge in this environment," said GOP strategist Dave Gilliard, who steered now-Rep. Brian Bilbray (R) to a close win in a California special election earlier this year in a tough atmosphere for Republicans. "You have to latch onto local issues and catch the imagination of voters separate from the party label."

Democrats are clearly benefiting from the decision by the GOP incumbents who hold these seats to retire from Congress. But it is telling that the Republicans running in their stead find themselves down significantly in public opinion polls to their Democratic opponents.

In the Republican-leaning, southern Arizona 8th district, Rep. Jim Kolbe (R) has been re-elected by comfortable margins 11 terms running. Yet former state Sen. Gabrielle Giffords (D) seems poised to easily dispose of former state Rep. Randy Graf (R).

The eastern Iowa 1st district and Denver-area 7th district of Colorado have repeatedly voted Democrat for president while choosing Republicans to represent them in the House. In Iowa's 1st, voters chose Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) over President Bush by 7 points in 2004, despite their long-standing preference for Rep. Jim Nussle (R), who was elected in 1990.

To replace Nussle, however, voters appear to be favoring a Democrat, trial attorney Bruce Braley. He led wealthy businessman Mike Whalen (R) by 7 points in the latest independent poll.

Colorado's 7th is more narrowly Democratic, giving Kerry a 3-point edge over Bush in 2004. But former state Sen. Ed Perlmutter's (D) early and healthy lead over former state official Rick O'Donnell (R) — despite a bruising Democratic primary — indicates the GOP isn't getting the benefit of the doubt from voters this year, as opposed to the previous two cycles, when Rep. Bob Beauprez (R) won competitive races.

Both Nussle and Beauprez are running for governor. Kolbe has not announced his future plans.

K.C. Jones, spokeswoman for the O'Donnell campaign, acknowledged that a national political environment that is difficult for Republicans has made for a tougher road for the former chairman of the Colorado Higher Education Commission. But as a veteran of Beauprez's 2002 campaign, Jones stressed that she always figured on a come-from-behind race and is pleased with O'Donnell's progress thus far.

"Unaffiliated voters in this district are turned off by both parties. Does that affect us right now because Republicans are in control of the White House and Congress? Yes," Jones conceded.

Braley spokesman Jeff Giertz said a favorable national political environment is making the Democrat's effort easier than a similar push might have been in 2002 or 2004, though he added that Braley's policies would be highly appealing to the electorate regardless of the political atmosphere.

Presidential approval ratings hovering in the low 30s in the 1st district and a motivated Democratic base hungry for change are distinct advantages Braley has in his contest with Whalen, who could otherwise benefit from the district's socially conservative sensibilities.

"Certainly the winds in this district are at our backs," Giertz said. "Voters are unhappy with the policies of the Bush administration ... Being that there's a Democratic registration advantage here, it energizes that advantage even more."

DOJ_NMG_0070748

Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, sought to downplay the difficulties Republicans face in Arizona, Colorado and Iowa, though he appeared to acknowledge in his comments the GOP is in trouble in each.

"They're difficult seats because they're open. It's always harder to keep an open seat than one with an incumbent," Forti said. "Colorado 7 and Iowa 1 are Democrat-leaning, so we've been swimming upstream from the get-go. But both are winnable."

Forti said Arizona's 8th is going to be a tough battle — the NRCC's preferred candidate lost in the GOP primary — but cautioned not to count out Graf, calling him a "true fighter."

The Tucson-area 8th district delivered 53 percent of its vote for Bush in 2004, and Republicans have an edge in registered voters there of approximately 20,000. But Graf has emerged as a heavy underdog to Giffords, though this appears to have little to do with national political trends and more to do with how the two candidates are viewed by voters — and party leaders.

Illegal immigration is a top issue in the Arizona race, and Graf is the candidate who has focused the most on securing the border with Mexico. But two candidates with more moderate views on the issue — the second and third place finishers — garnered more votes collectively in the primary than Graf, who challenged Kolbe in 2004 and is seen as a strident conservative regardless of whether that label is deserved.

Giffords may not be as moderate of a Democrat as she lets on. But early polling on this race suggests that 8th district voters see her as the political heir to the moderately Republican Kolbe — at least when the choice is between her and Graf. The NRCC apparently agreed, as it spent money in the Republican primary touting the campaign of Kolbe endorsee and former state Rep. Steve Huffman (R).

Earl de Berge, an independent pollster based in Phoenix, said Graf is being hurt by the perception — rightly or wrongly — that he is a hardliner, noting that he's been getting calls from reporters in recent days asking about rumors that allege connections between the former state Representative and racist groups.

"Those are serious, and can have a hard impact on a candidate right away," de Berge said, explaining that Graf was the Democrats' choice because "they viewed him as an extremist candidate who would be easier to beat in a moderate swing district."

A Forfeited Battleground District (WP)

By Chris Cillizza And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

CALDWELL, Ohio -- Four months ago, state Sen. Charlie Wilson (D) was teetering on the edge of defeat in his campaign for Ohio's open 6th District. Today he is strolling toward Nov. 7, when, if current trends continue, he will be elected to Congress.

No television ads for Wilson or his Republican opponent, state Rep. Chuck Blasdel, are airing. For the moment, the national party organizations, which swarm into the most competitive races, are nowhere to be found.

And Wilson's schedule is not exactly full. His only public event so far this week was a dinner for the Noble County Democratic Party on Tuesday night here in rural southeastern Ohio.

"We don't hear anything" from national Republicans, Wilson said as he relaxed amid the red-white-and-blue bunting that decorated the tables at the Noble County Community Center. "We are very happy they are looking elsewhere."

This is a race the 2006 midterm elections forgot. The seat in the pastures and Appalachian foothills of eastern Ohio has been held for a decade by Rep. Ted Strickland, who this year is the Democrats' nominee for governor. His departure once tantalized Republicans, who regarded this seat -- carried narrowly by President Bush in 2004 -- as their most promising chance to take a congressional seat from the Democratic column.

Some promise. Blasdel's campaign never gained much traction after Wilson, considered the strongest of three contenders, won the Democratic primary in May.

Like any game, politics tends to be more fun on offense than defense. Republicans are not having much fun this election season.

While Democrats have targets around the country where they could gain a seat, Republicans have the barest handful.

A combination of an adverse national environment and the need to devote their resources to defending at-risk GOP incumbents gives the national party few opportunities to invest heavily in challengers, such as Blasdel, who face an uphill fight.

Ask Republicans where they see takeover opportunities this fall and they will rattle off seats such as Georgia's 8th District -- held by Rep. Jim Marshall -- Iowa's 3rd or even the open at-large seat in strongly Democratic Vermont. But none of those races look particularly dire for Democrats at the moment, as many Republican strategists privately acknowledge.

Republicans' receding chances in the Ohio 6th provide a microcosm of this trend.

DOJ_NMG_0070749

For much of 2005, Blasdel, the second-ranking Republican in the Ohio House, was the golden boy of GOP recruitment efforts. National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.) regularly singled out him as a star in the making and the 6th District as a pickup opportunity.

Republicans' optimism only increased after Wilson did not collect the necessary signatures to qualify for the primary ballot, necessitating a write-in candidacy. Sensing opportunity, the Republican Congressional Committee poured hundreds of thousands of dollars into the district in hopes of killing Wilson's candidacy. Television ads accused Wilson of supporting the dumping of raw sewage in the Ohio River, among other not-so-nice allegations.

The strategy backfired. Wilson, who knocked on 40,000 doors and sent out 4,000 personal letters during the primary race, rolled up 66 percent of the vote, winning 4,500 votes more than the four Republican candidates combined.

"To do that is unheard of," said Noble County Democratic Party Chairman Larry Woodford. Republicans "saw the writing on the wall."

It certainly looks that way. After Wilson's win, Blasdel went from hot to "who?" in the eyes of many Republicans.

The 6th District "on paper does look like it should be competitive," Wilson said. Certainly, judging by the pickup trucks in the parking lot and camouflage on the attendees at the Noble County gathering, this is not a typical Democratic stronghold.

Most Democrats in this part of the world are conservative on social issues such as abortion and guns, and tend to identify more with Larry the Cable Guy than with Larry David. "Southeastern Ohio is Appalachia," said Woodford. "A lot of people don't want to say that, but it is."

Wilson, like Strickland, has so far been able to bridge that cultural divide between local and national Democrats. Instead, he is emphasizing his conservative credentials and past service for the area.

A poll conducted for his campaign last month shows that the strategy has been effective, as Wilson led Blasdel 49 percent to 25 percent. Blasdel campaign manager Ryan Stenger conceded that the Democrat is ahead at the moment but added that his candidate is seeing monthly improvements in private polling. "Things are definitely getting better," Stenger said. "We definitely have our challenges ahead of us."

Still, the Republican Congressional Committee has not promised an end-of-the-campaign advertising blitz that earlier this year seemed a given. Stenger argued that once the national party is satisfied with where its incumbents stand, the money will begin to flow to offensive opportunities in open seats.

In the meantime, Blasdel plans to capitalize on lower gas prices -- they have dropped below $2 in some parts of the district -- and the stock market, which is nearing a new high. "The other side will be caught napping on this one," promised Stenger.

Democrats Decide They Don't Need 'Contract' To Win (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, September 28, 2006

The 12th anniversary of the Republicans' 1994 "Contract with America" came and went on Wednesday without a 2006 Democratic counterpart. And there won't be one.

Instead, Democratic House and Senate leaders held yet another press conference to denounce the Republican Congress' "rubberstamping the Bush administration's misguided agenda."

Despite repeated urging from various quarters, including from former President Bill Clinton, that the party needs to make clear what it stands for and not just against, Democrats contend that off-year elections are referenda on the party in power and that a Democratic alternative agenda would only provide targets for the GOP to attack.

Just to underscore the point, the Senate Democratic leadership's "war room" sent out an e-mail Monday declaring that "much hype surrounds the 1994 Contract with America. The Contract is often incorrectly credited with playing a large role in the Republican victory in the mid-term elections. Evidence shows that this was not, in fact, the case: Candidates did not campaign on the Contract with America, and most Americans were unfamiliar with the document's existence."

Still, it's a fact that then-House Minority Leader Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) gathered 337 GOP Members and candidates on the West Front of the Capitol on Sept. 27, 1994, and issued a 10-plank platform that included welfare reform, a balanced-budget constitutional amendment, tort reform, Defense budget increases, middle-class tax cuts and term limits for Members of Congress.

It's undoubtedly true that the GOP won the election largely because of disgust with Democratic management — the failure of Clinton's health care reform plan and Congressional scandals — but the contract did provide a legislative roadmap for the GOP once it won a 52-seat victory and had to help govern the country.

This year, Democrats have issued a two-page positive agenda, "New Direction for America," but there's been no Capitol steps rally, and the document has all the earmarks of being just a handout designed to be an answer to the question, "But what do Democrats stand for?"

DOJ_NMG_0070750

It calls for "beginning the phased re-deployment of U.S. forces from Iraq in 2006," doubling U.S. special forces "to destroy Osama Bin Laden and terrorist networks like Al Qaeda" and upgrading homeland security.

It pledges to block a Congressional pay raise until the nation's minimum wage is raised, to make college tuition tax-deductible, to foster energy independence, to force Medicare to negotiate lower drug prices and to "enact real pension reform to protect employees' financial security from CEO corruption and mismanagement."

The document says nothing about economic policy, although Rep. Charlie Rangel (D-N.Y.), who's in line to be chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee if the Democrats take over, said he has not ruled out the possibility of eliminating President Bush's tax cuts, which included some cuts for middle-class Americans as well as vastly more for the rich.

Separately, Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) has co-written a 200-page book, "The Plan," with a former Clinton White House colleague, Bruce Reed, which does lay out a positive agenda; although it, too, is loaded with anti-Bush invective and is short on bipartisan outreach.

The book's "big ideas for America" include "universal citizen service" that calls for all Americans between 18 and 25 to spend three months learning civil defense procedures, "universal child health care" coverage and "universal retirement savings" that requires all employers to offer 401(k) plans to their workers.

The book also advances Emanuel's tax reform plan, introduced with Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), that calls for reducing the number of tax brackets from six to three, guaranteeing that all families with incomes under $100,000 pay only a 10 percent rate and taxing capital gains and dividends at the earner's income tax rate — an increase from 15 percent to, presumably, 35 percent for high-bracket earners.

Emanuel and Wyden also want to eliminate the Alternative Minimum Tax, institute a corporate flat-tax rate of 35 percent and create a base closing-style commission to eliminate corporate tax loopholes. The total package, Emanuel says, could reduce the budget deficit by $100 billion over 10 years.

Emanuel's book also calls for massive research efforts and tax credits for the purchase of hybrid cars to cut gasoline consumption in half over 10 years and reduce global warming. And it calls for tax credits to make college and/or advanced skills training affordable for all.

The book gives Bush practically no credit for any worthwhile advance, including his No Child Left Behind school reforms, but it does endorse, rather courageously, pay-for-performance for teachers as well as an extended school year.

You get little sense from the book that if Democrats did win control of the House or Senate, their margins would be so narrow they'd have to get GOP support to pass anything. Emanuel told me in an interview, "I believe in bipartisanship, but his administration makes it impossible. They reject all our ideas."

Emanuel is making no public predictions about the outcome in November, just saying, "I'd rather be in our situation than theirs," and disputing GOP claims that they will have a money and get-out-the-vote advantage.

Emanuel clearly thinks his party needs a positive message this year — otherwise he would not have written the book — but he told me that 2006 is still shaping up to be a "normal" off-year "referendum" election.

The exceptions were 1998, when the GOP was set to impeach Clinton and Democrats gained five seats, and the 2002 post-terrorism election, when the GOP picked up eight seats.

The average midterm loss for the party controlling the White House from 1974 through 1994 is nearly 26 seats. Eliminating the GOP's post-Watergate 49-seat drubbing, the average is 21. Factoring in the post-2000 Census gerrymandering of seats, Democrats would seem to be just on the edge of the 15 seats they need to take the House.

A positive message of purpose — saying where they'd lead instead of just how much trouble they'd inflict on Bush — could push them over the top. Maybe Democrats don't need a Contract, but they could use a plan.

Warning: Races May Not Be As Close As They Appear (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, September 28, 2006

Democratic pollsters are pushing lots of polls that show second- and third-tier candidates performing surprisingly well. If most of these challengers win, the Democrats will gain 30 or 40 House seats.

Obviously, that's unlikely. Extremely unlikely.

So what are we all supposed to make of Democratic polling memos asserting that Paul Hodes (New Hampshire's 2nd), John Hall (New York's 19th), Jason Altmire (Pennsylvania's 4th), Victoria Wulsin (Ohio's 2nd), Charlie Brown (California's 4th), Nancy Skinner (Michigan's 9th) and Dan Maffei (New York's 25th) are breathing down the necks of incumbent Republicans?

Some of these numbers stem from the fact that the Democratic base has solidified early on and Democratic candidates are getting the vote that normally comes to them only in October. The folks over at Public Opinion Strategies, I believe, coined the term "premature partisan polarization" to refer to the current tendency of voters to pick their party's Congressional candidates earlier and earlier, even if they know nothing about them.

DOJ_NMG_0070751

Consider Maffei, a Democrat challenging Rep. Jim Walsh (R-N.Y.) in a district that includes Syracuse and the eastern end of Rochester.

A recent Maffei poll shows him trailing Walsh by only 4 points, 44 percent to 40 percent. Yet Maffei's favorable rating was just 24 percent. That means a large percentage of respondents who said they would vote for Maffei don't have a favorable impression of him. But they are for him, whomever he may be.

Presumably, most of these respondents are Democrats who want to send a message to President Bush and figure that voting for Maffei is a good way of doing so. After all, Democratic presidential hopeful Sen. John Kerry (Mass.) won the district in 2004, defeating Bush 50 percent to 48 percent.

Maffei looks pretty irrelevant in all this, and the poll suggests that at this point, a slice of white bread with a (D) after its name would have a good chance of holding Walsh under 50 percent.

Maffei is not the only Democratic candidate running far ahead of his or her name identification. In New Hampshire's 2nd district, a Democratic poll pegs Hodes' total name identification as 27 percent, yet has him drawing 42 percent in the ballot test against Rep. Charles Bass (R).

In New York's 20th district, a Global Strategy Group poll for Kirsten Gillibrand shows her favorable name ID at 34 percent even as she draws 39 percent of the vote against Rep. John Sweeney (R).

In Pennsylvania's 4th district, Altmire's total name identification is 21 percent, yet he is drawing 44 percent of the vote in a ballot test against incumbent GOP Rep. Melissa Hart.

In each of these districts, there are enough Democratic voters to provide a solid Democratic Congressional vote, and Maffei, Hodes, Gillibrand and Altmire apparently are getting their share early — even prematurely. But are these races as close as they would seem?

Count me as skeptical, and not only because most of these poll memos contain the dreaded "and when voters were read short descriptions about the candidates" second ballot that allegedly measures a challenger's fundamental strength. If wishes were horses, beggars would ride.

The Maffei poll memo includes at least a couple of things that caught my eye and deserve mention. First, despite Maffei's move in the ballot test, Walsh still has a name ID of 51 percent favorable/36 percent unfavorable. In other words, in a district won by Kerry and where Walsh's "re-elect" has plummeted from 42 percent to 34 percent, the Congressman still is viewed favorably by a majority of respondents.

Granted, Walsh's negatives have risen since a previously unreleased March Democratic survey, but that's not surprising given the national and state environments, which strongly favor Democrats. Walsh's favorable ratings have slipped only slightly, from 56 percent in March to 51 percent now.

Equally noteworthy is that district voters, who have a very unfavorable view of Bush (25 percent favorable/62 percent unfavorable), seem willing to make a clear distinction between Bush and Walsh.

That willingness to make a distinction is crucial, since it demonstrates that Walsh has, to a considerable extent, personalized the district. In an environment like this, and in a district such as New York's 25th, Walsh's success in building his own image is crucial.

The memo goes on to make a generalized assertion: "Voters in the 25th District are clearly looking for change."

Well, I've seen that message, in one way or another, in almost every Democratic polling memo that comes across my desk. They almost always cite Bush's standing. They almost all argue that voters want change or are dissatisfied with the direction of the country. And they are right, but only so far.

The problem for Democrats is that in most cases, that won't be enough by itself to get voters to fire GOP incumbents. That's particularly true if Republicans pound away at their challengers, making them the issue in their races and decreasing their appeal as vehicles for change. Of course, not all Republican incumbents are doing that yet. And that's a mistake that some Republicans could well come to regret.

Stuart Rothenberg is editor of the Rothenberg Political Report (www.rothenbergpoliticalreport.com).

Calls Grow For Release Of Intelligence Report (WSJ)

WSJ Online's "Washington Wire", September 26, 2006

Leading congressional Democrats along with the Republican chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee are pressing the White House to release an intelligence report that concluded the Iraq war had helped create a new generation of Islamic militants.

DOJ_NMG_0070752

Democrats pushing for the National Intelligence Estimate to be released publicly include House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California; Sen. Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, the ranking member of the Senate Intelligence Committee; and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, arguably the party's most prominent elected official.

Santorum

Meantime, Sen. Pat Roberts of Kansas, chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said he wants the report to be declassified and released publicly "so the American people can see the material for themselves and come to their own conclusions." Other Republicans, including Sens. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania and George Voinovich of Ohio, said they are considering making a similar request.

At issue is the National Intelligence Estimate that made headlines last weekend when its conclusions about the war in Iraq appeared on the front pages of the New York Times and Washington Post. The White House has ruled out declassifying the entire report, though it has left open the possibility of selectively declassifying excerpts.

The sparring during the election season highlights Democrats' desire to use the unpopular war in Iraq to hammer away at Republicans' electoral advantage on national security issues. The White House is casting the war in Iraq as an essential part of the war on terror, while Democrats are trying to separate the two issues and argue that Iraq has been a costly distraction from the broader fight against Islamic extremism.

In the meantime, the Bush administration got a political boost from Iraq's president. In an interview on the PBS show "The NewsHour with Jim Lehrer," Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said he disagreed with the report's contention that the Iraq war had worsened the global terrorist threat. "I think the invasion of Iraq reduced the danger of terrorism on the United States of America because all terrorist groups are now concentrating on Iraq," he said. –Yochi J. Dreazen

House GOP Pushes Its 'Suburban Agenda' (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

While House Republicans trumpeted elements of their suburban agenda, Democrats yesterday said Congress will have failed the American people if it adjourns without increasing the minimum wage.

"The battleground is in the suburbs, and it is wise policy and wise politics to directly meet the needs of families in those areas," said Rep. Mark Steven Kirk, Illinois Republican, chairman of the party's Suburban Agenda Caucus.

Mr. Kirk said both parties for too long have focused on rural or urban voters. The country now is 54 percent suburbanites who face similar challenges, he said.

"In the middle is where the majority is," he said.

Republicans outlined seven "suburban agenda" measures for 2007 aimed at improving education and health care. They also are pushing the Alternative Energy Act of 2006, which funds research for plug-in electric hybrid car technology and studies solar and wind power.

Democrats, meanwhile, tried to force a vote on increasing the minimum wage, a move many centrist Republicans support.

"The Democrats want to take the nation in a new direction, one where the needs of all Americans are addressed," said Rep. Eddie Bernice Johnson, Texas Democrat.

They threatened to resist the adjournment scheduled for the end of the week until Republican leaders allow a clean "up or down" vote on the minimum wage. Most Democrats opposed an August bill that the House passed, which raised the wage but also offered numerous tax cuts. That bill was stalled in the Senate.

"We should not leave town when there is serious business the Republican leadership has failed to complete," said Rep. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat.

But Rep. Pete Sessions, Texas Republican, said his party is targeting "people in America who get up every day [and] go to work."

"We intend to make sure that voters in November see the suburban caucus and the agenda that we have that's good for their families and good for our Republican Party," he said.

"Suburban agenda" items that overwhelmingly passed the House this year include a measure to block sites like MySpace.com from schools and libraries and a bill allowing schools to do FBI background checks before hiring employees.

A new poll of 1,000 suburban voters released by Republicans yesterday shows 50 percent think the economy is on the right track, up from 38 percent in July. It also shows Republican popularity ratings have increased -- from 40 percent in July to 43 percent this month. Negative ratings decreased from 53 percent in July to 49 percent this month. The poll was conducted by the Winston Group, a firm used by Republicans.

"While Democrats talk the talk, these numbers show that suburban folks increasingly like Republicans because they walk the walk with our plan to fight terrorism and grow jobs," said Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert.

DOJ_NMG_0070753

But the Democrats, who need just 15 seats to wrest control of the House from Republicans, say the majority party did nothing for the American people this year.

"The 'Do-Nothing Congress' did more substantive work than we have done," said Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland. He said Republicans and President Bush "demand that it is either done their way or not done at all."

President Truman dubbed lawmakers in 1948 the "Do-Nothing Congress" because they met less than 110 days. When this Congress adjourns it will have met for less than 95 voting days.

Several Democrats during floor speeches yesterday attempted to get unanimous consent to consider the minimum-wage bill immediately. Republicans controlling the proceedings denied them.

New Hope For Democrats In Bid For Senate (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — Six weeks before Election Day, the Democrats suddenly face a map with unexpected opportunities in their battle for control of the Senate.

In Virginia, a state that few expected to be seriously competitive, Senator George Allen looks newly vulnerable after a series of controversies over charges of racial insensitivity, strategists in both parties say. In Tennessee, another Southern state long considered safely red, Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., a Democrat, has run a strong campaign that has kept that state in contention.

Elsewhere, Democratic challengers are either ahead or close in races in five states held by the Republicans: Missouri, Montana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island, according to political strategists in both parties and the latest polls.

All of these races could shift direction in a matter of days, let alone six weeks, and Republicans are counting on their superior finances and large blocks of television advertising to hold the line. Democrats also have their own vulnerabilities, particularly in New Jersey, where Senator Robert Menendez is in a tight race with his Republican challenger, State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., according to recent polls.

Democrats must win six Republican seats to regain a Senate majority, meaning they would have to win nearly every close race. Even the most optimistic Democrats acknowledge that such a feat would require a big anti-Republican wave, a lot of money and a lot of luck.

Still, a shift in the Senate was always considered a long shot this year. Some analysts now say, however, that there are enough Republican seats facing serious challenges to make it at least plausible.

“There’s a big difference in talking about six seats in play and not five,” said Stuart Rothenberg, an independent analyst.

In Pennsylvania, Rick Santorum, the No. 3 Republican in the Senate, has been lagging behind Bob Casey, the state treasurer, for months. In Rhode Island, Senator Lincoln Chafee, a Republican, overcame his primary challenge, but remains locked in a tight race with Sheldon Whitehouse, the Democrat and former state attorney general.

Senator Mike Dewine, Republican of Ohio, is fighting an unhappy political mood in his state, stoked by local Republican scandals and economic unease.. Independent polls suggest Mr. Dewine remains in a tight race with his Democratic challenger, Representative Sherrod Brown.

In Montana, Senator Conrad Burns, the Republican, has been considered vulnerable for months to his Democratic challenger, Jon Tester, a farmer and state senator. And any route to a majority for the Democrats would have to include Missouri, where Senator Jim Talent, the Republican, is being challenged by Claire McCaskill, the state auditor.

Republicans’ hopes for a pickup look strongest, at the moment, in New Jersey. But another target is the open Democratic seat in Maryland, where Lt. Gov. Michael Steele is running against Representative Benjamin L. Cardin, a Democrat still trying to unify his party after a competitive primary campaign.

Republican strategists acknowledge the intensely competitive map but say they are ready for it.

“Anybody who says there’s no way the Democrats could regain control of the Senate, that’s just wishful thinking,” said Glen Bolger, a Republican pollster active in numerous House and Senate races. “But there’s a long way between could and would, and the Republican resource advantage is just now coming to bear.”

Democrats are upbeat but wary.

Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said: “We will pick up seats. And if the stars continue to align, we can take back the Senate.”

Republicans say they have the money not only to defend their seats, but also to put Democrats on the defensive in Maryland, New Jersey and elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0070754

"We obviously knew all along many of our Republicans were going to have difficult races, and they've known that as well, which is why they have more resources than their counterparts and are able to push back," said Brian Nick, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

Republican Senate candidates are getting a major boost from the Republican National Committee, which is financing an advertising campaign so far focused largely on Missouri, Ohio and Tennessee. This is widely viewed as a firewall strategy: If Republicans hold onto even one of those seats, it stymies the Democrats' hopes of regaining a majority.

Mr. Schumer said, "The 800-pound gorilla is the money the R.N.C. is pouring into those races."

Republicans also argue that six weeks out, many voters are only beginning to pay attention. In Tennessee, for example, Ben Mitchell, campaign manager for the Republican Senate candidate, former Mayor Bob Corker of Chattanooga, said voters would reject Mr. Ford when they learned about his voting record, which Republicans assert is at odds with his centrist image.

Pete Brodnitz, a pollster for Mr. Ford, countered that Tennessee voters had a "big appetite for change."

Perhaps the most unexpected development this year is the competition in two Southern states. Democrats have fared poorly in the South in recent years, which has accounted, in large part, for their difficulty in gaining a Senate majority.

Tennessee, where the seat is held by the retiring majority leader, Bill Frist, is drawing intense interest from national Republicans. President Bush was in Memphis on Wednesday to raise money for Mr. Corker.

The Virginia race — between Mr. Allen and Jim Webb, the Democrat — looked safe for the Republicans until Mr. Allen made a demeaning reference to a young American man of Indian descent — a Webb campaign worker — at a rally in August. Then, last week, Mr. Allen reacted angrily to a reporter's question about whether his mother had been born Jewish, which began another distracting episode for his campaign.

This week, he has faced accusations that he used racist slurs in the 1970's and 1980's — allegations that Mr. Allen has flatly denied.

This week, Mr. Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, described the race as "competitive," but asserted that would change as it became clear that Mr. Webb "stands with John Kerry, Ted Kennedy, Chuck Schumer and Hillary Clinton."

Steve Jarding, an adviser to Mr. Webb, described the race as a dead heat, and said that while Mr. Allen retained a financial advantage, Mr. Webb's fund-raising had soared of late.

Both parties are watching to see if Mr. Webb can take advantage of his new opening.

Analysts say the level of Senate competition should come as no surprise; Senate races are more likely to reflect national trends, they say, whereas most House districts are so carefully drawn on partisan lines that "they are safe against anything but a hurricane," said Gary C. Jacobson, a political scientist at the University of California, San Diego.

Controversy Clouds Allen's Re-election Bid (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, September 28, 2006

LEESBURG, Va. — Michael Johnson is a swing voter in a swing county in what's turned into one of the hottest Senate races in the country, and he's swinging away from George Allen, the man he voted for in 2000.

Johnson, 35, a football fan attracted six years ago by Allen's family (his father was a Washington Redskins coach) and "positive, honest" image, says he probably won't vote for Allen this fall. The reason is a videotape showing Allen taunting a volunteer of Indian descent for his Democratic rival as "macaca" — considered an ethnic slur in some cultures.

"It was horrible," says Johnson, a planner for fast-growing Loudoun County. "Definitely disheartening."

In interviews here Wednesday, many Republicans said they're sticking with Allen.

"He's a wonderful man. A good family man. A good Christian," said Patsy Harrington, 40, a part-time real estate agent.

Until Aug. 11 and the "macaca" comment, Allen had a wide lead in the polls over Democrat Jim Webb, Navy secretary in the Reagan administration, and seemed ready to coast to re-election. Since then, however, his campaign has been slowed by Allen's reactions to the revelation his maternal grandparents were Jewish and allegations that he used racial slurs to refer to black people.

"It has been one misstep and meltdown after another" for the Allen campaign, Mark McKinnon, a strategist for President Bush, said Tuesday at a panel discussion on political advertising in New York sponsored by USA TODAY.

Democrats, who need six new seats for a Senate majority, are poised to invest heavily here. "With each day that goes by, Virginia looks increasingly winnable," says Phil Singer, spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. He declined to give details on spending plans.

Federal campaign reports for June 30, the most recent available, showed Allen with a formidable financial edge: $6.6 million on hand vs. $424,000 for Webb.

DOJ_NMG_0070755

Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd said the third-quarter report will show “a fundraising flurry” as a result of celebrity help and national attention, but Allen will have more money.

Both candidates have had 1970s flashbacks. Three of Allen's University of Virginia college football teammates told the online magazine Salon this week that Allen often used a racial slur to describe blacks.

Allen is sending mailers to Virginia women highlighting articles and speeches in which onetime Republican Webb argued, in colorful language he now says was immature, against women in the military.

Webb went on to marry a fellow Vietnam War veteran and change military policies to help women serve. “I've tried to show by my conduct when I had positions in government that I am open to assisting women succeed in all the areas where that's possible,” he said this month on NBC's Meet the Press.

Allen pushed for aid to historically black colleges and a Senate apology for failing to outlaw lynching. Last spring, he skipped the high-profile White House Correspondents Dinner to attend a racial reconciliation weekend with Democratic Georgia Rep. John Lewis, a civil rights hero. A former head of the state NAACP has endorsed him.

Allen has apologized repeatedly for the “macaca” incident, and this week, he denied the allegations that he used a racial epithet in college. “It is not who I was, and it is not who I am,” Allen said. “It is contrary to every fiber of my being.”

Allen was not available for an interview this week. Webb declined Tuesday to comment on the allegations from Allen's classmates.

Virginia conservatives remain solidly behind Allen. “We vote the party, not the person,” said Delrose Winter, 48, co-owner of a materials analysis lab. “I don't care what he did as long as it wasn't criminal. He seems very moral and sensible.”

The question for Allen is whether there are enough people like Winter in counties such as Loudoun, a magnet for newcomers from Washington and its inner suburbs. Steven Cox, 58, a farmer and baker, moved here seven years ago. “I have mixed feelings about Webb, but I know too many things about Allen,” Cox said Wednesday at the Leesburg Restaurant. “I'm just disgusted with the way things are going,” particularly regarding Iraq.

Across the room, several friends held forth on the Senate race as they finished lunch. Wayne Wilmot, 64, co-owner of an insurance agency, said comments Allen might have made 30 years ago are “immaterial.” He said Allen deserves a second term as senator. He's not sure about the White House.

Michelle Martinson, 50, a title underwriter, said she's a lifelong Republican who voted for Allen in 2000 but won't this year. Her reasons include his closeness to Bush, his support for a state ban on gay marriage, and “he comes across as kind of mean-spirited.” As for Webb, his “woman thing is just bizarre.” She is still mulling whether to support Webb or no one.

Webb Denies Ever Using Word As Epithet (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

RICHMOND, Sept. 27 -- Democratic Senate candidate James Webb on Wednesday sought to explain remarks he had made a day earlier, in which he refused to say whether he had used the "N-word," but he insisted he has never used it as a racial epithet aimed at anyone.

"I don't think that there's anyone who grew up around the South that hasn't had the word pass through their lips at one time in their life," he told the Richmond Times-Dispatch on Tuesday. "If you read 'Fields of Fire,' that word and a lot of other words are in the book." "Fields of Fire" is a novel Webb wrote about the Vietnam War.

Spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd said Webb, an author and former Marine, "did not want to make any blanket statements that he has never, ever uttered the word. Jim has not used the word directed at another person. He's never used it himself as a racial slur."

Allegations about race continued to roil Virginia's Senate race this week, as Webb and his opponent, George Allen (R-Va.), confronted fresh accusations and their campaigns struggled to shift the conversation to other subjects.

Political scientists who specialize in the history of the South said Webb's careful comments about the N-word, and the controversy over its alleged use by Allen, reflect the word's transformation from a common political term to the third-rail of electioneering.

"The Voting Rights Act transformed that word. It eradicated it," said Jack Bass, a professor of humanities and social science at the College of Charleston. "The crowd that [used it in the 1970s] either quit using it or they were gone. Blacks were voters by then."

Charles Bullock, a professor of political science at the University of Georgia, said that "in much of the South, there was this tremendous transformation from a time when it was a term widely used by politicians making successful appeals to now where it is something that no politician would dare utter."

DOJ_NMG_0070756

Webb's comments to the Times-Dispatch prompted Allen campaign officials to direct a reporter to Dan Cragg, a former acquaintance of Webb's, who said Webb used the word while describing his own behavior during his freshman year at the University of Southern California in the early 1960s. Webb later transferred to the U.S. Naval Academy.

Cragg, 67, who lives in Fairfax County, said on Wednesday that Webb described taking drives through the black neighborhood of Watts, where he and members of his ROTC unit used racial epithets and pointed fake guns at blacks to scare them.

"They would hop into their cars, and would go down to Watts with these buddies of his," Cragg said Webb told him. "They would take the rifles down there. They would call then [epithets], point the rifles at them, pull the triggers and then drive off laughing. One night, some guys caught them and beat . . . them. And that was the end of that."

Cragg said Webb told him the Watts story during a 1983 interview for a Vietnam veterans magazine. Cragg, who described himself as a Republican who would vote for Allen, did not include the story in his article. He provided a transcript of the interview, but the transcript does not contain the ROTC story. He said he still remembers the exchange vividly more than 20 years later.

Webb, who is in Texas for fundraising events, did not respond to repeated requests for comment. Todd said Webb denied the allegations in a conversation with her.

"He said it's not true. It's not even close to being true," Todd said. She quoted Webb as saying: "In 1963, you couldn't go to Watts and do that kind of thing. You'd get killed. So of course I didn't do it. I would never do that. I would never want to do that."

Todd condemned the allegations as politically motivated by the Allen campaign.

"They are pathetic individuals. They are beneath it. They are slime," she said. "Here we are trying to talk about the issues. They are completely and totally desperate."

Cragg, a former Army sergeant major, described himself as a longtime friend of Webb's who worked for him when he was assistant secretary of defense under President Ronald Reagan. Cragg said he approached the Allen campaign through a friend after hearing Webb's answer to the Times-Dispatch reporter's question about using the N-word.

"The fact is he has. He used it in my presence," Cragg said. "I don't think he's a racist any more than George Allen is. But he's not frank in admitting that he grew up in a culture where that was common and he used it."

Allen campaign officials declined to comment on Cragg's story. But political adviser Chris LaCivita responded to Todd's criticism. "They wouldn't know an issue if it hit them square in the face," he said.

Cragg's accusations come as Allen continued to battle charges he used the same racial epithet during college and was racially insensitive.

On Monday, a college football teammate, Ken Shelton, said Allen used the N-word referring to black people. He also said that he, Allen and Billy Lanahan, another teammate, once cut the head off of a deer and, at Allen's urging, stuffed the head into a black person's mailbox.

Lanahan is dead. But his former roommate came forward Wednesday to say that he recalls Lanahan telling him the story without mentioning that the mailbox was a black person's.

"He told me they went hunting," said George Beam, 53, who lives in Charlottesville. "All he said was we cut the deer head off and stuck it in somebody's mailbox."

And late Wednesday, Allen's campaign launched a multimedia barrage against Webb that included testimonials from former female midshipmen at the Naval Academy. The women, who came forward several weeks ago, said an article Webb wrote in 1979 created a hostile environment for academy women.

"It was demoralizing from a perspective that only a woman could understand," one of the women says in the ad.

Todd called the ad "completely erroneous" because Webb created opportunities for women as secretary of the Navy.

Is There Life After 'Macaca'? (WSJ)

By Fred Barnes

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. -- Suddenly, for George Allen, mere re-election has become a perilous business. As recently as six weeks ago, he was expected to glide to an easy victory in his Senate re-election campaign, with an eye fixed on seeking the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. But instead of a cakewalk, he has been subjected to extraordinary scrutiny and a raft of unfavorable publicity.

The national press hasn't treated Mr. Allen as an ordinary candidate. He's in a different category: Likely Presidential Contender. His re-election bid thus floats beyond local Virginia matters, becoming a test of Mr. Allen's viability as a national candidate for 2008. The media grew still more interested when Mr. Allen got a serious Democratic opponent, James Webb, a well-known novelist, Vietnam veteran and angry ex-Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0070757

Then Mr. Allen made a crude mistake that may ultimately doom his presidential aspirations and perhaps even his Senate career -- the notorious "macaca" incident. At a rural rally in mid-August, Mr. Allen digressed and singled out a young Webb aide videotaping his speech, a common practice these days in hopes of catching gaffes or blunders. Mr. Allen certainly delivered. He referred to the aide as "macaca," a racial slur in some cultures.

The tape was picked by liberal bloggers and circulated by YouTube, and eventually found its way to the Washington Post, never friendly to Virginia conservatives or to Mr. Allen in particular. The paper played the story as a major scandal, running 44 stories over the next month, including seven on the front page. Almost instantly the rest of the national media glommed onto the story.

Mr. Allen was thrown on the defensive, appearing increasingly rattled. He made things worse by giving several confusing, contradictory explanations and declined to apologize for several days. Then he apologized, over and over again. His lead in polls dropped to a slim four-point advantage.

Would Mr. Allen's gaffe have become a huge issue absent his presidential ambitions? Probably not, even with attention focused so closely on 2006 congressional races. Would the Post have hyped the macaca story day after day? I doubt it.

The cycle, however, is self-stoking. Mr. Allen's views on race and ethnicity have become the target of press frenzy. Ten days ago, he was asked if his mother, Etty, is Jewish. He said no. But when a reporter caught up with her, she said her parents were indeed Jewish, a fact she'd kept from her family, including Mr. Allen, until recently. That story made the front page of the New York Times.

This week ginned up a new controversy: Several acquaintances of Mr. Allen accuse him of having used the "n-word" years ago as a young man. Their stories were uncorroborated and disputed by Allen allies.

Given Mr. Allen's status as a presidential possibility, the media's concentration on his personal life was not surprising. Reporters are famous for scrutinizing the past of presidential candidates and ferreting out old embarrassments and long-held secrets. When Gary Hart ran for president, it was discovered he'd changed his name and fudged on his age. In 1992, an old letter written by Bill Clinton surfaced in which he condemned the military.

Mr. Allen's campaign has seemed unprepared for the way that presidential races, with their high visibility, draw out personal information. His two previous statewide races (for governor in 1993 and the Senate in 2000) were largely uneventful and revealed little besides that he's a likeable conservative with a libertarian streak and without the slightest hint of racism. The perils, I suppose, of a possibly premature coronation.

With Mr. Allen under sharp attack from all corners, Mr. Webb has become something of a bystander. He joined Mr. Allen for two contentious debates in which neither man gained an advantage. But otherwise he's been ignored. Since Mr. Webb is first-time candidate and an awkward campaigner, he may be better off out of the limelight.

But his obscurity will be short-lived. Mr. Allen is going on TV today with an ad zinging Mr. Webb for a 1982 article critical of women in the military, especially in combat. The article used vivid language that shows, according to the ad, Mr. Webb is disrespectful and insulting to women. "This is a severe problem for Webb with moderate voters, particularly women," says Dick Wadhams, Mr. Allen's chief strategist.

But that, as well as the policy proposals set to drop like confetti, won't be enough to restore Mr. Allen's credibility. He needs to remind voters of his success as governor. He abolished parole, reformed welfare and championed education reforms. New voters, many of them in Northern Virginia (which has one-third of the state's voting population), know little of Mr. Allen's impressive political background.

He must also shift the spotlight to Mr. Webb, whose views are vague but liberal enough for Mr. Allen to contest. Virginia no longer votes like a Southern state, but it's still more conservative than not. The anti-Webb message won't catch on, however, so long as the media remain focused on Mr. Allen's alleged personal flaws. It is going to be exceedingly difficult to overcome that hurdle.

The curdled conventional wisdom on the race is twofold: Mr. Allen is still favored to win re-election, but he should give up any thought of seeking the presidency in 2008. But Mr. Allen refuses to budge. He won't rule out a presidential race, and it remains very much in the cards.

Many conservatives are souring on Virginia's junior senator as a presidential candidate. Still: Should Mr. Allen overcome the media onslaught, effectively counter Mr. Webb's call for a withdrawal from Iraq, finish the campaign without breaking ranks with President Bush, and win a slugfest by a modest margin, he may emerge as a tough-minded survivor. The press won't like him any better, but he might earn the respect of Republican voters around the country. Candidates have been "misunderestimated" before, and stranger things have happened in politics.

Mr. Barnes, executive editor of the Weekly Standard, is author of "Rebel-in-Chief," released in paperback this week by Crown Forum.

DOJ_NMG_0070758

A Platform Of Bigotry (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

George Allen, the clownish, Confederate-flag-loving senator from Virginia, has apparently been scurrying around for many years, spreading his racially offensive garbage like a dog that should be curbed. With harsh new allegations emerging daily, it's fair to ask:

Where are the voices of reason in the Republican Party — the nonbigoted voices? Why haven't we heard from them on this matter?

Mr. Allen has long been touted as one of the leading candidates for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. But this is a man who has displayed the quintessential symbol of American bigotry, the Confederate battle flag, on the wall of his living room; who put up a hangman's noose as a decoration in his law office; who used an ethnic slur — macaca — in an attempt to publicly embarrass a 20-year-old American student of Indian descent; and who, according to the recollections of a number of his acquaintances, frequently referred to blacks as niggers.

The senator has denied the last allegation. But his accusers are low-keyed, straight-arrow professionals who have no obvious ax to grind. They, frankly, seem believable.

Dr. R. Kendall Shelton, a North Carolina radiologist who played football with Mr. Allen at the University of Virginia in the 1970's, recalled a number of incidents, including one in which Mr. Allen said that blacks in Virginia knew their place. Dr. Shelton said in a television interview that he believed then, and still believes, that Mr. Allen was a racist.

Beyond the obvious problems with the senator's comments and his behavior is the fact that he so neatly fits into the pattern of racial bigotry, insensitivity and exploitation that has characterized the G.O.P. since it adopted its Southern strategy some decades ago. Once it was the Democrats who provided a comfortable home for public officials with attitudes and policies that were hostile to blacks and other minorities. Now the deed to that safe house has been signed over to the G.O.P.

Ronald Reagan may be revered by Republicans, but I can never forget that he opposed both the Civil Rights Act and the Voting Rights Act of the mid-1960's, and that as a presidential candidate he kicked off his 1980 general election campaign in Philadelphia, Miss., which just happened to be where three civil rights workers — Andrew Goodman, Michael Schwerner and James Chaney — were savagely murdered in 1964.

During his appearance in Philadelphia, Reagan told a cheering crowd, "I believe in states' rights."

The lynching of Goodman, Schwerner and Chaney (try to imagine the terror they felt throughout their ordeal) is the kind of activity symbolized by the noose that Senator Allen felt compelled to put up in his office.

One of the senator's Republican colleagues, Conrad Burns, is up for re-election in Montana. He's got an ugly racial history, too. Several years ago, while campaigning for a second term, Mr. Burns was approached by a rancher who wanted to know what life was like in Washington. The rancher said, "Conrad, how can you live back there with all those niggers?"

Senator Burns said he told the rancher it was "a hell of a challenge."

The senator later apologized. But he has bounced from one racially insensitive moment to another over the years, including one occasion when he referred to Arabs as "ragheads."

You don't hear President Bush or the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, or any other prominent Republicans blowing the whistle on the likes of George Allen and Conrad Burns because Republicans across the board, so-called moderates as well as conservatives, have benefited tremendously from the party's bigotry. Allen and Burns may have been more blatant and buffoonish than is acceptable, but they have all been singing from the same racially offensive hymnal.

From the Willie Horton campaign to the intimidation of black voters in Florida and elsewhere to the use of every racially charged symbol and code word imaginable — it's all of a piece.

The late Lee Atwater, in a 1981 interview, explained the evolution of the Southern strategy:

"You start out in 1954 by saying, 'Nigger, nigger, nigger! By 1968 you can't say 'nigger' — that hurts you. Backfires. So you say stuff like forced busing, states' rights and all that stuff. You're getting so abstract now [that] you're talking about cutting taxes, and all these things you're talking about are totally economic things and a byproduct of them is [that] blacks get hurt worse than whites."

It's been working beautifully for the G.O.P. for decades. Why would the president or anyone else curtail a winning strategy now?

Tennessee Battles For Senate (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070759

Tennessee is living up to its reputation as a battleground state with Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., a Democrat, running neck and neck with Bob Corker, Chattanooga's Republican mayor, in their race for the Senate.

Mr. Corker's early double-digit polling lead in his bid to hold for Republicans the seat being vacated by Majority Leader Bill Frist has dwindled into a statistical dead heat, and Democrats now think they can capture the seat in this Republican-leaning state.

Republicans have underestimated the effectiveness of Mr. Ford's campaign, said Merle Black, political science professor at Emory University.

"It just looks like Ford wants this a lot more than Corker does," he said.

The stakes are high for Mr. Ford.

A victory by the son of former Rep. Harold Ford Sr. would give Democrats an unexpected victory in their effort to pick up six seats to win back the Senate majority in November.

It also would mark the first time a black person in the South has won an open election to the Senate and could be seen as the first chink in the armor of the Republican's Southern fortress. Republicans control both Senate seats in 10 of the 13 Southern states. Only Florida and Louisiana have split-party Senate representation, and only Arkansas has two Democrats.

Mr. Ford dismisses all of that.

"I'm not fighting for any legacy or any party pride or anything like that; I'm fighting for a seat on the U.S. Senate for the people of Tennessee. It's not any party's seat; it's the people's seat," he said.

Corker's campaign manager Ben Mitchell said financial support from Tennesseans will translate to votes in November.

"Our fundraising shows a tremendous amount of support from right here in Tennessee ... in contrast to Mr. Ford, who has a majority of his money coming in from out of state," Mr. Mitchell said.

"Bob Corker represents Tennessee values while Congressman Ford represents the values of out-of-state donors from California and New York who are funding his campaign."

The election is much closer than Republicans expected and they are having a tough time developing a strategy that can work against Mr. Ford.

"What we have to do is contend with a guy who is a very gifted talker and who will say just about anything to score political points," said Dan Ronayne, National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) spokesman.

Mr. Ford has also proven to be an effective counter-puncher.

The NRSC yesterday, using his voting record, pegged Mr. Ford as a flip-flopper on border security. He voted against legislation to create a 700-mile fence on the border that he said could not be done. But last week he voted for it, saying the bill presented was more comprehensive, including things other than the fence alone.

Mr. Ford immediately countered with the help of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee that put up an ad saying that Mr. Corker's construction firm has been cited for hiring illegal aliens.

Early on in the campaign the Republicans attempted to paint Mr. Ford as "Fancy Ford" who likes to live lavishly on the taxpayer's dime, but that quickly fizzled out.

"I've just finished paying off my college loans, and this guy is worth upwards of a quarter-billion dollars or more with a 40-room house in the Chattanooga mountains and 10 cars," Mr. Ford said.

One thing Mr. Ford cannot shake is limited residency in the state.

"Ford is like Al Gore," Mr. Ronayne said. "In 2000, we were able to show that Gore was more D.C. than Tennessee and Ford has the same problems."

Mr. Ford has worked hard to counteract that problem telling audiences that it isn't his fault that he came to the District with his mother and father when he was nine, "and since I didn't have a job or any money to pay my rent in Memphis, I decided to come with them."

Mfume Endorses Cardin, But Adds Caveat (WP)

By Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Senate candidate Benjamin L. Cardin received the critical endorsement yesterday of Democratic primary opponent Kweisi Mfume, whose blessing came with a blunt warning about the lack of diversity among candidates for statewide office in Maryland.

The main attraction at Cardin's campaign rally at the University of Maryland was supposed to be Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.), a rising star in the Democratic Party. But Mfume -- who lost to Cardin on Sept. 12 -- left a stark impression, telling the Baltimore congressman and fellow Democrats, "We have a problem."

DOJ_NMG_0070760

On stage at an outdoor amphitheater filled with college Democrats, the former NAACP president enthusiastically put his arms around Cardin, saying: "I know what he's done in the past, and I know what he'll do in the future. He's going to make a damn good senator."

But Mfume cautioned that the party had much work to do to energize black voters. The Democratic nominees for the top four jobs, he noted, look no different than the ticket 50 years ago.

"We need women in leadership positions in the state. We've got to find a way that African Americans and other minorities are represented statewide in office," he said, standing with Obama and other officials.

Cardin, who is white, faces Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R) in the general election Nov. 7 to succeed Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D), who is retiring.

In 2002, Steele became Maryland's first African American elected to statewide office and has tried to make inroads with black voters in the overwhelmingly Democratic state. He dismissed the significance of the high-profile endorsements yesterday and picked up on Mfume's theme.

"The challenge of the opportunity is to build a bridge to communities the Democratic Party has taken for granted and has, by its choice of nominee," decided to tell to wait, he said during an afternoon event in Largo. "I'm here to say, 'You don't have to wait any longer.' "

The issue of race has been at the forefront of the Senate contest since the primary, in which Mfume finished second in a crowded contest. Cardin lagged far behind Mfume in parts of the state where blacks are the majority. Mfume won nearly 70 percent of the vote in Prince George's County and 64 percent in Baltimore.

Cardin's challenge, said Democratic legislators in Prince George's, is to overcome disappointment in the black community. African Americans represent one of the most loyal Democratic voting blocs in Maryland, but resentment among some black voters lingers from the 2004 election, when the Democratic nominee for governor, Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend, did not pick a black running mate.

"The fact that we don't have an African American" at the top of the ticket, said Sen. Ulysses Currie (D-Prince George's), "doesn't help Ben." Currie, one of the few lawmakers in the battleground county who endorsed Cardin in the primary, hopes to convince his constituents that "there isn't anyone I've met who better understands or is more effective in government."

One Democratic African American is on the statewide ballot: Del. Anthony G. Brown of Prince George's, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley's running mate in the governor's race.

Nonetheless, the Rev. Grainger Browning, pastor of Ebenezer AME Church in Fort Washington, said it would take more than appearances for some African Americans to mend relations with the party because of the sense that black Democrats have been underappreciated.

"The key thing is that we have not been at the table of influence," said Browning, who was on stage yesterday. "We want to be at the table at the time of the conception of ideas and not just when it is time to campaign."

Terry Lierman, the state Democratic Party chairman, acknowledged that the party needs "much more diversity, and we're working towards it." But he said it was important to consider the large number of female and minority nominees for lower level offices, such as General Assembly seats. Montgomery County Democrat Isiah "Ike" Leggett, he noted, would be the first black county executive in the state's largest jurisdiction.

About 28 percent of Maryland's residents are black -- among the highest percentages in the nation. The Democratic Party expects black voters to make up about 20 percent of the general election vote. For that reason, said Ronald Walters, a U-Md. government and politics professor, Cardin cannot afford to cede a significant percentage of the black vote to Steele.

If there is muted enthusiasm for the party, it is because of the question of whether black Democrats turn out in large numbers for Cardin. A Baltimore Sun poll this week showed 24 percent of black voters favor Steele, a strong showing for a Republican.

How involved Mfume will be in the campaign is unclear. Mfume said he was following up on a commitment he made to Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.), who began planning the unity event months ago.

"I am here to fulfill my commitment and my obligation," he said.

There was certainly enthusiasm yesterday as Cardin told the crowd: "Michael Steele stands with George Bush. I stand with the people of Maryland." Obama followed, praising Cardin's experience in Annapolis and in Congress.

"There aren't too many people who could replace Senator Sarbanes and not miss a beat, and yet somehow, Maryland, you all found him," he said. Referring to Steele, he added: "I know the other guy is taller, and he's got that kind of local news anchor style about him. . . . But I tell you what, that's not what this election is about."

The Democrats' Charisma Doctor (WP)

By David Montgomery

DOJ_NMG_0070761

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

It's one thing for Ben Cardin to joke about his charisma deficit. "Who says I'm not flashy?" he quips in a campaign commercial when a supporter suggests: "Ben's not flashy, but he never stops."

It's quite another for him to invite Mr. Democratic Charisma himself onstage for a rally yesterday in the Cardin quest to become U.S. senator from Maryland.

Barack Obama didn't even have to open his mouth to have a crowd of a few hundred under a powerful spell in a grassy outdoor amphitheater at the University of Maryland in College Park. The junior senator from Illinois -- part Kenyan, part Kansan -- stood tall and youthful and bronze in a black suit and a baby-blue tie, his eyes half-closed, studying the audience with a kind of seductive lassitude. His arrival sparked an ovation, and he shot a quick amiable wink to the many pols and hopefuls crammed behind him on the stage, mute witnesses to the magic.

Beside Obama stood Cardin. Comparisons aren't polite, but the Democratic congressman from Maryland was asking for it: He looked older, shorter, pudgier and pinker.

Suffice it to say, when Cardin delivered his speech ahead of Obama -- the candidate was the warm-up act for the superstar -- a female voice from the crowd did not interrupt him with the ecstatic cry, "We want to meet you!" Obama won that populist bouquet. Squinting, pretending he didn't hear it, he continued his passionate call to "put on your marching shoes" to elect Cardin.

So the man lacks charisma, fine: He can borrow it. That may have been the point of this sunny morning tableau on the campaign trail. In his race against the current lieutenant governor, Republican Michael Steele -- who has been featuring a puppy in his campaign commercials -- Cardin contends he is running a campaign of substance over style. Cardin's style is anti-style, the recitation of issues, the requests for debate.

"We're bringing in charismatic popular leaders to show their support for Ben Cardin," says Oren Shur, the campaign's spokesman. "It's still our banner they're standing in front of. . . . People like Barack Obama transcend politics. They attract people and engage people into political events" they otherwise might ignore.

Obama, whose fans say he delivers substance with style, has been electrifying Democrats since his 2004 presidential convention keynote address, before he was even in the Senate. Cardin admires that speech so much he quoted a line in his own yesterday: "I believe that we have a righteous wind at our backs, and that we stand on the crossroads of history."

Sprinting Dems everywhere have been demanding an Obama jolt of energy, inspiration, star power. In the past two weeks, the senator has addressed campaign events in Kentucky, Iowa, West Virginia and Virginia, where he rallied supporters of Senate candidate Jim Webb against incumbent Republican George Allen, and he'll quicken his pace as Election Day approaches, said Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs. To many of the party faithful, the question is not if, but when, Obama himself will run for president.

The air in College Park was thick with Obama thrall.

"I've just always admired everything Mr. Obama says," said Kate Turner, a Maryland student who attended the rally on her 19th birthday just to hear him. "I'm excited about politics because he's involved."

Turner lost her sandal chasing Obama after he left the stage. She wanted a birthday picture with him.

"It's your birthday?" said the senator. "Where's your shoe, though?"

Cardin will get her vote, Turner says, but Obama will enjoy a far more personal honor. The snapshot of Obama and her will become her new Facebook picture.

More Obama giddiness:

"I decided to take time off from work to see my role model," said Joseph Eyong, 43, a native of Camaroon living in Silver Spring.

And this:

"Dude, I shook his hand."

That's Robert Hardin, 20, a Maryland junior from Fort Washington, to Alan Coleman, 20, a junior from Silver Spring. The night before the rally, one of their friends said he'd never heard of Obama. So they logged on to YouTube.com and had a viewing of the 2004 keynote speech.

"We were inspired to get up at 9 o'clock" for the rally, Coleman said. "If Obama wasn't here, I'm sure we wouldn't have half the turnout. I support all the politicians who are up there, but I don't know if I'd come out and hear them speak."

And what of that shortish white guy onstage with Barack Obama? After the speeches, Cardin was mobbed by a different crowd. Mostly reporters. But, his spokesman Shur affirmed, some people did seek Cardin's autograph on the back of campaign signs.

"If you talk about stentorian speaking," said Frank Bell, 80, of Kettering, ranking the rally speechifiers, "Obama's first, [Kweisi] Mfume's second, [retiring Sen. Paul] Sarbanes is third, and Ben's is somewhere down the line. . . . If he wins . . . it's going to be because he's standing for things people desperately need." (Bell didn't rank Sen. Barbara Mikulski, who also spoke.)

To win, Cardin is "going to have to do more," said Jennifer Lowery-Bell, 59, Frank's wife. "He can't be an Obama. We're not asking that." But Cardin will have to reach for some passion, she said, and he will have to keep pounding those issues, such as universal health care.

So, issues and passion: They matter. How they fit together is a politician's business. Sarbanes has been an issues guy, but a little bland. Obama meant it as a compliment when he said: "There aren't too many people who could replace Senator Sarbanes and not miss a beat. And yet somehow, Maryland, y'all found him." And the crowd cheered.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

Big house

"Leaking classified information is a crime punishable with prison time. The statutes are on the books, folks. Those who leak classified information and those who publicize it should go to jail," writes Ralph Peters of the New York Post.

"The latest example was a selective leak from a National Intelligence Estimate. ... The leak wasn't about some phony 'right to know.' It was a political stunt performed for political gain. And now our enemies know what our intelligence community thinks. Gee, thanks. We don't need to know what intelligence documents say. What matters is what our leaders do or fail to do.

"What will it take to inspire a nonpartisan crackdown on those who betray our secrets, who selfishly expose our country to mortal danger?" Mr. Peters asks.

"This shouldn't be a Democratic or Republican issue. It's an American issue. Keeping our country safe is more important than Senator Sweetspot's re-election campaign or a Pulitzer Prize for another self-adoring, America-loathing journalist. Put 'em in the slammer. Where these criminals belong. Enforce our laws. And maybe -- just maybe -- folks in Washington will start obeying those laws again."

California dreaming

Just six weeks before the midterms, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger holds a double-digit edge over Democratic nominee Phil Angelides in two independent voter surveys.

The Governator held a 17-point lead over Mr. Angelides -- 48 percent to 31 percent -- in a survey released Tuesday by the Public Policy Institute of California. A Field Poll released yesterday put Mr. Schwarzenegger's advantage at 10 points, 44 percent to 34 percent.

Another Field survey in February found the rivals tied at 39 percent.

"We're at or exceeding what we need to have to win when it comes to men, women and Latinos," Schwarzenegger adviser Matthew Dowd told the Associated Press, crediting the lead to bipartisan dealings and well-targeted campaign messages.

The policy institute's poll of 1,091 likely voters was conducted Sept. 13 to 20. The margin of error was two percentage points. The Field survey of 557 likely voters was conducted Sept. 14 through Sunday, with an error margin of 4.3 percentage points.

California dreaming No. 2

Heads up, Al Gore. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger may steal some of that environmental thunder. Mr. Schwarzenegger signed into law a sweeping initiative yesterday that imposes the nation's first cap on greenhouse-gas emissions.

"It will begin a bold new era of environmental protection in California that will change the course of history," he said.

And talk about a Hallmark moment: The Republican governor stood shoulder to shoulder with San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom, a Democrat; New York Gov. George E. Pataki, a Republican; and a spate of Democratic legislators, according to the San Francisco Chronicle, which called the ceremony a "major political victory." British Prime Minister Tony Blair joined via video link.

"Nothing is more important than protecting our planet," Mr. Schwarzenegger said.

A vote for Swanson

One of the young stalwarts at the Heritage Foundation is about to take on former Vice President Al Gore. James Swanson, author of "Manhunt: the 12-Day Chase for Lincoln's Killer," has been nominated for a Quill Award for best book of the year in the historical/current events category. His competition? The author of "An Inconvenient Truth."

Mr. Swanson, who works as senior legal scholar for Edwin Meese III at Heritage, counts President Bush, Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and other political heavyweights among his readership. The book was on the New York Times best-seller list for four months and will be made into a movie by Walden Media, starring none other than Harrison Ford as Col. Everton Conger, the man who led the search for John Wilkes Booth.

DOJ_NMG_0070763

The Quill Awards are the "people's choice" of the publishing industry. Mr. Swanson could use a little grass roots-support from those who appreciate a candid take on history. Balloting is open until Sept. 30 at www.quillsvote.com. The awards will be broadcast on NBC in October.

Wounded also-rans

News that Cleveland lost its bid to host the 2008 Republican National Convention "broke some hearts" in the strongly Democratic-leaning city yesterday, the Akron Beacon Journal reported. The chairwoman of the nine-member site-selection committee, Jo Ann Davidson, contacted Ohio Republican Party Chairman Bob Bennett personally to deliver the news that Minneapolis-St. Paul had won the convention derby.

"I'm terribly disappointed in that," Mr. Bennett said.

Things weren't much better down in Tampa, Fla., which has been "jilted" despite "good vibes" from the Republican National Committee, according to the Tampa Bay Business Journal.

"Picking Minneapolis at this time goes against information distributed by the RNC on site visits," the journal said.

Pastry faced

To drive home Democrats' argument that the Republican-approved Medicare prescription-drug program contains gaps, or "holes" in coverage, Rep. Pete Stark yesterday brought a box of doughnut holes to share with Republican colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee, reports The Washington Times' Amy Fagan.

With dramatic flair, Mr. Stark, California Democrat, complained that most of the 40 million Medicare beneficiaries "are still suffering through the doughnut hole" of coverage that Republicans created in the program.

Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, California Republican, replied that the program is designed to allow the private market to fill any gaps in drug coverage, just like the real doughnut industry figured out a way to make money from doughnut scraps. "If you allow the private sector to perform, they will," he said.

Rep. Nancy L. Johnson, Connecticut Republican, said low-income people don't have coverage gaps under the program and only a "minority" of beneficiaries do. Despite the political squabble, real doughnut holes are a bipartisan dish: Democrats and Republicans alike passed around the box and polished off the contents.

Ballot ballet

Their hanging chad detectors will be in full working operation, no doubt. Democrats are busy lining up teams of lawyers across the country to "fight what they allege could be GOP efforts to suppress voters" on Election Day, the Columbus (Ohio) Dispatch reports.

The Democratic National Committee has set up a toll-free hot line for voters "with problems" on Nov. 7 and boasts it has volunteer lawyers poised in 18 states "to fight ballot challenges." Republicans remain unruffled.

"They're going to have an awful lot of people standing around with nothing to do," said Bill Todd, a Republican lawyer in Ohio who expects to help out his state party on the big day.

Arnold's Turnaround (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

SACRAMENTO -- The Terminator has rescued himself from political ruin by reinventing his approach to government, thus demonstrating in the most dramatic way possible the value of political independence.

Just 10 months after California voters rejected all four of the ballot initiatives he put before them and sent his personal approval ratings crashing to dangerous depths, Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is riding high, poised to win a full term come November.

Instead of the partisan assault on public employee unions and Democratic legislators (a.k.a. "girlie men") that marked his rhetoric in 2005, Schwarzenegger has negotiated agreements this year on a minimum-wage increase, higher school spending, curbing air pollution and a mega-bond sale designed to meet overdue highway, flood-control and school-construction needs.

Democratic leaders of the legislature, who a year ago were ready to cut Schwarzenegger's throat politically, now sing his praises and join him on the platform at bill-signing ceremonies, while the unions debate whether it is worthwhile to put money into the rival campaign of the struggling Democratic nominee, state Treasurer Phil Angelides.

This turnaround, likely to yield a notable Republican victory in a year of widespread GOP losses, began within a week of Schwarzenegger's humiliation in the November 2005 special election he had called in hopes of trumping the legislature and passing four initiatives that would have curbed the unions and expanded his power to run the state his way.

He immediately and publicly said that he had misjudged the electorate but had heard the voters' message: Cut the partisan rhetoric and get back to work on the real problems facing the state.

DOJ_NMG_0070764

He signaled the change by hiring as his new chief of staff Susan Kennedy, a lifelong Democrat who had served as executive director of the state party and a key aide to former governor Gray Davis, the man Schwarzenegger beat in the recall election of 2003.

The other day, puffing a cigar in the smoking tent Schwarzenegger built in the courtyard of the smoke-free capitol, Kennedy talked about the new regime.

The governor still has very large goals, she said, citing the billions in construction bonds he has placed on the ballot in November. Those goals, she said, proved irresistible to the Democrats, "who salivate at the thought of spending $50 billion." But they also represent a political risk -- it will be a struggle to pass even one or two, polls show -- by a man "who is not afraid to fail, because he picks himself right up and goes back for more."

Were Schwarzenegger not that resilient and resourceful, he never would have made it out of Austria, to the top of the body-building world, to a business career, Hollywood stardom and now striking success in politics, all of which Joe Mathews describes in his excellent new political biography, "The People's Machine: Arnold Schwarzenegger and the Rise of Blockbuster Democracy."

Along the way, as one of the governor's aides told me, Schwarzenegger became an expert at marketing himself, "and to market yourself, you have to reinvent yourself."

The biggest reinvention came inside the governor's own head. A year ago, when I interviewed him on the eve of the special election, Schwarzenegger expressed burning frustration with the political, bureaucratic and interest-group barriers to his accomplishing great goals for his state.

After the failure of his effort to bypass all those barriers through direct appeal to the voters, an old Sacramento hand was summoned for help by the governor and his wife, Maria Shriver. Schwarzenegger was told he needed to learn one thing: patience.

Amazingly to some, he has learned it, and now works comfortably, convivially, on forging compromises with the very same Democratic legislators and lobbyists he once tried to run out of town. In turn, they have responded by cooperating instead of conniving to defeat or embarrass him.

Schwarzenegger's abandonment of a partisan posture has not cost him significant support in his own party, for a simple reason. As the only major Republican elected in this Democratic capitol, he stands as the barrier to higher taxes and more stringent regulation of business.

More important, his current political posture mirrors the makeup of this complex state, where the only growing political group consists of those who decline to state a party preference and where myriad competing racial, ethnic and geographic forces require political leadership with dexterity and flexibility.

Schwarzenegger is providing his party -- and the country -- with an object lesson in how to survive and thrive in that kind of independent political environment. Others will have to learn.

Democrats Follow Clinton's Lead In Ripping Fox News (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

Nearly a week after Bill Clinton's angry appearance on "Fox News Sunday," Democrats have turned their vitriol on the Fox News Channel, in what some consider a calculated move to boost the left's enthusiasm before midterm elections.

"It fires up our base, because they're glad someone is fighting back and setting the record straight," said Democratic strategist Donna Brazile.

Since the former president's interview with Fox's Chris Wallace was taped last Friday, high-profile Democrats, including California Sen. Barbara Boxer and strategist James Carville, have joined Mr. Clinton's criticism of the cable news network. Fox's critics say the persistent questioning of Mr. Clinton's record on terrorism is indicative of what they consider a conservative bias.

"I do think this is helpful to Democrats for Clinton to go after Fox directly. It's a smart play," said Brendan Nyhan, former co-editor of the nonpartisan online watchdog Spinsanity. "Liberals are excited to see someone high-profile go after Fox News explicitly."

Politicians attacking the media is nothing new. A perceived liberal bias in the mainstream press has been a staple of Republican strategy for decades.

"A reporter has a right to ask tough questions about the issues of the day," said Michael X. Delli Carpini, dean of the Annenberg School for Communication at the University of Pennsylvania. "The real question is the larger context it's being done in. It's not an unreasonable feeling on the part of Democrats."

Mr. Nyhan says Mr. Clinton's continued popularity with Democrats helps give his criticism of Fox legitimacy.

DOJ_NMG_0070765

On Tuesday, Mrs. Boxer told Fox News anchor Jane Skinner, "I hear that you agree with the [President Bush]. I am not surprised."

Meanwhile, during an appearance on MSNBC, former Democratic National Committee (DNC) Chairman Terry McAuliffe told host Tucker Carlson, "I know Chris Wallace, I have appeared on the Fox Sunday show many times with Chris Wallace. Let me be crystal clear: Roger Ailes [conservative president of Fox News] pays his paycheck. He is a tool of the Republican Party. ... He is what he is, and let's not deceive ourselves."

Many of Mr. Wallace's colleagues have defended his journalistic credentials, noting his previous stints with ABC and NBC. Nonetheless, DNC Chairman Howard Dean echoed Mr. McAuliffe's sentiment in an e-mail to supporters on Monday, in which he accused Fox of engaging in "right-wing revisionist history from the propaganda machine."

Despite all the criticism, some think Fox stands to gain as much from the controversy as the Democrats. The interview with Mr. Clinton gave "Fox News Sunday" its highest ratings since the capture of deposed Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein in 2003.

"It's the Howard Stern effect," Mr. Nyhan said. "You have half the audience listening because they love it and half listening because they hate it."

Giuliani Comes To Clinton's Defense Over Terrorism Preparedness (BRAH)

By Matt Sedensky

The Bradenton Herald, September 28, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. - Former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani defended Bill Clinton on Wednesday over the former president's counterterrorism efforts, saying recent criticism on preventing the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks is wrong.

Political bickering over which president - Clinton or George W. Bush - missed more opportunities to prevent the attacks has been escalating since Clinton gave a combative interview on "Fox News Sunday" in which he defended his efforts to kill Osama bin Laden.

"The idea of trying to cast blame on President Clinton is just wrong for many, many reasons, not the least of which is I don't think he deserves it," Giuliani said in response to a question after an appearance with fellow Republican Charlie Crist, who is running for governor. "I don't think President Bush deserves it. The people who deserve blame for Sept. 11, I think we should remind ourselves, are the terrorists - the Islamic fanatics - who came here and killed us and want to come here again and do it."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice challenged Clinton's claim that he did more than many of his conservative critics to pursue bin Laden, and she accused the Democrat of leaving no comprehensive plan to fight al-Qaida.

Giuliani said he believed Clinton, like his successor, did everything he could with the information he was provided.

"Every American president I've known would have given his life to prevent an attack like that. That includes President Clinton, President Bush," the former mayor said outside a firehouse here. "They did the best they could with the information they had at the time."

Giuliani also said a recently declassified report that said the Iraq war had become a "cause celebre" for Islamic extremists demonstrated the need to continue the fight there.

"The jihadists very much want a victory in Iraq. They feel that if they could defeat us in Iraq they will have a great victory for terrorism," Giuliani said. "What that should do is organize us to say if they want a big victory in Iraq then we have to deprive them of that victory."

Giuliani said he was "very interested in considering" a run for president but would not make a decision until after the November election.

Is There Life After 'Macaca'? (WSJ)

WSJ letter – LATimes, 9/11 movie, September 28, 2006

In regard to Howard Dean's Sept. 22 editorial-page commentary "'Democrats Offer a New Direction'":

I thought, this is it. Here is the op-ed piece that lays out the specifics of the Democratic agenda. After all, this is the chairman of the DNC proclaiming "a new direction." Nope. Howard Dean simply bashes the Bush administration with undocumented, cherry-picked economic data and then follows it up by saying the Democrats will offer, among other things, "honesty in government" and "a defense policy that is tough and smart." That certainly started the heartbeat racing. And, oh yes -- the Democrats will also "have a jobs agenda that includes good jobs. . . ."

Until now I thought Sen. John Kerry's contributions to this page were short on substance, but Howard Dean just set the bar even lower.

Timothy O. Corkery

South Boston, Mass.

DOJ_NMG_0070766

We can smell November coming just by the general political rhetoric in the air. Mr. Dean's attacks and numbers twisting is the same old game played by the party out of office. Nothing is mentioned about the fact that 70% of Americans now own their own homes, that interest rates are the lowest in our lifetime, and that unemployment is at a decades low of 4.7%. Further, we see Mr. Dean is in the pocket of the same unions that brought us $80,000-a-year useless job banks at GM and Ford. Where can I sign up for that job?

Not that I can sit here and say the Bush camp has done everything right; they would have trouble explaining a multiplication table to a Harvard graduate. I am just troubled that as the political silly season starts it's the same old game, just with different players.

Kenneth Schnoll

Mahwah, N.J.

Mr. Dean devotes 11 paragraphs to why the Democrats don't like President Bush or the Republicans and three paragraphs of liberal pabulum with no substance nor explanation of how the Democrats will actually accomplish anything. He ends with, "We are ready to lead with a thoughtful, fiscally responsible long-term vision," but, as usual, never attempts to explain what that cherished vision is. Hello? Anybody home?

Richard A. Hansen

Carmel, Ind.

Asserting that the middle class fared better under Bill Clinton, Mr. Dean provides carefully selected data (from "Clinton's final year," Clinton's "last five years," and from 1980), implies causation by ignoring distortions (late 1990s bubble vs. 2001 recession, defense spending cuts vs. War on Terrorism), and contradicts history (the pay-as-you-go budgeting he favors leads to tax increases).

Curiously, he bemoans the increased cost of tuition. He then promises to reverse cuts in tuition aid, which would only fuel tuition inflation. And then he promises to keep good jobs in the U.S., though the abundance of good jobs is the reason people invest so in education.

Ted Riley

Washington

The only thing said by Howard Dean that could be remotely construed to be a concrete proposal is his pledge to "redeploy" U.S. troops from Iraq. Translation: "I, Howard Dean, propose that the Democrats cut and run in Iraq." And that's about as concrete as Democrats get when they try to address issues affecting their countrymen.

The rest of Mr. Dean's commentary focused on how "bad" our economy is. But with unemployment at historic lows, gas prices dropping, inflation in check, productivity high and Americans keeping more of what they earn (instead of paying it as income tax to the federal government), the U.S. economy is the envy of the world. Regarding the budget deficit: It is being steadily reduced because total tax collections are higher than ever before, thanks to a healthy economy that produces greater economic activity than ever before. So what is Mr. Dean complaining about? Does he really believe all this pre-election hot air?

Patrick Curry

Irvine, Calif.

Should Shareholders Nominate Directors?

In "SEC-Saw" (editorial page, Sept. 15), Ira M. Millstein and Harvey J. Goldschmid urge the SEC to continue its efforts to provide shareholders a voice in the director election process. It is worth clarifying that it is the director nomination part of the voting process that has been the focus of recent SEC attention, not voting itself.

Also, a point the authors use as an underpinning of their argument is that shareholders are still the providers of capital in our economy. While that is true for some companies, especially startups and IPOs, Adolf Berle recognized as early as 1932 that the primary sources of capital for the mature corporation come from retained earnings and debt, not from direct shareholder input. Shareholders in mature corporations provide liquidity in secondary markets, which is a very important function, but it isn't providing capital to the company. There may well be good arguments for greater shareholder involvement in director nominations, but their being providers of capital should not be one of them.

Finally, the authors recognize potential abuses of providing greater access to the director nomination process and suggest safeguards such as minimum holding periods. While I agree with that, I believe the potential abuses of greater access outweigh the benefits. But if the SEC does go forward with this I would suggest it consider another safeguard, one that would limit nomination authority to shareholders who do not own significant quantities of a competing corporation's stock in order to avoid, for example, major owners of Ford stock nominating directors to General Motors with all the potential conflicts of interest that would entail.

Donald Margotta

Associate Professor of Finance

DOJ_NMG_0070767

Northeastern University
Boston
L.A. Times Statement Regarding 'Path to 9/11'

On your Sept. 18 editorial page, Cyrus Nowrasteh wrote "The Path to Hysteria," in which he chronicled his experience of the scandal surrounding the television movie he wrote, "The Path to 9/11."

In his account, Mr. Nowrasteh wrote: "The L.A. Times, for one, characterized me by race, religion, ethnicity, country-of-origin and political leanings -- wrongly on four of five counts. To them I was an Iranian-American politically conservative Muslim. It is perhaps irrelevant in our brave new world of journalism that I was born in Boulder, Colo. I am not a Muslim or practitioner of any religion, nor am I a political conservative. What am I? I am, most devoutly, an American. I asked the reporter if this kind of labeling was a new policy for the paper. He had no response."

He was referring to a front-page article in the L.A. Times ("ABC Stands By Its 9/11 Story -- Almost," Sept. 9) in which Scott Collins and Tina Daunt described the writer as "a politically conservative Iranian American Muslim."

We would like to set the record straight, one point at a time.

Mr. Nowrasteh, as he wrote in The Wall Street Journal, has Iranian parents. Which would make him Iranian-American.

Mr. Nowrasteh's politics have been widely characterized as conservative in the Washington Post and elsewhere. Additionally, last October he appeared on a panel at the Liberty Film Festival that was named "Rebels With a Cause: How Conservatives Can Lead Hollywood's Next Paradigm Shift. "

In a Q&A interview with Libertas: A Forum for Conservative Thought on Film (http://www.libertyfilmfestival.com/libertas/index.php?p=462), Mr. Nowrasteh identified himself as "Islamic-American."

And finally, in his piece in the Journal, Mr. Nowrasteh also implied that he contacted the reporter about his complaints, and was ignored. This is not the case: Scott Collins spoke on the phone with Mr. Nowrasteh after the article came out.

AIDS Bill Is Dilemma For Clinton (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton
The Hill, September 28, 2006

An AIDS funding bill that has stalled on the Senate floor has put Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) in a difficult position — forcing her to choose between the interests of her home state and those of battleground states in the 2008 presidential election.

Elected officials and AIDS activists from Iowa, South Carolina, and Ohio are urging senators to pass the Ryan White Comprehensive AIDS Resources Emergency Act, which would increase their state's funding for people infected with HIV, the virus that causes AIDS.

A group of activists and officials are focusing their efforts on Clinton because she has the highest profile among the bill's opponents. They may also be calculating that they have most leverage with her because she is expected to run for president.

Iowa and South Carolina will host two of the earliest contests of the 2008 Democratic presidential primary, and Ohio is expected to be a crucial battleground.

The bill, also known as the Ryan White Care Act, reauthorizes federal funding to fight AIDS. It would steer money away from major urban areas in New York, New Jersey and California to smaller, more rural states that have seen a dramatic increase in HIV infections in recent years.

The bill, which was originally passed in 1990, expires at the end of this week, the end of the 2006 fiscal year. Without a reauthorization, federal funding will continue at current levels.

Clinton and her New York colleague, Sen. Charles Schumer (D), outlined their objections to the new funding formula in a recent letter to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-N.Y.).

"New York State stands to lose more than $78 million in Ryan White Title II funds over four years," they wrote. "Without modifications to address our concerns, we stand united on behalf of New Yorkers living with HIV/AIDS in objecting to this bill."

Clinton and Schumer also wrote that the bill would reduces grants to Buffalo and Albany and could cost New York City as much as $17 million in lost federal funds next year. They stated that they support providing funds needed by other areas of the country, but not at the cost of established programs in their state.

That position puts Clinton at odds with Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D), who urged for AIDS funding to be restructured in a letter to Sens. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.), the chairman of the Senate health committee, and Edward Kennedy (Mass.), the panel's ranking Democrat.

"Iowa is one of many rural states that receive no Title I funding at all," Vilsack wrote. "[M]any states, including Iowa, have been forced to institute waiting lists for treatment or other cost-containment measures. This is unacceptable. The CARE Act should fully fund all 50 states' [AIDS Drug Assistance Programs]."

DOJ_NMG_0070768

If Vilsack does not run for president himself, he could help one of the Democratic presidential contenders gain an edge in the January 2008 Iowa Caucuses. Even if he does run, Vilsack would still be influential in the outcome of the contest.

Enzi attempted and failed to get agreement to bring up the bill on the Senate floor Tuesday and will try again, said an aide.

Three prominent Democratic public officials from Ohio, a state that narrowly decided the 2004 presidential race, have pressured Clinton recently.

Donald Plusquellic, mayor of Akron, Rhine McLin, mayor of Dayton, and Mark Mallory, mayor of Cincinnati, have each written letters to Clinton since mid-August urging her to support the revised formulas in the reauthorization bill.

"The current act disproportionately rewards larger cities at the expense of medium sized cities such as Cincinnati," wrote Mallory. "This is especially important in states like Ohio with multiple urban centers. The reformed act would go a long way to address these funding deficiencies and greatly increase funding for many medium sized cities, including a potential increase of $79,000 to Cincinnati."

McLin highlighted the effect on African Americans, a substantial Democratic constituency in Ohio as well as in South Carolina.

"Here in Ohio, African Americans were 45 percent of new AIDS cases in 2004, according to the Centers for Disease Control. Nationally, African Americans were 48 percent of new AIDS cases that year, while in some Southern states the percentage reaches as high as 75 percent," wrote McLin.

Clinton is one of a small group of Democrats holding up the bill, said Craig Orfield, a spokesman for Enzi. He said that in addition to Clinton and Schumer, New Jersey Sens. Frank Lautenberg (D), Robert Menendez (D) and Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) are thought to oppose the bill.

Dr. Kent Stock, an infectious disease physician from Charleston, South Carolina, who has helped lobby local state legislators on the economic costs of not stopping the spread of HIV, said Clinton has emerged as the most prominent opponent in the eyes of local AIDS activists.

"Hillary has taken a lot of heat because a lot of people are saying that it's Hillary who's putting her foot down on this act. In reality, it's not just Hillary.

"She has become the figurehead. There are a lot of people saying that Hillary has the ability to move it forward or hold it up in Congress…She's protecting her turf as any good senator would do."

But Clinton's position may require her to answer tough questions if she campaigns in the South Carolina next year or in early 2008.

"I think its going to hurt persons with HIV first and foremost where African Americans in my state represent 73 percent of the people affected," said Dr. Bambi Gaddist, executive director of the South Carolina HIV/AIDS Council.

African Americans are estimated to make up a third or more of the Democratic electorate in the state.

State Rep. Joe Neal, an African-American Democrat from South Carolina, said about 300 people in his state diagnosed with HIV are on a waiting list to receive medical treatment. Passage of the Ryan White Care bill would eliminate the list, he said.

"The AIDS crisis is now shifting to the south fairly dramatically," said Neal, who has advocated for more funds. "I understand that the political reality that the senator faces in protecting her own state and her interest but this is a larger interest than just New York and I hope she would think about it in that context."

Clinton's staff did not respond to several requests for comment.

Bill Clinton's 60th Birthday Benefit Blowout (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Baby boomer and former president Bill Clinton is laying plans to celebrate his 60th birthday in grand style with a charitable fundraising extravaganza in New York late next month that will include an invitation-only concert by the Rolling Stones and contributor packages that run to $500,000 and higher.

Clinton's daughter, Chelsea, who has generally avoided high-profile participation in her parents' political and philanthropic activities, is serving as co-host of the three-day party. She will host a Saturday brunch on a weekend that also features a golf tournament at the Bayonne (N.J.) Golf Club, multiple receptions and a dinner at the American Museum of Natural History with the former president, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Chelsea.

"My mother and I are planning a weekend of events to commemorate his [Clinton's] 60th birthday," Chelsea Clinton writes in the invitation. "I know that he would want you to share this milestone -- so I hope you can join us in New York City this October 27th through the 29th."

The 2,100 invitations began arriving this week. Weekend packages start at $60,000 (Hint: $1,000 for every year of Clinton's age). Next is the "Vice Chair Package," for those who contribute $100,000 or raise $250,000. Those who pledge $500,000 or more will receive the "Birthday Chair Package," which includes the "Backstage Pass" dinner and photo with Clinton and platinum seating at the Saturday dinner and the Stones concert.

DOJ_NMG_0070769

The Rolling Stones will perform at the Beacon Theater, an art deco landmark on upper Broadway that seats about 3,000 people. According to the invitation, the concert will be taped for an upcoming Martin Scorsese movie about the band. Organizers of the event would not say whether the Stones will be paid for their appearance.

Space in the theater is expected to be at a premium, and members of the extended Clinton network who may not be able to afford the hefty price of admission for the weekend events already are maneuvering to find a way into the concert.

"It's a birthday party," Clinton spokesman Jay Carson said yesterday. "It's the New York birthday celebration for President Clinton."

Clinton turned 60 in August but organizers delayed the birthday fundraising event until late October to avoid any complaints from other Democrats that solicitation of money for the former president's foundation would soak up money that could otherwise be used to try to win back the House and Senate in November.

The proceeds will go to the William J. Clinton Foundation, the umbrella organization that oversees the Clinton HIV-AIDS initiative, the Clinton Global Initiative and several other programs launched by the former president since he left office almost six years ago.

Clinton collected more than $7 billion in commitments to his Global Initiative project last week in New York. His foundation staged an event similar to the planned October fundraiser in Toronto recently and collected approximately $20 million. Organizers won't put a figure on what they expect to raise in New York next month but are anticipating a significantly larger take than the Canadian event generated.

Former Democratic National Committee chairman Terry McAuliffe is listed as the co-host with Chelsea Clinton.

The celebration of all things Clinton will come less than two weeks before Hillary Clinton is expected to cruise to reelection, after which she will turn her attention to a possible 2008 presidential campaign.

She is widely expected to seek the presidency, although her husband and other advisers say she will not make a final decision until the 2006 campaign is over. No doubt the weekend celebration will prompt further speculation that she already has decided.

Twin Cities To Host 2008 GOP Convention (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, September 28, 2006

Republicans will hold their 2008 presidential convention in the Twin Cities of Minneapolis-St. Paul, choosing a location in the politically pivotal Midwest.

Party and state officials announced the selection Wednesday. The convention is slated for Sept. 1-4, 2008.

"This is fantastic news," Republican Gov. Tim Pawlenty said. "We're very, very pleased."

Losing out were New York City, Cleveland and a joint bid from Tampa and St. Petersburg, Fla., other cities that had sought the convention.

The four-day event will be held at the Xcel Energy Center in St. Paul, Minn., a concert venue and the home of the National Hockey League's Minnesota Wild.

Democrats also had been considering holding their convention in the Twin Cities, but the Republican announcement left Democrats with two competing cities to choose from _ New York and Denver.

The Republican National Committee will vote in January to affirm the decision of the party's site selection committee. GOP officials say approval is assured.

By picking the Twin Cities for 2008, the GOP will ensure plenty of news coverage in media markets in Minnesota, Wisconsin and Iowa _ all battleground states in the 2004 election and ones expected to be competitive in the next presidential race.

"The heartland of America," said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. "Whoever wins those states is going to be the next president of the United States."

Minnesota had been seen by some as an unlikely host, with just 10 electoral votes and the nation's longest streak of voting for Democratic presidential candidates.

In 2004, Democrat John Kerry won the state 51 percent to 48 percent. The last Republican to win a presidential race in the state was Richard Nixon in 1972 and the last national convention happened in when the GOP backed President Benjamin Harrison in his unsuccessful re-election bid.

Minnesota's political landscape, however, has shifted right in recent years. It has become less of a Democratic bastion and more of a swing- voting state, a change attributed in part to population growth in the Twin Cities suburbs.

DOJ_NMG_0070770

The state was a hard-fought battleground in the 2004 and 2000 presidential elections, and in 2002, Minnesota elected Pawlenty, a Republican, as governor and Coleman as senator.

"Our stereotype is that we're cold and liberal and Democratic, and we're still cold," said Steven Schier, a political scientist at Carleton College in Northfield, Minn.

In the 2004 general election, 38 percent of Minnesota voters identified themselves as Democrats, while 35 percent called themselves Republicans, according to exit poll data. Twenty-seven percent identified as independents or "something else."

With the convention, the GOP hopes to court voters in a region Republican and Democratic strategists alike say will play a critical role in winning the White House in 2008. The GOP held its last convention in New York City, a Democratic stronghold where GOP delegates nominated President Bush for a second term.

Democrats, who last met in Boston, plan to hold their convention Aug. 25-28, and will announce a location later this fall. A spokesman said 11 sites expressed interest in having the party's convention, but only four completed the proposals. New Orleans later withdrew its bid, leaving Denver, New York City and Minneapolis-St. Paul.

But Minneapolis Mayor R.T. Rybak has said that because of timing and logistics, the Twin Cities can't host both conventions. The two conventions are scheduled for consecutive weeks.

Democrats said the competition for their convention now is between two cities.

"The DNC was thrilled to have three great American cities submit strong bids for the 2008 Democratic National Convention. We are looking forward to working with Denver and New York as we make our final decision," said Stacie Paxton, a Democratic party spokeswoman.

Denver's chances, however, may be hampered by their lack of unionized hotel workers. Democrats acknowledge that labor, a strong party constituency, could object to a site that didn't have unionized hotels.

The Twin Cities are the two largest in the state with a combined population of more than 650,000, and the metropolitan region straddles the Mississippi River.

In Minnesota, the effort to woo a national political convention has been a bipartisan affair, with the two big-city mayors, both Democrats, joining forces with top Republicans. They argued that Minnesota is a critical part of an Upper Midwest region that combined offers 27 electoral votes.

The GOP convention will coincide with the Minnesota State Fair, and state officials have predicted a national political convention would boost the Twin Cities economy by about $150 million.

____

Associated Press Writers Philip Elliott and Fred Frommer in Washington and Martiga Lohn in St. Paul, Minn., contributed to this report.

____

Republican National Committee: http://www.rnc.org

Xcel Energy Center: http://www.xcelenergycenter.com

Copyright 2006 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed.

NEWS WEB

BREITBART FINANCE

Symbol Lookup

©2006 BREITBART.COM, LLC.

ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.

Advertise | Contact Us | Design by Marc Atlan

Republicans Pick Twin Cities For 2008 Presidential Convention (MCT)

By Rob Hotakainen And Kevin Diaz

McClatchy Newspapers, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - Minnesota's emergence as a presidential battleground state paid off Wednesday when the Republican Party announced that it had chosen Minneapolis and St. Paul to host its 2008 National Convention.

The Twin Cities beat three other finalists: New York, Cleveland and Tampa, Fla. It will be the first time the Twin Cities have hosted a national convention since 1892, when Republicans nominated Benjamin Harrison for president.

The convention is scheduled for Sept. 1-4, 2008, at the Xcel Energy Center in St. Paul, a week after Democrats nominate their candidate. The Twin Cities also had been competing against New York and Denver to host the Democratic convention, but that bid is now dead.

"We want to congratulate the Twin Cities. ... We are looking forward to working with Denver and New York as we make our final decision," said Stacie Paxton, a spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee.

Republican National Committee co-chairwoman Jo Ann Davidson said the GOP chose the Twin Cities in a voice vote of the nine-member selection committee. She declined to disclose the final tally but said "it was not unanimous." The deciding factor, she said, wasn't politics, but rather logistics such as arenas, work space, transportation, security and the number of hotel rooms.

"This was a strictly business decision on our part," she said. "The committee decided that Minneapolis was the best choice."

RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman credited the Twin Cities' bipartisan host committee, but particularly Republican Sen. Norm Coleman, the former St. Paul mayor, who faces his first re-election bid in 2008.

"The house that Norm built is likely to be the place where the next president of the United States is introduced to the American people," Mehlman said.

Coleman said he was thrilled by the decision, saying it would "showcase Minnesota to a worldwide audience."

"When we built the Xcel Energy Center, we dreamed of bringing hockey back to Minnesota, but never the Super Bowl of politics," he said.

The GOP's decision, expected to be ratified in January by the party's national committee, drew an angry response from some Democrats, who expected their national convention to be in the Twin Cities.

Rick Stafford, a member of the executive committee of the Democratic National Committee from Minneapolis, said negotiations set for next week "would have pretty much cemented the deal." He said the GOP's decision showed that Republicans "cannot keep their honor in the site-selection process." He said as the non-incumbent party, the Democrats should have chosen their site first in keeping with tradition.

"It just follows their whole scorched-earth ... philosophy that's running true to form this year," said Stafford, adding that "all the signals" indicated that Republicans were going to allow Democrats to choose their site first. He speculated that word got out that Democrats wanted the Twin Cities and that local Republicans pressured the RNC to act quickly if it wanted to nail down the Twin Cities as its site.

"I'm kind of angry about it," Stafford said. "I mean, all is fair in love and war and politics, but I think it sets a tone: Are we going to go through this every four years now, this kind of game?"

Republicans rejected Stafford's arguments, noting that they picked first when they took their convention to New York in 2004.

"Quite frankly, that's nonsense," Davidson said. "I have no idea what tradition they're discussing."

In Minnesota, city officials seemed inclined to put politics aside in favor of local boosterism.

"What this confirms to us is that the Twin Cities can compete with any region in the country, any city in the country, " said St. Paul Mayor Chris Coleman, a Democrat. "We're going to host this convention in grand scale."

Civic boosters say landing a national political convention could bring 20,000 people and $150 million to the Twin Cities metro area. That will include thousands of journalists and media organizations from around the world. Some 95 hotels in Bloomington, Minneapolis and St. Paul are expected to hold an estimated 17,000 delegates, donors and staff.

Analysts said the GOP's choice will allow the party to capitalize on major media markets in Minnesota, Wisconsin and Iowa, three states that figured prominently in the 2004 election.

"The Midwest has become strategic ground," said David Schultz, who teaches politics at the Hamline University in St. Paul. "Bring the convention here, get the faithful excited and spotlight that you care about the Midwest and farmers."

Schultz said it's also a "symbolic black eye" to Minnesota Democrats trying to keep alive the spirit of Hubert Humphrey and Paul Wellstone.

"It's a purple state now, and Republicans increasingly view this as a winnable state," he said.

GOP Picks Minnesota For 2008 Convention (USAT)

By John Bacon And Sarah Elkins

USA Today, September 28, 2006

Republicans will hold their 2008 national convention in the Twin Cities of Minneapolis-St. Paul, party and state officials said Wednesday. The convention is scheduled for Sept. 1-4. Losing out were New York City, Cleveland and Tampa-St. Petersburg. The event will be held at the Xcel Energy Center in St. Paul, home of the National Hockey League's Minnesota Wild. Democrats also had been considering the Twin Cities. The announcement left Democrats with two competing cities to choose from: New York and Denver. By picking the Twin Cities, the GOP will ensure plenty of news coverage in Minnesota, Wisconsin and Iowa, all of which were close in the 2004 election, said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. "Whoever wins those states is going to be the next president of the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0070772

Obama rallies for Md. Senate candidate

Sen. Barack Obama, D- Ill., traveled to College Park, Md., to endorse the Democratic Senate bid of Rep. Ben Cardin. Cardin's opponent, Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, would join Obama as the only black senators if elected. Cardin, who is white, defeated former NAACP head Kweisi Mfume for the nomination. A political analyst who tracks black voting behavior, David Bositis of the Washington-based Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, said Cardin is "probably taking special care" to reach out to black voters.

Snow a headliner for GOP fundraising

White House spokesman Tony Snow is in high demand on the Republican fundraising circuit. Snow will speak at several fundraisers before the Nov. 7 elections. The former TV and radio host said the White House political office contacted him and said GOP groups wanted him as a speaker. Calling such activity "unplowed ground," Snow said he checked with the White House counsel's office before agreeing. He has spoken in Pennsylvania and has dates with Republicans from Minnesota, Ohio and Kentucky. Snow said he will be promoting President Bush's policies, not "railing against Democrats." — David Jackson

Lamont cuts $750K check to campaign

Connecticut Democratic Senate nominee Ned Lamont directed $750,000 toward his campaign this week. Lamont, who spent almost $4 million of his own money defeating Sen. Joe Lieberman in the primary, has written checks totaling $2.25 million for the general election. Lamont estimates his net worth at $90 million to $300 million. Lieberman is running as an independent in the fall campaign.

GOP To Go To Minnesota (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, September 28, 2006

Republicans chose the Twin Cities in Minnesota over Cleveland, Tampa, Fla., and New York as the site for their 2008 presidential nominating convention.

The convention proper will be held in Xcel Energy Center in St. Paul, where the Minnesota Wild National Hockey League team plays, but Minnesota officials said the decision holds broad economic impact for the region. The convention could bring in as much as $150 million, officials said.

Democrats were also considering holding their convention in 2008 in the Twin Cities. But the Democratic mayors of St. Paul and Minneapolis expressed no regret that their cities would host the showcase event for the rival party.

"Republicans have more money than Democrats," said St. Paul Mayor Chris Coleman.

The Twin Cities last hosted a national political convention in 1892, when Republicans nominated Benjamin Harrison for president.

Minnesota traditionally votes for the Democratic candidate for president, but the margin has narrowed in recent years.

G.O.P. Picks Twin Cities As '08 Site Of Convention (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — Republican officials announced Wednesday that they had chosen Minneapolis and St. Paul as the site of the party's 2008 presidential nominating convention.

It is the first time in nearly three decades that they have selected a site in the Midwest, which has become increasingly contested by both parties.

The decision prompted Democrats to drop their consideration of the Twin Cities, leaving them to choose between just two remaining contenders — Denver and New York City, where Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg is making a forceful push. Democratic officials are expected to make their decision within several weeks.

Republicans insisted their choice had not been politically driven. But in choosing Minneapolis and St. Paul over three other bidders — Tampa, Cleveland and New York, where President Bush had his re-election convention in 2004 — the party guaranteed itself widespread news media attention in three adjoining swing states, Minnesota, Iowa and Wisconsin. The convention is scheduled for Sept. 1-4, 2008.

In a nod to Senator Norm Coleman, Republican of Minnesota, who championed the proposal put forward by his home state, the Republican National Committee chairman, Ken Mehlman, said: "The house that Norm built is likely to be the place where the next president of the United States is introduced to the American people."

DOJ_NMG_0070773

The site selection is often a delicate dance for the two parties, who frequently consider some of the same cities and compete for attention at every step of the planning process. In making their announcement on Wednesday, Republican officials beat Democrats in laying claim to Minneapolis, which submitted proposals to both parties. Minnesota narrowly voted for Democratic presidential contenders in both 2000 and 2004, but was considered a target state in both races.

While Democratic officials originally had four cities to choose from, an early contestant, New Orleans, took itself out of the running when it became clear that its hurricane damage would not be repaired in time.

With Minneapolis out of contention, Democrats are now weighing whether Denver — an appealing Western spot in an increasingly volatile state — has enough union-run hotels to play host to their convention, which is sometimes larger than that of the Republicans. New York City has cleared the logistical bar for having the convention, officials said, but as a widely Democratic state, New York holds less political appeal than Colorado. And a potential Democratic presidential candidate, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, represents New York.

The last time Republican officials headed to the Midwest for a convention was 1980, when Ronald Reagan was nominated in Detroit. Democrats, who held their last conventions in Boston and Los Angeles, held their last middle-of-the-country convention in Chicago in 1996.

With Eye On Midwest In '08, GOP Picks Twin Cities For Convention (WP)

By Peter Slevin And Dan Balz

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

CHICAGO, Sept. 27 -- The Twin Cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul will host the 2008 Republican National Convention, the GOP announced Wednesday in an early signal of the likely significance of the Midwest in the next presidential election.

Moving away from the coasts for the first time in 16 years -- and choosing the Twin Cities for the first time since 1892 -- the Republicans also preempted the Democrats, who had narrowed their own convention selection to three sites, including Minneapolis-St. Paul.

The Democrats will now choose between New York and Denver, a spokeswoman said.

Steven Schier, a prominent Minnesota political commentator on the faculty of Carleton College, said the timing and the tactics suggest that the national Republican Party hopes to help its Minnesota candidates this year and appeal to voters in a swath of battleground states in 2008.

"This should not be considered just a Minnesota choice," he said. "You've got three swing states: Minnesota, Wisconsin and Iowa. We're very much a battleground state. We were in '04 and we will be in '08. Same in Wisconsin, same in Iowa."

In 2004, President Bush squeaked past Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) in Iowa by 10,000 votes, while Kerry finished 11,000 votes ahead of Bush in neighboring Wisconsin. Kerry beat Bush in Minnesota by 100,000 votes out of 3 million cast. Even so, that Minnesota was competitive at all was a sign of changing times in a state that for decades was dominated by nationally prominent Democrats such as Hubert H. Humphrey, Eugene McCarthy and Walter F. Mondale.

Parties tend to consider convention locations a symbol, although the effect is often minimal. In 1980, the last time the Republicans chose the Midwest, delegates convened in Detroit to highlight Ronald Reagan's determination to win blue-collar votes, a successful strategy.

The GOP chose Philadelphia in 2000, hoping to boost Bush's chances in a tightly contested state, but he lost there in 2000 and 2004.

This time around, Republicans had narrowed the choice to the Twin Cities or Tampa after ruling out Cleveland. With memories of Hurricane Katrina still fresh, Florida's chances were hurt by the fact that the Sept. 1-4 convention comes in the heart of storm season.

The Democrats, who expect to choose a host city by the end of the year, will focus on two that have potentially serious liabilities, said one Democrat familiar with the search.

New York's principal drawback is its cost, while Denver's primary problem centers on its trade union status.

Although the Democrats see the Rocky Mountain West as an area of potential electoral growth, Denver has labor problems, including a shortage of union hotels. That could make it difficult for a party that relies heavily on union campaign money and muscle to justify choosing the Mile-High City as its host.

Officials from the party and the city are working to see if these obstacles can be overcome.

As the political leadership of Minnesota and the Twin Cities celebrated their victory on Wednesday, St. Paul Mayor Chris Coleman (D) said he thinks the Democrats would have chosen the Twin Cities if Republicans hadn't. "The good news about the Republicans choosing us instead of the Democrats," Coleman joked, "is they have more money."

Balz reported from Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0070774

GOP Will Convene In Battleground (RC)

By Tory Newmyer And Jamie Weinstein

Roll Call, September 28, 2006

The GOP has chosen the Twin Cities of Minneapolis-St. Paul for its 2008 presidential convention, Republicans announced Wednesday.

In choosing the Gopher State's metropolitan center, the party passed over New York City, Cleveland, and a joint bid from Tampa and St. Petersburg, Fla., and signaled that the upper Midwest could be a focus of Republican efforts to hold the White House in two years.

The selection pre-empts Democrats, who also were considering Minneapolis-St. Paul for their convention. Though the parties occasionally have held their conventions in the same city, Democratic Party rules now dictate that they hold their confab in a separate location, a DNC official said.

That means Democrats now must choose between the remaining two finalists, New York and Denver. That decision is expected in coming weeks. The two conventions are scheduled to be held within days of each other.

In a conference call, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said, "The fact is [Minneapolis] is likely to be the place the next president of the United States is introduced to the American people."

Political observers immediately began to speculate about the selection's meaning for Republican strategy during the next presidential campaign.

Minnesota, with a modest 10 electoral votes, hasn't backed a GOP presidential candidate since Richard Nixon in 1972. But margins in the state have narrowed, and it was a key battleground in the 2004 election, with Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) carrying it by just 3 points.

By convening in Minnesota, Republicans also would be able to reach media markets in Iowa and Wisconsin, several observers noted.

"I think it's the new Minnwisiowa of politics," said Sarah Janecek of the online newsletter Politics in Minnesota.

Blois Olson, of the same publication, said Republicans "think they can win Minnesota. They want to show their strength here."

Minnesota lawmakers from both parties welcomed the news as well as the expected economic boon it promises. But they were divided about the impact the convention is likely to have on regional politics.

Republican Rep. John Kline said the event will help throw the region into play. "It's going to help bring attention to a very important part of the country," he said.

But retiring Democratic Rep. Martin Sabo predicted that any Republican candidate will have a hard time in the state.

"I think the Bush legacy will have an impact on the 2008 elections," he said. "He's not very popular in Minnesota."

Lobbyist David Norcross, a partner at Blank Rome, was one of eight members on the RNC's site selection committee. He said the committee took its vote Wednesday morning at the RNC's offices.

Norcross said the region's Xcel Energy Center, where the main festivities will be held, stood out as a key factor in the decision. "It is state of the art," said Norcross, who served as chairman of the committee on arrangements for the Republican National Convention in 2004 in New York City.

"The media work space is really really spectacular. It's all very impressive." Norcross said now Republicans will "begin to negotiate the finer points" of holding the convention in the Twin Cities.

Though the Democrats might have been a good fit with the Twin Cities, they "would have presented a serious logistical problem because they have many more delegates than the Republicans do," said Carleton College professor Steven Schier. "There would have been a real shortage of hotel rooms. They would have had to put people in Rochester, two hours south, and bused them in."

In the meantime, the selection of the Twin Cities puts extra pressure on Republican candidates to perform well in the state this fall, so as not to be embarrassed going into 2008.

GOP Rep. Mark Kennedy, who's running for a Senate seat being vacated by Democrat Mark Dayton, is widely thought to be trailing Democrat Amy Klobuchar by double digits even though he began the race as a highly touted recruit. Republican Gov. Tim Pawlenty appears to have a modest lead over Democrat Mike Hatch in his bid for a second term, while two GOP-held House seats, one held by Gil Gutknecht and the one being vacated by Kennedy, are considered competitive. Democrats also have high hopes of flipping the GOP-held state House.

In 2008, Sen. Norm Coleman will be up for re-election. Comedian and author Al Franken, a liberal Democrat, has sent strong signals about his interest in running for the seat. Such a matchup would be a marquee race.

DOJ_NMG_0070775

RNC Picks Twin Cities For 2008 (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

Minnesota's Twin Cities, Minneapolis and St. Paul, will host the Republican Party's 2008 nominating convention from Sept. 1 to Sept. 4, Ken Mehlman, the party's national chairman said yesterday.

The RNC's site-election committee rejected elaborate bids from New York -- the site of the highly successful 2004 Republican convention and secret favorite of many Republican officials and operatives -- as well as from Cleveland and a joint bid from Tampa and St. Petersburg, Fla.

Party leaders yesterday called their choice a strategically important decision.

"Republicans will choose their presidential nominee in the heart of the heartland -- the Twin Cities will host the Republican National Convention, which says Republicans care about the Midwest," Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota Republican, told The Washington Times.

"Whoever takes my state and two of the other states next to us that the Democrats won last time will be the next president," said Mr. Coleman, a Republican who defeated former Vice President Walter Mondale in 2002 after incumbent Sen. Paul Wellstone died in a plane crash.

Mr. Coleman noted the Twin Cities media markets extend into not only Minnesota, but Wisconsin and Iowa and part of Illinois, prime battlegrounds last time. Iowa narrowly went Republican in 2004, but Minnesota, which hasn't backed a Republican presidential candidate since Richard M. Nixon in 1972, preferred Democrat John Kerry by 3.5 percentage points.

President Bush also lost the other big Midwestern states last time. Illinois's 21 electoral votes went to Mr. Kerry, as did Michigan's 17 electoral votes and Wisconsin's 10, although Mr. Kerry carried that state by less than one percentage point

"You need a broad-based community to make this [convention] work, and we have Democratic mayors in Minneapolis and St. Paul and a Republican governor and a Republican senator," Mr. Coleman said.

The decision to go with Minnesota also showcases one of the Republican Party's rising young conservative stars, Gov. Tim Pawlenty, 45, who was going to run for the Senate in 2002 until Vice President Dick Cheney persuaded him to run for governor instead so that Mr. Coleman could make his run against Mr. Wellstone without a primary fight.

All smiles yesterday, Mr. Pawlenty, a favorite of Mr. Mehlman's for vice president in 2008, called the choice of the Twin Cities "fantastic." Mr. Coleman used the same word to describe the convention accommodations, at the Xcel Energy Center in St. Paul.

The Democratic National Committee momentarily put partisanship aside to "congratulate the Twin Cities," which the Democrats had also been considering.

DNC spokeswoman Stacie Paxton said her committee "was thrilled to have three great American cities submit strong bids for the 2008 Democratic National Convention. We are looking forward to working with Denver and New York as we make our final decision. The Twin Cities is a great community and this announcement is good news for the cities."

Scientists Form Group To Support Science-Friendly Candidates (NYT)

By Cornelia Dean

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

Several prominent scientists said yesterday that they had formed an organization dedicated to electing politicians “who respect evidence and understand the importance of using scientific and engineering advice in making public policy.”

Organizers of the group, Scientists and Engineers for America, said it would be nonpartisan, but in interviews several said Bush administration science policies had led them to act. The issues they cited included the administration’s position on climate change, its restrictions on stem cell research and delays in authorizing the over-the-counter sale of emergency contraception.

In a statement posted on its Web site (www.sefora.org), the group said scientists and engineers had an obligation “to enter the political debate when the nation’s leaders systematically ignore scientific evidence and analysis, put ideological interest ahead of scientific truths, suppress valid scientific evidence and harass and threaten scientists for speaking honestly about their research.”

The group’s organizers include John H. Gibbons and Neal Lane, who were science advisers in the Clinton administration, the Nobel laureates Peter Agre and Alfred Gilman, and Susan F. Wood, who resigned from the Food and Drug Administration last year to protest the agency’s delay in approving over-the-counter sales of the so-called Plan B emergency contraception.

“The issues we are talking about happen to be issues in which the administration’s record is quite poor,” Dr. Lane said. But he said the goal was to protect “the integrity of science” so that Americans could have confidence in the government’s science-based decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0070776

Mike Brown, the group's executive director, said it would be a 527 organization under tax laws, meaning that it could be involved in electoral politics, and that contributions to the group would not be tax deductible. He said it would focus its resources — Internet advertising, speakers and other events — on races in which science issues play a part.

The group is looking at the Senate race in Virginia between George Allen, the incumbent Republican, and James Webb, a Democrat; a stem cell ballot issue in Missouri; the question of intelligent design in Ohio; and Congressional races in Washington State, Mr. Brown said.

In what it described as a Bill of Rights for scientists and engineers, the group said that researchers who receive federal funds should be free to discuss their work publicly, and that appointments to federal scientific advisory committees should be based on scientific qualifications, not political beliefs. It said the government should not support science education programs that "include concepts that are derived from ideology," an apparent reference to creationism and its ideological cousin, intelligent design.

And it said the government should not publish false or misleading scientific information, something Dr. Wood said occurred when the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention briefly posted an item on its Web site suggesting that abortion was linked to breast cancer.

Checkout For An Undemocratic Checkoff (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Unalloyed good news is rare, so rejoice: The foremost achievement of the political speech regulators -- a.k.a. campaign finance "reformers" -- is collapsing. Taxpayer financing of presidential campaigns, which was in parlous condition in 2004, will die in 2008.

In 2000 and 2004 George W. Bush declined public funding -- and its accompanying restrictions on raising and spending money -- for the primaries, as did Howard Dean and John Kerry in 2004. In 2004 candidates accepting taxpayer funding were restricted to spending $45 million before the conventions. Bush and Kerry raised $269.6 million and $234.6 million, respectively, before the conventions. Any candidate who accepts public funding in the 2008 primaries will be considered second-tier. And almost certainly neither party's nominee will accept public funding for the fall campaign.

Taxpayer funding, enacted in 1974, empowered taxpayers to direct, by a checkoff on their income tax forms, that $1 of their tax bill be used to fund presidential campaigns. Even though the checkoff did not increase anyone's tax bill, participation peaked in 1981 at 28.7 percent -- a landslide "vote" of 71.3 percent against it. In 1993 Congress increased the checkoff's value to $3, thereby enabling fewer people to divert more money from the government's pool of revenue collected from everyone, including the 90 percent of taxpayers who now decline to participate.

It is delicious that the McCain-Feingold law, the reformers' most recent handiwork, is helping kill taxpayer financing of presidential campaigns. Before McCain-Feingold, limits on contributions of private money -- set in 1974 and not indexed for inflation -- became steadily more restrictive, so candidates accepted public funding. But McCain-Feingold, by doubling the permissible size of campaign contributions, made it easier for candidates to raise sums far larger than taxpayer funding provides.

Public funding was supposed to increase voter turnout by decreasing the cynicism supposedly caused by privately financed politics. But Bradley Smith, former chairman of the Federal Election Commission, notes that turnout did not surge until 2004. Then, the dramatic increase correlated with a surge of private money, much of it devoted to voter turnout efforts. Reformers considered this surge evidence of increasing corruption and, of course, evidence of the need for more regulation of speech.

John Samples of the Cato Institute, in his new book, "The Fallacy of Campaign Finance Reform," demolishes the argument that taxpayer funding has increased voters' choices by increasing the number of presidential candidates. The seven elections before 1976 had an average of 10.7 candidates who received at least 1 percent of the votes in the two major parties' primaries. Since taxpayer funding was enacted, the average has been 7.8 candidates. In the 15 elections since 1945, the two most successful independent candidates -- George Wallace in 1968 and Ross Perot in 1992 -- did not use government funds. Taxpayer financing, which liberals love, did help Ralph Nader win 2.7 percent of the 2000 vote, including 97,488 Florida votes that cost the liberals' candidate, Al Gore, the presidency.

Does anyone argue that the $1.3 billion in tax dollars given to candidates since 1976 has purchased more elevated campaigns? About 10 percent of public funding pays for the two parties' conventions -- vacuous festivities for a few thousand activists. Major broadcast organizations no longer cover conventions extensively because the public, which considers them unimportant, will not watch.

Sen. Mitch McConnell rightly says that taxpayer funding of politics has been the subject of the largest, most sustained and most accurate polling in American history. The polling occurs every year when 90 percent of taxpayers refuse to participate.

DOJ_NMG_0070777

Could it be that Americans recoil from funding political advocacy with which they disagree -- Republicans funding Democrats, Democrats funding Republicans, everyone funding fringe candidates such as the felon Lyndon LaRouche, who got infusions of taxpayers' money for a campaign he ran while in jail for fraud and conspiracy?

Nevertheless, reformers want to again enlarge the value of the checkoff -- the lever by which a small minority spends general tax revenue against the wishes of a vast majority. The reformers' ultimate objective is to make government the sole source of money for all federal elections. Then government money, supplied in much smaller amounts than voluntary contributions provide, would fund the (much reduced) amount of political speech about government that the government deems appropriate.

Reformers desperate to resuscitate taxpayer funding cite the supposedly scandalous fact that each party's 2008 presidential campaign may spend $500 million. If so, Americans volunteering to fund the dissemination of speech about candidates for the nation's most consequential office will contribute $1 billion, which is about half the sum they spend annually on Easter candy. Some scandal.

The Road To Inefficiency (WP)

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

IT BEGAN WITH an eagle-eyed auditor who, glancing at a garage maintained by Fairfax County's government for its huge fleet of official cars, noticed that too many of them spent their days parked, unused and apparently unneeded. The auditor rightly wondered whether the county bureaucracy -- 11,500 strong -- really warranted one vehicle per three employees. So it seemed perfectly rational when Fairfax decreed in 2004 that it would confiscate cars driven fewer than 4,500 miles a year -- a mere 18 miles per weekday over the course of a year, give or take.

Alas, the road to waste, inefficiency and bureaucratic scheming is paved with good intentions. On the one hand, the mileage minimum has helped prune the county's fleet by 167 vehicles, most of them in the year after the policy took effect. But, as reported by The Post's Lisa Rein, it has also prompted county workers and managers to devise ingenious methods to hang on to their county-owned cars -- by hook or by crook.

In some cases, managers have busied themselves coordinating vehicle swaps among their employees to ensure that vehicles hit the magic 4,500-mile target; in others, workers have been urged to drive more. (So much for lightening the load on the county's clogged roads or saving on gas.) A few brazen officials have even asserted that their vehicles' odometers must have malfunctioned.

Many public workers in Fairfax need county-issued cars, to transport surveying equipment or citizens with special needs or for many other legitimate uses. But e-mails unearthed by The Post also suggest that in some instances managers have done everything short of odometer-tampering to avoid parting with prized vehicles. "We need to think about scheduling with Tricia to use her vehicle for everything we can think of, so she won't lose it," wrote one supervisor.

In response to such chicanery, the county's Board of Supervisors voted to increase the minimum to 5,000 miles annually. We wonder if that won't just increase the incentive for subterfuge by a few unscrupulous managers. A better follow-up would be for the county to scrutinize the deployment of its remaining vehicles, tighten procedures governing their use and encourage more employees to use their own cars when possible (and claim reimbursement by mileage) -- a much more cost-efficient option.

Oh, No, Low Prices (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

Last week's announcement by Wal-Mart that it will offer many generic drugs for $4 is welcome news for American consumers. Strangely, however, this isn't winning Wal-Mart any applause from its left-wing critics.

Take Paul Blank, director of the union-funded Wake Up Wal-Mart, who declared that "Wal-Mart cruelly ignores the fact that it fails to provide company health care to over half of its employees. . . . The Wal-Mart health care crisis grows everyday, and sadly this prescription drug initiative will not insure one additional Wal-Mart employee, one uninsured child, or reduce the billions of cost for taxpayers."

Or consider Ron Pollack, director of the Families USA lobby for government-run health care, who conceded that lower prices are "a limited good thing," but then dismissed the price reduction as being as much "a part of Wal-Mart's public-relations efforts to blunt the deserved criticism of its poor health coverage for its workers as it is a substantive improvement."

These and other Wal-Mart critics are the same folks who've complained for years about high drug prices, using the issue to argue for government price controls, shorter patent lives on new drugs, and reimportation of drugs from Canada and Mexico. The Service Employees International Union held a "Boston Pill Party" in July 2004 declaring that "Americans have an unalienable right to cheap Celebrex and Lipitor."

DOJ_NMG_0070778

Wal-Mart isn't a charity, and its $4 decision is designed to lift its own sales by undercutting prices at competing retailers. But that's the way the market works, driving prices lower with competition. It turns out that Wal-Mart's critics really didn't care about prices; what they want is more union clout, and more government control over health care.

Ahmadinejad: We Won't Forgo Nuke Rights (AP)

AP, September 28, 2006

Iran's hard-line president said Wednesday Iran won't give up "one iota" of its right to pursue a peaceful nuclear program.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad reiterated his uncompromising stance as Iran's top nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani held talks with European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana in Berlin, described by an EU official as "very intense."

"In negotiations, they tell us to suspend (uranium) enrichment even for a day on the pretext of a technical problem so that they continue talks," state-run television quoted Ahmadinejad as saying Wednesday. "Our response to them is that no one has the right to give up the rights of the Iranian nation."

Ahmadinejad said the U.S. and its European allies want to force Iran to suspend uranium enrichment but won't succeed.

"They want to create propaganda about it and tell the world that they forced Iran to suspend (enrichment), but they are mistaken. The Iranian nation won't retreat from its right one iota," he was quoted as saying.

Solana and Larijani are holding talks over a package of incentives that six countries — the United States, China, Russia, France, Britain and Germany — are offering Tehran in return for suspending its uranium enrichment program and returning to full-scale negotiations.

Their meetings are scheduled to continue Thursday.

Iran violated the United Nations demand to halt uranium enrichment by Aug. 31. Enrichment can produce either fuel for a reactor or material for a warhead. The United States and several of its allies believe Iran is seeking to develop nuclear weapons. Tehran maintains its program is peaceful and merely aimed at generating electricity.

Iran, EU Negotiators Hold Nuclear Talks (AP)

By Stephen Graham, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

Negotiators for Iran and the European Union held five hours of "very intense" talks Wednesday over Iran's disputed nuclear program and planned to meet again Thursday, officials said.

EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana and chief Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani went into their meeting at a Foreign Ministry facility by the side of Lake Tegel on the outskirts of Berlin without making statements to reporters.

German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier, who was not participating in the Berlin talks, said he was optimistic progress could be made.

"I have the expectation that the talks today will be successful," Steinmeier said. "I think that today we will not get any final news, but hopefully in the course of tomorrow."

Solana would report back to the six countries trying to persuade Iran to give up its program to enrich uranium, he said, "and then it will be decided together if there are conditions for a return to the negotiating table."

But in Tehran, Iran's hard-line president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said his country won't give up "one iota" of its right to pursue a peaceful nuclear program.

Ahmadinejad said the U.S. and its European allies want to force Iran to suspend uranium enrichment but won't succeed.

"They want to create propaganda about it and tell the world that they forced Iran to suspend (enrichment), but they are mistaken. The Iranian nation won't retreat from its right one iota," he was quoted as saying.

The negotiators met for five hours of "very intense" talks before adjourning until Thursday, said Solana spokeswoman Cristina Gallach.

"The talks just broke off and we will resume tomorrow (Thursday) morning," Gallach said, describing the talks as "very intense."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters in Washington that she telephoned Solana on Wednesday and renewed U.S. support for his talks with Iran.

Solana and Larijani are holding the latest round of talks over a package of incentives that six countries — the United States, China, Russia, France, Britain and Germany — are offering Tehran in return for suspending its uranium enrichment program and returning to full-scale negotiations.

Iran missed an Aug. 31 Security Council deadline over the issue. The six are considering seeking sanctions in the U.N. Security Council if Tehran does not comply.

Rice said if Larijani agreed to a suspension of processing uranium "we would be on a course for negotiations."

DOJ_NMG_0070779

But, Rice told reporters, she had told Solana "clearly this won't go on very much longer."

"I did wish Solana well, and we are all awaiting the outcome of these discussions," she said.

Earlier, U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said whether Iran was agreeable to a temporary and verifiable suspension would not be known until Solana concludes his meetings with Larijani.

"It may require several meetings to find out," the spokesman said. "There may be an opportunity here," he said.

The administration's sanctions strategy is to impose a series of increasingly potent penalties against Iran, beginning with curbs on technology that could be used in military programs.

Enriched uranium can be used for power plants or for weapons, depending on the level of enrichment.

Associated Press Writer Barry Schweid contributed to this report from Washington.

U.S. To Wait 'A Few Weeks' On Iran Move (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

The Bush administration yesterday postponed its pursuit of U.N. sanctions against Iran for "a few weeks" to allow its European allies time to try to negotiate a suspension of Iran's nuclear fuel production.

Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in a telephone conversation before meeting with Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani in Berlin that Mr. Larijani "seems to be sincere" in trying to find a compromise, U.S. officials said.

The five-hour talks between the EU representative and the Iranian negotiator were described as intensive. The two men planned to meet again today, Solana spokeswoman Cristina Gallach said.

The United States has said it would join the Europeans in direct negotiations with Iran on incentives only if it stopped enriching uranium. Uranium can be used to produce atomic bombs or to fuel nuclear power plants.

Officials said that Mr. Solana suggested a little more time to negotiate a suspension of Iran's uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities might pay off, and that Miss Rice agreed.

"Our response was, 'Absolutely, if it's a matter of a few days, a few weeks here to see if there is a possibility of keeping open a negotiated diplomatic solution,' " State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters. "We want to give that every opportunity to succeed."

The administration had given Tehran an Aug. 31 deadline and threatened to push for sanctions. China and Russia have been firm in refusing to join in any punitive move.

On Tuesday, The Washington Times reported that Iran was close to reaching a compromise with the Europeans but was seeking a way to keep any enrichment suspension secret. Tehran denied it was considering such a deal.

Mr. McCormack said yesterday that the Iranians' "disposition to this point has not been to give clear answers," but he expressed hope that their behavior might be changing.

"There may be an opportunity here, there may be a little opening if we just give the Iranians a little time and space," he said. "Perhaps they will come through with a positive answer."

He declined to answer directly the question about a secret deal, saying that, if the United States showed up for negotiations with Iran, everyone would know that enrichment suspension -- Washington's only condition for participation -- had taken place.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad suggested during a seminar in Tehran that the West has proposed a quiet understanding that would help both sides save face.

"In negotiations, they tell us to suspend uranium enrichment for one day on the pretext of some technical problem and let us continue negotiations with you," Mr. Ahmadinejad was quoted as saying by the official Islamic Republic News Agency. "The Iranian nation will not give up its right."

The Iranian Students News Agency reported the president as saying: "They say, 'You should suspend uranium enrichment on the surface, helping us to say that Iran accepted suspension,' but I have to say we are men of negotiation but we do not demand negotiation."

Miss Rice warned that, despite her willingness to wait a few more weeks, "clearly this won't go on very much longer."

"Obviously, if we can come out of this with an Iranian decision to suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activity completely and verifiably, then we would be on a course of negotiations -- that's the course we would all like to pursue," she said.

One of the issues that Mr. Solana and Mr. Larijani discussed was how long any suspension would last, diplomats said.

The Iranian official, they added, is constrained by conflicting views in his government between those who do not want confrontation with the West and those for whom uranium enrichment is a source of pride.

"I have the expectation that the talks today will be successful," German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier told reporters in Berlin. "I think that today we will not get any final news, but hopefully in the course of tomorrow."

DOJ_NMG_0070780

Mr. Buffett's Excellent Idea (NYT)

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

At the center of the current showdown with Iran is one chilling technical fact: The same technology that can make fuel for a nuclear reactor can also make the core of a nuclear bomb.

Add to that the legal fact that the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty guarantees all members in good standing the right to make their own reactor fuel and you have a pretty good idea why the United States and Europe are having such a tough time blocking Tehran's nuclear ambitions.

Enter Warren Buffett, the billionaire investor and philanthropist. He is pledging $50 million for a fuel bank — run by the International Atomic Energy Agency — to be a supplier of last resort for any country that chooses not to get into the risky reactor fuel business and gets the I.A.E.A. seal of approval.

Right now countries can argue — sincerely or not — that without their own fuel plants they can be easily blackmailed by foreign suppliers with whom they have political disagreements. Iran has been caught lying about its nuclear program too often to believe that all it wants is reactor fuel. But its talk of nuclear cartels still gets a sympathetic hearing from many of the nuclear have-nots.

Mr. Buffett, who is working with the nonprofit Nuclear Threat Initiative, headed by former Senator Sam Nunn, is a man who understands leverage. He won't kick in his $50 million unless some government or governments ante up $100 million in cash or fuel. And the project has to come together within two years or he will take his money off the table.

In early 2004, President Bush rightly called for a ban on all new sales of sensitive nuclear fuel technology. But the idea has gone nowhere, with the have-nots charging discrimination and even friends like Argentina, Australia and South Africa talking about getting into the business.

American officials publicly welcomed Mr. Buffett's proposal as one way to persuade countries that they don't need to make their own fuel. But there's no talk of matching his largess. The White House — which has long criticized the I.A.E.A. for not being tough enough on Iran — is not eager to give the agency more power.

Instead, the administration has joined with Russia and four other major fuel producers to offer overlapping supply guarantees, with each promising to make up for the others' possible shortfall. That's a start. But we suspect that any plan that has governments — rather than the more neutral I.A.E.A. — offering guarantees won't calm suspicions or take away Iran's excuse.

More than 50 years ago, President Eisenhower first proposed setting up an international nuclear fuel bank, the original concept for the I.A.E.A. Washington would do well to take a harder look at Mr. Buffett's — and Mr. Eisenhower's — excellent idea. And then come up with the cash.

Egypt Developing Nuclear Energy Program (MCT)

By Miret El Naggar

McClatchy Newspapers, September 28, 2006

CAIRO, Egypt - Determined to lead the Arab world into the nuclear club, Egypt is working on a nuclear energy program intended to reduce the country's dependency on oil.

The program, announced last week by Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, is expected to cost as much as $2 billion and will take more than a decade before the plants produce electricity. While other Arab nations also are looking into nuclear research and development, Egypt already has two low-level reactors, a half century of research and the remains of a comprehensive plan that was scrapped after the nuclear accident at Chernobyl in 1986.

Egypt is looking for alternative power sources because of the rising cost of oil and its increasing energy needs. The government estimates that oil reserves in Egypt, the Arab world's most populous country, will be depleted within 20 years unless new oil fields are discovered.

Egypt has signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, the cornerstone of international efforts to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons. Countries that sign the treaty agree not to produce or otherwise acquire nuclear weapons. They also accept safeguards meant to prevent the diversion of spent nuclear fuel to weapons production. Egypt also has agreed to inspections by the United Nations' nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Egypt has two outdated, research-level reactors in Inshas, 38 miles north of Cairo. Energy Minister Hassan Younis told a state-backed newspaper this month that the government is in talks over how to finance the construction of a 1,000-megawatt power plant that would cost as much as $2 billion. Egypt also plans to build three power stations, each producing 600 megawatts, in the north coastal region of Dabaa.

DOJ_NMG_0070781

Nuclear development is a point of pride for Egypt. Arab nations are caught between two less-than-friendly rivals when it comes to nuclear development: Israel and Iran.

They complain that Israel was allowed to amass an undeclared nuclear arsenal, while Muslim nations fall under strict scrutiny for research into even peaceful uses of nuclear energy. Arab governments are equally wary of Iran's Shiite Muslim theocracy, which they blame for sidelining the Sunni populations of Iraq and Lebanon.

"It's hard to be in a region where one country owns nuclear weapons and another is developing them while claiming it won't use them," said Wael el Assad, nuclear specialist at the Arab League. "This security deficiency is unacceptable to states."

But unlike Iran, Egypt, led by Western-backed Mubarak, has U.S. support for the proposed program. That wasn't the case for other Arab leaders who delved into nuclear activities: Former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's main reactor was destroyed by Israel, while Libyan President Muammar Qaddafi renounced his program in hopes of getting removed from the U.S. list of states that sponsor terrorism.

"We are prepared to provide technical know-how for peaceful nuclear energy to friendly nations such as Egypt, with whom we share deep cooperation," Francis Ricciardone, U.S. ambassador to Egypt, told Egyptian television. "There is no comparison between Iran and Egypt, since Iran has a nuclear weapons program. Using nuclear energy for peaceful purposes, that is something different."

Iran says its nuclear program is also strictly for energy, but the IAEA has said Iran hasn't cooperated sufficiently so that its claim can be independently proved.

Egypt hasn't yet disclosed details of its nuclear plans.

It could purchase nuclear fuel from abroad to power its reactors and sell the spent fuel back to the supplier, so that there would be no possibility of using it for weapons production. Alternatively, Egypt could develop the capacity to produce its own fuel. The same production method, at a higher level, can produce highly enriched uranium for nuclear weapons.

Egypt, Tunisia and the United Arab Emirates are the only Arab nations currently on file with the IAEA as pursuing atomic programs as an alternative to traditional energy sources such as oil and natural gas. Algeria has two research reactors, but isn't actively pursuing nuclear capabilities, according to regional experts.

"Some Arab countries are showing interest in nuclear energy for generating electricity, water purification, and in other fields also, as health and agriculture," said Mahmoud Nasreddin, director of the Tunisia-based Arab Atomic Energy Agency.

In Egypt, however, there are murmurs that the timing of the announcement has less to do with renewable energy and more to do with positioning Mubarak's son to succeed his father as president. Mubarak's ruling National Democratic Party adopted the resolution to pursue a nuclear energy program at the party's annual convention last week.

"The whole world - I don't want to say all, but many developing countries - have proposed and started to execute the issue of alternative energy," Gamal Mubarak, the president's son, said at the conference. "It is time for Egypt to put forth this proposal for discussion about its future energy policies, the issue of alternative energy, including nuclear energy as one of the alternatives."

Critics of the government, led by the powerful Islamists in the Muslim Brotherhood, called the proposal "a big show" intended to bolster support for the younger Mubarak. Since 2002, Gamal Mubarak has served as head of the party's influential policies committee and has been crafting his image as a reformist.

Though both Mubaraks have repeatedly denied that Gamal has any intention of becoming president, his frequent public appearances and his rising influence within the NDP are convincing Egyptians he will take over after his father.

"This talk of nuclear program is only to grab the world's attention and point it at Gamal Mubarak," said Mohamed Habib, deputy leader of the Muslim Brotherhood.

El Naggar is a special correspondent for McClatchy Newspapers.

Envoy: Nuclear Talks Enter Crucial Phase (AP)

By Foster Klug, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

The chief U.S. envoy to stalled North Korean nuclear disarmament talks said Wednesday that negotiators are entering a crucial phase and suggested Washington is stepping up efforts to break a nearly year-long impasse.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill also urged the North to show it was serious about returning to the talks aimed at ridding Pyongyang of its self-professed nuclear weapons production program.

"I just want to know: Are they serious about making progress in this next round?" Hill said to an audience at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "I just want to get some idea of whether they're" preparing seriously for talks that have been stalled since November.

DOJ_NMG_0070782

"We're trying to get ready to fulfill our obligations" for whenever the talks resume, Hill said. "I just would like some indication from (North Korea) that they're doing something similar."

Hill said the next weeks would be "critical" and spoke of a "certain sense of urgency" involved in efforts to resume negotiations that include both Koreas, China, Russia, Japan and the United States.

His comments come as U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice contemplates a possible trip to Asia in the next month or so. Rice recently promised to "make another push to see what we can do" to resolve the impasse.

Hill met this week with his South Korean counterpart, Chun Yung-woo, and has been talking on the phone with his Japanese counterpart.

"When things are stopped for so long, you really want to find ways to restart them," Hill said. "We are in a rather crucial phase. We've not made any progress."

North Korea, meanwhile, says Washington is responsible for the deadlock, refusing to return until the U.S. lifts financial restrictions imposed for the regime's alleged money laundering and counterfeiting.

The North has raised alarms that it might be preparing for a nuclear bomb test. In July, it test-launched seven missiles, including some that might reach the American continent.

Despite the sense of urgency he mentioned in his comments, Hill said the United States would not talk with North Korea — officially called the Democratic People's Republic of Korea — "in the absence of the six-party process."

US Warns Against North Korea Nuclear Test (AFP)

By Stephen Collinson

AFP, September 28, 2006

The United States warned that any nuclear test by North Korea would be viewed by world powers as a "very serious" escalation of the crisis over the Stalinist state's weapons programs.

Christopher Hill, US point-man on the six-party nuclear talks process, also said Washington was considering whether to impose new sanctions on Pyongyang, despite warnings by several congressmen such a move would enflame the showdown.

Hill said the United States had been talking to China, Russia, South Korea and Japan about how to deter any nuclear test by North Korea.

"All parties have made it clear that this would be a very, very serious step," Hill told a congressional hearing.

"It is a very small piece of the world ... it is frankly speaking, rather shocking that anyone would even think of exploding a nuclear weapon on the Korean peninsula."

Pyongyang declared in February 2005 it had nuclear weapons, but there have been no reports of a test. Speculation has been mounting the Stalinist state may be preparing such a step.

Last July, North Korea defied international warnings and test fired seven ballistic missiles, including its long-range Taepodong-2, believed to be capable of striking America's western seaboard.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in an interview released Monday that time was running out to bring North Korea back to the negotiating table.

Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, was testifying before the Committee on International Relations of the House of Representatives.

Several congressmen warned in dire terms that a rumored move by the Bush administration to impose a new set of sanctions on the Stalinist state, could spell further bad news for the stalled six-party talks process.

"Let the administration think long and hard before taking this dramatic step," said veteran Democrat representative Tom Lantos, arguing that any such measures wouldn't hurt North Korea due to paltry US investment in the impoverished nation.

"If the South Koreans, Chinese and Japanese will not follow suit, a unilateral US trade and investment ban will be ineffective and counter-productive to the prospects for a negotiated solution on the Korean Peninsula.

"Pyongyang will undoubtedly cite these new sanctions as evidence of hostile intent, and strengthen its refusal to return to the six party talks," Lantos said.

But Hill said that Washington was considering whether to impose new sanctions on North Korea over the missile tests.

"We are of course looking at the issue particularly in the light of the fact that the North Koreans had a missile moratorium, some measures were relaxed ... and they violated the moratorium."

The Clinton administration lifted some economic sanctions on North Korea in 1995, one year after it agreed to freeze its nuclear activities.

More bilateral sanctions were lifted in 2000, when Pyongyang agreed to a moratorium on missile tests.

Hill pledged that any new measures would be imposed only after close consultation with other members of the six-party talks and key members of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0070783

Hill's comments came a day after a top North Korean official told the UN General Assembly his country's nuclear arms were for "self-defense."

In a rare North Korean explanation on the international stage of its policy, Deputy Foreign Minister Choe Su Hon reiterated Pyongyang could not resume the six-party talks as long as it remains subject to US sanctions.

The UN Security Council, including the North's only major ally, China, responded by unanimously adopting a resolution condemning its actions and imposing missile-related sanctions.

In September last year, Pyongyang joined the United States, South Korea, China, Russia and Japan in signing a joint statement under which it pledged to abandon its nuclear program in return for energy and economic aid, eventual diplomatic benefits and security guarantees.

But two months later, North Korea boycotted the forum to protest US sanctions on a Macau bank which allegedly helped it pass counterfeit US dollars and launder funds.

U.S. Weighs Moves Against Sudan Over U.N. Force (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

The United States is considering a series of punitive steps if the Sudanese government fails to agree to a U.N. peacekeeping force to end the violence in Sudan's Darfur region, U.S. officials said yesterday. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice signaled the new approach in a speech yesterday in which she demanded an immediate cease-fire and warned that Khartoum faces "a choice between cooperation and confrontation."

U.S. officials said the options under consideration include reimposing sanctions that had been eased when Sudan signed a peace agreement last year with southern rebels, as well as taking action against top Sudanese officials who have been implicated in what the United States has labeled acts of genocide in Darfur.

Another option that has received renewed consideration is establishing a "no-fly zone" over Darfur, mainly because the Sudanese military has restarted attacks. But there are practical obstacles to a no-fly zone, including the effect it may have on humanitarian missions, so officials said that decision is not imminent.

Although Rice's Washington speech to the African Society's National Summit on Africa held out the prospect of improved ties between the two countries, relations have worsened dramatically in recent weeks.

U.S. officials detained Sudan's deputy foreign minister at Dulles International Airport for several hours last week and also restricted the travel of Sudan's president, Lt. Gen. Omar Hassan al-Bashir, and his entourage when he came to address the U.N. General Assembly. Bashir was so angry that when he returned to Khartoum, he announced restrictions on the travel of U.S. diplomatic personnel and official U.S. visitors.

U.S. officials suggest that the visa restrictions imposed on Bashir were a mistake, generated mainly because he got the visa on a Sunday afternoon in Havana, where the U.S. routinely issues restricted visas to Cuban diplomats. "There was no policy decision to restrict them," a senior administration official said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue. "I think they simply didn't reset the machines for non-Cubans."

A senior Sudanese diplomat scoffed at that explanation. "Such mistakes are becoming very common for our American friends," the diplomat said. He confirmed that deputy foreign minister Ali Ahmed Karti had been detained for several hours and that Bashir was upset at the restricted visas. Speaking on the condition of anonymity, he said U.S. diplomatic movements were being restricted because "reciprocity is one of the golden principles of diplomacy."

U.S. officials are still trying to figure out the practical aspects of Sudan's restrictions, including whether they will apply to diplomats or official visitors.

U.S. officials gave varied explanations for Karti's detention, which included that he was carrying cash in excess of $10,000 to finance Bashir's travels and that he turned up on a Homeland Security watch list because of his association with the Janjaweed, the marauding militias implicated in the Darfur violence.

Human rights groups say that Karti, though he now holds the title of state minister for foreign affairs, was the head of the Popular Defense Forces, a paramilitary group that fought alongside the Janjaweed during a campaign of terrorism that has resulted in as many as 450,000 deaths and has driven more than 2 million from their homes. Some experts have said they think he is on the secret list of 51 names referred by the United Nations to the International Criminal Court for possible prosecution for war crimes.

The Darfur conflict broke out in early 2003 when African rebel groups attacked police stations and military outposts. The United Nations and human rights groups accuse the central government of supporting the Janjaweed in an effort to crush the rebellion. About 2,000 villages have been destroyed across Darfur, an area the size of France.

DOJ_NMG_0070784

The Bush administration has pressed to replace an undermanned, 7,000-person peacekeeping force headed by the African Union with 20,000 U.N. troops, but Sudan has refused to accept a Security Council resolution mandating the force.

In May, under the leadership of then-Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick, the U.S. persuaded Khartoum and one rebel group to sign the Darfur Peace Agreement. But Zoellick left the administration, along with many of his Sudan advisers, and U.S. policy was adrift over the summer. Last week, President Bush named former USAID administer Andrew S. Natsios as special presidential envoy to Sudan.

Human rights groups have criticized the Darfur agreement, saying that it did not have the support of a rebel group representing the majority of the Darfur population and that the Sudanese government has used it as an excuse to attack rebel groups that did not sign.

Rice demanded yesterday that Khartoum accept the U.N. force. While the Darfur agreement will not be negotiated, she said, "we are conferring with rebels who want peace."

Rice added: "We are seeking to address their legitimate concerns, and we will support them if they choose peace. If the rebels refuse, then they will face serious consequences, including targeted U.N. sanctions."

Rice Says Sudan Could Face More Sanctions Over Darfur (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Wednesday raised the threat of more international sanctions against Sudan if the government did not stop military operations in the Darfur region and unconditionally accept a United Nations peacekeeping force.

“If the Sudanese government chooses confrontation — if it continues waging war against its own citizens, challenging the African Union, undermining its peacekeeping force, and threatening the international community — then the regime in Khartoum will be held responsible, and it alone will bear the consequences,” Ms. Rice said during a speech to the Africa Society.

“The international community must make clear to the leaders of Sudan that this is the choice they face,” she said.

The 53-nation African Union has about 7,200 peacekeeping soldiers in Darfur and was scheduled to hand over its task to a larger United Nations force in September. But President Omar Hassan al-Bashir has fiercely opposed such a move, and in the meantime, the union has announced that it will send more troops to the region while pressure on him continues.

The union force has not had much success in stopping violence in Darfur that has continued despite a cease-fire in May. Ms. Rice was blunt during her speech, laying the blame for the bloodshed at the feet of Mr. Bashir’s government.

“Citing attacks by rebels in the area, the government of Sudan recruited a tribe of Arab nomads, known as the janjaweed, who have long resented the Africans of Darfur,” Ms. Rice said. “Funded, armed and encouraged by the Sudanese government, the janjaweed attacked village after village in Darfur — torturing and executing the men and the boys; beating and raping the women and the girls.”

Ms. Rice challenged Mr. Bashir’s authority to refuse the United Nations peacekeeping force. “We cannot, we will not, accept Sudan’s opposition,” she said. “Since the Sudanese government will not save the lives of its own people, then the United Nations must act.”

Rice Calls For Cease-fire In Darfur (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 28, 2006

The U.S. will not sit still while innocent people are killed in Sudan's Darfur region, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Wednesday, urging an immediate cease-fire and deployment of U.N. peacekeepers.

The top U.S. diplomat said Sudan's government could cooperate with the United Nations or face a confrontation. She warned of consequences if Sudan chose a fight and hinted at further U.N. penalties against the Khartoum government or rebel groups.

"We're not going to sit by and allow this kind of death and destruction to continue," Rice said during a question-and-answer session after her speech at the Africa Society's National Summit on Africa. "We'll use whatever tools are necessary, through the U.N, to be able to stop that."

Fighting between government-backed Arab militias and non-Arab rebels in Darfur has left more than 200,000 dead and 2.5 million displaced since 2002.

More than two years have passed since the Bush administration labeled the atrocities in Sudan as genocide. But the killing has accelerated in recent weeks as the Sudanese government has launched a new offensive.

DOJ_NMG_0070785

A poorly funded African Union force in Darfur has been unable to contain the violence and the U.N. Security Council has sought to take over the operation to provide better resources. Sudan opposes such a step.

"I would hope that the message that is going out to Sudan, not just from us but from every country in the world, is that this is now a real fork in the road," Rice said.

President Bush used his address to the U.N. General Assembly last week to announce a new envoy for Sudan and to decry the violence. Rice's address Wednesday was the most comprehensive high-level assessment of the problem to date.

In her speech, Rice said that long-term stability and safety for people in Sudan will come only when the many overlapping political and factional fights are addressed. She accused Sudan's government of hoarding wealth and power at the expense of much of the rest of the country, Africa's largest and about the size of the U.S. from east of the Mississippi River.

Rice said that if Sudan "works with the United Nations and welcomes a U.N. force into Darfur then it will find a dedicated partner in the United States."

Bush has told Sudanese President Omar el-Bashir that the U.S. was prepared to examine all aspects of its relationship with Sudan, Rice said. U.S. lawmakers are close to approving penalties against Khartoum.

"If the Sudanese government chooses confrontation — if it continues waging war against its own citizens, challenging the African Union, undermining its peacekeeping force and threatening the international community — then the regime in Khartoum will be held responsible and it alone will bear the consequences," Rice said.

Little Pressure On Hezbollah To Disarm (AP-Y)

By Hamza Hendawi And Henry Meyer

AP, September 28, 2006

Six weeks after the end of the Lebanon war, the militant Hezbollah group is facing little on-the-ground pressure to give up its weapons and disarm — despite a U.N. cease-fire resolution demanding just that.

The leaders of a U.N. peacekeeping force in south Lebanon say the job is not theirs. And Lebanon's ill-equipped army, some of whose soldiers wear tin-pot helmets and carry outdated M-16 rifles, shows no signs of diving into a confrontation with battle-hardened Hezbollah fighters.

For now, all sides say it's likely full disarmament will happen only in the future as part of a political solution — despite the U.N. resolution that ended the 34-day war on Aug. 14 and required disarmament.

The commanders of the U.N. force say that under the resolution, their job is merely to assist the Lebanese army in regaining control of southern Lebanon and to ensure the area cannot be used for launching rocket attacks into northern Israel.

Meanwhile, Lebanese security officials say the army's mission in the south is based on what they call an "understanding" with Hezbollah that the army will not search for and seize weapons, but only confiscate those shown in public.

At one Lebanese military checkpoint near the town of Marjayoun, some eight miles from the Israeli border, soldiers recently waved most cars through — although some were stopped so identity papers and registration documents could be checked.

The Lebanese government, which for years allowed Hezbollah to run a "state within a state" in the south, has long argued that disarming the militants could be done only through agreement among the country's major political groups.

Israel says the resolution makes clear that Hezbollah must be disarmed south of the Litani River. Mark Regev, an Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman, said of the current situation, "It's a process."

Israeli soldiers have been instructed to shoot Lebanese stone-throwers along the border if they feel their lives are in danger. The order came after dozens of yellow-clad Hezbollah supporters threw stones at Israeli soldiers Friday.

Regev said Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, at a rally last week, "publicly stated that he is out to flout the will of the international community and to prevent the implementation of what was an unanimous resolution of the Security Council."

At the rally in the Beirut suburbs Friday, Nasrallah vowed his guerrillas will not surrender their weapons and said: "There is no army in the world capable of making us drop our weapons as long as there will be people who believe in this resistance."

The current U.N. peacekeeping contingent is far larger and better-armed than a previous 2,000-member force. Some 15,000 troops, more than half from Europe, will eventually be deployed with tanks, artillery cannons and other heavy armor.

But the multinational troops, who now number 5,000, are acutely aware that their presence could become unpopular if they are viewed as supporting Israel's attempts to eliminate Hezbollah's arms.

French peacekeepers setting up base near the town of Deir Kifa noted they had encountered a less-than-friendly reception from some residents, who defiantly waved yellow Hezbollah flags.

"We mustn't be seen as an occupying force — the people can reject us very quickly," said Col. Jerome Salle.

He said the U.N. troops would mount patrols but would not establish checkpoints on public roads, to avoid inflaming residents.

DOJ_NMG_0070786

Gen. Alain Pelligrini, the French officer who commands the U.N. force, said the peacekeepers wouldn't even act if they saw weapons being carried openly by Hezbollah fighters.

"No, I would ask the Lebanese army to intervene and if the Lebanese army has difficulties in intervening, then we would see what we need to do," he said last week.

Halim Sarhan, who runs a dental laboratory in the market town of Nabatiyeh, expressed a common sentiment when he said no one should try to disarm Hezbollah by force. "There must be political consensus on the issue first," he said.

Hezbollah has said it would agree to disarm only if the government is strong enough to defend Lebanon against Israel — a stance that reflects its own ambitions to become the country's dominant political force.

It has also linked the issue to Israel's return of the Shebaa farms, a 25-square-mile contested area where Lebanon, Syria and Israel meet.

Some weapons and explosives have been found in a few Hezbollah positions that were either overrun or abandoned during the fighting, said Lebanese security officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the subject.

Hezbollah is thought to have a great deal of experience in concealing its weapons. Many are believed to be in underground tunnels, buried in groves or in remote parts of the mountainous south.

The U.N. forces and the Lebanese army are likely to have more teeth when it comes to preventing new weapons shipments.

A German naval force is to patrol the waters off southern Lebanon and Lebanese authorities are tightening controls at the country's only international airport in Beirut and on the Syrian border.

But Syrian President Bashar Assad, whose country has long been a route for arms deliveries to Hezbollah believed to come from Iran, said this week that it was "Mission Impossible" to cut off the guerrillas' supply of weapons altogether.

Israel Releases High-Ranking Hamas Official (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 27 — An Israeli military court today released the Palestinian deputy prime minister, Nasser al-Shaer, one of more than 30 Hamas lawmakers and cabinet ministers who have been detained by the Israelis over the past three months.

Mr. Shaer, who was the highest-ranking official held, was arrested on Aug. 19 but was not charged with any crime, and the court cited a “lack of evidence” in ordering his release today.

“My arrest was not justified,” Mr. Shaer told The Associated Press. “It was part of the aggression waged against the Palestinian people.”

Mr. Shaer headed to his hometown of Nablus, in the West Bank, where he was greeted enthusiastically by supporters at a reception hall. However, the court said that for the next two weeks, Mr. Shaer would not be allowed to go to Ramallah, where his office is located and which serves as the Palestinian political headquarters in the West Bank.

Israel began rounding up the Hamas legislators in the West Bank after Palestinian militants, including the armed wing of Hamas, seized an Israeli soldier on June 25 and took him into the Gaza Strip. The soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, is still being held, despite an Israeli military incursion in Gaza and the crackdown on Hamas lawmakers.

Israel, which classifies Hamas as a terrorist organization, has charged many of the Hamas lawmakers with belonging to an illegal organization.

A military court ruled on Sept. 12 that 18 of the Hamas legislators should be freed. But on Monday, a military appeals court reversed the ruling, and those legislators and others remain in jail while awaiting trial.

At an Israeli cabinet meeting today, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and top security officials said they were prepared to intensify military operations in Gaza if Palestinian militants continue to fire rockets from the territory into southern Israel.

Earlier today, an Israeli airstrike killed a 14-year-old Palestinian girl, Dam Hamad, near the border of the Gaza Strip and Egypt.

The Israeli military said it had intelligence that a home along the border was being used to hide the entrance to a smuggling tunnel linked to Egypt.

The military called the home and told residents to leave, because the house was about to be bombed. Shortly afterward, the military dropped two bombs, destroying the home and leaving a huge crater, Palestinian witnesses said.

However, falling concrete and other debris killed the girl, who was in a home nearby, according to Dr. Ali Musa, head of Al Najar Hospital in Rafah.

DOJ_NMG_0070787

In the West Bank, Israeli security officials said they arrested two 17-year-old Palestinians and seized a 22-pound bomb belt they were planning to use in a suicide attack. After soldiers arrested Abduallah Qatawi and Jihad Dukan, the two teenagers took the soldiers to the place where the bomb was hidden, the security officials said.

In another development, an Israeli court sentenced a Jewish settler to four life sentences for a shooting spree that killed four Palestinians in the West Bank.

The settler, Asher Weissgan, killed the four Palestinians in an industrial zone in Shiloh on Aug. 17, 2005, the day that the Israeli military began forcibly removing all Jewish settlers from Gaza.

Prosecutors said that Mr. Weissgan carried out the killings in an attempt to prevent the Gaza withdrawal from taking place. Mr. Weissgan was convicted of the killings earlier this month.

Israeli Military Court Frees Hamas Deputy PM (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, September 28, 2006

An Israeli military court on Wednesday freed the top-ranking Hamas official seized in a round-up of the ruling Palestinian party's political leadership but 34 others, including four cabinet ministers, remained in jail.

Nasser al-Shaer, deputy prime minister in the Palestinian Authority government, was released more than a month after his arrest at a hiding place in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

Mr Shaer had gone underground after the Israeli military seized much of the Hamas leadership following the June kidnapping in Gaza of an Israeli soldier, Corporal Gilad Shalit.

There has been speculation that Hamas leaders still in jail might be freed as part of a prisoner exchange deal for the abducted soldier.

An Israeli military court in the West Bank on Monday overturned an earlier ruling to free 21 detained Hamas officials. A hearing on the fate of 13 others is scheduled for next week.

Mr Shaer's lawyer, who said his client had not been charged, said Wednesday's ruling barred the deputy prime minister from returning to his office in Ramallah.

His release was not viewed as a significant step in securing the freedom of Corporal Shalit. Egyptian efforts to free the captive soldier have been complicated by internal tensions within the PA, where attempts to set up a Hamas-Fatah government of national unity are in stalemate.

Shimon Peres, Israeli vice prime minister, on Wednesday blamed Hamas's exiled leadership in Damascus for increasing tensions in Gaza by prolonging the Shalit affair.

Unity talks on establishing a government that would be acceptable to the international community and lead to a lifting of the political and economic embargo on Hamas have foundered on the Islamist party's refusal either to recognise Israel or accept existing agreements between Israel and the PA.

Mahmoud Abbas, the PA's Fatah president, travelled to Qatar on Wednesday after delegating the latest round of contacts with Hamas to more junior officials.

Political sources in Gaza said that reports circulating there that Mr Abbas might dissolve the existing Hamas government or form an emergency administration had exacerbated factional tensions in the territory.

Medical officials in Gaza said a 14-year-old girl was killed in the latest Israeli air strike on the territory in which the air force on Wednesday attacked a house believed to be used as cover for a weapons smuggling tunnel.

They said the house was targeted after its owner, an alleged weapons dealer, had obeyed Israeli orders to leave. However, a second missile struck after children had gathered at the scene. Apart from the dead girl, seven other children were wounded, they said.

Israel Releases Palestinian Deputy PM (AP)

By Ali Daraghmeh, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

Israel on Wednesday released the Palestinian deputy prime minister, the highest-ranking of more than 30 officials in the Hamas-led government jailed as part of a crackdown on the Islamic militant group.

The detention of much of the Hamas-led government has been a major sore point in rapidly deteriorating relations between Israel and the Palestinians since Hamas took power.

Nasser Shaer, who was held without charge for more than a month, was ordered freed by an Israeli court, which banned him from going to his government office in the West Bank city of Ramallah for two weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0070788

Shaer said Wednesday he was not mistreated in jail, but added: "There is nothing dearer than being free. They came and took me from my house in front of my children, wife, and family. They had no reason to do it."

Israel and the West, labeling the violent Islamic movement a terror group, have cut off funding to the Palestinian government, plunging the Palestinian areas into a deep financial crisis.

Violence flared June 25 when Hamas-linked militants attacked an Israeli army base near Gaza, killing two soldiers, capturing a third and triggering a large-scale Israeli offensive in the coastal strip.

Israel also rounded up dozens of West Bank officials from the Hamas-led government. Though Israel said they were suspected of involvement in terrorism, it was widely assumed they were meant to be traded for the soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit. But no progress has been reported in mediation efforts.

Shaer managed to evade detention for more than a month, but was caught Aug. 19.

After Israeli soldiers dropped him off at a checkpoint Wednesday, he hitched a ride home to Nablus, where he was greeted by dozens of supporters who chanted, "God is great," and held a party in his honor at a local restaurant.

Thirty lawmakers and four Cabinet ministers remain in Israeli custody, charged with belonging to an illegal group. On Monday, a military court in the West Bank declined to release 21 of the detainees on bail. A hearing for 13 others is scheduled for Oct. 5.

Palestinian government spokesman Ghazi Hamad said Shaer's detention was "political and illegal," and the charges against the other officials were "fabricated."

Shaer, who did not run for parliament on the Hamas ticket but joined the government after the Islamic group's election victory, said he refused to talk politics in prison and denied he is a Hamas member.

Breaking with Hamas ideology that refuses to recognize a Jewish state in the Middle East, Shaer told reporters that if Israel renewed its 2000 offer of 95 percent of the West Bank and all of Gaza for a Palestinian state, leaving Israel intact, "I would ask the Palestinian people."

The late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat rejected the offer, and Israel took it off the table after violence erupted later in 2000.

Egypt has unsuccessfully tried to broker a deal trading Shalit for hundreds of Palestinian prisoners in Israeli jails.

Egypt recently sent a letter to Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal, based in Damascus, Syria, demanding Shalit's immediate release to avoid a worsening crisis, Palestinian officials and Arab diplomats said.

But Moussa Abu Marzouk, deputy leader of Hamas' political bureau, denied Hamas was under pressure to release the soldier.

"We are keen to make the Egyptian mediation a success," he said, but added: "Until now, we are not any closer to having the requests of Hamas for the soldier's release met."

Meanwhile, Israel pushed on with its Gaza offensive, destroying the house of a weapons dealer in the southern town of Rafah, in an attack that killed a 14-year-old girl, Palestinian officials said.

The army called the owner 15 minutes before a first air strike and told him to leave, witnesses said. That air strike caused no injuries, but as children gathered near the rubble, a second Israeli missile struck, killing the teenager and wounding seven other children, hospital officials said.

The army said the house was used as cover for a weapons smuggling tunnel being dug under the nearby border with Egypt.

The chief of Israel's Shin Bet security service, Yuval Diskin, accused Egypt Wednesday of allowing Palestinian militants to smuggle 19 tons of weapons into Gaza — much of it through tunnels — since Israel withdrew from Gaza last year.

"The Egyptians know who the smugglers are and don't deal with them," Diskin told Israel's Cabinet, according to a participant in the meeting. "They received intelligence on this from us and didn't use it."

Egyptian forces destroyed another tunnel Wednesday, Egyptian police said.

Early Thursday, Israeli aircraft fired two missiles at the house of a Palestinian weapons dealer on the Gaza-Egypt border, destroying it completely, Palestinian secucrity officials said.

The owner received a warning by telephone before the air strike, and residents left the building, the officials said. Two people were lightly hurt.

Israeli has carried out a series of such strikes against homes of suspected weapins dealers in recent weeks.

For Kazakh Leader's Visit, U.S. Seeks A Balance (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers And Ilan Greenberg

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070789

ASTANA, Kazakhstan, Sept. 26 — When Vice President Dick Cheney came to this oil-rich Central Asian nation this spring he expressed admiration for what he called its "political development." Yet just a day before his visit began, the authoritarian government effectively shut down the two most prominent American democracy organizations working here.

While American officials are negotiating to reverse the government's decision, they have yet to complain about it publicly.

As President Bush prepares to receive the Kazakh president, Nursultan A. Nazarbayev, at a state dinner in Washington on Friday, the episode reflects the delicate balance the administration has struck with a country of growing strategic importance that has a record of corruption, flawed elections and rights violations, including the killings of two opposition leaders in the last year in disputed circumstances.

Critics here say the episode also illustrates the Bush administration's willingness to sacrifice democracy, a centerpiece of its foreign policy, when it conflicts with other foreign policy goals.

"There are four enemies of human rights: oil, gas, the war on terror and geopolitical considerations," said Yevgeny A. Zhovtis of the Kazakhstan International Bureau for Human Rights and Rule of Law, an organization that has received financing from the American Embassy and the National Endowment for Democracy. "And we have all four."

The Bush administration has promoted democratic reforms in Kazakhstan for years, but it also appears eager to mollify a president who has been a comparatively moderate Muslim leader in Central Asia, who has allowed NATO aircraft headed to Afghanistan to fly over the country and sent a company of soldiers to Iraq, and who controls vast resources of oil and gas, much of it extracted by American companies.

In a meeting on Monday in New York with Foreign Minister Kasymzhomart Tokayev, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice spoke generally about democracy and human rights in Kazakhstan, a senior State Department official said, but did not raise the matter of the two democracy groups — the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs and the International Republican Institute.

In Washington, Frederick Jones, a spokesman for the National Security Council, said the White House was aware of the problem with the institutes but added that he could not say whether President Bush would raise it this week, since the discussions were not scripted in advance. Still, he said, "Democratization is a very important part of the agenda."

The backlash against promotion of democracy is by no means limited to Kazakhstan. The institutes, which are nonprofit, nonpartisan groups financed by the United States government, have been eyed warily not just here but in Russia, China and an array of authoritarian Central Asian countries that were alarmed by the "color revolutions" in Serbia, Georgia and, particularly, Ukraine.

As outlined in a recent report by the National Endowment for Democracy, many of them, including Kazakhstan, have followed the lead of Russia and severely restricted nongovernmental organizations. Some countries, notably Belarus, but also the Persian Gulf state of Bahrain, have closed them down altogether.

For Kazakhstan, as for the Bush administration, the coming visit has created an opportunity for improving relations that have been strained in recent years, even as Russia has taken advantage of its own political and economic influence.

The strains have stemmed from American concerns over corruption, restrictions on the news media and President Nazarbayev's consolidation of political control.

The Kazakh government has its own concerns with American policy. They include a criminal case in New York against James H. Giffen, an American businessman, that implicates Mr. Nazarbayev in a bribery scheme dating from the 1990's, and lukewarm American support for Kazakhstan's bid to preside over the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

Here in Kazakhstan, Mr. Nazarbayev's visit has been portrayed as a chance for him to enhance his international prestige by improving relations with the United States. "The time has come when we can raise our relations to a completely new level," Mr. Nazarbayev told reporters in Astana earlier this month.

Kazakhstan, the ninth largest country in the world in area but with only 15 million people, the majority of them Muslims, has experienced an energy-fueled economic boom that has transformed it into a regional power.

Mr. Nazarbayev is genuinely popular inside the country, though that popularity is certainly nurtured by the government's control of television, which provides lavish, uncritical coverage. Even independent surveys of voters leaving the polls showed him winning re-election handily last December, with a vote as high as 82 percent, compared with the official result of 91 percent. The lower figure came from a poll financed by the International Republican Institute.

Mr. Nazarbayev's opponents said the government's need to pad what would have been a clear victory anyway highlighted a growing trend toward authoritarianism. Oraz Jandosov, a co-chairman of a democratic opposition party, True Bright Path, said the most disturbing consequences of the power and impunity enveloping Mr. Nazarbayev's government were the deaths of two opposition leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0070790

One, Zamanbek N. Nurkadilov, was found shot three times, once in the head, last November. His death was subsequently declared a suicide. The other, Altynbek Sarsenbaiuly, was killed in February along with two bodyguards on a road outside Almaty, the country's biggest city.

In August, an aide in the upper house of Parliament, Yerzhan Utembayev, and several officers of the secret services were convicted of those killings, though few here believed the declared motive: that Mr. Utembayev had been angered that Mr. Sarsenbaiuly had accused him of being a drunk in a newspaper interview three years earlier.

The actions against the American democracy programs followed soon after Mr. Sarsenbaiuly's killing, reflecting a trend to stifle any open discussion of the country's problem.

In a letter to the American Embassy, a copy of which was shown to The New York Times, Kazakh prosecutors charged the two institutes under a law that forbids "material assistance" to political parties. The institutes were accused of "the handing over of materials" and "illegal instances of transport" during their work with political and civic groups.

The accusations fit a pattern of harassment in the months leading up to last year's election, when government tax and financial agencies repeatedly investigated and audited dozens of private organizations. The Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, the institution Mr. Nazarbayev hopes to lead as chairman in 2009, criticized the election for "a number of significant shortcomings," including "an atmosphere of intimidation."

Four American officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the continuing negotiations over the institutes, said neither institute had paid for or otherwise supported partisan activity.

Two people involved in the discussions said former Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright and Senator John McCain of Arizona, the chairwoman and chairman of the Democratic and Republican institutes respectively, had written a letter to Mr. Bush urging him to raise the issue with Mr. Nazarbayev during his visit.

American officials continue to express support for Kazakhstan's opposition and for democracy here in general.

Mr. Cheney, when he visited, met over breakfast with opposition leaders for an hour and 20 minutes in a hotel in Astana, the capital. Mr. Jandosov, who was there, said he welcomed the chance to explain "what the real situation was," but expressed regret that the meeting came the morning after Mr. Cheney appeared in public with Mr. Nazarbayev and expressed support for him.

"Kazakhstan has gone along with a lot of the American oil agenda with the unspoken understanding that the Kazakhstan population is not going to be provoked," said Murat Laumulin of the Kazakhstan Institute of Strategic Studies, a research organization with close ties to the government. "There isn't to be a 'color revolution' here, and for five to seven years we don't have to worry about needing to introduce genuine democracy. We get a strategic pause."

Kazakh Leader's Visit To Require Diplomatic Finesse (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin, Usa Today

USA Today, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush meets Friday with the leader of oil-rich Kazakhstan, a visit made awkward by the country's poor human rights record and questions about its commitment to democracy.

Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbayev's trip to the White House is the second diplomatic balancing act for Bush this week. On Wednesday, Bush hosted the quarreling presidents of Afghanistan and Pakistan in an attempt to get them to jointly fight terrorism.

Nazarbayev and Bush will discuss energy, Kazakhstan's economy and efforts to fight terrorism and narcotics trafficking, the White House says.

Bush also will be "encouraging Kazakhstan to accelerate progress on democratic reform," says Frederick Jones, a spokesman for the National Security Council.

Nazarbayev, 66, has ruled Kazakhstan since 1989, when it was still a Soviet republic. The State Department's latest human rights report calls Kazakhstan's record "poor." It says the regime puts "severe limits on citizens' rights to change their government."

Rachel Denber, deputy director of Human Rights Watch for Europe and Central Asia, says Nazarbayev has stayed in power by rigging elections, the latest in December.

For Nazarbayev, the visit confirms the Bush administration values Kazakhstan's oil and strategic position between Russia, China and the Caspian Sea. Kazakhstan produces 1.2 million barrels of oil a day but has the potential to be a top producer in a decade.

U.S. companies such as Chevron have spent $6 billion there since 1993 — more than a third of the country's foreign investment, the State Department says.

DOJ_NMG_0070791

Nazarbayev has sided with the United States on major issues. He bypassed Russia with an oil pipeline, despite intense pressure from the Kremlin. He also has given up the country's Soviet-era nuclear weapons.

The Kazakhstani leader has made strides in alleviating poverty and promoting secular education in a largely Muslim society, says Frederick Starr, head of the Central Asia program at the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced and International Studies.

Two opposition leaders have died in suspicious circumstances in the past year. Zamanbek Nurkadilov was shot twice in the chest and once in the head. An official inquiry ruled his death a suicide. In the death of Altynbek Sarsenbayev, members of the Kazakh security service were among 10 people convicted of murder. Nazarbayev denies involvement. For months before he died, Sarsenbayev said he welcomed U.S. "moral support" for democracy, but he said "very soft phrases and inaction" were encouraging the country's authoritarian leadership "to oppress their own people."

Richard Boucher, assistant secretary of State for Central and South Asia, said the U.S. raises human rights concerns with Kazakhstan "regularly" but can't have "single-dimensional policies." He said the two countries have "a well-balanced relationship based on security cooperation, economic development and moving toward democratic stability."

Mexico Chides Rice For Political Remarks (AP-Y)

By Will Weissert, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

Mexico said Wednesday that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was out of line by suggesting that its democracy was just now maturing, saying it wasn't up to her to voice such opinions publicly.

In a Monday interview with The Wall Street Journal's editorial board, Rice said Mexico was beginning to put its disputed July 2 election behind it.

"Mexico has come through this crisis and I think it's been a real vote of confidence in the Mexican democratic system, which after all, is relatively — it's just now maturing in a kind of two-party system," Rice said.

Ruben Aguilar, spokesman for President Vicente Fox, said Wednesday that "we shouldn't be surprised that other countries salute Mexican institutions," but said Rice shouldn't comment on Mexican democracy.

"We don't agree with the declaration of the secretary of state because, in accordance with the construction of Mexico's political system, it's only up to Mexicans themselves to voice those opinions," he said told a briefing for reporters at the presidential residence.

Mexican officials have expressed even stronger disapproval of comments by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who recently questioned the legitimacy of the presidential election.

Rice's suggestion that Mexico is headed toward a two-party system may have been her most controversial remark. The Institutional Revolutionary Party controlled Mexico's presidency from 1929 until a stunning loss to Fox in 2000. But the country has three major political parties, and several others are represented in its Congress.

Former Energy Secretary Felipe Calderon, of Fox's conservative, pro-business National Action Party, was declared the winner of the July 2 election by about 0.6 percent and will take office Dec. 1.

But leftist runner-up Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador has rallied hundreds of thousands in street protests alleging election fraud and he has declared a parallel government.

Aguilar would not say if Mexico planned to lodge an official complaint with Washington.

During the Wall Street Journal interview, Rice said support for Lopez Obrador appeared to be fading, noting that "while Chavez continues to say he'll support Lopez Obrador and all of that, the question is will Mexicans."

"And it doesn't appear that they will. It appears that the Mexicans wish to get back to reality here, to a stable political environment."

China Asks US To Drop Tariff Bill (FT)

By Alan Beattie And Mure Dickie

Financial Times, September 28, 2006

China's foreign ministry on Wednesday called on US senators to drop a bill that would impose 27.5 per cent tariffs on Chinese imports in retaliation for Beijing's alleged undervaluation of the renminbi.

"We hope the US senators will view objectively and rationally the problems that have emerged in the process of rapid development of Sino-US trade . . . and will cease deliberation on a bill harmful to Sino-US economic co-operation," the ministry said.

The statement was the ministry's most direct opposition yet to the legislation sponsored by senators Charles Schumer and Lindsey Graham, who are considering whether to press ahead with their bill.

DOJ_NMG_0070792

Their reluctance to call for a vote this week represents a qualified vote of confidence in Hank Paulson, Treasury secretary, who has announced a high-level dialogue with the Chinese authorities that he says signals China's greater willingness to listen.

But both senators made it clear that their patience even with Mr Paulson's efforts was limited. "We believe in him," Mr Schumer said after meeting Mr Paulson on Tuesday. "On the other hand, we have seen for three years that China doesn't like to move."

He added: "We believe China is close to an immovable object. The question is whether Secretary Paulson is an unstoppable force."

Officials close to the China-US talks say the Schumer-Graham bill in itself has lost the power to shock and threaten the Chinese, not least because, they say, the two senators have indicated the bill is intended to raise the issue more than actually becoming law. But it does underline the protectionist mood in Congress, they say.

The confidence in Mr Paulson relative to his predecessor as Treasury secretary, John Snow, whose entreaties to China failed to produce much movement, was echoed by Charles Grassley, chairman of the Senate finance committee, which oversees trade. "What is wrong with [the] Schumer and Graham [bill] at this point as opposed to six months ago is that their efforts will be undercutting the negotiations that Secretary Paulson has taken forth", Mr Grassley told the FT on Tuesday. "Undercutting Paulson is a heck of a lot different from undercutting his predecessor."

The bill, however, reflects growing frustration with China's obduracy in making only small incremental changes to its exchange rate regime. Sixty-seven senators out of 100 voted for the original bill. Following the slight adjustment and move towards a floating rate system last summer, the renminbi has appreciated by only 4.3 per cent since the first vote on the Schumer-Graham bill.

The 27.5 per cent number came from what the senators said was the average estimation of the renminbi's overvaluation at the time of the bill's introduction.

The bill is very unlikely to become law, both because the House of Representatives has already passed a China trade bill and will be reluctant to undertake another, and because the White House would probably veto any bill that did make it through Congress.

A unilateral imposition of tariffs to compensate for alleged competitive currency manipulation would be flatly illegal under World Trade Organisation rules and would almost certainly spur litigation by China at the WTO.

Tom Gallagher of the ISI Group, a Washington-based consultancy, said the symbolic impact was still important. "Once senators have gone on record twice there is a higher hurdle to reverse their votes in the future," he said. "It could highlight protectionism risks next year if the Democrats take the House."

NASA Chief, On First China Trip, Says Joint Spaceflight Is Unlikely (NYT)

By Warren E. Leary

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — Any joint human spaceflights involving China and the United States will have to come in the future when there is more trust and openness between the countries, the NASA administrator, Michael D. Griffin, said Wednesday.

Speaking in Shanghai toward the end of the first visit to China by top officials from the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, Mr. Griffin said there were "no current plans to work with China on the space shuttle and space station programs."

Mr. Griffin, who characterized the five-day visit as enjoyable and informative, said that it was too early to talk about any cooperative programs between the nations, but that the first steps probably would be in data sharing and some type of joint effort with robotic spacecraft.

"We did discuss closer cooperation in our nations' science programs," Mr. Griffin said during a news conference in which American reporters participated by telephone. "We're all very encouraged by those initial discussions."

Mr. Griffin said earlier that the International Space Station program involving the United States and 15 other nations had well-established partnerships after almost 13 years and that he would not propose changing it. And since the space shuttle program is to close down in 2010 with the retirement of the three remaining orbiters, there is little prospect of Chinese involvement, he said.

China, only the third nation, after Russia and the United States, with the capacity to send humans into space, has been seeking more international cooperation in space projects, but Washington has been reluctant because of such issues as technology transfer, trading weapons technology and human rights.

The biggest difficulty, Mr. Griffin said, was with a civilian agency like NASA working with a Chinese space program dominated by that country's military. Aside from concerns about national security issues, like missile technology proliferation, human space cooperation "requires a great deal of trust and openness."

DOJ_NMG_0070793

Partners in human space flight have to understand one another's equipment, systems and procedures completely, as the United States and Russia have learned to do, he said.

"We have to have a great degree of trust. If not, there is a real danger in the mix," Mr. Griffin said. "If we're going to fly together, we're going to have to depend on each other."

Mr. Griffin said the NASA group chose not to visit the Jiuquan Satellite Launch Center, an extensive rocket-launching complex in the Gobi Desert from which the Chinese prepare and fly their manned spacecraft and keep an extensive inventory of rockets.

NASA officials had received permission to visit the base, which is operated by the People's Liberation Army. But they were told that the tour would be limited to the launching pads and that they would not have access to the buildings where spacecraft are tested and prepared for launching. Mr. Griffin said that if he had been allowed to see the engineering facilities and have "eye-level discussions" with fellow engineers, he would have gone.

"I am not a tourist; this is, in fact, my profession," Mr. Griffin said at the news conference. "I have seen a lot of launch pads in my time and didn't need to go that far to see another one."

Mr. Griffin said his "get acquainted" visit, during which he met Chinese space officials and toured a number of science centers, had generally been "very enjoyable" and informative.

"Our hosts could hardly have been nicer," he said. "This is our very first visit. It's not our last visit."

Chinese Corruption Or Competition? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

THE CHINESE GOVERNMENT wants its people to believe that no one is beyond the reach of its sweeping anti-corruption campaign. That is the message behind the sacking and detention of Shanghai's Communist Party leader, Chen Liangyu, on Sunday. But few in China or anywhere else are likely to buy the notion that this is a principled crackdown on corruption.

Chen stands accused of misappropriating funds in the city's pension fund and using his position to enrich friends and family members. The member of the national Politburo may have done all that, but his real misfortune is to be associated with former President Jiang Zemin's Shanghai power base at a time when President Hu Jintao is trying to consolidate his control, partly by emasculating Shanghai's power within the party.

Chen is the highest-ranking official to be arrested or fired as a result of the anti-corruption investigations launched last spring, and other party leaders in Shanghai have been put on notice that they may be next in what could turn out to be a widespread purge. Such purges aren't uncommon when a new leader takes power in China; Jiang did much the same by prompting the resignation of Beijing's party secretary in 1995.

Getting rid of Chen serves a variety of political purposes for Hu. He eliminates a potential rival ahead of next year's party congress, sends a message to other Shanghai officials that they need to take Beijing's dictates on slower economic growth more seriously and reassures resentful residents of impoverished rural areas that the central government is concerned about all that bourgeois hedonism in China's glitziest city.

Never mind that a self-proclaimed campaign against corruption can itself be corrupt if politically driven; it still can reap dividends. In China, corruption and double-dealing are endemic throughout society. As Times staff writer Mark Magnier pointed out Sunday in an article on the country's growing crisis of trust, cheating is rampant in business relationships, false advertising is an everyday fact of life, kickbacks are ubiquitous and counterfeiting is so common that even the smallest stores are equipped with machines to authenticate currency.

Corruption, it's often said, is one of the viruses that could kill off China's economic miracle. Indeed, in most parts of the world, such an environment would have already sent investors fleeing for the exits. There is usually a direct link between corruption and poverty. Those nations at the top of Transparency International's annual list of the world's most corrupt countries tend also to top the lists of the world's poorest. But China, because of its sheer size and promise, has been able to grow spectacularly despite the corrupt practices of many government functionaries turned capitalists.

The country has an "anything goes" frontier mentality that Californians of a bygone era might have recognized. That's not sustainable forever. Lawless frontiers are a great place to make a quick buck, but eventually the citizenry gets fed up and starts screaming for a sheriff — one who isn't just going after his political rivals.

At German Conference On Muslim Relations, One Vote Is Unanimous: Mozart Must Go On (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070794

BERLIN, Sept. 27 — Amid all the issues that divide Germany's Muslims and non-Muslims — from women's rights to the teaching of Islam in schools — there was one point on which the 30 participants in a landmark conference held here on Wednesday could agree, according to its organizer.

They would like to see the Deutsche Oper of Berlin reinstate the Mozart opera it canceled earlier this week after receiving an anonymous threat that the production — which features a scene with the severed head of the Prophet Muhammad — could put the opera house at risk.

The 30 representatives, drawn equally from the German government and Germany's Muslim population, could even go see the opera together, said Wolfgang Schäuble, the interior minister, who organized and served as chairman of the conference, held in an 18th-century baroque palace.

With that suggestion, made at a news conference after the session, Mr. Schäuble artfully linked the public uproar over the cancellation of Mozart's "Idomeneo" to this long-planned gathering, which was meant to demonstrate Germany's resolve to reach out to its more than three million Muslims.

"We have, in a very tolerant tone, laid out quite different positions," Mr. Schäuble said. "That was the point."

In some ways, the opera affair galvanized the meeting — underlining the urgency and complexity of the issues facing Germany, as it seeks to integrate a Muslim population that is growing in size and, in the view of some, growing farther apart from mainstream German society.

"There was general agreement that we would like to see the opera come back," said Mehmet Yildirim, the general secretary of the Turkish-Islamic Union. "But there were different perspectives on the issue."

He said that while the atmosphere on Wednesday was positive, he was less sure that Germany and its Muslim population would be able to work together over a period of years to solve their more basic differences.

The conference, which had been planned soon after Angela Merkel was elected chancellor last fall, comes at a time of heightened debate over whether Germans have been too quick to compromise their values in the face of anger, or merely the threat of anger, on the part of Muslims.

Even before the cancellation of the opera, there were misgivings here about the repeated expressions of regret by Pope Benedict XVI, a German, for his recent remarks about Islam and violence.

On Wednesday, Mrs. Merkel added her voice to a chorus of political and cultural leaders who criticized the Deutsche Oper.

"I think the cancellation was a mistake," she said to reporters. "Self-censorship does not help us against people who want to practice violence in the name of Islam. It makes no sense to retreat."

A top cultural official in Berlin, Thomas Flierl, said the city would like to stage "Idomeneo" as soon as possible. The Deutsche Oper said it was open to rescheduling it, provided that a "suitable date" could be found. On Tuesday, the director of the opera house, Kirsten Harms, said she would first have to resolve the political and diplomatic implications.

Ms. Harms has been roundly scorned. But critics said the Berlin government, particularly its chief security official, Ehrhard Körting, should have given her more advice.

At the conference, the issues were no less sensitive, ranging from the teaching of Islamic religion in public schools to the training of imams in Germany, and from the construction of mosques to the discrimination against Muslims living in this country, the majority of whom are of Turkish origin.

The meeting was a necessary step because the government needs to get a feel for the Islamic point of view, said Ayyub Axel Köhler, chairman of the Central Council of Muslims.

Complicating attempts at dialogue, Muslims in Germany are a fractured group. The government took note of that by inviting independent figures like Seyran Ates, a Turkish-German lawyer who represents victims of domestic abuse. Mr. Schäuble, an experienced and influential member of Mrs. Merkel's Christian Democratic Party, supports teaching Islam in schools. But he also insists that Muslim schoolgirls be allowed to take physical education — an activity some conservative Muslim families resist.

Mr. Schäuble, who oversees antiterrorism policy, warned Muslim leaders that they must abide by the German Constitution and the principles of a democratic society if they wanted to be included in the conference.

In an interview with Der Spiegel this week, he made clear the limits of his tolerance. "I can promise you this," he said, "anyone who calls me an infidel at the conference will be in for a fight."

The session was closed to the news media, but judging by the conciliatory tone afterward, it did not seem likely that anybody called him one.

Exhuming The Past In A Painful Quest (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070795

NEBAJ, Guatemala -- A decade after the conclusion of the long civil war that ravaged this Central American nation, Guatemalans are literally trying to dig up their past.

Spurred by a surge of requests from victims' families this year, dozens of forensic anthropologists have been fanning out across the countryside to search for remains of the 200,000 people -- most of them Mayan Indian civilians -- who were killed or abducted during the 36-year conflict.

Many were massacred by military forces and dumped into mass graves. Others were buried hurriedly in unmarked, secret locations by relatives anxious to avoid rampaging troops.

About 40,000 victims simply disappeared after being seized by government operatives.

Nearly every day brings another grisly discovery: skulls of toddlers executed with gunshots to the head; corpses of young men whose necks are still looped with the garrotes used to strangle them. Nearly every week brings another funeral packed with weeping relatives: once-youthful widows now wrinkled and gray, children long since grown to adulthood.

Meanwhile, in a cavernous, damp warehouse in Guatemala's capital, investigators wearing protective masks and surgical gloves are combing through piles upon piles of mildewed documents from a recently discovered secret police archive, hunting for clues to the fate of the disappeared.

The current effort is hardly the first probe of wartime atrocities since peace accords ended the conflict in 1996. But its scope and pace are unprecedented in a country where those responsible have enjoyed near impunity. Only two military officials have been imprisoned for war crimes, according to human rights activists, despite findings by a U.N. commission that government and allied paramilitary forces committed nearly all of the atrocities.

Much of the bloodletting occurred in the late 1970s, when the military-backed dictatorship that had been battling leftist guerrillas expanded its targets to include anyone critical of the government -- including students, priests and union members. But the slaughter reached its peak in the early 1980s, when the military launched a scorched-earth campaign through the countryside to eliminate any potential support for the guerrillas from the long-oppressed Mayan Indians. Hundreds of villages were burned, livestock destroyed and tens of thousands of people killed.

The remains of fewer than 5,000 victims have been returned to their families.

The anguish of those still searching was palpable among the two dozen Mayan Indians who attended a recent exhumation near this town in the central Guatemalan department of Quiche.

Most were subsistence farmers and manual laborers who could speak only their native Mayan language and could ill afford to take time off from work. Yet day after day they hiked to the grave site atop a mist-shrouded mountain -- the women bearing small children strapped to their backs with colorful blankets, the men shouldering shovels to help the forensic team dig for bodies.'I Don't Think It's Her'

Jacinto Bernal, a 56-year-old with weathered skin, blinked back tears as he watched an anthropologist brush away dirt from the skeleton of a woman who appeared to be in her thirties and may or may not have been his wife, Maria Perez. She was gunned down by a military helicopter in 1985, he said, leaving him to raise their four young children on his own.

"I don't think it's her," Bernal muttered miserably. "She was struck in the back of the head, but it looks like this skull has a hole in the front."

There was little else to go on.

Like others who used the spot as a secret burial ground during the 1980s, Bernal had been forced to sneak there after dark and could no longer remember exactly where he had buried his wife's body.

A few feet away, in a different group of peasants, Petrona Bernal, 45, squatted by a grave containing the tiny bones of a young child whom she hoped would prove to be her baby boy. He was born in 1982, shortly after Bernal's village was destroyed.

"We lived on the run," she recalled. "All we had to eat was herbs and flowers."

Malnourished and weak, she had given birth to her son in the forest, only to watch the infant die of hunger days later. Ever since, Bernal said, she has ached to recover the boy's body and give him a proper Christian burial.

Until now, she had not dared to return to the secret grave site. Many members of civil defense patrols who carried out atrocities at the military's behest still live among the communities they once terrorized. Many military leaders who directed the war remain powerful -- including Gen. EfraÃ-n RÃ-os Montt, the former dictator who today heads one of the largest parties in the legislature.

RÃ-os Montt has repeatedly denied ordering the hundreds of massacres documented during his 1982-83 tenure and has even questioned whether they took place. Forensic workers, lawyers and activists seeking to uncover war crimes have also faced repeated threats. Several have been killed.

But thanks in part to an infusion of foreign funds, private forensic teams and grass-roots organizations dedicated to helping indigenous peoples have expanded their efforts to file claims with the state to authorize exhumations.

DOJ_NMG_0070796

The campaign also received a boost in 2004 when the newly elected president, Ã“scar Berger, publicly apologized to the victims of wartime atrocities on behalf of the government. He has established a commission to compensate them as well as help fund some of the forensic work this year.

Back in the late 1990s, noted Fredy Peccerelli, head of the Guatemalan Forensic Anthropology Foundation, his organization was a tiny outfit able to conduct only about 10 exhumations a year. This year his staff of 80 has already reached 120 sites. They expect to recover about 450 bodies by the end of this year, and about 1,000 per year in the near future.

Even so, at that rate it will take decades to recover even a fraction of the total number of victims.

Finding and identifying the 40,000 who went missing is an even greater challenge. Many were pulled off buses or back roads and taken to military bases far from their home provinces to be tortured by interrogators.

Of the 650 bodies Peccerelli's group has recovered from exhumations at military bases, only 220 have been identified. The rest are being stored in stacks of cardboard boxes at the foundation's headquarters, awaiting a new initiative to collect and compare DNA samples from victims and their relatives that Peccerelli hopes to begin soon.A Massive Police Archive

Another potential source of leads is the recently discovered secret police archive. Deputies of Guatemala's human rights ombudsman stumbled upon it accidentally in July 2005 when they were investigating complaints that explosives were being unsafely stored in the area.

The documents number more than 80 million pages and date as far back as the 1880s. Stacked from floor to ceiling in room after room, they have been badly damaged by water, rats and insects, and do not include records from precincts in several regions where the worst atrocities occurred. However, buried in the mountains of paper are priceless finds like death certificates for unidentified bodies found by police. By comparing the fingerprints on the certificates with those on the national identity cards of missing victims, said Peccerelli, "you can find if there's a match and then search for the body at a specific cemetery."

Alberto Fuentes, who is overseeing the preservation and analysis of the archives, said investigators have also come across a few arrest warrants for people detained for "political crimes" who later turned up dead -- including grandmothers and babies.

But he cautioned that it would take time to find enough documents in the archives to mount a legal case against their killers. "This is a project of 20 years," he said.

The evidence generated by the recent exhumations has also failed so far to spur a rise in prosecutions.

"We still have a weak state that is scared of the military," said Frank LaRue, one of Guatemala's leading human rights advocates. "Local prosecutors are authorizing the exhumations. But when the results come in, they don't initiate criminal proceedings. So we're having all these exhumations but no trials."

Even if prosecutors were to open cases, convictions could be hard to achieve. While Guatemalan judges have sentenced some members of the civil defense patrols, suits against those who issued their orders have been tied up in legal wrangling or languished in the attorney general's office for years.

Efforts by Guatemalans to obtain justice from foreign courts have also met with obstacles. In July, Judge Santiago Pedraz of the Spanish National Court issued arrest warrants for eight former military officials, including RÃ-os Montt, on charges of genocide, torture, terrorism and illegal detention. Guatemalan authorities have not acted on the warrants, and Guatemalan courts blocked Pedraz from deposing the accused during a fact-finding trip in June.

Nonetheless, Peccerelli remains hopeful, pointing out that it took years of activism and hundreds of exhumations just to get the government to admit that civilians had been killed. "Now it is accepted that those massacres occurred," he said. "We're just waiting for the next step, and we know that the work we're doing will contribute."

Clinton Warns Divided Labor (WT/AP)

By Beth Gardiner

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

MANCHESTER, England -- Former President Bill Clinton sought yesterday to boost Britain's badly divided Labor Party, warning supporters not to let it suffer the same fate as America's defeated Democrats.

Delegates at Labor's annual conference gave a celebrity's welcome to a leader they love far more than President Bush, who is widely despised in the party.

Mr. Clinton charmed a packed auditorium with a 40-minute speech in which he lavished praise on Prime Minister Tony Blair and treasury chief Gordon Brown, Mr. Blair's likely successor.

In a reference to the political damage that Mr. Blair suffered at home because of his relationship with Mr. Bush, Mr. Clinton thanked him for maintaining Britain's alliance with the United States "through quite a lot of storm as well as occasional sunshine."

DOJ_NMG_0070797

He said that because Labor had been so successful in strengthening Britain's economy and modernizing its society, there was a danger that voters would assume the improvements were "just a part of the landscape" and that any party that came to power would make similar choices.

"I have been there," he said, recalling that his administration cut the U.S. deficit drastically, only to watch it balloon under Mr. Bush. "I say that to remind you that it can change quickly."

With the departing Mr. Blair, Labor's most successful leader ever, the party faces a perilous future. Infighting has tarnished its image, and the opposition Conservative Party is surging after nearly a decade in the doldrums.

A fierce party rebellion forced Mr. Blair to announce Sept. 7 that he will quit within a year. In his emotional final conference speech Tuesday, he warned the party to stop its internal battles or risk being punished at the polls.

Some Labor backers worry that Mr. Brown, who lacks Mr. Blair's charm and polish, will be unable to beat back Conservative leader David Cameron. But a battle to keep the finance minister from getting the top job could be divisive.

Mr. Clinton told the delegates that they should be proud of all they had accomplished to change Britain.

"Your prime minister, his government, your party, have been a stunning success," he said, praising Labor for creating jobs and leading the way internationally on fighting poverty and global warming. "None of this is an accident."

He argued that the party would always have to change its policies to keep up in a fast-moving world and urged them not to let themselves be cast as supporters of the status quo while their opponents are seen as advocates of change.

Delegate Christopher Wellbelove, a local council member in southern London, said Mr. Clinton's reminder of the Democrats' defeat by Mr. Bush and his Republicans was chilling.

"We got a very clear warning that if we don't stick together, we could lose everything" and give the Tories a shot at winning elections expected in 2009. "It can all be taken away."

Risky Wishes At The U.N. (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

The 15 nations that will gather in New York today to conduct a straw vote on who is to be the next U.N. secretary general should reflect on a durable lesson of political life: Be careful what you wish for. You may get it.

That warning of the dangers of answered prayers applies particularly to President Bush and his support for Ban Ki Moon, South Korea's reliably stolid foreign minister, in the highly competitive race to succeed Kofi Annan at year's end. Bush -- pilloried by Third World radicals at last week's General Assembly opening -- may be picking up a lightning rod instead of a shield.

Bush's decision rewards a long-established U.S. ally, South Korea, rather than a new U.S. strategic partner, India, which supports favorite son Shashi Tharoor. Tharoor, a U.N. civil servant, novelist and historian, is as presentationally polished as Ban is laconic.

In two previous polls of Security Council members, Washington has voted to encourage both the leading candidates to stay in the race. A shift to voting only for Ban -- a move that Bush indicated he would make to South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun at a White House meeting this month -- would probably doom the hopes of Tharoor and the other candidates.

It is unusual for the competition to end so early for a job that provides the world's biggest diplomatic megaphone and little else in terms of real power. But everything else about this year's contest has been unusual and, alas, probably seminal.

The campaigning for votes from the Security Council members has been unusually open, political and intense, with candidates crisscrossing the globe for the past two months to drum up support. South Korea's generosity in foreign aid and investment decisions may work in Ban's favor with some nations, it is said in diplomatic understatement in the corridors of the United Nations.

Bush has other motivations. Supporting Ban smooths Bush's once-troubled relations with Roh. Helping secure the top diplomatic job at the world body for an American ally would be an important first and an asset for Bush's growing concern with his legacy. There may be hope as well in Washington that Ban would be more tractable -- or at least quieter and more remote -- than was Annan, who made jarringly public his disagreements with Bush over international law and the war in Iraq.

Annan in fact worked hard to protect U.S.-U.N. relations and came under fire from Third World radicals for being "too responsive" to Washington as they sought to play up a widening North-South divide in the world body.

The headlines on the diatribes that Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad delivered last week in any forum available in New York, including the General Assembly hall, concentrated on his attacks on Bush. But Ahmadinejad was even more confrontational about the United Nations, whose legitimacy the Iranian directly challenged. Having such a highly visible American ally in charge of the U.N. Secretariat might complicate the vital negotiating role that the world body will play in resolving the Iranian crisis or in the confrontation with North Korea over its nuclear arms.

DOJ_NMG_0070798

Those are not sufficient reasons for Washington to drop its support of Ban, who is a well-respected diplomat. But they are reasons for the Bush team to be careful in building expectations about what Ban's election would mean for U.S. strategic interests. At a time when the United Nations itself needs defending and explaining to many skeptical audiences throughout the world, traditional diplomacy may not be the best qualification for a new secretary general.

Security Council ambassadors will not actually vote for or against anyone today. They will mark ballot sheets to encourage, discourage or express no opinion on declared candidates. It is still possible that last-minute horse-trading could produce a muddled outcome that would encourage new candidates to get into the race.

Top jobs are also open at the World Health Organization, where China is making a strong push, and the World Food Program, where Europe hopes one of its citizens will replace previous American directors. The temptation will be strong to barter votes in a package deal.

Reserving or rewarding such high-responsibility jobs on a regional or national basis -- or because of a history of alliances -- is an obsolete luxury in the age of globalization. Merit and suitability should be the only criteria in a game that must be played by transparent rules.

DOJ_NMG_0070799

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Thursday, September 28, 2006 10:55 AM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Beckner, Rick (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McMahon, Linda M (CIV); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Osborn, Tara (CIV); Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 9/28/2006 Civil Division News

Judge: Ashcroft doesn't have absolute immunity in lawsuit

State's `No Child' Lawsuit Still Alive; A Federal Judge Dismisses 3 Of Connecticut's 4 Complaints Against The Law's Cost, But Leaves Room For The Case To Proceed

No charges in Sound oil spill; ConocoPhillips ship suspected in '04

Tenet agrees to 'integrity' pact

U.S. transgendered inmate freed to die at home charged with trying to fake own death

Doctors Lobby for Better U.S. Surveillance of Heart Devices

AP

September 28, 2006

Judge: Ashcroft doesn't have absolute immunity in lawsuit

By REBECCA BOONE
ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

BOISE, Idaho -- Former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft does not have absolute immunity from a lawsuit over the material witness policies the Justice Department used after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, U.S. District Judge Edward Lodge ruled Wednesday.

In his ruling, Lodge refused to dismiss the lawsuit brought by former University of Idaho football player

Abdullah al-Kidd against Ashcroft, current U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez, the Department of Homeland Security and others.

The ruling leaves the federal government with essentially three choices: To appeal the ruling to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, to settle the lawsuit or to move forward with a trial. If the trial moves forward, Ashcroft and the other defendants could be subjected to questioning by al-Kidd's attorneys - including representatives from the American Civil Liberties Union - about their actions and policies in the months and years after the 9-11 attacks.

"We are literally reviewing it at this minute and no, we have not made any decisions at this time," Charles Miller, spokesman for the Justice Department's civil division, said of the ruling.

Al-Kidd, who played for the Vandals under the name Lavoni Kidd, contends that in 2003 the government wrongfully arrested him as a material witness in its unsuccessful computer terrorism case against a fellow student, Sami Omar Al-Hussayen. Al-Kidd and Al-Hussayen both worked on behalf of the Islamic Assembly of North America, a Michigan-based charitable organization that federal investigators alleged funneled money to activities supporting terrorism and published material advocating suicide attacks on the United States.

A jury acquitted Al-Hussayen of using his computer skills to foster terrorism and of three immigration violations after an eight-week federal trial. But Al-Hussayen - who was only months from finishing his doctorate study at the University of Idaho - was eventually deported to Saudi Arabia.

Al-Kidd was never actually called to testify, but he spent two weeks in jail as a material witness and was later released to the custody of his wife with strict limitations on where he could travel. He sued, alleging that he was falsely imprisoned and that the government violated due process, using material witness laws to arrest, detain and investigate individuals without first proving probable cause.

Specifically, he claimed that Ashcroft was personally liable for violating his rights because after the terrorist attacks Ashcroft "created a national policy to improperly seek material witness warrants, oversaw the execution of such warrants, and failed to correct the constitutional violations of conducting such actions," according to court documents. Al-Kidd said the investigation and detention not only caused him to lose a scholarship to study in Saudi Arabia, but that it cost him employment opportunities.

Ashcroft, in turn, asked the judge to dismiss the matter, saying that because his position at the Department of Justice was prosecutorial he was entitled to absolute immunity from the lawsuit.

The judge rejected that argument, saying that if al-Kidd's claims are true, then Ashcroft's actions did not qualify for absolute immunity.

"The development and practice of using the material witness statute to detain individuals while investigating possible criminal activity qualifies as police-type investigative activity, not prosecutorial advocacy," Lodge wrote in his ruling.

Moreover, Lodge found, Ashcroft does not necessarily have even qualified, or partial, immunity from the lawsuit.

"The allegations against Mr. Ashcroft involve more than vicarious liability but assert claims involving Mr. Ashcroft's own knowledge and actions related to Mr. al-Kidd's alleged constitutional deprivations," Lodge wrote. "Whether these allegations can be substantiated is a question to be decided later."

Al-Kidd's attorney, Lee Gelernt with the ACLU's national headquarters in New York, said the ruling could have widespread implications.

"This is the first opinion that I'm aware of that sort of squarely places the attorney general in the mix on the material witness issue," Gelernt said.

He called the ruling a "vindication" for al-Kidd.

"It will hopefully deter the government from using the material witness statute in the future in the way they did after Sept. 11," Gelernt said. "They used it as a deterrent tool to investigate people for whom they did not have probable cause to arrest on criminal charges."

Al-Kidd is asking the judge to declare that the federal government's actions were unconstitutional, to order the FBI and other agencies to expunge any records relating to the detention of al-Kidd and others, and for damages in an amount to be proven at trial.

END

Hartford Courant

September 28, 2006

State's `No Child' Lawsuit Still Alive; A Federal Judge Dismisses 3 Of Connecticut's 4 Complaints Against The Law's Cost, But Leaves Room For The Case To Proceed

By ROBERT A. FRAHM
Courant Staff Writer

A federal judge Wednesday dismissed much of Connecticut's argument for challenging a controversial U.S. government school reform law but left open one avenue for the state's lawsuit to continue.

U.S. District Judge Mark R. Kravitz dismissed three of the four counts in Connecticut's complaint that the 4-year-old No Child Left Behind Act unfairly costs state and local taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars.

While Wednesday's ruling in New Haven does not address the merits of the arguments made by the two sides, it sharply limits the scope of the federal court's jurisdiction on technical grounds.

A key portion of the ruling is that the court does not have jurisdiction over U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings' denial of Connecticut's request to waive parts of the law. Spellings denied the state's request to waive a requirement to test all students in grades 3 through 8. The state's previous testing program was limited to grades 4, 6 and 8.

However, Kravitz also ruled that the court will be able to review a fourth count in the state's argument - an allegation that Spellings violated administrative procedures and acted arbitrarily in rejecting amendments sought by Connecticut with regard to the testing of some groups of children, including those who speak little or no English.

State Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said that leaves open the opportunity to pursue the state's central argument that the No Child Left Behind law promises adequate funding but has failed to provide it.

"The denial of those amendments, we say, was wrong because the secretary misinterpreted the unfunded mandates provision" of the law, he said.

The state's lawsuit challenges the cost - but not the substance - of the law, the centerpiece of President Bush's education agenda. The law calls for a broad expansion of testing and a shake-up of schools that fail to make adequate academic progress for all groups of students, including low-income children, members of racial minorities, non-English-speaking children and students with disabilities.

Both sides put a positive spin on Wednesday's split ruling.

"Our case ... is alive and well," Blumenthal said in a hastily called press conference late Wednesday afternoon.

He said the state plans to appeal the dismissal of the three counts.

"We believe as strongly as ever this fight is about resources necessary to educate our children and hold the United States government accountable to its promise," said Blumenthal, who filed the lawsuit a year ago.

Katherine McLane, press secretary for the U.S. Department of Education, said the department is pleased that the judge dismissed three of Connecticut's claims.

"The goal of No Child Left Behind is nothing more than what parents deserve and are demanding - that their children read and do math at grade level," she said. "Importantly, the judge agreed that the secretary has discretion to deny a waiver request and that her decision is not reviewable by a court. The remaining issues in this case have been reserved for another day."

In dismissing portions of the state's complaint, Kravitz said some of the state's requests for judicial review were premature because there had been no actual violation of the law by state officials and, therefore, no federal enforcement action on which to rule.

END

SEATTLE POST-INTELLIGENCER

Sept. 28, 2006

No charges in Sound oil spill; ConocoPhillips ship suspected in '04

By ROBERT MCCLURE AND PAUL SHUKOVSKY
P-I REPORTERS

After a mysterious midnight oil spill turned central Puget Sound beaches into a stinky mess, the Coast Guard proudly proclaimed that investigators had tracked down the spiller. The oil's chemical fingerprint clearly implicated a ConocoPhillips tanker, the agency said.

That was more than 1 1/2 years ago.

But now, federal prosecutors in Seattle are declining to press criminal charges against ConocoPhillips, even though the chemical fingerprint showed that the substance spilled was crude oil, which is usually carried by tankers such as ConocoPhillips' Polar Texas.

The Polar Texas was in the vicinity of the spill in Dalco Passage, near Vashon and Maury islands, on the night of the October 2004 spill. It was the only oil tanker there that night.

The decision by U.S. Attorney John McKay's office not to prosecute ConocoPhillips, which hasn't acknowledged guilt, doesn't mean the firm is totally off the hook. Federal and state environmental officials are still pushing civil cases against the Houston-based oil company.

And a grand jury in Alaska investigated allegations of criminal conduct by the company in unrelated episodes, including the apparent cover-up of another oil spill. It's unclear whether criminal charges will be brought in that case.

In Seattle, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jim Oesterle would not elaborate on why McKay's office is declining to prosecute, saying commenting might interfere with ongoing negotiations between the company and environmental officials regarding possible civil penalties.

"I'm not prepared at this point to give all the reasons for (declining prosecution), and the reason for not providing more information is I don't want to get ahead of the state or the (Department of Justice) on their resolutions, because I know they're in the midst of those negotiations," Oesterle said.

The state Ecology Department said it and other agencies had been waiting for the outcome of the criminal investigation to launch an effort to recoup damages from the company for the environmental harm done.

The environmental agencies hoped that the company would admit that it spilled the oil and outline how it might have happened, so that the agencies could estimate how much oil spilled, said Dale Davis of the department's oil-spills unit. The oil spill's volume is a key factor in how much the company would have to pay.

"I don't think (waiting for the criminal investigation) helped us any," Davis said. However, there is no time limit on seeking environmental damages.

But there is a two-year time limit for the Ecology Department to pursue a separate process that penalizes the company by making it pay a fine. That expires next month.

"We are aggressively pursuing every option available to make sure justice is done as a result of the Dalco Passage spill," the agency said in a written statement.

The Coast Guard, which investigates oil spills, said it would continue to coordinate possible civil action against the company with a Justice Department unit in San Francisco.

The Coast Guard has declined to provide information about the investigation, rejecting a Freedom of Information Act request by the Seattle P-I on the ground that it has not finished investigating the case.

Lt. Cmdr. Andre Billeaudeaux, a Coast Guard spokesman, said that while he cannot comment on this decision by the U.S. Attorney's Office, "We are true believers in the U.S. attorney's methods."

"They have a measured approach, and they have their methods," Billeaudeaux said. "We do our best and we do a quality job. ... We have so many missions we do and so many irons in the fire. We do our best and move on. If there's process improvements (needed) in hindsight, we take a look at things we could have done better and sharpen the knife."

ConocoPhillips spokesman Rich Johnson said the company had no comment because it would be "inappropriate to discuss" the ongoing negotiations.

"We're continuing to cooperate with the authorities," Johnson said.

While a grand jury in Seattle was investigating the spill in June 2005, a memo distributed by the union representing ConocoPhillips' shipboard workers said, "So far the company is very pleased with the way our members have handled themselves and hope they will continue to be open and honest should they be called to testify in the future."

Members of the Polar Texas crew and the company have steadfastly maintained that they did nothing wrong when the ship took on additional seawater for ballast the night of the spill after unloading some crude oil in Tacoma.

If that operation were done incorrectly, it would be possible for the ship to disgorge oil in its cargo hold into Puget Sound. However, officers and crew members aboard the ship said the operation went well. Ballast water is taken on to keep a ship riding low enough in the water that it will be stable. The forecast on the night of the spill called for 10-foot swells and 30 mph winds in the North Pacific.

A former chief engineer of the Polar Texas and a former president of the Polar Texas fleet have told the P-I that it would be possible for crew members to flub the ballasting operation without knowing it, resulting in a spill.

At the time of the spill, the Polar Texas was just two months from being sent to the scrap yard. It left Tacoma about 6 p.m. that night, but the spill was not discovered until a tugboat captain passed through the area after midnight.

A P-I investigation in March 2005 documented numerous problems aboard ConocoPhillips tankers, including use of alcohol by crew members in apparent violation of company policy and an unreported explosion aboard one of the company's vessels.

The Alaska grand jury investigated problems aboard other ConocoPhillips tankers, including a spill aboard the Polar Discovery in mid-ocean in January 2004, caused when crew members mistakenly piped sludge oil from the engine room onto the ship's deck. Some got onto the side of the ship.

Later, the captain and other officers lowered a crew member over the ship's side with a power sprayer that could be used to clean up the oil.

Crew members said the purpose was to clean off oil on the vessel's side, although officers denied that. An entry in the logbook described it as a man-overboard drill. The captain offered no explanation for that entry.

The oil spill was not reported until a whistle-blower came forward four months later.

Failure to report an oil spill to the Coast Guard immediately is a federal crime.

END

AFX

September 28, 2006

Tenet agrees to 'integrity' pact

DALLAS (AFX) - Tenet Healthcare Corp. on Thursday said it has agreed to a 'corporate integrity' pact with federal authorities -- an offshoot of the hospital manager's $900 million settlement resolving investigations into alleged over-billing of Medicare.

The agreement with the Office of the Inspector General and Department of Health and Human Services establishes annual training requirements and compliance reviews by independent organizations. It targets Tenet's clinical standards, code of conduct and procedures in billing and reimbursement, among other areas.

Tenet, the nation's second-largest hospital operator, agreed in June to pay the $900 million to end investigations by the Justice Department and several U.S. attorneys into allegations that it overbilled Medicare for the most costly cases, made illegal kickbacks to doctors to refer Medicare patients to its hospitals\l "l", and used improper billing codes to bilk the health care program. The settlement\l "l" did not include a determination that Tenet broke the law.

In a statement, President and Chief Executive Trevor Fetter said the company already has in place many of the procedures and systems called for under the corporate integrity pact, due to changes made over the past three years since the company came under investigation.

The agreement runs through September 2011.

END

APError! Hyperlink reference not valid.September 28, 2006

U.S. transgendered inmate freed to die at home charged with trying to fake own death

BALTIMORE_A transgendered inmate freed from prison last year because she was dying of AIDS has been charged with using a forged Maryland death certificate to get new criminal charges dismissed.

Dee Deirdre Farmer, 41, was charged Wednesday with forging a Baltimore Circuit Court order to change the death certificate of a man named Charles Smith to reflect that Farmer was the person who had died. Charging documents showed that Farmer got criminal charges in Virginia dismissed using a forged Maryland death certificate.

In a landmark case, Farmer sued U.S. federal prison officials over a 1989 rape that occurred about a week after Farmer entered a federal maximum-security prison for men in Terre Haute, Indiana. Farmer had arrived with male sex organs and breast implants, after undergoing estrogen therapy.

The lawsuit claimed the government had violated Farmer's constitutional right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment by ignoring the risk that a feminine-appearing inmate would be raped by other prisoners. The U.S. Supreme Court ruling in 1994 that prison officials can sometimes be held liable for inmate assaults revived Farmer's lawsuit, which had been dismissed by lower courts. After the Supreme Court decision, however, she lost the case at trial.

Farmer was serving a 20-year federal sentence for credit-card fraud, followed by a 30-year sentence for credit-card fraud in Maryland.

In February 2005, Chief Judge Joseph F. Murphy Jr. of the Maryland Court of Special Appeals freed Farmer from a state prison near Hagerstown, saying the inmate, then described as blind, bedridden and dying of AIDS, was no longer a threat to society.

"When I cut him loose, my recollection is that it was on the basis of documentary evidence that he was HIV-positive and that his life expectancy was very, very short," Murphy told The (Baltimore) Sun on Wednesday. Murphy said he decided to release Farmer on probation "in the hopes that that might encourage him to remain crime-free while he was out with what little time he had left."

Farmer was born male, and underwent a sex-change operation to become female. She legally changed her Maryland birth certificate a few years ago to reflect that she was a woman named Dee Deirdre Farmer, according to court documents.

In December, Farmer was arrested in a department store in Baltimore County for allegedly applying for and using store credit cards in other people's names. She identified herself as Larry Prescott, although she later gave the name Dee Farmer, and appeared in court on those charges dressed as a man, said Baltimore County prosecutor Michelle Samoryk, who said that Farmer did not appear to be ill.

Farmer was charged in December as Larry G. Prescott, 44, with identity theft, identity fraud and theft for allegedly opening fake Nordstrom credit card accounts.

Dee Deirdre Farmer was indicted in January on five counts of mail fraud and two counts of aggravated identity theft for allegedly obtaining more than $50,000 in money and property by opening fraudulent credit accounts.

Nicholas A. Szokoly, the lawyer who helped win Farmer's release last year from prison, was surprised to learn of the new charges.

"I was hoping he would get some peace," the lawyer said. "I was looking forward to Dee being able to return home (last year) and have some quiet time with his family."

END

Bloomberg

Sept. 28, 2006

Doctors Lobby for Better U.S. Surveillance of Heart Devices

Heart specialists are asking U.S. officials to tighten surveillance of implanted defibrillators and stop issuing ``recall'' notices, because the term frightens patients who shouldn't have the devices removed.

The Heart Rhythm Society, a Washington-based group of 3,700 implant specialists, is urging the changes to help revive an industry damaged by recalls, device-related deaths and thousands of replacement surgeries. Doctors implant the $30,000 devices to automatically shock stopped hearts into normal rhythm.

Defibrillators were the fastest-growing medical technology until sales began declining for the first time in the second quarter. Minneapolis-based Medtronic Inc., Boston Scientific Corp., of Natick, Massachusetts, and St. Paul, Minnesota-based St. Jude Medical Inc. have lost a combined $11.2 billion in market value since their last earnings reports.

``With all the recalls that occurred in 2005, there was an awakening on our part,'' said society president Dwight Reynolds, an Oklahoma College of Medicine implant surgeon, in an interview yesterday. ``We realized that not only were there flaws in surveillance, analysis and communication, but there was a responsibility we had too.''

Experts say 1,000 people a day in the U.S. die of sudden cardiac death and that many could be saved by defibrillators. Since February 2005, the three companies have recalled about 300,000 defibrillators.

Quickly Shared

The society's comprehensive proposal, the first of its kind, recommends that information about any defibrillator flaw that may cause death or serious injury be quickly shared with doctors and patients.

The group said Medtronic, Boston Scientific and St. Jude should create independent panels of experts to evaluate devices and advise them on actions. There should be a standard way to notify patients, and doctors and funeral homes should routinely recover all devices for company analysis after defibrillator patients die, the proposal said.

When the society released its proposal in draft form in April, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and industry executives embraced it, Reynolds said. As a result, the companies are likely to create panels of independent doctors to advise them on product failures and plan recalls and other safety alerts, Reynolds said.

Reynolds this week met with staff members for U.S. Senator Charles Grassley of Iowa, chairman of the Finance Committee, and U.S. Senator Robert F. Bennett of Utah, chairman of the appropriations agriculture subcommittee, which has jurisdiction over the FDA budget.

`Reviewing Information'

``We're reviewing the information they gave us," said Emily Christensen, a spokeswoman for Bennett. Reynolds also said he visited Daniel Schultz, head of the FDA's center for devices.

Susan Bro, a spokesman for the FDA, said her agency's ``collaboration with the Heart Rhythm Society has been extremely productive. Some of the ideas in today's report are eminently doable and will inform our thinking and work with the clinical community," she said.

Medtronic is the leader in the $10 billion-a-year cardiac rhythm management business, followed by Boston Scientific's Guidant unit and St. Jude Medical Inc. The category includes pacemakers, which speed up hearts that beat too slowly so oxygen- carrying blood can better circulate.

Guidant and Medtronic have been criticized by patients for continuing to sell devices for months or years after company engineers learned of flaws that could cause products to fail at crucial moments.

In March, just before it was acquired by Boston Scientific, Guidant released a report from independent medical experts that concluded the company's product engineers made crucial and incorrect safety decisions without physician review.

`Recall'

The Heart Rhythm Society endorsed calls by the $175 billion- a-year medical device industry for the Food and Drug Administration to remove the term ``recall" from its lexicon so patients don't think all faulty implants must be removed.

Instead, the group recommended the terms ``advisory notice" or ``safety alert." Device industry officials prefer to call them ``field corrective actions."

A spokesman for AdvaMed, the largest trade group of device makers, declined comment on the society's report.

The number of recalls by all manufacturers jumped to 25 in the fiscal year ended last September from seven in 2003, the FDA said. The most important was Guidant's recall of 109,000 defibrillators, linked to at least seven deaths. The action cut Guidant sales and profits, derailed the company's purchase by Johnson & Johnson and sparked lawsuits, investigations and FDA sanctions.

Complications

A Canadian study in April reported that surgical removal of recalled defibrillators causes complications, including death, in 8.1 percent of patients. That is almost double the previously estimated rates, and the authors urged doctors to consider those risks before explanting suspect devices.

Reynolds, who implants 300 heart devices a year, said many patients were gripped by fear because the FDA calls its regulatory action a ``recall," which suggests the unit must be removed when the chance of failure is low.

``When you have a device taken out because of the word `recall,' and something bad happens, then people have not been well served," said Reynolds.

END

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent: Thursday, September 28, 2006 6:29 PM
To: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject: DOJ Daily News Wrap

PUBLIC AFFAIRS DAILY NEWS WRAP
September 28, 2006

Contact: Brian Roehrkasse, Deputy Director, Office of Public Affairs (202) 514-2007

FRIDAY'S EXPECTED NEWS STORIES:

Attorney General Participates in Swearing-In Ceremony for Ken Wainstein (OPA)
Today, the Attorney General participated in the swearing-in ceremony for Ken Wainstein as the first Assistant Attorney General for the new National Security Division. The Department also announced the members of the National Security Division's senior leadership team.

Justice Department Dismisses Antitrust Lawsuit against Exelon Corp. and Public Enterprise Service Group Inc. (Antitrust)
The Department of Justice today announced that it filed a notice with the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia to dismiss its antitrust complaint challenging the potential acquisition of Public Service Enterprise Group Inc. (PSEG) by Exelon Corp. Exelon has formally abandoned its effort to acquire PSEG, and therefore the lawsuit and proposed consent decree are no longer necessary, the Department said.

Justice Department Files Motions for Stay in NSA-ACLU Case with Sixth Circuit after Judge Refuses to Stay Ruling Imposed on Government's Terrorist Surveillance Program (Civil)
The Department of Justice filed two motions for a stay with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit after a federal judge refused to stay her ruling that would block the implementation of the government's Terrorist Surveillance Program. U.S. Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit allowed the government to continue the program, but only for another week. Judge Diggs Taylor ruled last month that the surveillance violates the rights to free speech and privacy. She had also said it violates the separation of powers between the executive, legislative and judicial branches of government enshrined in the Constitution. The Department asked Taylor to allow the program to continue until the Ohio-based Sixth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals issues a final ruling on the legal issues, which could take months. Taylor denied that request, but gave the government a seven-day reprieve while it seeks a stay from the appeals court pending that court's final ruling.

Talking Points:

- A stay is necessary to ensure that this vital intelligence-gathering program is not interrupted.

- We believe there would be a dramatic risk of harm to the Nation if the Terrorist Surveillance Program were halted by court order at this point.

Justice Department Settles Allegations of Disability Discrimination Against Texas Developers, Architects, and Engineers (Civil Rights)
The Justice Department today settled a lawsuit against 10 Austin, Texas developers, builders, architects, and engineers alleging disability discrimination in the design and construction of two housing developments in Austin. The suit, filed in U.S. District Court for the Western District of Texas, was brought to enforce provisions of the federal Fair Housing Act that require recently constructed dwellings to include features designed to make the dwellings more accessible to persons with physical disabilities.

Talking Points

- People with disabilities, like all Americans, deserve the opportunity to obtain fair housing in their communities.

- This lawsuit under the Fair Housing Act helps to ensure that we remain a welcoming society for all Americans.

Federal Jury Convicts Two For Cross Burning (Civil Rights)
A federal jury today convicted Christopher Mitchell and James Bradley Weems of burning a cross in front of the home of an African-American man in Fouke, Ark. The jury convicted each defendant of one count of conspiracy to violate the victim's civil rights. The evidence at trial established that on the night of August 5, 2005, Mitchell and Weems, attended a party where they discussed an African-American man who lived nearby, using racial slurs to describe him. The defendants, along with a third man, Christopher Baird, who had pleaded guilty to his role in the offense, used wooden boards to erect a cross. The defendants then planted the cross near the home of the African-American man and lit it on fire. Witnesses testified that as a result of the cross burning, the African-American victim and the family he lived with all moved from their home because they were too frightened to remain in the town.

Talking Points

- Few symbols of racial hatred are as grotesque as a cross burning.

- People have the right to live where they choose, free from such threats based on bigotry.

- The Department of Justice will continue to vigorously prosecute such offensive and criminal conduct.

Court Bars Arizona Men from Promoting Tax Fraud Scheme (Tax)

A federal court in Arizona has permanently barred a tax return preparer from promoting a tax scheme that involved creating a phony "Business Trust Organization" or limited liability company that resulted in the loss of millions of dollars of income and payroll tax revenue, the Justice Department announced today. James G. Morris of Mesa, Ariz. consented to the injunction order without admitting the allegations in the government complaint. The United States had previously obtained injunctions against Dennis H. Lawrence of Tempe, Ariz., and Allen Vanderwey of Phoenix.

BBC Interviews FBI Deputy Assistant Director (FBI)
BBC World Business conducted an on-camera interview with Sal Hernandez, Deputy Assistant Director for the Criminal Investigative Division regarding the FBI's efforts to address corporate fraud. It is unclear when the interview will air.

FRIDAY'S EXPECTED EVENTS/RELEASES:

9:00 A.M. EDT

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales will deliver remarks before the Georgetown University Law Center Conference on the Judiciary regarding judicial independence.
McDonough Building
Hart Auditorium
600 New Jersey Avenue N.W.
Washington, D.C.
OPEN PRESS

Due to space limitations, all other media wishing to cover the event must contact Elissa Free of the Georgetown University Law Center at ebf4@law.georgetown.edu or (202) 662-9519.

9:45 A.M. EDT

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales will deliver remarks before the United States Chamber of Commerce Intellectual Property Summit regarding the Department's efforts to protect intellectual property rights.
U.S. Chamber of Commerce
Hall of Flags
1615 H Street N.W.
Washington, D.C.
OPEN PRESS

Pre-set for all media wishing to cover the event is 9:15 A.M. EDT. Press inquiries regarding logistics should be directed to Theresa Pagliocca at (202) 532-3486 or Katie Wilson of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce at (202) 463-5375.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, September 29, 2006 8:18 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Friday, September 29, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060929.pdf; dojclips060929.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Senate Approves Detainee Bill Backed By Bush (WP).....6
Senate Approves Broad New Rules To Try Detainees (NYT)...7
Senate OKs Detainee Interrogation Bill (AP-Y).....9
Terror Detainee Bill Passes Senate, 65-34 (USAT).....11
US Senate Backs Detainee Bill (FT).....11
Senate OKs Detainees Tribunal Bill (WT).....12
Senate Votes To Create U.S. War-Crimes Tribunals For Terrorists (BLOOM).....13
Many Rights In U.S. Legal System Absent In New Bill (WP)...14
Legal Battle Over Detainee Bill Is Likely (LAT).....16
Democrats See Strength In Bucking Bush (NYT).....18
Can The Democrats Beat Bush's Beliefs With Poll Politics? (WSJ).....20
7-Day Stay Granted In Surveillance Case (WP/AP).....21
Judge Rules Against Surveillance During Appeal (Update4) (BLOOM).....21
Domestic Spying Program Gets 7-day Extension From Detroit Judge (FREEP).....23
Spy Program Gets One-week Extension, Judge Rules (DEN)23
Judge Gives Feds 7 More Days To Wiretap (UPI).....24
House Approves Power For Warrantless Wiretaps (NYT).....24
7-day Stay Granted In Surveillance Case (AP-Y).....25
House Set To Vote On Eavesdropping Bill (AP-Y).....25
House OKs Expanded Wiretap Program (LAT).....26
Belgians Say Banking Group Broke European Rules In Giving Data To U.S. (NYT).....28
Belgium Rules Sifting Of Bank Data Illegal (WP).....29
Belgium, EU To Seek Oversight Of Transfer Of Bank Data To U.S. (WSJ).....31
Imam Denies Endorsing Attacks On U.S. (NSDY/AP).....31
Defense Committee Formed For Liberty City Men Charged With Terror Plot (MH).....32
BREAKING NEWS: Tuscaloosa Man Arrested By Federal Terrorism Task Force (TUSN).....33
FBI Arrests Tuscaloosa Man For Illegal Money Transfers (AP).....33
Ashcroft Is Denied Immunity In Case (WP).....34
Document Seizure Hampers Gitmo Detainees (AP).....34
Canadian Police Official Apologizes For Mistakes (WP).....36
US Fuels Pakistan Bounty Market (FT).....36

Homeland Response:

FBI Denies Overestimating Anthrax Power (WP/AP).....37
Security Budget To Include Cargo Pact (WSJ).....38
Congress Nears Deal On Ports Security (AP).....39
Felons In The Dock (WSJ).....40
Inside The Beltway (WT).....40
Why Bill Clinton Pushed Back (WP).....42
Insurers Are Ready To Fight To Keep Federal Backing Of Terrorism Coverage (NYT).....43

War News:

Bush Attacks Democrats Over Iraq And Terror (NYT).....44
Bush Attacks 'Party Of Cut And Run' (WP).....45
Bush Speech Links Politics, Terror Fight (LAT).....46
Bush Criticizes Democrats On Terror War (AP-Y).....47
Bush Scolds 'Party Of Cut And Run' (WT).....48
Ratings Rise With Terror Talks (WT).....49
Land: Majority Of Baptists Support Bush (AP-Y).....50
Bush Urges Key Allies To Cooperate (AP).....51
Afghan, Pakistani Leaders Plan Visits (WT).....52
In Britain, Musharraf Is Questioned On Terror Ties (NYT).....53
Blair, Musharraf Pledge To Fight Terror (AP).....54
When Hamid Met Pervez (NYT).....55
The Musharraf Exception (WSJ).....56
Rumsfeld Comments On Intelligence Report (AP).....57
Rumsfeld Says Its Not Possible To Tell If Jihadist Ranks Are Growing (AFP).....57
Of Course Iraq Made It Worse (WP).....58
U.N.: Al-Qaida Activity In Iraq May Drop (AP).....59

Book Says Bush Ignored Urgent Warning On Iraq (NYT).....60
Bob Woodward: Bush Misleads On Iraq (CBS).....63
Zarqawi Successor Exhorts Scientists (WP/AP).....63
Audiotape Calls For Abduction Of Westerners (LAT).....64
After Burst Of Violence, As Many As 60 Bodies Are Found In Baghdad (NYT).....64
40 Torture Victims Found In Baghdad (AP).....65
Chaos Moves Into A Neighborhood Called Liberty (LAT).....66
Insurgents Continue To Defy Security Drive (USAT).....67
At Checkpoints In Baghdad, Disguise Is A Lifesaving Ritual (WP).....68
Congressmen Say Iraq War Weakens Military Response To Other Crises (MCT).....70
Iraq Contractor's Work Is Further Criticized (WP).....72
Congress Is Told Of Failures Of Rebuilding Work In Iraq (NYT).....73
Plumbing Problems At Iraq Site Spur Wider Contractor Review (LAT).....74
Attacks Cost Iraq Oil Exports $16B (AP).....75
Applying Diplomacy To Conflict (WP).....76
Cost Of Iraq War Nearly $2b A Week (BOS).....77
Iraqi Journalists Add Laws To List Of Dangers (NYT).....79
Parents, Kids Both Welcome Reopening Of Private Schools (USAT).....80
NATO To Command 12,000 G.I.'s In Afghanistan (NYT).....81
Foreign Command To Direct U.S. Troops (AP).....82
NATO To Expand Military Operations Into Eastern Afghanistan (BLOOM).....83
Nations Limit Use Of NATO Forces (USAT).....84
The Reliable Source (WP).....84
Why He Fights (FOX).....85
Louisville Paper Gets Disc With 232 Photos Of Nude National Guard Women (E&P).....85

Corporate Scandals:

House Panel Digs Deep In HP Spy Case (WP).....86
H.P. Before A Skeptical Congress (NYT).....88
Ousted HP Chairwoman Says She Consulted Others In Leak Probe, Believed Methods Were Legal (FINDLAW/AP).....90
Congress Slams H-P Over Board Scandal (MRKTWTCH).....91
On Display At HP Hearing, Many Ways To Say 'Shocking' (WP).....93
House Panelists Rail At HP (LAT).....95
Probing The Pretexters (WSJ).....97
Hewlett's Hunt For Leak Became A Game Of Clue (NYT).....100
For Ten Witnesses, Nothing But The Fifth (WP).....102
H-P General Counsel Resigns, Won't Testify (WSJ).....102
Hewlett Lawyer's Liability Is Unclear, Experts Say (NYT).....103
Hewlett-Packard Rebuked By Lawmakers For Allowing Leak Probe (BLOOM).....104
Sonsini Grilled During House Committee Hearing On HP Spying Scandal (LAW).....107
Investigator Who Worked For H-P Tailed Reporter In Unrelated Probe (WSJ).....108
Phone Firm Files Pretexter Lawsuit In H-P Leak Case (WSJ)109
Hewlett-Packard Scandal Catalyst Sails Far From Fray (Update1) (BLOOM).....110
Comverse Ex-CEO Alexander Has Namibia Case Postponed (Update5) (BLOOM).....111
U.S. Fugitive In Options Case Displeased By His African Jail (NYT).....112
Royal Ahold Will Avoid Prosecution (BLOOM).....113
Former Citibank Exec Guilty Of Fraud (NSDY).....114
Ex-head Of Citibank Commodities Desk Pleads Guilty In NYC (AP).....114
Gatekeeper GCs Increasingly Becoming Targets For Liability (NLJ).....115
Hedge Fund Shrinks Staff And Faces S.E.C. Inquiry (NYT)..117

Criminal Law:

Pirro Wants Wiretap Leaks Investigated (NSDY).....118
Pirro Hits Trail After Inquiry Emerges (NYT).....119
New York Family Feuds Go Public (WP).....121
Pirro: Emotional Outburst Or Something More Sinister? (WNBC-TV).....122
Pirro: I'm Determined To Stay In Race (WP/AP).....123
Candidate And Erring Spouse Rose To Power In Partnership (NYT).....124
Political Drama In New York (NYT).....126
Report Links White House And Lobbyist (NYT).....126
Abramoff Put White House Contacts At 400 (WP).....128
Report Details Abramoff Ties To White House (LAT).....129
House Report Details 485 Contacts Between Abramoff Team And White House Officials (RC).....131
Report Reveals Hundreds Of Contracts Between Lobbyists And Bush Aides (WSJ).....132
Judge Delays Prison Again For Abramoff (AP-Y).....133
Judge Postpones Prison For Abramoff (MCT).....134
Gotti's Prosecutors Discovered New Evidence Failed To Help (NYT).....134
Gotti Jr. Presses On As A Free Man (NSDY).....135
Canterbury Woman Pleads Guilty To Falsifying Data On Cell Batteries Used In Astronaut Space Suits (NORBULL) .136

DOJ_NMG_0070814

Convicted Ex-procurement Chief Granted Sentencing Delay (GOVEXEC)....137
Prosecutor: Bus Company Had Shoddy Fleet (AP)....137
Vigil Case Ready For Jury (KRQE-TV)....138
No Defense Case Again In Vigil Trial (AP)....139
Papers Fight Secrecy In Fumo-related Case (PHI)....139
FILTH, OR FREE SPEECH? (ORLWEEK)....140
Tennessee Man Sentenced For Threatening Bush, Cheney, Others (AP)....141
Feds Indict Two For Welfare Housing Fraud (LYNNIT)....142
Witness Tells Court About Gang Rape In MS-13 Trial (WP) 142

Civil Law:

Judge Denies Stay Motion In Government Case Against Tobacco (MRKTWTCH)....143
What's The Judge Smoking? (WSJ)....144
Tenet Agrees To "Integrity" Pact (AP-YBIZ)....145
Federal Judge Rejects Ohio Law Restricting Use Of Abortion Pill (FINDLAW/AP)....145

Civil Rights:

Complex Designers And Builders Settle Discrimination Suit (AP)....146
Two Groups Request Voting Monitors For Augusta November Election (WRDW-TV)....146
Lawmaker Questions E-voting Paper Trail (AP-Y)....147

Antitrust:

Congressmen Ask For Delay In BellSouth, AT&T Merger (AP)....148
Pols Call For Delay Of AT&T-BellSouth Merger (AJC)....148
Lawmakers Call For Delay In AT&T/BellSouth Merger (SABIZ)....149
Lawmakers Seek Delay Of AT&T-BellSouth Deal Review (MRKTWTCH)....150
'We Think It Will Pass' (FWST)....152
Officials Make Another Pitch For Wright Compromise (AP).153
Justice Formally Drops Exelon Case (AP-YBIZ)....153
West Penn Tries To Stop UPMC's Mercy Deal (PPG)....154
West Penn Chief Blasts UPMC-Mercy Merger (PTR)....155

Environment:

Company Acts In Outbreak From Spinach (NYT)....156
Clean Air, Murky Precedent (NYT)....157
More Comfort For The Comfortable (NYT)....158
Take It Back (WP)....159

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

2 Colombians Guilty Of U.S. Drug Charges (AP)....159
Feds Consider Death Penalty In Red River Valley Drug Killing (AP)....160
Authorities Keep Watch For Secret Meth Labs (HA)....160
U.S. Aims To Financially Impair Suspects (AP)....161
Feds Sue Utah Couple Over Faked Cancer (SLT)....162
Rethinking Plan Colombia: Some Ways To Fix It (CSM)....163
Doubts Aside, U.S. Set To Boost Colombia Aid (LAT)....166
Officials Investigate Fire At Indicted Woman's Home (PALHER)....167
Pet Store Arson Kills Animals; Rescued Reptiles On Brink (BOSH)....167
Pet Shop Blaze Deliberately Set, Fire Officials Say (BOS)....168
Senator To Put 'Hold' On Gun Dealer Bill (AP)....168

Immigration:

Senate Moves Toward Action On Border Fence (NYT)....169
Border Bill Takes A Detour (LAT)....170

Tax:

Merck Faces $2.3 Bln Tax Bill In U.S. Expense Dispute (Update2) (BLOOM)....172
War Stress May Hit Part-time Soldiers The Hardest (USAT) 173
VA Didn't Spend All Money Appropriated For Mental-health Services, GAOsays (MCT)....174

Congress-Administration:

Term Should Indicate New Justices' Influence (USAT)....175
Key Cases On Court's Docket (USAT)....176
Abortion, Race Cases Will Challenge Roberts' Goal Of Consensus (LAW)....176
High Tech For High Court (LAT)....179
How Bush Looks To Define Energy-Policy Focus (WSJ)....179
Bush Touts Ethanol As Way To Ease Dependence On Oil (DJ)....181
Deficit Comes In Below Projections, Thanks To `off-budget' Borrowing (MCT)....182
Judge Halts Effort To Recoup Mistaken Medicare Refunds (NYT)....183
Medicare Drug Premiums Steady (USAT)....184
Sources Of Coverage (USAT)....185
Lawmakers Argue Over AIDS Funding Bill (AP-Y)....185
New Sense Of Caution At F.D.A. (NYT)....186
More Clout Sought For Social Studies In U.S. Law (WP)....188
As Congress Wraps Up, Pandering Warps Policy (USAT)....189

Other News:

U.S. Economy: Second-Quarter Growth Is Revised Lower (Update4) (BLOOM)....189

DOJ_NMG_0070815

Why Economists Track Firms' R&D (WSJ) 191
For A Moment, The Dow Was Above Its Record Close (NYT/AP) 192
Dow Industrials Flirt With Peak On Latest Climb (WSJ) 193
Riding The Beast As Stocks Near A High, Pressure Builds For A Professional Investor (WSJ) 194
Hold Your Breath (WSJ) 196
How Great Dow Art (USAT) 197
Doha Collapse Threatens US Farm Reform (FT) 198
Risky Mortgages Threaten A Squeeze (CSM) 199
Democratic Duo Brings Bravado To Party (WSJ) 200
In Close Races, Local Issues Still Dominate (WP) 202
Religious-Right Voter Guides Facing Challenge From Left (WP) 204
Lieberman Leads Lamont In Connecticut Poll (AP) 205
Now, Even Allen's Apologies Are Getting Him In Trouble (WP) 206
Group Accuses Allen Of Spurning Heritage (AP-Y) 207
Allen Campaign Ads Launch Two-pronged Attack (WT) 208
Unraveling Allen (WP) 209
Ugly Words (WP) 210
Politics In The Age Of YouTube (CBS) 210
Menendez's Firing Of Staffer Buoys New Jersey GOP Hopes (WP) 211
Senate Democrats To Keep Menendez On N.J. Ballot (WT) 212
Menendez: 'Nothing ... In That Tape Was At My Direction.' (NSL) 213
Tape About Hiring Puts Menendez Camp On The Defensive (NYT) 213
Menendez Linked On Tape To Gov't Contracts Scheme (AP) 215
N.J. Senate Race A Dead Heat, Poll Shows (AP-Y) 216
Kean-Menendez Seante Racel Too Close To Call (NSL) ... 217
Polls Show Kean, Menendez Close (TSNJ) 217
Michigan Woes Fuel GOP Election Hopes (WT) 218
GOP Zeroing In On Mollohan's Problems (WP) 220
Challenger Seeks Probe Of Rep. Foley's E-Mails To Boy, 16 (WP) 221
Lawmaker Questioned On E-Mails To Page (LAT) 222
Republicans In Ohio Say Motivating Voters Is Harder This Year (BLOOM) 223
It's Not Easy Getting Out Of The House (USAT) 224
Effort Aims To Push Muslims To The Polls (WP) 226
Amtrak Requests Yet More Money (WT) 226
Beneficiaries Of CITGO Heating Oil Program Having Second Thoughts (MCT) 227
Most Uninsured Children Have A Parent Who Works (LAT) . 229
Union Blocks Foreign Healthcare Plan (CSM) 229
Rose Kennedy's Life, In Her Own Words (NYT/AP) 230
Bush's Conception Conflict (WP) 231
Kazakh President Opens Washington Stay (AP-Y) 232
Bush To Seal Strategic Link With Kazakh Leader (FT) 233
Energy On Agenda At Bush-Nazarbayev Talks (AFP) 234
Embrace For A Strongman (WP) 235
Kazakhstan's No Joke (LAT) 236
Rice To Meet With Arab Allies, Israel (AP) 236
Rice To Visit Israelis, Palestinians With Little Sign Of Breakthrough (AFP) 237
Rice Sees Moderates As Key To Mideast (WT) 238
Little Progress In EU-Iran Talks (FT) 239
Iran, EU Fail To Reach A Deal In Berlin (AP) 239
European Official Reports Progress In Talks With Iran (NYT) 240
Iran's Uranium Glitch (WP) 241
Hughes: Fixing U.S. Image May Take Years (AP) 242
Thailand Names Interim Prime Minister (AP) 243
Retired General Picked As Thai New PM As US Cuts Off Military Aid (AFP) 244
S. Korean Contender For U.N. Post Has An Edge (WP) 245
South Korean Favored To Win Top Job At U.N. (NYT) 246
S Korean Foreign Minister UN Frontrunner (FT) 247
South Korean Favored For Annan's Post (AP) 248
Senate Shies Away From Vote On Bolton (AP) 249
Bolton's Post Left In Limbo (WT) 249
Call To Overhaul Security Council Heard (AP-Y) 250
Inside The Ring (WT) 251
China Lets Currency Rise A Bit On Dollar (NYT) 253
Senators End Plans To Vote For Tariff On Chinese Goods (WSJ) 255
Bill For Tariffs Against China Dropped (AP-Y) 255
China's Spending For Research Outpaces The U.S. (WSJ) 256
China's Crackdown Puts Teeth Into Effort To Cool Property Boom (WSJ) 257
U.S. Financier Helps A Chairman Shake China Inc. (WSJ) .. 257
Europe Union Weary From Growing Pains (CSM) 260
Poland's Budget Underscores Divisions Among New EU Members (WSJ) 262
U.N. Peacekeepers In Darfur Unlikely (AP) 263
Caucus Presses Rice On Darfur (MCT) 264
From The Ashes, A Chunk Of America Beckons In Somalia (NYT) 265
Kenya Pressured To Apprehend Fugitive From Rwandan Genocide (MCT) 266

DOJ_NMG_0070816

Chávez's Anti-US Campaign (CSM) 267
Chavez Ally Surges In Ecuadorean Race (AP) 268
U.S. Aims To Financially Impair Suspects (AP-Y) 269
Russia Recalls Envoy To Georgia (WP).....270
Russia Outraged By Arrest Of 5 Military Officers (LAT) 271
Russia To Grant Cuba $350 Million Credit (AP).....272
Wary Eye Cast On Abe's 'New Japan' (LAT).....272
Don't Force Democracy In Burma (NYT).....274
Clinton And Blair Map A Path Of Change (FT).....275
Islam And The Pope (NYT).....277
Tales From The Crypt (WSJ).....278

DOJ_NMG_0070817

TERRORISM NEWS:

Senate Approves Detainee Bill Backed By Bush (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

Congress approved landmark changes to the nation's system of interrogating and prosecuting terrorism suspects last night, preparing the ground for possible military trials for key al-Qaeda members under rules that critics say will draw stiff constitutional challenges.

The Senate joined the House in embracing President Bush's view that the battle against terrorism justifies the imposition of extraordinary limits on defendants' traditional rights in the courtroom. They include restrictions on a suspect's ability to challenge his detention, examine all evidence against him, and bar testimony allegedly acquired through coercion of witnesses.

The Senate's 65 to 34 vote marked a victory for Bush and fellow Republicans a month before the Nov. 7 elections as their party tries to make anti-terrorism a signature campaign issue. Underscoring that strategy, the House last night voted 232 to 191 to authorize Bush's warrantless wiretapping program, with GOP leaders hoping to add it to their list of accomplishments even though it has no chance of Senate passage before this weekend's scheduled adjournment. On the final wiretapping vote, 18 Democrats joined 214 Republicans to win passage. Thirteen Republicans, 177 Democrats and one independent voted nay.

Democrats resisted both measures and nearly amended the detainee bill to allow foreigners designated as enemy combatants to challenge their captivity by filing habeas corpus appeals with the federal courts. But Republicans held fast, gambling that Democrats will fail in their bid to convince voters that the GOP is sacrificing the nation's traditions of justice and fairness in the name of battling terrorists and winning elections.

"As our troops risk their lives to fight terrorism, this bill will ensure they are prepared to defeat today's enemies and address tomorrow's threats," Bush said after the vote.

With control of both houses possibly at stake this fall, yesterday's debates were often impassioned and deeply partisan. House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) called Democrats "dangerous." Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), the ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, said the nation is losing its "moral compass."

The Senate approved the detainee legislation after Bush's allies narrowly fended off five amendments. The vote on final passage drew support from 53 Republicans and 12 Democrats, while 32 Democrats, one independent and one Republican -- Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.) -- voted nay.

Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) voted for the bill after telling reporters earlier that he would oppose it because it is "patently unconstitutional on its face." He cited its denial of the habeas corpus right to military detainees. In an interview last night, Specter said he decided to back the bill because it has several good items, "and the court will clean it up" by striking the habeas corpus provisions.

The Supreme Court triggered the congressional action by striking down in late June Bush's earlier system for trying suspects in military commissions.

The new bill is designed to legalize military commissions and to clarify interrogation techniques that CIA officers may use on terrorism suspects considered "unlawful enemy combatants," who are granted fewer protections than are prisoners of war. Hundreds of such detainees have been held for several years without trial at the U.S. military base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, while others were held at secret prisons overseas.

The new measure, which the House approved 253 to 168 on Wednesday, rejects Bush's earlier bid to narrow U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions in the treatment of such detainees. But it grants the executive branch substantial leeway in deciding how to comply with treaty obligations regulating actions that fall short of "grave breaches" of the conventions.

It would bar military commissions from considering testimony obtained through interrogation techniques that involve "cruel, unusual or inhumane treatment or punishment," which the Constitution's Fifth, Eighth and 14th amendments prohibit. The bar would be retroactive only to Dec. 30, 2005 -- when Congress adopted the Detainee Treatment Act -- to protect CIA operatives from possible prosecution over interrogation tactics used before that date.

DOJ_NMG_0070818

Yesterday's main drama involved Specter's bid to amend the bill to grant the habeas corpus right to foreign detainees. Habeas corpus appeals -- a legal cornerstone -- allow prisoners to ask a judge to rule on the legality of their detention.

Specter and his allies said the habeas corpus right must apply to all persons -- including noncitizens -- held in U.S. custody. Most other Republicans said foreigners designated by the military as "unlawful enemy combatants" do not deserve habeas corpus protections.

Specter's amendment failed, 51 to 48. Senate Republicans voting for the habeas corpus amendment were Specter, Chafee, Gordon Smith (Ore.) and John E. Sununu (N.H.). Ben Nelson (Neb.) was the only Democrat who opposed the amendment. Four amendments drafted by Democrats also failed, mostly along party lines.

Republicans, especially in the House, plan to use the military commission and wiretapping legislation as a one-two punch against Democrats this fall. The legislative action prompted extraordinarily blunt language from House GOP leaders, foreshadowing a major theme for the campaign. Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) issued a written statement on Wednesday declaring: "Democrat Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and 159 of her Democrat colleagues voted today in favor of MORE rights for terrorists."

GOP leaders continued such attacks after the wiretapping vote. "For the second time in just two days, House Democrats have voted to protect the rights of terrorists," Hastert said last night, while Boehner lashed out at what he called "the Democrats' irrational opposition to strong national security policies."

Democrats tried to deflect such attacks by focusing on the newly released National Intelligence Estimate, partially leaked on Saturday, which concludes that the Iraq war has become a "cause celebre" for terrorists. But Republicans maneuvered their attacks toward that issue as well.

"The Democrats' jubilance with the national intelligence leak over the weekend underscores just how dangerous I think my friends on the other side of the aisle are when it comes to national security," Boehner said yesterday.

Democrats said they will take the high road. "There will be 30-second attack ads and negative mail pieces, and we will be called everything from cut-and-run quitters to Defeatocrats, to people who care more about the rights of terrorists than the protection of Americans," predicted Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.). "While I know all of this, I'm still disappointed, and I'm still ashamed, because what we're doing here today -- a debate over the fundamental human rights of the accused -- should be bigger than politics."

Democratic leaders stressed that the attacks will not work. Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, cited polling that he said suggested that matters such as warrantless wiretapping and military commissions are "secondary issues," lagging well behind Iraq in the public's mind. Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) said it is "beyond [his] ability to comprehend" how a member of Congress could be accused of supporting terrorism.

But Greenberg Quinlan Rosner, a prominent Democratic polling firm, tried to raise alarms yesterday with the release of focus group findings that suggest that the attacks would work if not countered forcefully. "Attacks on Democrats for opposing any effort to stop terrorists . . . were highly effective," the pollsters' memo stated.

Under the House surveillance bill, the National Security Agency could conduct electronic surveillance of international communications for up to 45 days without a warrant, but the administration would then have to obtain permission from the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court and, in most cases, would have to notify lawmakers.

But the congressional intelligence committees could recertify any warrantless wiretapping repeatedly, in 45-day increments, without referral to the court. And restraints on the program could be suspended in the aftermath of a terrorist attack or when the president determines that the country is under "imminent threat." The "imminent threat" provision was added at the insistence of the Bush administration.

Senate Approves Broad New Rules To Try Detainees (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070819

WASHINGTON, Sept. 28 — The Senate approved a measure on Thursday on the interrogations and trials of terrorism suspects, establishing far-reaching rules to deal with what President Bush has called the most dangerous combatants in a different type of war.

The vote was 65 to 34. It was cast after more than 10 hours of often impassioned debate that touched on the Constitution, the horrors of Sept. 11 and the role of the United States in the world.

Both parties also positioned themselves for the continuing clash over national security going into the homestretch of the midterm elections. The vote showed that Democrats believe that President Bush's power to wield national security as a political issue is seriously diminished.

The bill would set up rules for the military commissions that will allow the government to proceed with the prosecutions of high-level detainees including Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, considered the mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

It would make illegal several broadly defined abuses of detainees, while leaving it to the president to establish specific permissible interrogation techniques. And it would strip detainees of a habeas corpus right to challenge their detentions in court.

The bill is the same as one that the House passed, eliminating the need for a conference between the two chambers. The House is expected to approve the Senate bill Friday, sending it to the president to be signed.

The bill was a compromise between the White House and three Republican senators who had resisted what they saw as Mr. Bush's effort to rewrite the nation's obligations under the Geneva Conventions. Although the president had to relent on some major provisions, the vote allows him to claim victory in achieving a main legislative priority.

"As our troops risk their lives to fight terrorism, this bill will ensure they are prepared to defeat today's enemies and address tomorrow's threats," the president said in a statement after the vote.

Republicans argued that the new rules would provide the necessary tools to fight a new kind of enemy.

"Our prior concept of war has been completely altered, as we learned so tragically on Sept. 11, 2001," Senator Saxby Chambliss, Republican of Georgia, said. "And we must address threats in a different way."

Democrats argued that the rules were being rushed through for political gain too close to a major election and that they would fundamentally threaten the foundations of the American legal system and come back to haunt lawmakers as one of the greatest mistakes in history.

"I believe there can be no mercy for those who perpetrated the crimes of 9/11," Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, said. "But in the process of accomplishing what I believe is essential for our security, we must hold onto our values and set an example that we can point to with pride, not shame."

Twelve Democrats crossed party lines to vote for the bill. One Republican, Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, voted against it.

But provisions of the bill came under criticism from Republicans as well as Democrats, with several crossing lines on amendments that failed along narrow margins.

Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, arguing for an amendment to strike a provision to bar suspects from challenging their detentions in court, said it "is as legally abusive of the rights guaranteed in the Constitution as the actions at Abu Ghraib, Guantánamo and secret prisons were physically abusive of detainees."

The amendment failed, 51 to 49.

Even some Republicans who voted for the bill said they expected the Supreme Court to strike down the legislation because of the provision barring court detainees' challenges, an outcome that would send the legislation right back to Congress.

"We should have done it right, because we're going to have to do it again," said Senator Gordon H. Smith, Republican of Oregon, who voted to strike the provision and yet supported the bill.

The measure would broaden the definition of enemy combatants beyond the traditional definition used in wartime, to include noncitizens living legally in the United States as well as those in foreign countries and anyone determined to be an enemy combatant under criteria defined by the president or secretary of defense.

It would strip at Guantánamo detainees of the habeas right to challenge their detention in court, relying instead on procedures known as combatant status review trials. Those trials have looser rules of evidence than the courts.

It would allow of evidence seized in this country or abroad without a search warrant to be admitted in trials.

DOJ_NMG_0070820

The bill would also bar the admission of evidence obtained by cruel and inhuman treatment, except any obtained before Dec. 30, 2005, when Congress enacted the Detainee Treatment Act, that a judge declares reliable and probative.

Democrats said the date was conveniently set after the worst abuses at Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo.

The legislation establishes several "grave breaches" of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Convention that are felonies under the War Crimes Act, including torture, rape, murder and any act intended to cause "serious" physical or mental pain or suffering.

The issue was sent to Congress as a result of a Supreme Court decision in June that struck down military tribunals that the Bush administration had established shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks. The court ruled that the tribunals violated the Constitution and international law.

The White House submitted a bill this month to authorize a tribunal system, setting off intraparty fighting as the three Senate Republicans, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, John McCain of Arizona and John W. Warner Jr. of Virginia, insisted that they would not support a provision that in any way appeared to alter the commitments under the Geneva Conventions.

Such a redefinition, they argued, would send a signal to other nations that they, too, could rewrite their commitments to the 57-year-old conventions and, ultimately, lead to Americans seized in wartime being abused and tried in kangaroo courts.

The White House and the senators came to their agreement last week.

Democrats and human rights groups objected to changes in the legislation over the weekend, as the House and White House drafted final language, including defining enemy combatants and setting rules on search warrants.

"We should get this right, now, and we are not doing so by passing this bill," Senator Harry Reid, the Nevada Democrat who is the minority leader, said before the vote. "Future generations will view passage of this bill as a grave error."

Human rights groups called the vote to approve the bill "dangerous" and "disappointing." Critics feared that it left the president a large loophole by allowing him to set specific interrogation techniques.

Senators Graham, McCain and Warner rebutted that vociferously, arguing in floor statements, as well as in a colloquy submitted into the official record, that the measure would in no way give the president the authority to authorize any interrogation tactics that do not comply with the Detainee Treatment Act and the Geneva Conventions, which bar cruel and inhuman treatment, and that the bill would not alter American obligations under the Geneva Conventions.

"The conventions are preserved intact," Mr. McCain promised his colleagues from the floor.

After the vote, Mr. Graham said: "America can be proud. Not only did she adhere to the Geneva Conventions, she went further than she had to, because we're better than the terrorists."

Besides the amendments that would have struck the ban on habeas corpus cases, the others that failed included one that would have established a sunset on the measure to allow Congress to reconsider it in five years and one that would have require the C.I.A. to submit to Congressional oversight.

Another failed amendment would have required the State Department to inform other nations of what interrogation techniques it considered illegal for use on American troops, a move intended to prompt the administration to say publicly what techniques it considers out of bounds.

Senate OKs Detainee Interrogation Bill (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, September 28, 2006

The Senate on Thursday endorsed President Bush's plans to prosecute and interrogate terror suspects, all but sealing congressional approval for legislation that Republicans intend to use on the campaign trail to assert their toughness on terrorism.

The 65-34 vote means the bill could reach the president's desk by week's end. The House passed nearly identical legislation on Wednesday and was expected to approve the Senate bill on Friday, sending it on to the White House.

The bill would create military commissions to prosecute terrorism suspects. It also would prohibit some of the worst abuses of detainees like mutilation and rape, but grant the president leeway to decide which other interrogation techniques are permissible.

The White House and its supporters have called the measure crucial in the anti-terror fight, but some Democrats said it left the door open to abuse, violating the U.S. Constitution in the name of protecting Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0070821

Twelve Democrats sided with 53 Republicans in voting for the bill. Lincoln Chafee, R-R.I., in a tough re-election fight, joined 32 Democrats and the chamber's lone independent in opposing the bill. Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, was absent.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., who helped draft the legislation during negotiations with the White House, said the measure would set up a system for treating detainees that the nation could be proud of. He said the goal "is to render justice to the terrorists, even though they will not render justice to us."

Democrats said the Republicans' rush to muscle the measure through Congress was aimed at giving them something to tout during the campaign, in which control of the House and Senate are at stake. Election Day is Nov. 7.

"There is no question that the rush to pass this bill — which is the product of secret negotiations with the White House — is about serving a political agenda," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.

Senate approval was the latest step in the remarkable journey that Bush has taken in shaping how the United States treats the terrorism suspects it has been holding, some for almost five years.

The Supreme Court nullified Bush's initial system for trying detainees in June, and earlier this month a handful of maverick GOP senators embarrassed the president by forcing him to slightly tone down his next proposal. But they struck a deal last week, and the president and congressional Republicans are now claiming the episode as a victory.

While Democrats warned the bill could open the way for abuse, Republicans said defeating the bill would put the country at risk of another terrorist attack.

"We are not conducting a law enforcement operation against a check-writing scam or trying to foil a bank heist," said Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky. "We are at war against extremists who want to kill our citizens."

Approving the bill before lawmakers leave for the elections has been a top priority for Republicans. GOP leaders fought off attempts by Democrats and a lone Republican to change the bill, ensuring swift passage.

By mostly party-line votes, the Senate rejected Democratic efforts to limit the bill to five years, to require frequent reports from the administration on the CIA's interrogations and to add a list of forbidden interrogation techniques.

The legislation could let Bush begin prosecuting terrorists connected to the Sept. 11 attacks just as voters head to the polls, and let Republicans use opposition by Democrats as fodder for criticizing them during the campaign.

"Some want to tie the hands of our terror fighters," said Sen. Christopher Bond, R-Mo., alluding to opponents of the bill. "They want to take away the tools we use to fight terror, to handcuff us, to hamper us in our fight to protect our families."

Democrats contended the legislation could set a dangerous precedent that might invite other countries to mistreat captured Americans. Their opposition focused on language barring detainees from going to federal court to protest their detention and treatment — a right referred to as "habeas corpus."

"The habeas corpus language in this bill is as legally abusive of rights guaranteed in the Constitution as the actions at Abu Ghraib, Guantanamo and secret prisons that were physically abusive of detainees," said Sen. Carl Levin, the top Democrat on the Armed Services panel.

Bush went to Capitol Hill Thursday morning, urging senators to follow the House lead and approve the plan.

"The American people need to know we're working together to win the war on terror," he said.

That didn't stop Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., from offering an amendment that would have restored suspects' habeas corpus rights. It was rejected, 51-48.

The overall bill would prohibit war crimes and define such atrocities as rape and torture, but otherwise would allow the president to interpret the Geneva Conventions, the treaty that sets standards for the treatment of war prisoners.

The legislation was in response to a Supreme Court ruling in June that Bush's plan to hold and prosecute terrorists was illegal.

Bush had determined prior to that ruling that his executive powers gave him the right to detain and prosecute enemy combatants. He declared these detainees, being held at Guantanamo Bay prison in Cuba and in secret CIA prisons elsewhere in the world, should not be afforded Geneva Convention protections.

U.S. officials said the Supreme Court ruling threw cold water on the CIA's interrogation program, which they said had been helpful in obtaining valuable intelligence.

DOJ_NMG_0070822

Bush was forced to negotiate a new trial system with Congress. For nearly two weeks the White House and rebellious Republican senators — Graham, John McCain of Arizona and John Warner of Virginia — fought publicly over whether Bush's proposed plan would give a president too much authority and curtail legal rights considered fundamental in other courts.

Under the bill, a terrorist being held at Guantanamo could be tried by military commission so long as he was afforded certain rights, such as the ability to confront evidence given to the jury and having access to defense counsel.

Those subject to commission trials would be any person "who has engaged in hostilities or who has purposefully and materially supported hostilities against the United States or its co-belligerents." Proponents say this definition would not apply to U.S. citizens.

The bill would eliminate some rights common in military and civilian courts. For example, the commission would be allowed to consider hearsay evidence so long as a judge determined it was reliable. Hearsay is barred from civilian courts.

The legislation also says the president can "interpret the meaning and application" of international standards for prisoner treatment, a provision intended to allow him to authorize aggressive interrogation methods that might otherwise be seen as illegal by international courts.

___

The House resolution is HR 6166. The Senate bill is S 3930.

___

On the Net:

Congress: http://thomas.loc.gov

Terror Detainee Bill Passes Senate, 65-34 (USAT)

USA Today, September 29, 2006

The Senate on Thursday endorsed President Bush's plans to prosecute and interrogate terrorism suspects, all but sealing congressional approval for the legislation. The 65-34 vote means the bill could reach the president's desk by week's end.

The bill would create military commissions to prosecute terrorism suspects. It also loosely describes how CIA interrogators can and cannot treat detainees, granting the president leeway to decide what is legally permissible. Most opponents of the bill focused on portions of the bill that they said denied detainees basic rights. The House passed nearly identical legislation Wednesday by a 253-168 vote and is likely to approve the Senate bill today.

Also Thursday, the House approved a bill that would grant legal status to Bush's warrantless wiretapping program with new restrictions, including requiring Bush to notify intelligence committees and congressional leaders to conduct such wiretaps.

Woodward: Bush hiding truth about Iraq

The Bush administration is not telling the public the whole story about the level of violence in Iraq and has not acknowledged that its intelligence experts predict “next year, 2007, is going to get worse,” Washington Post investigative reporter Bob Woodward has told CBS' 60 Minutes. His interview with correspondent Mike Wallace is due to air Sunday. The report is timed to plug Woodward's next book, State of Denial: Bush at War, Part III, which is to be released Monday. Excerpts from the interview can be found at cbsnews.com.

Bush fires back on intelligence report

Battered by Democrats over the National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) that said the Iraq war had become the “cause célèbre” for jihadists, President Bush fought back, saying Democrats represented the party of “cut and run.” Without mentioning them by name, Bush seized on remarks by Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif., and Sen. Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va., as evidence of what he called the opposition party's weak resolve on Iraq.

“Democrats offer nothing but criticism and obstructionism and endless second-guessing. The party of FDR (Franklin D. Roosevelt), the party of Harry Truman, has become the party of cut and run,” Bush said at a GOP fundraising speech in Birmingham, Ala. “Rather than heed the warnings in the NIE, President Bush politicized this discussion,” said Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chief of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

US Senate Backs Detainee Bill (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

DOJ_NMG_0070823

Financial Times, September 29, 2006

The US Senate on Thursday night approved new rules for the interrogation of suspected terrorists and for military tribunals, handing a victory to the White House in the face of charges that the proposals were "un-American" and threatened the country's moral authority.

The 65-34 vote means the bill could reach the president's desk by week's end. The House passed nearly identical legislation on Wednesday and was expected to approve the Senate bill on Friday, sending it on to the White House.

The bill will allow the programme of secret prisons operated by the Central Intelligence Agency, restrict some tough interrogation techniques and remove the rights of "enemy combatants" to challenge their detentions in federal courts.

In the debate, John Kerry, Democratic presidential nominee in 2004, warned it would undermine "America's moral authority, blur lines that have for decades been absolute" so that "no speech, no rhetoric, no promise can restore it."

In June, the Bush administration looked on the defensive after the Supreme Court ruled that its military tribunals were unlawful because they did not have congressional approval, and failed to protect detainees.

Since then the White House has exploited the political leverage of the coming midterm election, forcing Republicans to rally round its proposals to show unity on national security.

A turning point came on September 6, when Mr Bush reframed the debate about tribunals by announcing plans to transfer 14 high-profile al-Qaeda suspects, including Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of 9/11 to Guantanamo Bay to await trial. The move transformed an abstruse legal debate into a more personalised one about how to treat those accused of being behind the worst terrorist attack on US soil.

In a speech on Thursday Mr Bush made his most combative and pointed political comments of the campaign. "Five years after 9/11, Democrats offer nothing but criticism, and obstruction and endless second guessing," he said, arguing that "the party of Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Harry Truman" was now "the party of cut-and-run".

Jennifer Daskal, US advocacy director for Human Rights Watch, warned that the rushed bill would have "dramatic implications for the US treatment of detainees. The most disturbing provision is that it takes away the rights of detainees held in US custody to challenge the legality of their detention and from raising claims that they were abused or tortured, even after they have been release from custody".

Senate OKs Detainees Tribunal Bill (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 29, 2006

The Senate gave its final approval yesterday for President Bush's proposal for interrogating and prosecuting the terror suspects held at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, sending the legislation to the White House for Mr. Bush's signature.

Immediately after that vote, the Senate agreed to vote today on the bill to construct 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border. After a week of stalling the bill, Democrats supported the procedural move.

The terrorist tribunal bill, a modified version of a proposal offered by Mr. Bush, passed on an 65-34 vote. Fifty-three Republicans and 12 Democrats voted for the bill. Thirty-two Democrats were joined by Sen. Lincoln Chafee, Rhode Island Republican, and Sen. James M. Jeffords, Vermont independent, in voting against the measure. One Republican -- Sen. Olympia J. Snowe of Maine -- did not vote.

"This legislation recognizes that we are a nation at war," said Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican. "We are not conducting a law-enforcement operation against a check-writing scam or trying to foil a bank heist. We are at war against extremists who want to kill our citizens, cripple our economy and discredit the principles we hold dear -- freedom and democracy."

Mr. Bush promised to sign the bill.

"I applaud Congress for passing legislation that will provide our men and women in uniform with the necessary resources to protect our country and win the war on terror," he said. "As our troops risk their lives to fight terrorism, this bill will ensure they are prepared to defeat today's enemies and address tomorrow's threats. I look forward to signing this bill into law."

DOJ_NMG_0070824

Minority Whip Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, led most of his caucus in opposing the plan because, he said, it does not provide the terror suspects with enough of the civil rights granted to Americans facing trials in U.S. courts.

"The national-security policies of this administration and Republican Congress may have been tough, but they haven't been smart," he said moments before the vote. "The American people are paying a price for their mistakes."

Voting for the bill, Mr. Reid said, would be a "grave error," and he predicted that it would be found unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

"The framers of our Constitution understood the need for checks and balances, but this bill discards them," he said.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat and likely 2008 presidential candidate, joined Mr. Reid in opposing the legislation.

"Democrats and Republicans alike believe that terrorists must be caught, captured, sentenced, punished," she said. "I believe there can be no mercy for those who perpetrated 9/11 and other crimes against humanity, but in the process of accomplishing what I believe is essential for our security, we must hold on to our values and set an example that we can point to with pride, not shame."

Most of the Democrats who bolted their party leadership and voted for the bill either face tough re-election campaigns or hail from Republican-leaning states. The former category includes Sens. Robert Menendez of New Jersey, Debbie Stabenow of Michigan and Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who all voted to approve the plan.

"We must remember that these detainees are terrorists engaged in an ongoing war against the United States," Mr. Menendez said after the vote. "Therefore, it is important that these terrorists are tried in military commissions that afford a fair and reliable prosecution consistent with our national-security interests. I believe this bill does that."

Mr. Chafee, of Rhode Island, has the opposite political problem. The latest polls have him trailing Sheldon Whitehouse slightly in his re-election battle in one of the nation's most liberal states.

Throughout the day yesterday, Republicans thwarted several amendments, including one that would have granted detainees habeas corpus rights to challenge tribunal decisions in federal court. The passing of any amendment would have derailed the House-passed bill.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, was among those who opposed that amendment.

"I'm going to sleep very good casting my vote," the former Air Force lawyer said. "I think I've got a decent moral compass about what we should be doing to people."

Within minutes of the vote, Republicans issued political attacks on vulnerable Democrats.

"Debbie Stabenow today sided with trial lawyers and terrorists instead of common sense," Brian Walton, a spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said after she voted for the amendment. "Stabenow's continued incompetence when it comes to keeping America safe is staggering."

Also yesterday, the House approved the Bush administration's terrorist surveillance program aimed at capturing international communications between terrorist plotters.

"You can't say that you're serious about taking on the terrorists if you stand up here every day and vote 'no,'" said Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican.

The bill passed last night on a near party-line 232-191 vote, with Republicans backing the bill 214-13, and Democrats opposing by 177-18, plus a "no" vote from the chamber's one independent. But the bill has no immediate prospect for approval in the Senate.

Senate Votes To Create U.S. War-Crimes Tribunals For Terrorists (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, September 29, 2006

By James Rowley

Sept. 28 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Senate joined the House in authorizing President George W. Bush to begin military war-crimes trials of suspected terrorists detained at the U.S. Navy Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

DOJ_NMG_0070825

By a 65-34 vote, the Senate approved legislation establishing military tribunals and empowering Bush to set guidelines for aggressively interrogating suspects without violating international prohibitions on prisoner abuse.

Once the House votes to accept technical changes made by the Senate, the measure will go to Bush for his signature. Military prosecutors have prepared war-crimes charges against 10 suspected terrorists seized since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on New York and Washington.

``We can tell the world at large" that U.S. detention and interrogation policies ``are not only humane and just but will allow us to protect ourselves from a vicious enemy," said South Carolina Republican Lindsey Graham. ``We are very close to that day coming."

On Sept. 6, Bush announced the transfer of 14 other terror suspects from Central Intelligence Agency prisons to Guantanamo Bay for military trials. They include Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of al-Qaeda's 2001 attacks that killed almost 3,000 people.

The legislation is needed because the Supreme Court invalidated the military commissions Bush had established. The court said the previous tribunals lacked congressional approval and failed to incorporate prisoner protections mandated by the Geneva Conventions.

House Vote

The House passed the legislation yesterday 253-168. House leaders scheduled a second vote tomorrow on the Senate-passed version.

The Senate vote came after the Republican majority defeated a series of amendments, including one that would have preserved the right of more than 200 detainees to go to federal court to challenge their captivity. The amendment was offered by Pennsylvania Republican Arlen Specter, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Democrats who supported the amendment said it was needed to avoid trampling on well-established civil liberties and protections. Abridging the right to a court hearing would only invite other nations to deny the same protections to U.S. troops held prisoner in future wars, they argued.

``We are about to put the darkest blot possible on this nation's conscience," said Vermont Democrat Patrick Leahy.

He said the legislation would ``apply to any alien picked up anywhere in the world and suspected of possibly supporting enemies of the United States."

Other Amendments

The Senate also defeated amendments to set a five-year expiration on any military-tribunal order issued by the president and anther requiring the Central Intelligence Agency to report to Congress three times a year on its program to interrogate suspected terrorists in secret overseas prisons.

``There needs to be a comprehensive and accurate accounting of detainees held by the CIA," said West Virginia Democrat Jay Rockefeller, vice chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee.

The legislation represents a compromise negotiated with the Bush administration after the Senate Armed Services Committee approved an alternative with the support of three Republicans.

Following the panel's Sept. 14 vote, the three Republicans, John Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona and Graham, negotiated a compromise with Bush.

The president dropped his demand that Congress define what constitutes ``humiliating and degrading treatment" of prisoners under the 1949 Geneva Conventions.

Many Rights In U.S. Legal System Absent In New Bill (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

The military trials bill approved by Congress lends legislative support for the first time to broad rules for the detention, interrogation, prosecution and trials of terrorism suspects far different from those in the familiar American criminal justice system.

DOJ_NMG_0070826

President Bush's argument that the government requires extraordinary power to respond to the unusual threat of terrorism helped him win final support for a system of military trials with highly truncated defendant's rights. The United States used similar trials on just four occasions: during the country's revolution, the Mexican-American War, the Civil War and World War II.

Included in the bill, passed by Republican majorities in the Senate yesterday and the House on Wednesday, are unique rules that bar terrorism suspects from challenging their detention or treatment through traditional habeas corpus petitions. They allow prosecutors, under certain conditions, to use evidence collected through hearsay or coercion to seek criminal convictions.

The bill rejects the right to a speedy trial and limits the traditional right to self-representation by requiring that defendants accept military defense attorneys. Panels of military officers need not reach unanimous agreement to win convictions, except in death penalty cases, and appeals must go through a second military panel before reaching a federal civilian court.

By writing into law for the first time the definition of an "unlawful enemy combatant," the bill empowers the executive branch to detain indefinitely anyone it determines to have "purposefully and materially" supported anti-U.S. hostilities. Only foreign nationals among those detainees can be tried by the military commissions, as they are known, and sentenced to decades in jail or put to death.

At the same time, the bill immunizes U.S. officials from prosecution for cruel, inhumane or degrading treatment of detainees who the military and the CIA captured before the end of last year. It gives the president a dominant but not exclusive role in setting the rules for future interrogations of terrorism suspects.

Written largely, but not completely, on the administration's terms, with passages that give executive branch officials discretion to set details or divert from its protections, the bill is meant to provide what Bush said yesterday are "the tools" needed to handle terrorism suspects U.S. officials hope to capture.

For more than 57 months after the 2001 terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, Bush maintained that he did not need congressional authorization of such tools. But the Supreme Court decided otherwise in June, declaring the administration's detainee treatment and trial procedures illegal, and ruling that Bush must first seek Congress's approval.

Now Bush has received much of the authority he desired from party loyalists and a handful of Democrats on Capitol Hill. "The American people need to know we're working together," Bush told senators before yesterday's vote.

But Tom Malinowski, the Washington office director for Human Rights Watch, said Bush's motivation is partly to protect his reputation by gaining congressional endorsement of controversial actions already taken. "He's been accused of authorizing criminal torture in a way that has hurt America and could come back to haunt our troops. One of his purposes is to have Congress stand with him in the dock," Malinowski said.

The bill contains some protections unavailable to the eight Nazi saboteurs who came ashore in the United States in 1942 and were captured two weeks later. Six were executed that year after a closed military trial on the fifth floor of Justice Department headquarters. That proceeding was upheld by the Supreme Court in a decision it explained two months after the electrocutions.

Under the new procedures, trials are supposed to be open, but can be closed to protect the security of individuals or information expected to harm national security. Defendants have a right to be present, unless they are disruptive, and a right to examine and respond to the evidence against them. Proof of guilt must exceed a reasonable doubt.

Many constitutional experts say, however, that the bill pushes at the edges of so much settled U.S. law that its passage will not be the last word on America's detainee policies. They predict it will shift the public debate to the federal courts, a forum where the administration has had less success getting its way on counterterrorism policies.

"This is a full-employment act for lawyers," said Deborah Perlstein, who directs the U.S. Law and Security Program at the New York-based nonprofit group Human Rights First.

Former White House associate counsel Bradford A. Berenson, a supporter of the bill and one of the authors of the rules struck down by the Supreme Court, agreed. "Some of the most creative legal minds are going to be devoted to poking holes in this," he said.

Anticipating court challenges, the administration attempted to make the bill bulletproof by including provisions that would sharply restrict judicial review and limit the application of international treaties -- signed by Washington -- that govern the rights of wartime detainees.

The bill also contains blunt assertions that it complies with U.S. treaty obligations.

DOJ_NMG_0070827

University of Texas constitutional law professor Sanford V. Levinson described the bill in an Internet posting as the mark of a "banana republic." Yale Law School Dean Harold Koh said that "the image of Congress rushing to strip jurisdiction from the courts in response to a politically created emergency is really quite shocking, and it's not clear that most of the members understand what they've done."

In contrast, Douglas W. Kmiec, a professor of constitutional law at Pepperdine University, said Congress "did reasonably well in terms of fashioning a fair" set of procedures. But Kmiec and many others say they cannot predict how the Supreme Court will respond to the provision barring habeas corpus rights, which he said will leave "a large body of detainees with no conceivable basis to challenge their detentions."

There are other likely flashpoints. In the Supreme Court's June decision overturning previous administration policies, four members of the court who joined the majority opinion said conspiracy is not a war crime. The new bill says it is.

Georgetown University law professor Neal Katyal said the bill's creation of two systems of justice -- military commissions for foreign nationals and regular criminal trials for U.S. citizens -- may violate the Constitution's 14th Amendment, which requires equal protection of the laws to anyone under U.S. jurisdiction.

"If you're an American citizen, you get the Cadillac system of justice. If you're a foreigner or a green-card holder, you get this beat-up-Chevy version," he said.

Legal Battle Over Detainee Bill Is Likely (LAT)

By David G. Savage And Richard Simon, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 29, 2006

The Senate approves Bush's plan for military tribunals. Limits on terror suspects' options for appeal could lead to a Supreme Court ruling.

WASHINGTON — The Senate on Thursday approved President Bush's plan to question and try foreign terrorism suspects before military judges — without oversight by the federal courts.

Bush is expected to receive a bill he can sign into law in the next few days, but legal challenges almost assuredly will be pursued against the prosecution process, which the administration considers a key element in its war on terrorism.

The measure's most disputed provision would block foreign prisoners held by the military from turning to the federal courts to end their imprisonment. By preventing detainees from challenging their confinement in court, it sets up a potential constitutional conflict before the Supreme Court.

The Senate by a 51-to-48 vote Thursday rejected a proposal to include this right in the bill establishing rules for the new military tribunal system. The overall bill was then approved, 65 to 34.

The measure is virtually the same as one passed by the House on Wednesday.

The legislative victory for the president came three months after he had suffered a stinging defeat in the Supreme Court. In striking down the plan the White House had devised for putting "unlawful enemy combatants" on trial, the justices ruled that Congress must authorize the process for trying terrorism suspects.

The Republican-led House and Senate not only gave Bush the legal authority he requested, but told the Supreme Court to stay out of the matter, now and in the future.

The bill won passage in the Senate hours after Bush journeyed to Capitol Hill to tell GOP lawmakers that "there's still an enemy out there that wants to do harm to the United States."

Slight differences in the Senate version of the bill mean it must be returned to the House, where it is expected to easily win approval today. Republican leaders then plan to forward the bill to the White House with a ceremony on Capitol Hill, in line with the party's effort to highlight its national security credentials before the November election.

"This legislation will give the president the tools he needs to protect American lives without compromising our core democratic values," Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) said.

But some lawmakers, Republicans as well as Democrats, called the move to suspend habeas corpus — the demand for legal justification of one's imprisonment — a historic mistake, and one that could cause the entire bill to be struck down.

DOJ_NMG_0070828

"This is wrong; it is unconstitutional; it is un-American," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the top Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The judiciary panel's chairman, Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), said, "Surely as we are standing here, if this bill is passed and habeas corpus is stricken, we'll be back on this floor again" grappling with a future ruling against it by the Supreme Court.

Still, Specter was one of 53 Republicans who joined 12 Democrats in voting for the final bill. Leahy was among 32 Democrats who opposed it, along with one independent and one Republican — Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, who is locked in a tough fight for reelection in his Democratic-leaning state.

California Sens. Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein, both Democrats, voted against the bill.

Civil libertarians said they planned to fight the measure in court.

"Congress is now rubber-stamping a bill that was written by the president and gives the president expansive power to detain without judicial oversight," said Vincent Warren, executive director of the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York. "It will grant the president the privilege of kings…. This unprecedented and expansive suspension of habeas corpus is utterly unconstitutional, and we will challenge it."

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), a military lawyer who helped write the bill, said federal judges should not be permitted to interfere with the military's handling of prisoners.

"I don't believe judges should be making military decisions in a time of war," he said. "To substitute a judge for the military in a time of war on something as basic as who our enemy is, is not only not necessary under the Constitution, it impedes the war effort."

The privilege of habeas corpus holds a venerated place in English and U.S. law. The U.S. Constitution says, "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it."

But it has long been unclear whether this right extended to foreign prisoners held by the U.S. military. After World War II, the Supreme Court said German war prisoners did not have a right to file writs of habeas corpus to challenge their imprisonment.

Two years ago, the high court reversed course somewhat in a case brought on behalf of detainees at the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. In Rasul vs. Bush, the justices interpreted a 19th century measure passed by Congress as opening the door for judges to hear claims from prisoners held by the military who say they are "wholly innocent of wrongdoing."

The measure approved by the Senate on Thursday would close that door. The legislation says, "No court, justice or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien detained by the United States [who] has been determined … to have been properly detained as an enemy combatant."

Congress passed a similar restriction in December in the Detainee Treatment Act. But in its decision in June, the Supreme Court interpreted that ban as applying to only new claims, not pending cases that had been filed earlier on behalf of Guantanamo detainees.

Under the new legislation, it would apply to all claims.

It means that detainees at Guantanamo would not be able to challenge their detention there or the rules under which they are tried. However, if a detainee is convicted in a military court, and possibly sentenced to death, he can appeal to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. If that fails, he could also ask the Supreme Court to review his case.

During the House debate Wednesday, GOP lawmakers made it clear they wanted the bill to prevent the Supreme Court from, in their eyes, hampering the prosecution of suspected foreign terrorists.

"What this does is to say to the Supreme Court, 'We meant what we said when we passed the law a year ago which said [the ban on habeas corpus] should apply to people already in Guantanamo,' " said Rep. Dan Lungren (R-Gold River). "This time we really mean it. Please follow it."

But Specter on Thursday questioned whether Congress could suspend this right.

"The Constitution is explicit in the statement that habeas corpus may be suspended only with rebellion or invasion. We do not have a rebellion or an invasion," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0070829

The rules for the military trials established by the new measure would generally follow those proposed by the Bush administration. Prosecutors would be able to make use of "hearsay" evidence and confessions that were obtained through coercion, so long as the military judge believed the evidence was reliable.

It is not clear whether the administration plans to try many of its detainees as war criminals. This summer, only 10 of the more than 700 men who have been held at Guantanamo had been charged with war crimes. And none had been tried when the Supreme Court struck down Bush's plan.

Bush announced Sept. 6 that he had sent 14 "high-value" foreign terrorism suspects to Guantanamo. They had been held in secret prisons run by the CIA. This group include Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, said to be the mastermind behind the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

The passage of new bill clears the way for him to be tried. If he were convicted, and possibly sentenced to death, he could appeal his conviction or sentence to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. If that appeal failed, he could ask the Supreme Court to review his case.

Last week, lawmakers reached a compromise with the president that preserves, at least in principle, the Geneva Convention's ban on inhumane treatment of prisoners.

Closing the debate, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a prisoner of war during the Vietnam War who helped draft the measure, said the legislation made clear that the U.S. would fulfill its obligations under the Geneva Convention.

In a choreographed exchange Thursday, McCain, joined by Sens. John W. Warner (R-Va.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.), said the law did not allow the president to modify the Geneva Convention or to weaken the ban on torture and inhuman treatment passed by Congress last year.

As the details of the bill were hammered out in recent weeks in talks between the White House and GOP lawmakers led by McCain, Graham and Warner, Democrats for the most part stood back and watched. But in this week's floor debates, Democratic leaders gave fuller voice to their disagreements with the final product.

"I strongly believe this legislation is unconstitutional," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said. "It will almost certainly be struck down by the Supreme Court. And when that happens, we'll be back here several years from now debating how to bring terrorists to justice. I am convinced that future generations will view passage of this bill as a grave error."

david.savage@latimes.com
richard.simon@latimes.com

Times staff writer Julian Barnes contributed to this report.

Democrats See Strength In Bucking Bush (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 28 — The Democratic vote in the Senate on Thursday against legislation governing the treatment of terrorism suspects showed that party leaders believe that President Bush's power to wield national security as a political issue is seriously diminished.

The most vivid example of the Democratic assessment came from the party's many presidential hopefuls in the Senate. All of them voted against the bill, apparently calculating that Mr. Bush's handling of Iraq has undercut the traditional Republican strength on national security and will insulate them from what are certain to be strong attacks from Republicans not only this year but also in 2008.

Democratic opponents of the legislation said their political position was driven by a substantive determination that the bill, which creates rules for interrogating and trying terrorism suspects, is fundamentally flawed and a dangerous departure from founding American principles.

"The only reason to worry about the politics of it is if you don't understand it and don't have the guts to stand up and defend your vote," said Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, who is considering a presidential race.

DOJ_NMG_0070830

Over all, 32 Democrats voted against the measure while 12, including some of those in the most difficult re-election fights, backed it. Among the latter was Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, whose perceived support for Mr. Bush has brought him political trouble at home.

It was a stark change from four years ago, when Mr. Bush cornered Democrats into another defining pre-election vote on security issues — that one to give the president the authority to launch an attack against Iraq. At the time, many Democrats felt they had little choice politically but to side with Mr. Bush, and a majority of Senate Democrats backed him.

The Iraq vote of October 2002 was a subtext to the Senate debate on Thursday. Democrats pointed to the situation in Iraq as an example of what can happen when the Bush administration, in the charged atmosphere of an approaching Congressional election, is handed new power by a compliant Congress.

"After four years, the price we are paying is clear for saying to a president and an administration that we would trust you," said Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts, whose own vote on the war haunted his 2004 presidential campaign. There is no doubt the vote will be injected into the final weeks of the midterm campaigns. Republicans have been working to draw Democrats into a fight over security legislation. But a division among Republicans allowed Democrats to stay out of the fray until the moment of truth arrived this week.

Within minutes of the vote on the bill in the House on Wednesday, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois denounced the Democrats who had voted against it. Mr. Bush echoed him on Thursday, speaking before the Senate voted.

"We must give our professionals the tools necessary to protect the American people in this war on terror, and those in the House of Representatives were wrong to vote against this bill," Mr. Bush told a crowd in Birmingham, Ala.

Democrats know what awaits them.

"I fear," said Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, who is up for re-election this year and who is a possible presidential candidate in 2008, "that there are those who place a strategy for winning elections ahead of a smart strategy for winning the war on terror."

Party strategists have concluded, however, that Democrats can hold their own politically with Republicans on security issues and that voters no longer give Mr. Bush such wide latitude in the fight against terrorism. Democrats believe they can rebut the stinging attack to come by persuading Americans that the tribunal bill was rushed for political reasons and overturned basic rights like the ability to challenge one's incarceration.

"I think most Americans would agree that if somebody is held they should at least be able to respond to the charges," said Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois. "The fact we don't have that is something that, over time, Americans are going to be embarrassed about."

Yet the minority of Democrats who joined with Republicans in passing the bill again illustrated that the party is unable to speak with one voice on security issues. Senator Ben Nelson of Nebraska, a Democrat up for re-election who often breaks with his party, said he was willing to follow the lead of Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, who lent the final legislation his strong endorsement. Mr. McCain is a potential Republican presidential candidate.

"I think people respect Senator McCain on these issues," Mr. Nelson said, "and I think he probably represents the views of a lot of people in Nebraska."

Four other Democrats facing voters this year — Bill Nelson of Florida, Debbie Stabenow of Michigan, Thomas R. Carper of Delaware and Robert Menendez of New Jersey — voted for the bill. New Jersey's other senator, Frank R. Lautenberg, a Democrat, also supported it. Nine others running for re-election opposed it.

Republicans were surprised by the level of Democratic opposition in both the House and Senate. Some Republicans were predicting a "jail break," an outcome where lawmakers criticize a bill and support proposed changes but then support it at the end. They think Democrats will find it hard to justify their position.

"It is a kind of difficult vote to explain, at least where I come from," said Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas.

But Democrats argue they came out on the better end of the terrorism debate this week, with public attention focused on a National Intelligence Estimate that suggested that the war in Iraq was fueling terrorism while other Republican-backed security legislation was tied up in divisions between the House and Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0070831

"Republicans thought this would end up in a big roar for them, and it is ending up in a little whimper," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

Each party believes it enhanced its political standing this week. The Nov. 7 elections will help determine which one did.

Can The Democrats Beat Bush's Beliefs With Poll Politics? (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

When pundits confronting the modern sport of extreme politics want to step back from it all, a favored tactic is to ask: What would a man from Mars think? The spectacle currently on display for the man from Mars is a full-throttle election-year fight over the meaning of national security. The Democrats want voters to view the November election through the fogged and bloody prism of the war in Iraq; Republicans want voters at 30,000 feet with a war on terror spread to the horizon.

We don't need the proverbial man from Mars to assess the fight between Democrats and Republicans over national security. Over the past year, I've exchanged messages with several American soldiers in Iraq, now a planet in our political system, and I asked one recently for his opinion of the political landscape back home. He sounded like he might prefer Mars.

"We are very cut off from big political debates here," he said. "We have access to email and the Internet, but as a ground combat arms guy, my pace precludes the close following of national political news that I enjoyed prior to deploying, so I can't say that these debates weigh heavily on us." Thank God for that.

It is difficult to imagine that the U.S. soldiers in Iraq would regard the political debate back home as measuring up to the seriousness of what they do every day. How would you like to roll out of your bunk in al Anbar province, Mosul or Baghdad on a Sunday morning and read across the top of the local U.S. paper that everything you've done in Iraq for three years has merely made the terrorism threat worse? You just might lose heart a notch, a dangerous thing when fighting a war.

But at this late stage of the campaign, Iraq-as-failure has become the central narrative in the Democrats' strategy. A memo sent out to Democrats last week by Greenberg Quinlan Rosner, a strategy group led by former Clinton pollster Stan Greenberg, discusses Mr. Bush's "failure in Iraq, which energized Democrats and dispirited Republicans." It urges Democrats: "On Iraq, stress Bush/GOP 'mismanagement' and need for a 'new direction.'"

There is general agreement in Democratic circles that the party made a mistake by not confronting the national-security issue more forcefully in 2002 and 2004. Paul Begala cited the two elections on the "Today" show Monday and said al Qaeda is "coming back to get us because of the failed policies of George Bush."

Greenberg Quinlan Rosner says it has polled each element of this strategy, and that the poll numbers suggest public support for these Democratic positions. A poll-certified national-security strategy just might work with the out-of-sorts 2006 electorate. But there was a reason for 2002 and 2004. Those Democrats who did get elected channeled their energies into denouncing the Bush antiterror programs and backing the Lamont Insurrection. So there's a problem with the current hand-the-war-to-us strategy: Their hearts and minds really aren't in it. They don't want the war.

No one doubts that George Bush's war on terror is based in belief and principle. Yes indeed, many Democrats say this is precisely the problem. But voters are going to have to make a net judgment between these two variations on a theme. What's before them?

On the GOP side, they've seen George Bush give three major policy speeches this month, pushing the Bush Doctrine with commitment and consistency. Today Congress may send for his signature the bill he sought on terrorist detainees.

The Democrats are back in the national-security game alright, but the playbook is opinion polling first, with belief a second option. One result is their national-security offensive has taken on a surreal unseriousness.

A fortnight ago, the big political story suddenly became ABC's made-for-television movie, "The Path to 9/11." Out of the woods to dominate the news cycle came the ghosts from the Clinton past -- Sandy Berger, Madeleine Albright -- condemning the film as a slander on their long years before the antiterror mast. Up to this point, Democratic candidates had seemed to be surfing smoothly toward control of the House on waves of bad media news out of Iraq. Suddenly they've got to deal with a movie suggesting we're in Iraq because their president failed to pull the trigger on Osama bin Laden.

DOJ_NMG_0070832

This sideshow culminated last Sunday morning in a bizarre exchange between Bill Clinton and Chris Wallace of Fox -- Mr. Clinton wagging a familiar finger at Mr. Wallace and accusing the anchorman of smirking at him. Personally, I think Mr. Wallace generally looks bemused, which is a distant, more innocent cousin of the smirk. Bill O'Reilly, now there's a big-league smirk.

Some pundits surmised that the Clinton eruption was planned to rally the liberal base, depressed at the sight of bad Bush's approval rating crawling back above 40%, and rising. This was Bill Clinton so my guess is it was both -- planned and over the top. The fact is, the Democrats found themselves back in Afghanistan with Bill Clinton and Madeleine Albright, rather than where they wanted the news to be, amid Baghdad's bombs. A messy week.

Then came the leaked NIE story in the New York Times this past Sunday. What a bombshell. This would put them back on message: Iraq as failure. But by now it's evident that the whole workweek invested in the National Intelligence Estimate story was a colossal waste of the time devoted to it. What began Sunday as the Times's towering bonfire -- 16 intel agencies and 12 anonymous sources writing off Iraq -- by Wednesday had burned down to embers.

After the White House released the NIE summary late Tuesday afternoon, reporters reading it for the first time on the Web undoubtedly kept hitting the Page Down button on their PCs. This is it!? Three crummy pages that anyone could have boiled down from a Foreign Affairs "Wither Iraq?" symposium.

The Democrats' problem is this: They are trying to beat policy with politics and weaken belief with polls. This may work for Social Security. I don't think it works with war. Don't be surprised if come November, Democrats are still on message -- Iraq as failure -- and still in the minority.

7-Day Stay Granted In Surveillance Case (WP/AP)

By Sarah Karush, The Associated Press

AP, September 29, 2006

DETROIT -- The federal judge who struck down President Bush's warrantless surveillance program turned aside a government request for an indefinite stay Thursday but said the government could have a week to appeal.

U.S. Judge Anna Diggs Taylor ruled on Aug. 17 that the program, which targets communications between people in this country and people overseas when a link to terrorism is suspected, violates the rights to free speech and privacy, as well as the separation of powers in the Constitution. The White House says the surveillance is a key tool in the fight against terrorism that already has helped prevent attacks.

The Justice Department asked Taylor to allow the program to continue until the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals issues a final ruling on the legal issues, which could take months.

Taylor denied that request, but gave the government a seven-day reprieve while it seeks a stay from the appeals court during the time the appeal is pending. Later Thursday, the government filed a motion for a stay with the appeals court in Cincinnati.

The American Civil Liberties Union brought the suit in Detroit on behalf of journalists, scholars and lawyers who say the program has made it difficult for them to do their jobs because they believe many of their overseas contacts are likely targets.

Many of them said they had been forced to take expensive and time-consuming overseas trips because their contacts were no longer willing to speak openly on the phone or because it would be unethical to ask them to do so when the confidentiality of those conversations could not be guaranteed.

Judge Rules Against Surveillance During Appeal (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Margaret Cronin Fisk

Bloomberg, September 29, 2006

Sept. 28 (Bloomberg) -- A U.S. judge rejected a Bush administration request to continue its terrorist surveillance as it appeals her earlier decision that the program is unlawful, while giving the government a week to seek relief from a higher court.

U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ruled on Aug. 17 that the surveillance, ordered by President George W. Bush after the Sept. 11 attacks, violated the Constitution and federal law. Today the judge rejected the government's bid to put her ruling on hold during its appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0070833

Taylor said that to prevent possible harm to the public she wouldn't order the surveillance stopped immediately, instead giving the government a week to get a federal appeals court order allowing continued surveillance. The government filed that request following the hearing. An immediate stop to the program would harm U.S. security, a government lawyer told the judge.

``The terrorism surveillance program was authorized to close a gap in intelligence," Justice Department attorney Anthony J. Coppolino told Taylor. ``A chilling effect on a small number of communicators speaking with al-Qaeda or suspected al-Qaeda does not outweigh the harm" to the public if the program stops, he said.

In ruling against the government, Taylor said she saw ``no likelihood of the government prevailing on the merits on appeal." The program was challenged by the American Civil Liberties Union and advocacy groups.

Legislation in Congress

The government filed papers with the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati after the hearing, asking for a continued delay of Taylor's order to stop the program.

The ACLU and other plaintiffs ``can present no harm comparable to the drastic harm to the nation if the Terrorist Surveillance Program were halted by court order prior to an opportunity for appellate review," government lawyers said.

Congress is considering legislation to authorize the National Security Agency program of wiretapping, without court warrants, international telephone calls between al-Qaeda operatives in the U.S. and overseas. The House plans to vote today on its version, though Republicans said lawmakers weren't likely to reconcile differing proposals before recessing at week's end for the Nov. 7 election campaign.

Coppolino, in asking the judge to allow the surveillance to continue, said that otherwise ``we will immediately incur the risk that some vital intelligence will be lost."

High Stakes

``When the stakes are so great, we ask the court not to override the security judgment of the president and his security advisers," Coppolino said.

ACLU lawyer Ann Beeson urged Taylor not to allow continued surveillance.

``The public interest is served by requiring compliance with the law," Beeson told the judge. She told reporters after the hearing that if the government is allowed to continue the surveillance while appealing Taylor's August ruling, ``the program could continue operations until next summer."

The program was disclosed in December by the New York Times. The ACLU and other advocacy groups sued the NSA the following month, saying the surveillance without court warrants violated their free-speech rights. They said the government should be required to get warrants for the surveillance from a secret court created by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

The government ``can easily obtain FISA warrants for any member of al-Qaeda," Beeson told Taylor today. The government also has the right to conduct warrantless wiretaps for up to 72 hours under the 1978 law, she said.

Not Fast Enough

The government said the program was essential to prevent terrorist attacks in the U.S. ``FISA is a very useful and effective tool, but there are circumstances when even an emergency application" for a wiretap isn't fast enough, Coppolino said at the hearing.

Taylor's Aug. 17 decision rejected the government's argument that the wiretapping was authorized by a congressional resolution empowering Bush to use force following the terrorist attacks. The judge also ruled that the program violated the Constitution's separation of powers among the three branches of government.

After Taylor's ruling in August, both sides agreed the surveillance would continue until today's hearing.

Three days after the wiretapping was disclosed in December, Bush defended the program in a news conference, saying congressional leaders were ``briefed more than two dozen times" about the program. Bush said he ``absolutely" had the power to authorize the wiretaps.

The ACLU's lawsuit called the wiretapping ``a secret government program to intercept vast quantities of the international telephone and internet communications of innocent Americans without court approval." The program disrupted people's ability to ``talk with sources, locate witnesses, conduct scholarship and engage in advocacy," the ACLU said court filings.

The case is American Civil Liberties Union v. National Security Agency, No. 06-10204, U.S. District Court, Eastern District of Michigan (Detroit).

To contact the reporter on this story: Margaret Cronin Fisk in Southfield, Michigan at 2947 or mcfisk@bloomberg.net .

Domestic Spying Program Gets 7-day Extension From Detroit Judge (FREEP)

By David Ashenfelter, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, September 29, 2006

The Bush administration's domestic spying program that intercepts international phone calls and e-mails of suspected Al-Qaeda members without court orders can continue for seven more days, a federal judge in Detroit ruled Thursday.

U.S. District Judge Anna Digga Taylor, who declared the National Security Agency's program unconstitutional on Aug. 17 on grounds that it violates Americans' constitutional rights to free speech and privacy, said she would delay enforcement of her decision for seven days to give government lawyers time to ask the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals for a longer stay.

The Justice Department wanted Taylor to delay enforcement of her order until the appeals court decides whether to uphold or overturn her August decision. The ACLU asked Taylor to reject the government's request.

The ACLU sued the government in January on behalf of scholars, lawyers, nonprofit groups and journalists who said the NSA program had disrupted client's ability to confer with sources to conduct research, locate witnesses and engage in advocacy.

Coppolino and Taylor traded gentle barbs during Thursday's 30-minute court hearing.

"Your injunction, as far as we can see, was the first time in history that foreign intelligence has been enjoined at a time of war," Coppolino told Taylor.

In rejecting his request for a stay pending the outcome of the appeal, Taylor remarked that the government had failed to cite any steps it had taken to comply with her order.

Contact DAVID ASHENFELTER at 313-223-4490 or ashenf@freepress.com.

Spy Program Gets One-week Extension, Judge Rules (DEN)

By Paul Egan, The Detroit News

Detroit News, September 29, 2006

A federal judge in Detroit who has ruled President Bush's Terrorist Surveillance Program unconstitutional today gave the government one week to get a higher court to say whether the eavesdropping program should be allowed to continue while her decision is appealed.

Under the ruling today by U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor, the National Security Agency program, under which wiretaps can be obtained without first getting judges to issue warrants, would have to cease next Thursday, unless the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals decides otherwise.

Anthony Coppolino, a lawyer with the Justice Department in Washington, D.C., told Taylor today that stopping the program would be "an extraordinarily dangerous thing to do," because the government depends on the program to detect terrorist threats by al-Qaida.

"We respectfully ask the court not to override the national security judgment of the president and his senior advisers while the appeal is pending," Coppolino said.

But Ann Beeson, associate legal director for the American Civil Liberties Union, said if Taylor lifted the temporary stay on her order, it would only mean the president and the government would have to follow the law.

Even without the Terrorist Surveillance Program, the government can obtain unlimited wiretaps outside the United States and can obtain domestic wiretaps without warrants for up to 72 hours under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, Beeson said.

"The public interest is served first of all by requiring compliance with the law," Beeson said.

Taylor said it is unlikely the government will succeed in its appeal of her ruling that the program violates the First and Fourth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution.

She extended the earlier temporary stay of her Aug. 17 order by one week to give the government time to ask the federal appeals court whether it should grant a stay.

You can reach Paul Egan at (313) 222-2069 or pegan@detnews.com.

Judge Gives Feds 7 More Days To Wiretap (UPI)

United Press International, September 29, 2006

DETROIT, Sept. 28 (UPI) -- A U.S. federal judge in Detroit gave the Bush administration seven days to seek a longer stay of her order finding warrantless wiretapping unconstitutional.

U.S. Judge Anna Diggs Taylor on Thursday refused the government's request for an indefinite stay, the Detroit Free Press reported. But she agreed to give the Justice Department time to appeal to the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals.

The National Security Agency began the wiretapping program soon after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. The program became public late last year through an article in The New York Times.

"Monitoring al-Qaida operatives and their confederates remains one of the pre-eminent concerns of the war on terrorism," the NSA argued. "It should be self-evident that suspending those activities -- even in the limited period during which the court of appeals reviews the matter -- would threaten the gravest of harms to the United States and its people."

The American Civil Liberties Union, which brought the suit, argued that allowing the wiretapping to continue could cause grave harm.

House Approves Power For Warrantless Wiretaps (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 28 — The House voted on Thursday to give the president the formal power to order wiretaps on Americans without a court order for 90 days, even as a federal judge in Detroit once again declared the administration's program of wiretapping without warrants to be illegal.

The House approved the surveillance measure, 232 to 191, after rejecting efforts by Democrats and some Republicans to impose greater restrictions on the wiretapping authority.

It appears all but certain that Congress will not reach an agreement on a final surveillance bill before its pre-election recess this week.

Senate Republicans held out hope that they would vote on Friday or Saturday on a bill of theirs that takes a different approach to regulating wiretapping and has the backing of the White House.

Even if the Senate acts this week, lawmakers agreed, there would not be time before the recess for House-Senate negotiators to reach an accord on a final plan, depriving the White House of the chance to sign a bill into law before Election Day.

The legislation took on greater urgency on Thursday after the court ruling in Detroit, as Judge Anna Diggs Taylor of Federal District Court gave the government a week to appeal her decision of Aug. 17 on the wiretapping program or shut it down.

In her earlier ruling, Judge Taylor had found that the surveillance program that President Bush approved after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks was illegal and unconstitutional, violating First and Fourth Amendment protections by allowing wiretaps on Americans' international communications without a court-ordered warrant.

Judge Taylor reaffirmed that finding after a hearing on Thursday, when she said that she thought it was unlikely that the United States Court of Appeals for Sixth Circuit, in Cincinnati, would overrule her. Her decision, she said, was based on "settled law."

The Justice Department immediately filed an emergency motion with the appeals court, asking it to suspend Judge Taylor's ruling while it considers "the important legal issues" raised by the case, brought by the American Civil Liberties Union. Stopping the program while the appeals court considers it would pose "a drastic risk of harm to the nation," the department said in its filing.

Representative Peter Hoekstra, the Michigan Republican who leads the House Intelligence Committee, said the Detroit ruling "underscores the importance of Congressional approval of legislation to modernize" federal surveillance laws in the fight against terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0070836

The bill that the House passed on Thursday with Mr. Hoekstra's backing formalized the president's authority to act outside the confines of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Congress passed that act in 1978 in response to domestic spying on political figures and antiwar protesters.

The bill gives the president the authority to order wiretaps for up to 90 days without a court order on Americans suspected of having ties to terrorists if the president determines there is an "imminent threat" to the United States.

Representative Heather A. Wilson, the New Mexico Republican who wrote the measure, said it would also impose additional Congressional oversight after what she called the administration's "inappropriate" failure to brief the full Intelligence Committees on the surveillance program.

Ms. Wilson said she believed that the bill struck the right balance between giving the government the tools it needed to fight terrorism and protecting the privacy and civil liberties of Americans.

"This is not some drift net," she said.

A bipartisan amendment offered by Representatives Adam B. Schiff, Democrat of California, and Jeff Flake, Republican of Arizona, sought to limit wiretaps without warrants to a maximum of 7 days rather than 90. The amendment would affirm the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act as the "exclusive" means of conducting intelligence surveillance.

Mr. Schiff said in an interview that Ms. Wilson's bill would effectively gut the current intelligence law and give the president broad and sweeping authority at the expense of the courts. His effort failed, 221 to 202. Ms. Wilson's measure also faced behind-the-scenes resistance from the Bush administration, which had pressed her to bring the bill more in line with the Senate version to speed a final bill, Senate officials said.

The Senate bill would offer a differing and somewhat broader approach to resolving the issue by submitting the entire surveillance program to the foreign intelligence court for a one-time review of its constitutionality.

Critics of the approach said it would give the president virtually unchecked authority if the program were to be declared legal.

Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who worked out the compromise with the White House, said he saw it as the only viable way to ensure some measure of judicial review over the program.

7-day Stay Granted In Surveillance Case (AP-Y)

By Sarah Karush

AP, September 28, 2006

The federal judge who struck down President Bush's warrantless surveillance program turned aside a government request for an indefinite stay Thursday but said the government could have a week to appeal.

U.S. Judge Anna Diggs Taylor ruled on Aug. 17 that the program, which targets communications between people in this country and people overseas when a link to terrorism is suspected, violates the rights to free speech and privacy, as well as the separation of powers in the Constitution. The White House says the surveillance is a key tool in the fight against terrorism that already has helped prevent attacks.

The Justice Department asked Taylor to allow the program to continue until the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals issues a final ruling on the legal issues, which could take months.

Taylor denied that request, but gave the government a seven-day reprieve while it seeks a stay from the appeals court during the time the appeal is pending. Later Thursday, the government filed a motion for a stay with the appeals court in Cincinnati.

The American Civil Liberties Union brought the suit in Detroit on behalf of journalists, scholars and lawyers who say the program has made it difficult for them to do their jobs because they believe many of their overseas contacts are likely targets.

Many of them said they had been forced to take expensive and time-consuming overseas trips because their contacts were no longer willing to speak openly on the phone or because it would be unethical to ask them to do so when the confidentiality of those conversations could not be guaranteed.

House Set To Vote On Eavesdropping Bill (AP-Y)

By Laurie Kellman

DOJ_NMG_0070837

AP, September 28, 2006

To Republicans defending their House majority, a bill to validate President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program is as much about luring Democrats into voting against it as it is about enacting a law.

As Republicans tell it, anyone who votes against legalizing Bush's surveillance and detainee treatment programs is voting to "coddle" terrorists.

"You can't say that you're serious about taking on the terrorists if you stand up here every day and vote no," Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, told reporters Thursday, as the House prepared to vote on the bill.

"To always have reasons why you just can't vote yes, I think speaks volumes when it comes to which party is better able and more willing to take on the terrorists and defeat them," Boehner said.

The House was scheduled to vote Thursday night on a bill by Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., that would set a legal framework for Bush's warrantless wiretapping program between people on U.S. soil making calls or sending e-mails and those in other countries. Under the measure, the president would be authorized to conduct such wiretaps if he:

_Notifies the House and Senate Intelligence Committees and congressional leaders.

_Believes an attack is imminent, and later explains the reason and names the individuals and groups involved.

_Renews his certification every 90 days.

The Senate also could vote on a similar bill before Congress recesses at the end of the week. Leaders concede that differences between the versions are so vast they cannot reconcile them into a final bill that can be delivered to Bush before the election.

For its part, the White House announced that it strongly supports House passage of its version but isn't satisfied with it, adding that the administration "looks forward to working with Congress to strengthen the bill as it moves through the legislative process."

But with Congress giving Bush the other half of his September anti-terrorism agenda — a bill setting conditions on how terrorism suspects are to be detained, interrogated and tried — Republicans shifted from lawmaking to campaign mode.

After the House voted 253-168 to set rules on tough interrogations and military tribunal proceedings, Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., was even more critical than Boehner.

"Democrat Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and 159 of her Democrat colleagues voted today in favor of more rights for terrorists," Hastert said in a statement. "So the same terrorists who plan to harm innocent Americans and their freedom worldwide would be coddled, if we followed the Democrat plan. "

Shot back Pelosi: "I think the speaker is a desperate man for him to say that. Would you think that anyone in our country wants to coddle terrorists?"

She and other Democratic critics of the GOP's September anti-terrorism agenda contend the Republican-written bills make Bush's programs vulnerable to being overturned in court. More broadly, they argue the legislation reflects the White House's willingness to fight the war on terrorism at the expense of civil and human rights.

A Democratic majority in either House would set the balance right, Democrats say. "In 40 days we can put an end to this nonsense," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.

A federal judge in Detroit who struck down the warrantless surveillance program turned aside a government request for an indefinite stay Thursday. U.S. Judge Anna Diggs Taylor said the government could have a week to appeal.

___

The House bill is HR 5825; the Senate bill is S 3931.

___

On the Net:

Congress: http://thomas.loc.gov

House OKs Expanded Wiretap Program (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, September 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070838

WASHINGTON — The House voted late Thursday to rewrite the nation's domestic wiretap laws, giving President Bush new power to monitor the e-mail and phone records of U.S. citizens during terrorism investigations without having to obtain court approval.

But lawmakers were unlikely to deliver final legislation to the White House before leaving this weekend for the election campaign, a setback for the administration, which has made national security a pillar of its strategy to maintain Republican control of Congress.

The House measure would endorse the once-secret program Bush launched after Sept. 11, authorizing the National Security Agency to monitor international communications between terrorism suspects and people in the U.S. without first obtaining warrants. It would also set new rules for warrantless surveillance during emergencies and give Congress a bigger role in monitoring the surveillance.

The measure was approved, 232 to 191, with 18 Democrats supporting it. Thirteen Republicans opposed the bill.

The action came as the Senate was immersed in approving another Bush priority: legislation setting procedures for trials of military detainees and interrogating terrorism suspects.

Some lawmakers said the Senate could still take up the wiretap issue in a lame-duck session after the Nov. 7 election. Failing that, Bush would be deprived of congressional backing for what he has called one of the administration's most important anti-terrorism programs.

The House and Senate bills generally would expand executive power to conduct warrantless electronic surveillance, but they differ in key respects.

Each bill would change the definition of electronic surveillance so that in most cases warrants would be required only if the communication occurred within the U.S. or if a person in the U.S. was intentionally targeted. If the target was outside the U.S. — as Bush has described his NSA program — then court review would not be required.

That would be a big change from current law, which requires a court order to intercept calls or e-mails into or out of the U.S.

Critics said the bills would greatly expand surveillance of citizens without court approval.

"They would allow more warrantless surveillance of Americans than has ever before been approved by statute in U.S. history," said Lisa Graves, a legislative counsel with the American Civil Liberties Union.

The revisions would alter the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, which created a secret court to handle Justice Department requests for electronic surveillance in terrorism and espionage cases. Bush acknowledged that he had bypassed the court when he ordered the NSA program, saying he had the power under the Constitution to ignore the intelligence statute.

Republicans said Thursday that the act needed updating to reflect new technologies used by terrorists. They portrayed critics as putting the country at risk by refusing to give the administration adequate tools to fight the war on terrorism.

"This bill is reasonable," said Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.), its sponsor. "We are trying to modernize the electronic surveillance act of this country, so we are allowing our intelligence agencies to collect the intelligence to keep us safe while also putting in place rules of the road to protect civil liberties."

Democrats said the legislation abridged civil liberties and invaded the privacy rights of ordinary citizens to be free of unreasonable searches without a court order.

"The president wants to go on a fishing expedition," said Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), "but he doesn't want to get a fishing license."

The GOP leadership blocked consideration of amendments to the legislation.

A bipartisan group of House members, including Rep. Adam B. Schiff (D-Burbank) and Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Arizona), had proposed to increase the number of judges who hear wiretap cases and give the administration more time to seek warrants in emergencies.

The action came nine months after the disclosure in media reports that Bush had ordered the NSA to monitor international communications between terrorism suspects abroad and people in this country. The disclosure initially raised broad concern that the administration had violated the FISA law.

DOJ_NMG_0070839

On Thursday, Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) was skeptical that the NSA bills would be approved in the lame-duck session but said a consensus had developed in Congress "that the program should be authorized by Congress."

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) said he was hopeful that the Senate would take up the NSA bill after the election.

Bush urged Senate Republicans to pass the NSA bill, Cornyn said in an interview outside the Senate chamber.

"There's been a lot of people in Congress who've been complaining that Congress has been left out of its role in this program, and now this bill specifically provides Congress such a role," he said.

"It would be ironic if we didn't pass it."

The House bill would permit warrantless surveillance in the wake of terrorist attacks and in cases where attacks were considered "imminent," so long as the administration notified selected members of Congress. The law now allows for warrantless surveillance for 15 days only when Congress declares war.

The Senate legislation takes a somewhat different tack. It would enable the president to create surveillance "programs" that were approved in advance by the FISA court and could later monitor individuals without another court order.

The Senate bill also includes language that encourages the president to obtain court review of the NSA program but does not require such a review.

The administration's program suffered another setback Thursday when a federal judge in Detroit, who has declared the NSA program unconstitutional, turned down a Justice Department request for an indefinite stay of her ruling.

The Justice Department asked U.S. Judge Anna Diggs Taylor to allow the program to continue pending an appeal.

Taylor denied that request, but she gave the government seven days to seek a stay from the appeals court to allow the program to continue.

"A stay is necessary to ensure that this vital intelligence-gathering program is not interrupted," Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos. "We believe there would be a dramatic risk of harm to the nation if the Terrorist Surveillance Program was halted by court order at this point."

Taylor ruled Aug. 17 that the program violates the rights to free speech and privacy under the Constitution.

Belgians Say Banking Group Broke European Rules In Giving Data To U.S. (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

BRUSSELS, Sept. 28 — The Belgian banking consortium Swift breached European privacy rules when it aided a United States antiterrorism program by providing confidential information about money transfers, Belgium's privacy protection commission concluded Thursday.

"It has to be seen as a gross miscalculation by Swift that it has, for years, secretly and systematically transferred massive amounts of personal data for surveillance without effective and clear legal basis and independent controls in line with Belgian and European law," the report said.

Swift, or the Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunications, has come under scrutiny for participating in a Bush administration program that allows analysts from the Central Intelligence Agency and officials from other United States agencies to search for possible terrorist financing activity among the millions of confidential financial transactions it oversees.

The Bush administration has defended the once-secret program, which began after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States. But critics in Europe argue that it has placed American security interests ahead of European civil liberties.

A European Union working group debated this week whether the program violated European banking law and is considering whether an independent auditor should be appointed to prevent possible privacy abuses. It agreed to put off its final report until next month, in part to allow officials in Belgium to weigh in with their own report.

Presenting the findings of the investigation, Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt of Belgium said he recognized that sharing data on financial transfers was essential in the global effort to curb terrorism. But he took Swift to task for passing on confidential financial information without adequate safeguards that European privacy rules would be respected.

DOJ_NMG_0070840

"Swift finds itself in a conflicting position between American and European law," Mr. Verhofstadt said. "But it should have received stronger guarantees of privacy protection based on European standards — not by American standards, which are not as strong."

Such guarantees should have included stronger safeguards that the information was being used only for terrorism investigations, Belgian officials said.

Under European law, companies are forbidden from transferring confidential personal data to another country unless that country offers adequate protections. The European Union does not consider the United States to be a country that offers sufficient legal protection of individual data.

Swift and officials with the United States Treasury Department, which oversees the program, have insisted that the American government's demands for documents were narrowly tailored and limited. The Belgian investigation found that, at least at the outset of the operation, the American agencies obtained "massive" amounts of information in what it described as a "carpet-sweeping technique" to gather financial transactions from particular countries. The Americans used "a very wide definition of terrorism" in their demands for records before negotiations with Swift led to a narrower definition of what transactions might be relevant, the investigation found.

While Swift did not provide a precise number for the financial transactions that it turned over to American officials, the Belgian investigation said that 2.5 billion records last year alone "could have been the subject of subpoenas."

Swift has defended the transfers on the grounds that it has offices in the United States and that it was meeting its legal obligations by upholding the laws of the United States.

But the commission rejected this argument. It said Swift was still subject to Belgian rules, regardless of whether the data transferred to the American authorities came exclusively from the company's United States subsidiary rather than its global headquarters in Brussels.

Referring to the broad administrative subpoenas issued to Swift by the United States Treasury, the commission said, "Swift should have realized that exceptional measures based on American rules do not legitimize hidden, systemic violations of fundamental European principles related to data protection over a long period of time."

Mr. Verhofstadt said Belgium's privacy protection commission had not moved to take legal action against Swift. Instead, he said, Belgium would push its European Union partners to open talks with the United States on a new agreement on the transfer of financial records to be used in terrorism investigations.

Swift dismissed criticism that it had done anything unlawful, saying it received strong assurances that the data would be used exclusively for terrorism investigations. But the chief executive of Swift, Leonard Schrank, agreed that the United States and Europe needed a common framework to reconcile data protection with the fight against terrorism.

"We need an agreement between the E.U. and the U.S. that recognizes the global threat of terrorism but has a comfort level for those seeking to guarantee data protection," he said. "We are caught between complying with the U.S. and European rules, and it's a train wreck. But what we have done saves lives in the U.S. and Europe and we must not lose sight of that."

He declined to say whether Swift was still transferring such data to the United States, but said the consortium was still obligated to answer subpoenas from the American authorities because it conducted substantial business in the United States.

Belgium Rules Sifting Of Bank Data Illegal (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

PARIS, Sept. 29 -- A secret U.S. program to monitor millions of international financial transactions for terrorist links violated Belgian and European law and will have to be changed, the Belgian government said Thursday.

The decision, announced by Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt, came as the country's Data Privacy Commission released a 20-page report finding that the Belgium-based Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, or SWIFT, had improperly turned over data from millions of global financial transactions to U.S. anti-terrorism investigators.

DOJ_NMG_0070841

"It has to be seen as a gross miscalculation by SWIFT that it has, for years, secretly and systematically transferred massive amounts of personal data for surveillance without effective and clear legal basis and independent controls in line with Belgian and European law," the report says.

Leonard H. Schrank, SWIFT's chief executive, said in a telephone interview that the cooperative "believes we complied with everything and respected to the fullest extent possible the privacy law in Belgium. But the trouble is data privacy laws in Europe are quite difficult to follow. They're not drafted for national security issues."

SWIFT said in a statement that it had relinquished data to the U.S. Treasury Department only after it had been "subject to valid and compulsory subpoenas" from U.S. authorities.

The Belgian ruling is the latest in a string of European complaints about how the United States is conducting global operations against terrorism. European governments, politicians, human rights groups and citizens have also criticized the treatment of inmates at the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, the operation of secret prisons by the CIA -- including some reportedly in Europe -- and the CIA's extrajudicial transfers of terror suspects.

Europeans tend to support strong efforts against terrorist groups -- many of their countries have terror cells within their borders, and two, Britain and Spain, have suffered major attacks on their transit systems. But many Europeans believe that U.S. policies go too far and fuel radicalism in the Muslim world.

Belgian authorities announced no plans for legal action against SWIFT, which conveys funds among 7,800 banks in 206 countries and territories. Verhofstadt called the anti-terrorist monitoring "an absolute necessity" and said U.S. and European negotiators should find a way to bring it into compliance with European law.

Asked about the Belgian ruling, U.S. Treasury spokeswoman Molly Millerwise said in an e-mail that the department was "mindful of privacy concerns and for that very reason implemented significant safeguards" for what the department calls the Terrorist Finance Tracking Program.

"The U.S. Treasury Department welcomes the suggestion of the Belgian government to engage in greater dialogue at an EU level on how to make the [tracking program] a more cooperative effort. The dialogue is already underway with our European counterparts; such cooperation can only further our common goals," Millerwise said.

Schrank added, "The message today is that there is a recommendation at long last that says, let's get the E.U. and the U.S. sitting down to get a framework for dealing with national intelligence and counterterrorism and the concerns of data privacy. Border security and data privacy are drawn different in every country, and the politicians have to draw the line."

None of the network's banks had made a privacy complaint in connection with the program, he said. "No one that I am aware of has been harmed in any way. . . . Thousands of lives have been saved" as a result of the program, he said. "Let's not forget that."

The Bush administration has called its secret international banking surveillance program a vital tool in uncovering terrorist networks. When newspapers first reported the program's existence in June, President Bush called the disclosure "disgraceful."

The program was begun without congressional or court approval shortly after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. With SWIFT's cooperation, U.S. investigators tapped records from the cooperative's banks, a total of millions of transactions, looking for suspicious patterns and links to terrorists.

A SWIFT spokesman said Thursday that "the status of the program is unchanged."

A European Union working group that oversees data protection is investigating SWIFT's transfers of data and is to release its report in November. After a meeting this week in Brussels, the group said it has "immediate concerns about the lack of transparency which has surrounded these arrangements."

Verhofstadt said SWIFT was "in a conflicting situation between American and European laws." But he said the cooperative "made several evaluation mistakes during the executing of the American subpoenas. From the very beginning, SWIFT should have been aware that fundamental European laws should also be respected."

The prime minister added, "Fundamental differences exist between the E.U. and the U.S.A. concerning legislations and the principles governing the treatment of personal data, mainly in the domain of the level of protection, which is higher in Europe. . . .

"SWIFT is also clearly responsible because they made all the crucial decisions regarding data communication" to the U.S. Treasury, "behind the back of its 7,800 clients."

The report faulted SWIFT for not notifying European authorities of the program from its inception.

SWIFT said its "compliance was legal, limited, targeted, protected, audited and overseen." It added, "SWIFT also did its utmost to comply with the European data privacy principles of proportionality, purpose and oversight."

Belgium, EU To Seek Oversight Of Transfer Of Bank Data To U.S. (WSJ)

By William Echikson And Glenn R. Simpson

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

BRUSSELS -- Belgium accused a communications network for the global banking industry based here of violating European privacy laws through the "massive, systematic" transfer of personal banking data to the U.S. government for use in a counterterrorism intelligence operation.

The controversy sharpens the conflict between the U.S. and Europe over the degree of enhanced surveillance needed to combat terrorism. Europe, an important staging ground for terrorist operations, has strict protections on collection of various types of personal data that the U.S. says can be vital in preventing attacks.

Since shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks on New York and Washington in 2001, a Belgian company known as Swift has given the U.S. Treasury Department and the Central Intelligence Agency access to billions of financial transactions that flow through a global electronic network it operates on behalf of the world's largest banks. The program was exposed in newspaper reports earlier this year, generating controversy on both sides of the Atlantic.

Belgian and European Union officials will now seek to negotiate a new oversight agreement for the financial-intelligence program, said Belgian Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt Thursday, adding that Swift had been caught between conflicting European and American laws.

"We wholeheartedly support calls for U.S. and EU authorities to work together to develop an improved framework to reconcile data privacy protections with today's pressing security concerns," Swift Chief Executive Leonard Schrank said Thursday.

Swift's formal name is the Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication. It is a nonprofit cooperative that operates a secure network for the exchange of data on international financial transfers on behalf of nearly 8,000 financial institutions.

The 28-page report by Belgium's privacy commissioner detailed how Swift secretly worked with the U.S. government to track suspected terrorist financial activity, in response to Treasury Department subpoenas that were issued to a U.S.-based data subsidiary.

"It should be regarded as a serious error of judgment by Swift for it to have subjected to monitoring for years, secretly and systematically, a massive quantity of personal data, without sufficient and clear justification and independent controls in accordance with the Belgian and European law," the report concluded.

The criticism comes after concerns raised Tuesday by an EU panel of privacy experts. That group, which is only advisory, expressed "immediate concerns about the lack of transparency" in the program and said it will meet again in November to consider the matter.

Belgian officials confirmed statements by Swift and U.S. officials that there were elaborate safeguards instituted to protect the sensitive data from misuse.

Imam Denies Endorsing Attacks On U.S. (NSDY/AP)

By Michael Hill, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 29, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. -- Jabbing his finger and speaking emphatically, an imam facing terrorism-related charges told a court Thursday that though houseguests spoke to him about attacking the United States, he never endorsed the idea.

"They came to the wrong person," Yassin Aref said on the witness stand.

DOJ_NMG_0070843

Aref, imam at an Albany mosque, and Mohammed Hossain, a pizzeria owner and mosque member, were caught in 2004 in an FBI sting built around a fictitious assassination plot. An FBI informant told them he was an arms dealer and asked Hossain to launder money from the sale of a shoulder-fired missile that would be used to kill a Pakistani diplomat in New York City, according to the federal complaint. They are accused in a 30-count indictment of supporting terrorism.

Prosecutors have used a diary kept by Aref in 1999, when he was living in Syria, to portray him as someone aligned with terrorists. A potentially damning passage comes from that January, in which Aref wrote about hosting two Muslim guests from Libya and Palestine. Aref said there was a discussion about "moving the war to America and Israel," making explosives, and attacking Western targets to gain attention.

Aref had calmly given benign interpretations of previous diary entries under questioning from his lawyer, Terence Kindlon, but he spoke faster and more fervently when this entry flashed on a projection screen in front of the jury.

"I want to explain," he said. This sort of talk was common in Syria at this time and as an observant Muslim he was obligated to allow these two young men to stay at his home as guests, he testified.

"I don't know why they came," he said, "I don't know who sent them."

Pointing his finger at the projection screen as he spoke, he said nowhere in the diary does he say that he agreed with these men, supported their ideas or invited them back to his home. Aref said he listened, but showed no interest in "moving the war to America," a country he has lived in for seven years.

The impassioned mini-filibuster left the stenographer struggling to keep up and seemed to take Kindlon aback. The judge asked Aref to talk slower.

Aref, 36, initially took the stand Wednesday, kicking off the defense on the third week of the men's trial. It was not clear if Hossain also would take the stand.

Aref, a refugee from the Kurdish region of northern Iraq, worked in 1999 for the Islamic Movement in Kurdistan, while he was an expatriate in Syria. He became entangled in the FBI sting as a witness to the money laundering transactions, which involved $50,000 cash.

Defense Committee Formed For Liberty City Men Charged With Terror Plot (MH)

By Dani Mcclain

The Miami Herald, September 29, 2006

Activists Thursday announced the formation of the "Liberty City 7 Defense Committee" to support a group of local men arrested and charged in June in connection with a terror plot to blow up the Sears Tower in Chicago and federal buildings in Miami.

At a news conference outside federal court in downtown Miami, family members and representatives of several community groups called for the men's release. The seven men are currently being held in federal prison pending a trial in March.

"We conclude that these arrests were wrongful, politically motivated and racially motivated," said Max Rameau of Miami CopWatch, a lead group organizing the defense committee. The seven men in question are black.

Family members of three of the men -- Narseal Batiste, Stanley Phanor and Lyglenson Lemorin -- stood shoulder to shoulder, wearing T-shirts that featured the men's photographs and the words: ``The U.S. government is the real terrorist!''

None spoke to the press. Minerva Vasquez, the wife of Narseal Batiste, said her attorney advised her not to comment.

The activists said the men lacked the financial and organizational capacity to carry out the terrorist plot.

"George Bush's war on terror is now grabbing for straws," said Sushma Sheth, a Miami Workers Center spokeswoman. ``The danger of this fear-mongering is that it's making terrorists out of all of us.''

Some speakers repeatedly invoked the names of Jose Antonio Llama and Orlando Bosch, two Cuban-Americans who Rameau said have been openly involved in plots against the Cuban government.

Llama, known as Toñin, told El Nuevo Herald in June that exile groups created a paramilitary organization to execute destabilizing acts in Cuba. Other exiles denounced his statements as false. Bosch, a Cuban exile who lives in Miami, was acquitted in a Venezuelan court of the 1976 bombing of a Cuban jetliner that killed 73 people.

DOJ_NMG_0070844

The Liberty City Seven terror case broke June 22 when federal agents rounded up the seven defendants and charged them with conspiring to support al Qaeda in an alleged plot to blow up FBI buildings in five cities, including Miami.

Agents raided the group's Liberty City warehouse, where they combined religious activities with military training. Defense lawyers decried the arrests, arguing their clients were part of an entrapment scheme set up by the federal government's two informants.

BREAKING NEWS: Tuscaloosa Man Arrested By Federal Terrorism Task Force (TUSN)

By Jason Morton, Staff Writer

Tuscaloosa News (Alabama), September 29, 2006

TUSCALOOSA | The man who shot and killed a would-be robber late last year now faces federal allegations of illegally sending money out of the country.

Jack Mohamed S. Mused was arrested Thursday on charges of operating an unlicensed money transmitting business, conspiracy to operate an unlicensed money transmitting business and trafficking counterfeit goods.

Mused, 29, was taken into custody about 8 a.m. today at his place of business, the Raceway convenience store on McFarland Boulevard, authorities said.

Members of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Joint Terrorism Task Force arrested him, but details regarding what he did to justify the charges are vague.

Dale Miskell, an FBI supervisory special agent for the Birmingham office, said he could not disclose many facts about the case, but confirmed that the allegations center on Mused's transferring money outside the U.S. without a license.

Mused's case originates out of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Monroe, La., which is near where several of the remaining potential suspects reside.

Donald Washington, the U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Louisiana, said additional information regarding Mused's charges would be made available today.

"There is no present danger to the public related to the arrest of Mr. Mused that we are currently aware of," Washington said when asked of Mused's possible links to terrorism. "Our case against Mr. Mused will become public tomorrow."

Mused was arrested by Birmingham office's Joint Terrorism Task Force, which includes members of the Jefferson County and Shelby County sheriff's offices, the U.S. Secret Service, Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Alcohol Beverage Control Board. The FBI also offered a special thanks to the Tuscaloosa and Northport police departments.

"The government's ability to track to flow of money into and out of the country is vital to our national security," said Carmen S. Adams, special agent in charge of the Birmingham FBI office. "This case is yet another example of the FBI working with our law enforcement partners to aggressively pursue those who use our financial system to conceal and transfer illicit funds."

In January, a grand jury exonerated Mused for killing 19-year-old Eric Dewayne Baggett on Dec. 29, 2005, at Raceway. The investigative panel found that Baggett and another man were trying to rob the store when Mused opened fire.

Reach Jason Morton at jason.morton@tuscaloosanews.com or 205-722-0200.

FBI Arrests Tuscaloosa Man For Illegal Money Transfers (AP)

AP, September 29, 2006

TUSCALOOSA, Ala. (AP) — A Tuscaloosa man who shot and killed a would-be robber late last year was arrested Thursday on charges of making illegal money transfers.

Jack Mohamed S. Mused, 29, was arrested without incident at about 8 a.m. at his place of business, a Raceway convenience store, authorities said.

He was charged with transmitting money without a license, conspiracy to operate an unlicensed money transmitting business and trafficking in counterfeit goods, FBI officials said.

FBI spokesman Paul Daymond said several other people in other parts of the country were also arrested Thursday in relation to this case.

DOJ_NMG_0070845

Daymond said he did not know exactly how many other people were arrested or whether they face the same charges as Mused. He declined to reveal the destination of the money transfers or the type of goods involved because the investigation is continuing.

Museds case originates out of the U.S. Attorneys Office in Monroe, La., which is near where several of the remaining potential suspects reside.

"There is no present danger to the public related to the arrest of Mr. Mused that we are currently aware of," said Donald Washington, the U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Louisiana. "Our case against Mr. Mused will become public tomorrow."

Mused was arrested by members of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force, which includes local, state and federal agencies.

Daymond said the Joint Terrorism Task Force participates in investigations any time there is any potential link to terrorism. But he said he could not confirm that Mused's activity had a link to terrorism.

In January, a grand jury exonerated Mused for killing 19-year-old Eric Dewayne Baggett on Dec. 29, 2005, at Raceway. The investigative panel found that Baggett and another man were trying to rob the store when Mused opened fire.

Ashcroft Is Denied Immunity In Case (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

A federal judge in Idaho has ruled that former attorney general John D. Ashcroft can be held personally responsible for the wrongful detention of a U.S. citizen arrested as a "material witness" in a terrorism case.

U.S. District Judge Edward J. Lodge, in a ruling issued late Wednesday, dismissed claims by the Justice Department that Ashcroft and other officials should be granted immunity from claims by a former star college football player arrested at Dulles International Airport in 2003.

Attorneys for the plaintiff in the civil suit, Abdullah al-Kidd, said the decision raises the possibility that Ashcroft could be forced to testify or turn over records about the government's use of the material witness law, a cornerstone of its controversial legal strategy after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Justice Department officials did not respond to telephone messages yesterday seeking comment. A spokeswoman for Ashcroft also did not respond to requests for comment.

Robin Goldfaden, one of Kidd's attorneys at the American Civil Liberties Union, said the case "could be the launching point for more fully documenting how the government is misusing the material witness statute."

The law was intended to give authorities the power to detain witnesses they feared might flee before testifying. But after the Sept. 11 attacks, the government used it to hold 70 men, nearly half of whom were never called to testify in court, according to a study by the ACLU and Human Rights Watch.

Kidd -- a Kansas native who was known as Lavoni T. Kidd before converting to Islam -- was arrested in March 2003 as he prepared to board a flight to Saudi Arabia, where he was planning to pursue a doctorate in Islamic studies. Federal prosecutors claimed he was a flight risk crucial to the prosecution of a fellow University of Idaho student, Sami Omar al-Hussayen.

Kidd was imprisoned for 16 days in three states and then placed under restrictive court supervision for more than a year. But Kidd was never called to testify against Hussayen, who was eventually acquitted of computer-related terrorism charges.

While not deciding on the veracity of Kidd's claims, Lodge, who was appointed to the federal bench in 1989 by President George H.W. Bush, ruled that Ashcroft could be found personally liable in the case because of his role in establishing and enforcing the government's material-witness policies.

Document Seizure Hampers Gitmo Detainees (AP)

By Andrew O. Selsky

AP, September 28, 2006

His ankles chained to the floor of the hearing room, a Saudi detainee hoped to convince three U.S. military officers that he is not a danger to the United States, has no intelligence value and should be released from the Guantanamo Bay prison.

DOJ_NMG_0070846

But in his one shot this year at getting out of here, the detainee could not produce letters from his family that he wanted to submit as evidence. They were seized by the military, along with thousands of other documents from detainees, as it investigates whether the suicides of three prisoners in June were assisted or encouraged.

While the letters on their own may not have convinced the panel that the detainee should be released, the hearing shows that the Naval Criminal Investigative Service's confiscation of more than 1,100 pounds of documents is hampering detainees' ability to confront accusations against them.

Correspondence between attorneys and their clients was among the documents seized. Lawyers for detainees say the military is violating attorney-client privilege and exacerbating the isolation of detainees by taking family pictures and other personal items.

A federal judge last week ordered an independent "filter team" to review the paperwork for evidence of complicity in the suicides. Irrelevant and protected documents must be returned to detainees, the judge ruled.

Defense attorneys are bitter.

"Attorneys working at Guantanamo have never believed they could tell clients with certainty that attorney-client communications are truly confidential," lawyer Joshua Colangelo-Bryan told The Associated Press in an e-mail. "Now that the government has admitted to reviewing the legal materials of many detainees, it is obvious that these concerns were well founded."

Patricia A. Bronte, another attorney, said detainees will now have a harder time trying to clear themselves.

"I believe that their ability to present evidence in their defense, already severely circumscribed, will be further harmed," Bronte said. "It was a minor miracle for the detainee to even obtain some letters in support of his claim of innocence. For the NCIS to then confiscate the evidence from him ... just illustrates the unfairness of the whole proceeding. "

At his appearance last week before the Administrative Review Board, the 22-year-old Saudi detainee — who is not allowed an attorney for the hearing and instead is assigned a military representative — told the presiding Marine colonel and two other board members that he had come empty-handed.

"I tried to bring the letters, but they took them away from me," he told the officers sitting at a table some 10 feet away, an American flag thumb-tacked to the speckled-tile wall behind them. Reporters from The Associated Press and three other news organizations attended the hearing. Under media ground rules, the detainee and board participants could not be identified.

The hearing, held in a small room inside a trailer in the detention center, provides a rare glimpse into the issues the military wrestles with in recommending whether a detainee should continue to be held or sent away.

Most detainees have been skipping the annual hearings, officials said, reflecting skepticism that the encounters will result in their release.

About 460 detainees are currently at Guantanamo, including some held for more than four years. Only 10 have been charged with crimes, but about 315 others have been released or transferred to detention in their home countries, military officials said.

Bronte said it is was too early to judge how wide-reaching the effects of the document seizures are.

"Prisoners' lawyers are not allowed to attend the ARB proceedings and can only find out about them through their clients," she said. "Because of the restrictions on attorney-client communications, this can be weeks or months after the fact."

Sitting on an office chair with his manacled hands resting in his lap, the bearded prisoner openly acknowledged he had gone to Afghanistan before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks to fight the Northern Alliance. The alliance was battling Afghanistan's hard-line Islamic rulers, the Taliban. But he insisted he never wanted to kill Americans.

"After Sept. 11, there was talk about the United States entering Afghanistan, but I never thought of fighting the United States," the detainee, wearing baggy white pants and a white cotton shirt, said in a soft voice. White is reserved for compliant detainees; others wear orange.

He acknowledged he receiving training in firing a pistol, assault rifle and a rocket-propelled grenade in the Arab-run Al Farouq training camp in Afghanistan. He said he also was once shown a surface-to-air missile in Afghanistan, but never received training on the SAM-7. He was captured near the Afghan-Pakistan border, according to military records.

DOJ_NMG_0070847

U.S. interrogators, tasked with uncovering plots against the United States and determining if a detainee is a security risk, have repeatedly asked questions about surface-to-air missiles, the detainee said.

A clerk, reading from the record, said the detainee has denied knowing of any plans to attack U.S. aircraft at Prince Sultan Air Base in Saudi Arabia. It was unclear why interrogators pursued that line of questioning. Parts of Administrative Review Board hearings and documents are classified, closed to detainees and the press.

The detainee said he wanted no more queries about surface-to-air missiles, believing that each new set of interrogators was not being told the topic has already been covered.

"Could you write that down, that I didn't train in that weapon," he asked the board president.

"I will personally tell the interrogators that you said this," the colonel responded.

The Marine told the detainee the board tried to get his letters from the Navy investigators. He invited the detainee to recount for the record what the letters said.

The detainee said family members noted he was only 17 when he went to Afghanistan and was innocent. He declined to describe the letters in depth.

"I prefer to wait until you have the letters in your hands so you can see them with your own eyes," he said.

Canadian Police Official Apologizes For Mistakes (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

TORONTO, Sept. 28 -- Canada's top Mountie apologized Thursday for the "terrible injustices" done to a Canadian Muslim spirited to Syria and tortured for 10 months on false suspicions of terrorist ties. Critics of the government demanded that the prime minister offer his own apology.

Giuliano Zaccardelli, commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, directed his remarks to Maher Arar, 36, who four years ago was detained at a New York airport and delivered to a Syrian prison by U.S. agents. Those agents were working on false information given to them by Canada.

"Mr. Arar, I wish to take this opportunity to express publicly to you and to your wife and to your children how truly sorry I am" for RCMP actions that led to "the terrible injustices that you experienced and the pain that you and your family endured," Zaccardelli said, testifying before a parliamentary committee.

The remarks on the Arar case were Zaccardelli's first since a judicial inquiry on the controversy was released Sept. 18. The inquiry found that RCMP agents had given exaggerated and often flat-out false reports to U.S. intelligence agents, suggesting that Arar had terrorist connections and was the subject of a terrorist investigation. In fact, the exhaustive inquiry found, he was an innocent computer programmer.

The United States sent Arar to Syria as part of its "extraordinary rendition" program, in which terrorist suspects are secretly dispatched to other countries, some of which are known to torture prisoners and practice brutal interrogation methods. U.S. officials have not acknowledged Arar's innocence or any wrongdoing on their part.

Political critics excoriated Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper on Thursday for balking at extending the same apology made by the RCMP commissioner. The House of Commons unanimously voted last week that "apologies should be presented" to Arar. But Harper's government has said any such formal expression from the government must be part of a negotiated settlement to compensate the father of two children, ages 9 and 4.

"Canada owes a moral debt to Mr. Arar and his children," Marlene Jennings, a Liberal Party lawmaker from Quebec, said in debate in the House of Commons. "The Conservative government has yet to apologize. Surely compassion is not a matter of negotiation."

"The government agrees that Mr. Arar was the victim of a great injustice," responded Jason Kenney, the Conservative Party parliamentary secretary to Harper. "But we have a responsibility to the taxpayers to ensure that the result will be responsible financially."

Arar returned to Canada after his imprisonment in a coffin-size dungeon in Syria and has campaigned to clear his name.

US Fuels Pakistan Bounty Market (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0070848

By Tom Burgis

Financial Times, September 29, 2006

Bounties offered by the US for suspected terrorists have created a black market in abductions in Pakistan, according to a report published on Wednesday.

People have been seized by Pakistani police, border guards and bounty hunters eager to claim rewards offered for suspected terrorists, evidence compiled by human rights organisation Amnesty International shows.

Many were handed to Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence, which in turn passed at least 369 detainees to American operatives, writes Pakistan's president, Pervez Musharraf, in his book In the Line of Fire, also published this week. Amnesty's report says people abducted in Pakistan account for about two-thirds of the 759 past or present inmates at Camp X-Ray, the US military prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

The report – "Pakistan: human rights ignored in the 'war on terror'" – found "hundreds of people have been arbitrarily detained".

Incentives for bounty hunters came in leaflets dropped from American aircraft after the invasion of Afghanistan in November 2001 and recovered by locals and reporters. Rewards included $5,000 (€4,000, £2,700) for information on al-Qaeda or Taliban fighters and up to $25m for alleged terrorist masterminds such as Khalid Sheik Mohammed.

The CIA on Thursday declined to comment. The State Department did not respond to repeated requests from the FT for a comment. A Pentagon spokesman said: "The rewards programme is effective in helping to protect Americans and citizens around the world from terrorists, including those who harbour or aid the enemy."

Professor Shaun Gregory, a UK expert on Pakistani security at Bradford University's Department of Peace Studies and a visiting fellow at Islamabad's Institute for Strategic Studies, Pakistan's leading military think-tank, said leaflets dropped in Afghanistan spread into Pakistan.

The market in abductees was at its most frenetic in late 2001, Amnesty said. Pakistan's security services continue to deny the existence of such detainees when pressed by relatives of the disappeared. The bounty trade "is the logical working-through of the notion that the CIA will pay for 'bad guys'," Prof Gregory said.

Prisoners in Pakistani jails have allegedly been "groomed" to appear more like potential terrorists before being sold to American personnel, Angelika Pathak, one of the report's authors, told the FT.

Mark Denbaux, professor of law at Seton Hall University law school, New Jersey, and a lawyer representing two Guantánamo detainees, said his client, Rafiq Alhami, a Tunisian Arab resident in Afghanistan, was bundled into a van during a medical visit to Pakistan in late 2001.

Mr Alhami, 40, a honey broker with a heart condition, believes his captors were paid a bounty, Prof Denbaux said. He remains in Camp X-Ray, not charged with any offence.

Gen Musharraf writes that since the September 11 2001 attacks his agents have rounded up hundreds of suspected terrorists: "Some are known to the world, some are not. We have captured 689 and handed over 369 to the United States.

"We have earned bounties totalling millions of dollars. Those who habitually accuse us of 'not doing enough' on the war on terror should simply ask the CIA how much prize money it has paid to the government in Pakistan."

Western diplomats said the allegations would dent the image of martial democrat cultivated by Gen Musharraf, who dined with President George W. Bush and Hamid Karzai, the Afghan president, on Wednesday. The guests, who blame each other for the Afghan insurgency, refused to shake hands.

Gen Musharraf arrived in London on Thursday, and spent the afternoon with Tony Blair, the prime minister. On Friday he will address the Oxford Union.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Denies Overestimating Anthrax Power (WP/AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070849

WASHINGTON -- The FBI denied Thursday that it ever overestimated the potency of the anthrax spores used in mailings that killed five people in 2001.

The bureau also rejected a request for a classified briefing on the case from Rep. Rush Holt, D-N.J. Citing media reports, Holt said Wednesday that the FBI should have determined in days, not years, that the anthrax was less sophisticated than initially believed.

Shortly after the attacks, media reports said the spores contained additives and had been subjected to sophisticated milling _ both techniques used in anthrax-based weapons _ to make them more lethal. Earlier this month, there were media reports that the FBI belatedly learned that those techniques were not used and the anthrax was not enhanced.

Bureau officials say the early reports of weaponized anthrax were misconceptions, and the more recent reports misunderstood how early the FBI was able to accurately analyze the spores.

"The FBI and its partners in this investigation have never been under any misconceptions about the character of the anthrax used in the attacks," Assistant FBI Director Eleni P. Kalisch wrote Holt on Thursday. "On the contrary, since the earliest months of this investigation, we have consulted with the world's foremost scientific experts on anthrax and relevant bio-forensic sciences, both inside and outside the FBI. While there may have been erroneous media reports about the character of the 2001 anthrax, the FBI's investigation has never been guided by such reports."

In a letter Wednesday to FBI Director Robert Mueller, Holt had requested a classified briefing on the investigation.

Kalisch rejected that request on two grounds:

Although Holt and other members of Congress got updates and briefings in 2002 and 2003, Kalisch said the FBI and Justice Department decided to stop briefing members of Congress after sensitive investigative information was reported in the media citing congressional sources.

Because this is a criminal investigation rather than an intelligence activity, a briefing of the House Intelligence Committee, of which Holt is a member, would be inappropriate, Kalisch wrote.

In an interview, Holt responded, "The inference that any member of the intelligence committee was the source of previous leaks is outrageous, irresponsible and without foundation."

The case "clearly falls within the purview of the intelligence committee," Holt added. "Our job is to see that the government functions well and in the anthrax investigation our government has not functioned well."

In 2001, anthrax contamination was found in mail facilities in and near Holt's central New Jersey district and in his office on Capitol Hill.

Holt had written Mueller that the FBI's delay in determining what kind of anthrax was used meant that "resources were diverted and countless agents wasted their time investigating a small pool of suspects, instead of the broader search we now know was needed."

The FBI has conducted 9,100 interviews and issued 6,000 subpoenas in the case.

Holt asked Mueller to have Douglas Beecher, a scientist in the FBI's Hazardous Materials Response Unit, testify before the House Intelligence Committee.

In April, Beecher wrote an article published in a scientific journal in August saying there was "a widely circulated misconception" that the anthrax spores were made using additives and sophisticated engineering akin to military weapons production.

The anthrax attacks, in the days after Sept. 11, 2001, killed five people across the country and sickened 17. There were five confirmed anthrax infections and two suspected cases in New Jersey but no fatalities.

Security Budget To Include Cargo Pact (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A $34.8 billion homeland security budget neared final passage in Congress, and House-Senate negotiators predicted agreement on a companion measure to better protect American ports and U.S.-bound cargo.

DOJ_NMG_0070850

After days of stalemate, Republican leaders cleared the way last night for House approval today of the homeland measure, which includes $1.8 billion in emergency funds to help burnish the party's image on border security and fighting illegal immigration.

Also under the package, the government is given new power to regulate the safety of high-risk chemical plants that might be targets for terrorists. Republicans hope that the port-security legislation -- taking final shape last night -- will be a third feather in their cap going into the midterm elections.

With House members slated to go home tonight speed is essential, and critics complained that the legislative exercise is more for political show. Rail and transit security provisions, added by the Senate, were largely scuttled under the proposed agreement. And while the bill authorizes annual funding of $400 million in federal grants to improve port security, the actual appropriations for the new fiscal year that begins Oct. 1 are about half that.

The port legislation is viewed as an important first step toward tightening inspections at home and abroad for U.S. bound cargoes. By the end of 2007, the Homeland Security Department would be required to deploy sufficient radiation detection equipment to screen all shipments through the nation's 22 busiest seaports. A pilot program would be established in three foreign seaports to test integrated scanning systems, and a variety of steps are outlined to improve track ships heading to U.S. waters and better identify crew members.

While the primary focus is on preventing attacks, there is a tacit acknowledgement that disruptions could yet come. And the bill requires the establishment of protocols for the resumption of trade and port operations after a security incident.

Port security became more of a political issue this spring after Dubai Ports World's venture into the American market. Rep. Peter King (R., N.Y.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, was among the early critics of that deal, and he urged his colleagues last evening to accept the compromise. "We do want to get a bill," he said. "We don't want the perfect to be the enemy of the good."

His Senate counterpart, Sen. Susan Collins (R., Maine), who chairs Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, was also hopeful that the bill could be enacted before senators leave this weekend. "This legislation will make a real difference," she said.

In the case of the $34.8 billion homeland security budget bill, a House-Senate agreement had been reached Monday evening but then ran into strong objections from powerful Republicans because of provision impacting post-9/11 border-crossing rules requiring a new passport card for U.S. citizens.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R., Wis.) was most outspoken, but he appeared to be accepting enough last night to allow the bill to go forward.

Congress Nears Deal On Ports Security (AP)

By Jim Abrams, The Associated Press

The AP, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congress neared agreement Thursday on legislation to strengthen security at the nation's ports, regarded since the Sept. 11 attacks as one of the most vulnerable targets for a catastrophic act of terrorism.

House and Senate negotiators were prepared to sign off on the bill as early as Friday, rushing it to the floor before lawmakers depart Washington at the end of the day for the election campaign.

With votes this week authorizing military tribunals for terrorists and House consideration of new rules for wiretapping, the seaport bill gives lawmakers another talking point as they try to prove their security credentials to voters.

Democratic negotiators at the ports security conference expressed concern that the final version would fail to address another significant threat _ that of terrorist attacks on the nation's rail and mass transit systems.

Pointing to rail attacks in Madrid, London and Bombay, they said they would try to restore language from the original Senate bill that authorized funding for rail and mass transit security. The nation's railways, said Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., "remain all too unprotected."

DOJ_NMG_0070851

While staff members were still writing the final version of the compromise bill, it was apparent that provisions on rail and mass transit would be dropped. "It's an issue we intend to take up as soon as possible," said Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., chairman of the Homeland Security Committee. He indicated that wouldn't happen until next year.

There was tentative agreement on the ports aspect of the bill. Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee Chairman Susan Collins, R-Maine, said it would include approval of $400 million a year over five years for risk-based grants for training and exercises at ports.

It would require the nation's 22 largest ports, handling 98 percent of all cargo entering the country, to install radiation detectors by the end of next year.

Pilot programs would be established at three foreign ports to test technology for nonintrusive cargo inspections. Currently only one foreign port, Hong Kong, scans all U.S.-bound cargo for nuclear materials.

The Homeland Security Department would also be required to set up protocols for resuming operations after an attack or incident. The nation's 361 ports handle some 11 million shipping containers annually and it is feared that a terrorist attack, such as a nuclear device set off by remote control, could cripple the entire economy as well as causing massive casualties.

The bill would authorize $3.4 billion over five years for the ports security.

Democrats in particular said that was still short of what is needed. "We inspect just 5 percent of incoming shipping containers, while 95 percent gets into our country without us knowing what's inside," said Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J.

Congress made port security a priority after a February fight over a buyout that put a Dubai company in control of some operations at six American ports. The outcry led the Dubai company, DP World, to sell the U.S. operations to an American company.

Felons In The Dock (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

Here's an odd but telling footnote to the political fight over port security: The powerful International Longshore and Warehouse Union is lobbying Congress not to bar felons from working in sensitive dock security jobs. Really.

House and Senate conferees are trying to work out a final port security bill this week, and a provision sponsored by Senator Jim DeMint (R., S.C.) would prohibit dock workers convicted of certain felonies -- including murder, espionage or treason -- from obtaining access to secure areas. Workers convicted of other felonies -- say, extortion, smuggling, bribery, identity fraud or the unlawful possession or distribution of firearms -- would be prevented from getting clearance until seven years after conviction. The Department of Homeland Security has issued a similar regulation, though it isn't final.

Yet the longshoremen's union -- the same outfit behind the 2002 West Coast port shutdown -- and its labor allies are muscling Congress to strike the DeMint provision. Larry Willis, the general counsel for the Transportation Trades Department at the AFL-CIO, says that the felonious categories that would bar workers are "too broad."

Too broad? Some 750,000 workers currently have unescorted access to secure port areas, including longshoremen, truck drivers and rail workers. People with a criminal record would seem to be obvious candidates for recruitment by bad guys trying to infiltrate the docks. The felony standards Congress is considering are also similar to those that are currently enforced for airport workers or nuclear-plant guards.

Various politicians and unions created a political furor earlier this year merely because an Arab company with a clean business record, Dubai Ports World, would have managed some American ports. How bizarre to worry about that non-threat but then be complacent about sensitive port access by proven crooks.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John McCaslin

The Washington Times, September 29, 2006

Growing fear

Percentage likelihood — according to 39 Republican congressmen polled by National Journal in March, May and again this week — of Democrats taking over control of the House and Senate after the midterm elections: 25 percent, 32 percent and 34 percent, respectively.

DOJ_NMG_0070852

Shame on you

If you think former President Bill Clinton has been in a sour mood, what with all the finger-pointing of late surrounding his administration's reaction (or lack thereof) to global terrorism, wait until he sees three television ads that will start airing in the coming days.

The group Move America Forward, based in Sacramento, Calif., says it's had enough of Mr. Clinton and his loyal lieutenants trying to "rewrite history" about the war on terrorism and goes so far as to call the former commander in chief "shameless."

Viewers also will be reminded that Mr. Clinton's national security adviser, Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger, was nabbed by security officials at the National Archives after he "stole and ate classified documents that exposed the failures of the Clinton anti-terrorism policies."

One TV ad, we're told, will be finalized today. Move America Forward predicts Mr. Clinton "won't like it one bit."

Fathers and sons

Your eyes don't deceive you: Strom Thurmond is jumping aboard Sen. John McCain's bandwagon for president.

Strom Thurmond Jr., that is, son and namesake of legendary Sen. Strom Thurmond, South Carolina Republican, the oldest senator (100 years) in U.S. history. He died on June 26, 2003.

In 2001, Mr. Thurmond was picked by President Bush to become U.S. attorney for South Carolina. Today, he's in private practice in Aiken, S.C.

Also climbing aboard Mr. McCain's Straight Talk America political action committee this week is the child of yet another great South Carolina political legacy. Carroll A. Campbell III is the oldest son of former South Carolina Gov. Carroll Campbell.

A longtime businessman, Mr. Campbell in 2003 was appointed by South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford to serve on the South Carolina State Ports Authority.

Torments and joys

There's much buzz about former Attorney General John Ashcroft's upcoming book, "Never Again: Securing America and Restoring Justice."

The former chief of the Justice Department will discuss in detail everything from the USA Patriot Act to the surveillance program authorized by President Bush, providing new details, his publisher said.

Otherwise, readers will share in Mr. Ashcroft's personal "pitfalls, torments, joys and greatest accomplishments."

Snow job

That was the country's top Republican communicator, White House spokesman Tony Snow, ducking this week into a Capitol Hill meeting of the Republican Communications Association, a networking group of several hundred congressional press secretaries and other Republican communicators throughout Washington.

Lindsey Mask, press secretary of the U.S. House Committee on Education and the Workforce, describes for us "a lighthearted, down-to-earth Snow, who fully described a 'day in the life' of a White House press secretary."

"We could all feel his genuine enthusiasm for his new role and his sincere appreciation for and loyalty to the president of the United States," she says.

Second acts

When Harry S. Truman left office, he had no Secret Service detail and no presidential pension, and had to sell some of his family's land.

Lyndon B. Johnson became a full-time rancher and a virtual recluse upon leaving the Oval Office. And Jimmy Carter was riddled with $2 million in personal debt (no wonder he grabbed a hammer and went to work) when he pulled out of the White House driveway.

To help pay whatever bills he had, Ronald Reagan, less than one year after his last term expired, accepted $2 million for a speaking tour in Japan. But nobody has commanded a higher post-White House salary than Bill Clinton, who besides the millions of dollars he pulls in from speaking engagements, received the highest payment of any former president for his memoirs: a whopping $12 million.

DOJ_NMG_0070853

All fascinating facts we cull from Mark Updegrove's new book, "Second Acts: Presidential Lives and Legacies After the White House."

Why Bill Clinton Pushed Back (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

Bill Clinton's eruption on "Fox News Sunday" last weekend over questions about his administration's handling of terrorism was a long time coming and has political implications that go beyond this fall's elections.

By choosing to intervene in the terror debate in a way that no one could miss, Clinton forced an argument about the past that had up to now been largely a one-sided propaganda war waged by the right. The conservative movement understands the political value of controlling the interpretation of history. Now its control is finally being contested.

How long have Clinton's resentments been simmering? We remember the period immediately after Sept. 11 as a time when partisanship melted away. That is largely true, especially because Democrats rallied behind President Bush. For months after the attacks, Democrats did not raise questions about why they had happened on Bush's watch.

But not everyone was nonpartisan. On Oct. 4, 2001, a mere three weeks and a couple of days after the twin towers fell and the Pentagon was hit, there was Rush Limbaugh arguing on the Wall Street Journal's op-ed page: "If we're serious about avoiding past mistakes and improving national security, we can't duck some serious questions about Mr. Clinton's presidency."

To this day I remain astonished at Limbaugh's gall -- and at his shrewdness. Republicans were arguing simultaneously that it was treasonous finger-pointing to question what Bush did or failed to do to prevent the attacks, but patriotic to go after Clinton. Thus did they build up a mythology that cast Bush as the tough hero in confronting the terrorist threat and Clinton as the shirker. Bad history. Smart politics.

Moreover, when Democrats, notably former House minority leader Richard Gephardt, finally put their heads up in the late spring of 2002 to ask questions about that Aug. 6, 2001, memo warning of the possibility of terrorist attacks, the Republican pushback was furious.

Vice President Cheney, addressing his Democratic "friends" in Congress, said on May 16, 2002, that "they need to be very cautious not to seek political advantage by making incendiary suggestions, as were made by some today, that the White House had advance information that would have prevented the tragic attacks of 9/11. Such commentary is thoroughly irresponsible and totally unworthy of national leaders in a time of war."

Boy, that was defensive, wasn't it? Funny that Cheney didn't respond that way when Limbaugh made his incendiary attack on Clinton. Opportunistic and inconsistent? Sure, but again, smart politics.

This is just a fragment of a long history of evasion and blame-shifting by the administration and its supporters. And the polemical distortions of history came roaring back earlier this month in ABC's fictionalized account of the Sept. 11 events that butchered the Clinton record.

This history-as-attack-ad approach won praise from none other than Limbaugh, who described the film's screenwriter as a friend. Limbaugh was pleased that the film was "just devastating to the Clinton administration" and attacked its critics as "just a bunch of thin-skinned bullies." Pot-and-kettle metaphors don't begin to do justice to the hilarity of Limbaugh's saying such a thing.

And so Clinton exploded. My canvassing of Clinton insiders suggests two things about his outburst on "Fox News Sunday." First, he did not go into the studio knowing he would do it. There was, they say, a spontaneity to his anger. But, second, he had thought long and hard about comparisons between his record on terrorism and Bush's. He had his lines down pat from private musing about how he had been turned into a punching bag by the right. Something like this, one adviser said, was bound to happen eventually.

Sober, moderate opinion will say what sober, moderate opinion always says about an episode of this sort: Tut tut, Clinton looked unpresidential, we should worry about the future, not the past, blah, blah, blah.

But sober, moderate opinion was largely silent as the right wing slashed and distorted Clinton's record on terrorism. It largely stood by as the Bush administration tried to intimidate its own critics into silence. As a result, the day-to-day political conversation was tilted toward a distorted view of the past. All the sins of omission and commission were piled onto Clinton while

DOJ_NMG_0070854

Bush was cast as the nation's angelic avenger. And as conservatives understand, our view of the past greatly influences what we do in the present.

A genuinely sober and moderate view would recognize that it's time the scales of history were righted. Propagandistic accounts need to be challenged, systematically and consistently. The debate needed a very hard shove. Clinton delivered it.

Insurers Are Ready To Fight To Keep Federal Backing Of Terrorism Coverage (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

Insurance and business groups are gearing up for a battle to preserve a government program that would cover most of the losses from another major terrorist attack.

After Sept. 11, 2001, President Bush campaigned for the program to shield insurers from the bulk of the cost of an attack up to $100 billion. Without such backing, few insurers were willing to sell the coverage.

But last year, the administration concluded that the insurers were able to provide terrorism coverage on their own, and the insurers persuaded Congress to extend the federal backing until the end of 2007.

As soon as today, a presidential working group led by Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. is expected to issue an assessment of the insurers' ability to go it alone. The insurers fear that the group will argue, as a Treasury report did in June 2005, that the federal program interferes with market forces.

"The working assumption is that their findings are going to be similar to the Treasury conclusions of last year," said Joel Wood, a lobbyist for the Council of Insurance Agents and Brokers.

Insurers say that the frequency and severity of terrorism attacks are unpredictable and that is why the industry needs the government to play a role.

"The potential is so large that no single industry can absorb that risk," Edmund F. Kelly, the chief executive of the Liberty Mutual Holding Company, said Wednesday at a Congressional hearing. Industry officials said they could not offer coverage without government backing. Government officials have said demand for insurance will create a market.

Before 2001, insurers provided terrorism coverage as a part of other policies. But afterward, most would not sell it at any price. Banks began requiring terrorism coverage on loans for real estate and construction. President Bush said the lack of coverage was choking the economy.

In exchange for government backing, property-casualty insurers were required to offer terrorism coverage.

If the government gets out of the insurance business, insurers will probably still be liable for various losses from terrorist attacks, even without terrorism insurance.

The reason is that many companies sell workers' compensation insurance. State regulators require those policies to cover injuries or deaths to employees, regardless of the cause, including terrorism.

That means insurers might have to pay billions of dollars for worker compensation claims. Also, many regulators require insurers to pay losses from fires after an event they would otherwise refuse to cover, like an earthquake or a terrorist attack.

Insurers and their allies in business stepped up their lobbying this week, pointing out that countries like Britain, Spain, France and Germany have government-backed programs for terrorism insurance.

Richard C. Shelby, a Republican from Alabama who is the chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, said this week that he would not rule out ending the program. He declined to comment, but said in a statement that he thought the program had "impeded the development of broader, innovative solutions."

Unless Congress extends the program, it will die at the end of 2007. Already, industry executives say, insurers that are renewing multiyear policies are including provisions that cancel terrorism coverage without government backing.

Each year, the program has increased the amount that insurers must pay. This year the industry must pay the first $25 billion in losses, up from $5 billion in 2002. For the next $75 billion in losses, the government would pay 90 percent.

The cost of terrorism insurance varies widely, but complaints have been muted, even among those paying the most, because they say they simply need the coverage.

DOJ_NMG_0070855

In places that insurers consider riskiest — like Lower Manhattan, Chicago and Los Angeles — premiums can be three or four times a company's cost for all other property-casualty coverage.

In many major cities, terrorism coverage adds 20 percent to an overall insurance bill, industry experts say. Across the country, the cost is much lower: an average of an additional 4 percent, according to the Marsh & McLennan Companies, a big insurance broker. In unlikely target areas across the country, many customers pay little or nothing.

Since the World Trade Center attacks, the insurers have collected billions in premiums for terrorism coverage and, with no subsequent attacks, paid out nothing in claims.

Representative Richard Baker, a Republican from Louisiana, has generally supported the insurers. But at the hearing in Washington this week, he suggested they should pay more of the burden. "We don't want to fund the industry's profitability," he said. "That's our concern."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Attacks Democrats Over Iraq And Terror (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., Sept. 28 — President Bush took on the Democrats on Thursday with some of his most pointed language yet this campaign year, telegraphing the start of the last, intensive phase of the election season for the White House.

Speaking to a crowd of more than 2,000 supporters in this Bush-friendly Southern city, the president took Democrats to task for their criticism of the Iraq war, for their votes this week against legislation creating military tribunals to try terrorism suspects and for what he called misleading descriptions of the latest National Intelligence Estimate on global terrorism.

"Five years after 9/11, the worst attack on the American homeland in our history, the Democrats offer nothing but criticism and obstruction and endless second-guessing," Mr. Bush said at a fund-raising event for Gov. Bob Riley. "The party of F.D.R. and the party of Harry Truman has become the party of cut and run."

The National Intelligence Estimate, completed in April and reflecting a consensus of 16 American intelligence agencies, concluded among other things that the Iraq war had become a "cause célèbre" for Islamic extremists. But other sections in the estimate say terrorists would be demoralized by defeat in Iraq, and Mr. Bush declared that "some in the other party have been quoting selectively from the document for partisan political gain."

"The Democrats are using the N.I.E. to mislead the American people and justify their policy of withdrawal from Iraq," the president said. "The American people need to know what withdrawal from Iraq would mean. By withdrawing from Iraq before the job is done, we would be doing exactly what the extremists and terrorists want."

Mr. Bush has been honing his offensive against Democrats for weeks as his political team seeks to shift the election-year focus from a debate about him and the unpopular war to one about terrorism in general, his party's efforts to combat it and what he describes as the opposition's promotion of defeatism and retreat.

But until now he had left the sort of hard-charging talk that he used here to his political strategist Karl Rove, Vice President Dick Cheney and the Republican national chairman, Ken Mehlman.

Minutes after the speech, during which he received several standing ovations, the Democrats hit back.

The administration has "gone from shock and awe to an American public shocked at how awful the situation in Iraq is," Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said in a statement sent by e-mail to reporters. "Rather than heed the warnings in the N.I.E., President Bush politicized this discussion, and the Republican Congress has stood on the sidelines."

In his criticism, Mr. Bush also singled out members of the Democratic leadership. Referring to "a senior Democrat in Congress" without mentioning her by name, he recalled a recent comment in which Representative Jane Harman of California, the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, said: "The president says that fighting them there makes it less likely we'll have to fight them here. The opposite is true."

DOJ_NMG_0070856

The president pointed to Ms. Harman's remark as an example of how "some in Washington, some decent people, patriotic people," think that "we should not be on the offensive in this war on terror."

"History," he said, "tells us that logic is false."

Through a spokesman, Ms. Harman said Thursday evening, "If the president reads his own intelligence, he will see that his failed strategy in Iraq is making the terrorist threat more dangerous."

Bush Attacks 'Party Of Cut And Run' (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

BIRMINGHAM, Sept. 28 -- In his sharpest partisan attack of this election campaign, President Bush denounced Democratic critics of his Iraq policy on Thursday and said "the party of FDR and the party of Harry Truman has become the party of cut and run."

Seeking to rebut Democrats who say a new intelligence report indicates that Iraq is fueling terrorism rather than helping to counter it, Bush said voters face a choice "between two parties with two different attitudes on this war on terror."

Republicans "understand the nature of the enemy," he said. "We know the enemy wants to attack us again," whereas Democrats "offer nothing but criticism and obstruction and endless second-guessing."

Despite assertions in a recently declassified intelligence report that the war in Iraq has become "a cause celebre" that is inspiring new jihadists and fueling anti-Americanism, Bush restated his position that the country is safer since the March 2003 invasion of Iraq. Absent the war, he said, extremists would find other excuses to attack Americans and other Westerners.

He said that leaving Iraq before that country is stabilized would embolden terrorists while exposing the United States to economic blackmail and the prospect of even-more-lethal threats.

"The greatest danger is not that America's presence in Iraq is drawing new recruits to the terrorist cause," he said. "The greatest danger is that an American withdrawal from Iraq would embolden the terrorists and help them find new recruits to carry out even more destructive attacks on the American homeland."

Bush's remarks added fresh fuel to an escalating partisan fight over conclusions from the National Intelligence Estimate. Bush grudgingly released portions of the report on Tuesday after some of its contents were leaked to news media outlets.

The report, which was completed in April, says the number of potential terrorists is growing as the war in Iraq enflames radical Muslims and fans hatred of America. The assessment also says that although anti-terrorism efforts have been largely successful in crippling al-Qaeda, the overall terrorist threat is becoming more diffuse, making it harder to identify potential terrorists and prevent attacks.

The document concludes that the factors fueling the growth in jihadism outweigh its vulnerabilities, meaning the terrorist threat is likely to grow. The paper reflects the collective judgment of the nation's 16 intelligence agencies.

"George Bush has no credibility left on national security," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "No matter how many stump speeches he gives on the campaign trail, the American people can see the damage his tough talk has done to America's safety."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), who heads the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, accused Bush of ignoring key facts in the intelligence document. "When the president pays no attention to the findings of 16 nonpartisan, non-political intelligence agencies in our government, there's only more trouble ahead for our county and our soldiers," he said.

Speaking before a large and enthusiastic audience at a fundraising luncheon for Alabama Gov. Bob Riley (R), Bush attempted to turn criticism of his Iraq policy into a cudgel.

Bush quoted an unnamed congresswoman -- later identified by the White House as Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), the top-ranking Democrat on the House intelligence committee -- as ridiculing Bush's frequent assertion that "we're fighting them over there so we don't have to fight them over here."

"We didn't create terrorism by fighting terrorism," Bush responded. "Iraq is not the reason why the terrorists are at war against us."

DOJ_NMG_0070857

Bush also criticized many Democrats for not supporting his approach to trying terrorism suspects. Pointing to Wednesday's vote on a bill passed by the House authorizing military tribunals for the suspects, Bush reminded his audience that 160 Democrats -- "including the entire Democrat leadership" -- voted against the measure, which passed 253 to 168.

Opponents have said the measure is at odds with core American values because it would allow evidence gathered without a warrant or gained through coercion to be used against terrorism suspects. Plus, they argued, it could invite brutal treatment of U.S. troops captured abroad.

While the intelligence report painted a grim picture of the growing terrorist threat, Bush asserted that it also provided support for his administration's strategy for fighting it. The report called Iraq a pivotal battleground in the wider anti-terrorism effort -- a point Bush makes frequently. Also, the document said, extremism's lack of appeal to the vast majority of Muslims offers hope for victory.

Before coming to Birmingham, Bush visited nearby Hoover, where he was briefed on the use of corn-based ethanol to fuel that city's municipal fleet.

Later, Bush traveled to New Albany, Ohio, where he headlined a fundraiser for embattled Rep. Deborah Pryce (R). The event was at the sprawling estate of Leslie H. Wexner, chairman and chief executive officer of Limited Brands, the retailing conglomerate that includes the Limited, Victoria's Secret and Bath & Body Works. The event, which was closed to the press, was expected to raise $500,000 for Pryce.

Bush Speech Links Politics, Terror Fight (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, September 29, 2006

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — President Bush angrily accused Democratic leaders Thursday of misrepresenting a recently declassified intelligence report, and said they favored policies that would increase the nation's vulnerability to terrorist attacks.

Addressing Republican Party contributors, the president melded politics, a defense of the war in Iraq and the anti-terrorism fight to a greater extent than he had recently.

His remarks set off an equally angry response from a leading Democratic senator.

"Five years after 9/11, the worst attack on the American homeland in our history, the Democrats offer nothing but criticism and obstruction, and endless second-guessing," Bush said in a speech that repeatedly brought the audience of several thousand at the Birmingham convention center to its feet.

"The Democrats can't have it both ways," he said, accusing his political opponents of quoting selectively from declassified sections of a recent National Intelligence Estimate on the capabilities of Islamic extremists. "Either they believe that Iraq is a distraction from the war on terror or they agree with the intelligence community and the terrorists themselves that the outcome of Iraq is important in the war on terror.

"Truth is, the Democrats are using the NIE to mislead the American people and justify their policy of withdrawal from Iraq," Bush said.

The president has been speaking frequently about the war, and addressing large numbers of Republican contributors, but Thursday's speech brought together the two most difficult issues he is facing during his sixth year in office — the war and the challenge of keeping GOP majorities in the House and Senate — more openly than he had before.

He also singled out statements by Rep. Jane Harman of Venice and Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, the top Democrats on the House and Senate intelligence committees, although he quoted neither by name. Aides said later that they were the two Democrats he was referring to.

Referring to Harman, Bush said: "She said, 'The president says that fighting them there makes it less likely we'll have to fight them here. The opposite is true.' She went on to say, 'Because we are fighting them there, it may become more likely that we'll have to fight them here.' "

Harman made those remarks at the beginning of the week, following reports that the National Intelligence Estimate had said, among other things, that the militant movement opposing U.S. forces in Iraq had grown stronger.

DOJ_NMG_0070858

Challenging her assessment, Bush said, "History tells us that logic is false. We didn't create terrorism by fighting terrorism. Iraq is not the reason why the terrorists are at war with us."

As he has in the past, he cited terrorist strikes on the World Trade Center in 1993 and on the the U.S. destroyer Cole in 2000, as well as the Sept. 11 attacks. U.S.-led forces invaded Iraq in 2003.

Bush also referred to Rockefeller's contention, made during an interview with CBS News this month, that the United States would be better off today if ousted Iraqi President Saddam Hussein had remained in power because "we wouldn't have depleted our resources" in Iraq and thus would be better able to go after Al Qaeda.

"Some Democrats in Congress say that we should not be fighting the terrorists in Iraq; it was a mistake to go into Iraq in the first place," Bush said. "I believe these Democrats need to answer a simple question: Do they really believe that we would be better off if Saddam Hussein were still in power?"

Citing Rockefeller's statement, the president continued: "If this is what the Democrats think, they need to make this case to the American people. They need to make the case that the world would be better off if Saddam Hussein were still in power."

Bush's remarks prompted Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York, who heads the Democrats' Senate election campaign, to respond: "Mr. President, the truth will set you free."

Schumer said that Bush was paying "no attention" to the work of the nation's 16 "nonpartisan, nonpolitical intelligence agencies" that was reflected in the National Intelligence Estimate, thus spelling "only more trouble ahead for our country and our soldiers."

"Democrats want a strong policy on the war but also a smart one," he said in a written statement.

Bush spoke at a luncheon that White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said raised $1.76 million for the reelection campaign of Republican Gov. Bob Riley of Alabama and $750,000 for the Republican Governors' Assn. He later traveled to Ohio to address a fundraiser for Republican Rep. Deborah Pryce near Columbus.

Bush Criticizes Democrats On Terror War (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, September 28, 2006

President Bush suggested Thursday that Democrats don't have the stomach to fight the war on terror, battling back in the election-season clamor over administration intelligence showing terrorism spreading.

"Five years after 9/11, the worst attack on the American homeland in our history, Democrats offer nothing but criticism and obstruction and endless second-guessing," Bush said at a Republican fundraiser.

"The party of FDR and the party of Harry Truman has become the party of cut and run," Bush told a convention-center audience of over 2,000 people. The event put $2.5 million in the campaign accounts of Alabama Gov. Bob Riley and the state GOP.

Democrats immediately disputed the charge that they would hold back in the anti-terror battle.

"On his watch, five years after 9/11, he not only has failed to capture Osama bin Laden, but as the (National Intelligence Estimate) indicates, his failed policies have made America less safe and spawned terrorism, not decreased it," said Karen Finney, spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee. "Democrats will be tough and smart, and will actually fight the terrorists, not leave them to plan future attacks."

Bush's no-holds-barred speech, one of his harshest yet on the campaign trail, came less than six weeks before midterm elections in which Democrats are seeking to strip Republicans of their control of one or both houses of Congress.

The war of words continued a nearly weeklong tussle by both parties over the implications of a newly revealed estimate, an analysis of terror trends put together by the nation's top intelligence analysts in 16 spy agencies.

The document concluded that Iraq has become a "cause celebre" for jihadists worldwide, whom it said have grown in number and geographic reach. The report said the factors, such as the Iraq war, that are fueling the jihadist movement's growth outweigh its vulnerabilities and that, if the current trend continues, risks to the U.S. interests at home and abroad will grow.

Portions of the five-month-old report were leaked over the weekend, and Bush ordered the key judgments — four of its 30 pages — declassified on Tuesday in hopes that wider availability of most conclusions would quell the criticism.

DOJ_NMG_0070859

Democrats continued to point to the report to argue that the 2003 Iraq invasion, by fanning anti-U.S. sentiments and helping terrorists recruit, is one reason to change leadership in Congress.

On Thursday, Bush accused the opposition party of cherrypicking pieces of the report "for partisan political gain" and "to mislead the American people and justify their policy of withdrawal from Iraq."

"The greatest danger is not that America's presence in the war in Iraq is drawing new recruits to the terrorist cause," Bush said. "The greatest danger is that an American withdrawal from Iraq would embolden the terrorists and help them find new recruits to carry out even more destructive attacks."

Though not by name, he quoted Rep. Jane Harman of California, top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, as saying that because of the Iraq war "it may become more likely" that the U.S. will have to contend with terrorists on its own soil again, rather than less likely as the president argues. And he quoted Sen. Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, top Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee, as saying the world would be better off without the Iraq war and if former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein were still in power.

"Some in Washington, some decent people, patriotic people, feel like we should not be on the offensive in this war on terror," the president said. "We will fight them wherever they make a stand."

The president also criticized House Democrats, including their leadership, who voted this week against a White House plan for interrogating, detaining and trying terrorists. "We must give our professionals the tools they need to protect the American people in this war on terror and those in the House of Representatives were wrong to vote against this bill," he said.

Democrats, joined by some Republicans, say the legislation would give the president too much latitude when deciding whether aggressive interrogations cross the line and violate international standards of prisoner treatment.

Bush headed from Alabama to Ohio to raise $600,000 for the Ohio GOP and Rep. Deborah Pryce, who is struggling to hold on to her seat in an evenly split district and stressing her independence from the president.

That fundraiser was held behind closed doors — like most that Bush does lately.

By Thursday's end, the president had headlined 68 political events — all fundraisers — benefiting 37 candidates, the national GOP, several state counterparts and the campaign arms of House and Senate Republicans. Half of them overall have been closed to media coverage, with the percentage going up to nearly two-thirds in recent months.

The only one of the president's six political events this week that was open was the fundraiser for Riley, who is favored for re-election over his challenger, Democratic Lt. Gov. Lucy Baxley.

Bush Scolds 'Party Of Cut And Run' (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 29, 2006

President Bush yesterday said Democrats have ditched the tradition of the great war-fighting presidents of the 20th century to become "the party of cut and run," and accused them of using leaked excerpts of a recent intelligence estimate to mislead voters before midterm elections.

In his most politically biting speech yet in this campaign, Mr. Bush slammed his political opponents for not having an Iraq policy, then warned against embracing the conclusions of some top members of their party who say Iraq is a distraction from the war on terror.

"Five years after 9/11, the worst attack on American homeland in our history, the Democrats offer nothing but criticism and obstruction, and endless second-guessing," Mr. Bush said while campaigning for Alabama Gov. Bob Riley in Birmingham. "The party of FDR and the party of Harry Truman has become the party of cut and run."

Mr. Bush also spoke at length about the National Intelligence Estimate (NIE), leaked portions of which were published over the weekend, prompting the president on Tuesday to release a longer declassified version that painted a mixed picture of the war.

"Truth is, the Democrats are using the NIE to mislead the American people and justify their policy of withdrawal from Iraq," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0070860

Democrats taunted back, saying Mr. Bush has a chance to prove himself right by releasing the entire intelligence document.

"If George Bush is so confident that his national security policies are working, he should release the entire National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism and let the American people decide for themselves," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat.

He and five other top Senate Democrats wrote a letter to John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, asking him to speed up a planned intelligence study that focuses solely on Iraq.

Democrats hope the NIE information helps them regain the initiative and refocus the debate on Iraq after Mr. Bush's successful September, during which his series of speeches on the broader war on terror boosted both his approval ratings and support for Republicans' job in handling terror.

Last weekend, the New York Times and The Washington Post reported on a portion of the NIE that said the war in Iraq is prompting more people to become jihadists. That boosted Democrats' argument that the war in Iraq is a mistake.

"They've gone from shock and awe to an American public shocked at how awful the situation in Iraq is," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat and chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "Rather than heed the warnings in the NIE, President Bush politicized this discussion and the Republican Congress has stood on the sidelines."

But the administration released a broader version this week that also notes that defeating jihadist fighters in Iraq would be a demoralizing blow for terrorists worldwide -- boosting Mr. Bush's argument that Iraq is central in the broader war on terror.

While not disputing the assessment that Iraq is spawning more terrorists, the president said it is just the latest reason terrorists have given for fighting against the United States.

"Our troops were not in Iraq when the terrorists first attacked the World Trade Center. They were not in Iraq when they blew up our embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. They were not in Iraq when they bombed the USS Cole," he said.

The next fight for the administration may be Bob Woodward's upcoming book, "State of Denial," due out next week. In an interview with CBS' "60 Minutes" -- which is owned by the same company that owns the book's publisher, Simon & Schuster -- Mr. Woodward says the administration is withholding information that the war in Iraq will get worse next year.

"The truth is that the assessment by intelligence experts is that next year, 2007, is going to get worse and, in public, you have the president and you have the Pentagon [saying], 'Oh, no, things are going to get better,'" Mr. Woodward says, according to CBS.

Ratings Rise With Terror Talks (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 29, 2006

It's no surprise that President Bush has returned to talking about the war on terror -- for the past four weeks, his approval ratings have steadily risen as he delivered a series of speeches tying Iraq to the broader war on terror and demanding that Congress give him tools to fight the war.

The average of the most recent public polls puts Mr. Bush with a 42 percent approval rating -- far from stellar heading into an election, but better than the lower-than-38 percent rating he averaged at the end of August, just before his major blitz of speeches on the war on terror.

Mr. Bush talks about the war on terror frequently -- including a biting attack on Democrats at a fundraiser in Alabama yesterday -- but the White House said the recent series of speeches was designed to cut through day-to-day matters and give the president a chance to get across some specific points.

"The speeches help crystallize the philosophical choice that Americans are facing, not just in the midterm election but every day, as they think about the war on terror. You cannot remind people enough about the nature of the enemy, the challenges we face as a nation, the patience and resolve it is going to require," White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said.

Beginning in Salt Lake City on Aug. 31 at the American Legion and ending with his Sept. 19 address to the U.N. General Assembly, Mr. Bush laid out a more complete picture of al Qaeda, using quotes from terrorist leaders, and demanded that Congress give him tools such as wiretapping authority to go after terrorists. He also challenged both Americans and people worldwide to accept that the battle against terrorism is the major ideological struggle of this century.

DOJ_NMG_0070861

One senior administration official said Republicans started to benefit with Sen. Joe Lieberman's primary loss to an anti-Iraq war Democrat in Connecticut in early August and then continued with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's speech to the American Legion two days before Mr. Bush's, which cautioned against repeating the 1930s mistakes of appeasement.

"What they all did together was the perfect storm, which was it set a clear definition between each side in this election," the official said, adding that it stiffened Republicans' spines while leaving Democrats searching. "The Rumsfeld speech was effective because it spooked them, made them overreact and made them walk around and say 'I'm not an appeaser.'"

Driving Mr. Bush's rise in the polls has been a steady increase in support among Republicans -- from 76 percent approval in early August to 87 percent now, according to the Fox News poll.

But that also means he is not winning over Democrats or independents, whom Republicans will need in November's election, said Bill Burton, spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

"Independents and Democrats are united against Republicans in the House and the president," Mr. Burton said.

Democrats also doubt that Mr. Bush's improved numbers will help Republican House and Senate candidates and point to polls that show approval for the Republican-led Congress still below 30 percent. Democrats also hold a lead of about 10 percentage points when voters are asked generally whether they plan to vote for a Democrat or Republican for Congress this year.

Mr. Burton said Democrats are using the newly declassified portions of the National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) to poke holes in Mr. Bush's terror argument and to fire back at Republicans who are using Mr. Bush's arguments on the campaign trail. He pointed to Connecticut's 5th Congressional District, where Democratic challenger Chris Murphy is using the NIE's assessment of Iraq against Republican incumbent Nancy L. Johnson.

Still, Republicans said Mr. Bush has dominated the news cycles this month, dictated the congressional agenda and crowded out Democrats' message. With a packed campaigning schedule, they expect that momentum to continue.

"The more people know about these priorities, and the more they hear from the White House, the more they support the president. This is clearly not the 'new direction' his opponents were looking for," said Don Stewart, spokesman for Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican.

Land: Majority Of Baptists Support Bush (AP-Y)

By Rose French

AP, September 28, 2006

The head of public policy for the Southern Baptist Convention says an overwhelming majority of Baptists still support President Bush and his handling of the Iraq war.

In an interview with The Associated Press on Thursday, Richard Land said that exit polls showed about 84 percent of Southern Baptists voted for Bush in 2004. The Iraq war hasn't significantly eroded that support, he said, despite recent polls that show Republicans losing ground with moderate evangelicals.

"I'm not ready to throw in the towel on Iraq yet," said Land, president of the Washington, D.C.-based Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission, the Southern Baptist Convention's public policy arm.

"It would be foolish to say anybody's pleased," Land said. "I don't think the president's pleased with the progress of the war. Clearly, he would have wished things would have gone better. So do I."

But, Land added: "I still think Iraq is one of the more noble things we've done. We went there to try to restore freedom and to bring freedom to the Middle East."

An Associated Press-Ipsos poll conducted earlier this month indicated that 42 percent of white evangelicals disapprove of the job Bush has done as president.

But Land contends Bush has lost less support from Southern Baptists than "virtually any other constituency." The Nashville-based SBC is the largest Protestant denomination in the U.S. with over 16 million members.

DOJ_NMG_0070862

"I don't think there's any question that the vast majority of Southern Baptists still strongly support this president and his policies," Land said.

Southern Baptists have been among the most vocal of conservative Christian groups in support of the Bush administration.

The president has spoken by video link to the Southern Baptist national convention three times in recent years and outgoing SBC President Jack Graham called the president "a man of personal faith whose leadership is great for America."

Land, who also serves on the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom, an independent and bipartisan federal agency, said the United States needs to worry less about trying to improve its image in the Middle East.

Instead, Land says, "we ought to go negative."

"We ought to be spending our money explaining what the Middle East would look like if the jihadists win, what Afghanistan looked like when the Taliban was in control and what the role of women was.

"We need to focus more on the fact that most people being killed in Iraq are not Americans but Muslims being killed by other Muslims," he said. "If democracy loses in the Middle East, it's Muslims who will be the primary losers."

___

On the Net:

Southern Baptist Convention: http://www.sbc.net/

Bush Urges Key Allies To Cooperate (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 28, 2006

In a Rose Garden appearance arranged to show warmth and unity, the bickering leaders of Pakistan and Afghanistan shook hands with President Bush but not with each other.

Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf and Afghan President Hamid Karzai, whom Bush considers key bulwarks against Islamic radicalism in a volatile region, barely looked at one another as Bush appealed for cooperation against the common enemy of terrorism.

"I look forward to having dinner with friends of mine who don't happen to share the same faith I do but nevertheless share the same outlook for a more hopeful world," Bush said in a brief Rose Garden appearance before Wednesday's light dinner of soup, sea bass and salad.

The meeting was a command performance for leaders who have joined their fortunes to Bush's anti-terror drive since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks but who for months have picked at one another's efforts to fight terrorists along their long, remote, mountainous border.

They actually did shake hands before joining Bush in appearing before reporters.

"These two men are personal friends of mine," Bush said. "They are strong leaders who have an understanding of the world in which we live. They understand that the forces of moderation are being challenged by extremists and radicals."

After the private meal, the White House issued a bland statement that called the session a "constructive exchange" but outlined no new agreements or initiatives. The White House did not make any officials available for questions.

"They committed to supporting moderation and defeating extremism through greater intelligence sharing, coordinated action against terrorists, and common efforts to enhance the prosperity of the people of Afghanistan and Pakistan," the statement from press secretary Tony Snow said.

Bush's three-way dinner party, just weeks before the November congressional elections, came as he works to persuade voters that Republicans are best able to guide the U.S.-led war against terrorism. He faces declining American support for both the U.S.-led war in Iraq and the U.S. military commitment in Afghanistan.

Afghan officials claim that Pakistan lets Taliban militants hide out and launch attacks into Afghanistan. Musharraf says Karzai has bad information and notes that Pakistan has deployed 80,000 troops along the porous border.

Karzai says Musharraf turns a blind eye to hatred and extremism being bred at Islamic schools in Pakistan. At one point, Musharraf said Karzai is behaving "like an ostrich," refusing to acknowledge the truth and trying to shore up his political standing at home.

DOJ_NMG_0070863

Right up to Wednesday night's White House dinner, they also have pointed fingers at one another over al-Qaida's Osama bin Laden and other terror leaders. Each says bin Laden isn't hiding in his country and suggests the other might do more to help find him.

The heated accusations had put the White House in the middle, and Bush clearly thought it was time to clear the air.

Standing between the pair, Bush emphasized "the need to cooperate, to make sure that people have got a hopeful future" in both countries.

The Afghan and Pakistani leaders stood stiffly on either side of Bush as he spoke without notes or a lectern. Musharraf was tightlipped, hands clasped awkwardly before him. Karzai nodded agreeably as Bush spoke. Neither of the foreign leaders spoke.

"Today's dinner is a chance for us to strategize together" and find common solutions, Bush said.

Speaking in London Thursday, where he traveled after his U.S. visit, Musharraf said, "The meeting that I held with President Bush and Hamid Karzai last night was very good. It was decided that we should have a common strategy. We have to fight terrorism. We have to defeat it, defeat it jointly."

The session came as Afghanistan suffers its worst reversals since the U.S.-led ouster of the extremist Taliban regime nearly five years ago.

The Taliban militants have regrouped and launched an offensive earlier this year whose strength and organization took Afghan and U.S. officials by surprise. They have adopted methods commonly used by militants in Iraq: suicide bombings, ambushes and beheadings.

Illegal opium production has risen yearly despite billions of dollars spent to suppress it, and Afghanistan is now the source of more than 90 percent of the world's supply.

Afghan, Pakistani Leaders Plan Visits (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, September 29, 2006

After days of public sniping, the leaders of Afghanistan and Pakistan agreed during dinner with President Bush to meet three times in an attempt to end violence in the region.

President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf will attend two gatherings of tribal elders, one on each side of the border, Afghan Ambassador Said T. Jawad told The Washington Times.

Both presidents are also to meet a third time, probably in Islamabad, Pakistan, said Mr. Jawad, who described their willingness to talk as "crucial."

A Wednesday night dinner with President Bush at the White House started off "tense" after a bout of name-calling in television interviews but apparently ended on a friendly note.

Mr. Bush "played a very constructive role in emphasizing that cooperation will benefit Afghanistan, Pakistan and global security," said the Afghan ambassador, who attended the dinner.

"It is an important achievement. The result will depend on how these decisions are implemented," Mr. Jawad said.

Pakistan Embassy spokesman Akram Shaheedi confirmed the meetings would take place. Both officials said a timetable had not been fixed for the meetings.

The leaders' commitment to work jointly on a solution to regional Taliban-led terrorism ended months of mutual accusations and recriminations as to the roots and backing of terrorists operating in Afghanistan.

Gen. Musharraf on Sept. 5 signed a peace agreement with pro-Taliban tribal leaders in Pakistan's North Waziristan border area in an effort to halt cross-border attacks.

Violence in the area has since escalated, and critics have slammed the deal as Pakistan's ceding military control over a region used by terrorists as a staging area for attacks in Afghanistan.

"There has been an increase in activity, certainly along the border region, especially in the southeast areas [in Afghanistan] across from North Waziristan," U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. John Paradis told a press conference covered by the Reuters news agency.

DOJ_NMG_0070864

Mr. Jawad said the new tribal "jirgas" or council meetings would differ from the agreement between Pakistan and specific tribal groups along the border.

"We want tribal leaders on both sides of the border, not where the Taliban are based, but tribal leaders from both sides," he said.

"This is a long fight against terror -- it will require strong continued commitment, and it is in the mutual interest of Afghanistan and Pakistan to reach that objective as soon as possible," the ambassador said.

A document by a senior researcher at the British Defense Academy leaked in London accused Pakistan's Inter-services Intelligence (ISI) agency of indirectly supporting terrorist groups, including al Qaeda, the Associated Press reported.

Gen. Musharraf rejected the accusations, telling the British Broadcasting Corp. that his intelligence service had enabled the arrest of almost 700 terror suspects.

"ISI is a disciplined force, breaking the back of al Qaeda," said Gen. Musharraf, who is on a book tour for his memoirs.

He flew to London yesterday, where he met for two hours with Prime Minister Tony Blair.

The document was part of a private review of global efforts to combat terrorism, Associated Press reported, and according to Britain's Ministry of Defense did not represent the views of the ministry or the British government.

Nevertheless, the British document closely paralleled the U.S. National Intelligence Estimate, parts of which were declassified earlier this week in response to media leaks.

The NIE called the Iraq war a "cause celebre" for Islamic terrorism and said that despite U.S. troops' wreaking serious damage on al Qaeda leadership, the number of terrorists is spreading in number and geographic dispersion.

Mr. Jawad said the tone of Wednesday's 21/2 hour White House dinner was cordial and constructive, although he acknowledged that it had started off a little "tense."

"They shook hands, and some of the participants shared cigars," said Mr. Jawad. "It was very friendly."

Afghanistan is experiencing the worst rise in terrorist violence since the U.S.-led 2001 fall of the Taliban government, with attacks on the border area of Pakistan tripling in some areas, according to U.S. officials.

NATO agreed yesterday to take command of peacekeeping in all of Afghanistan next month after the United States pledged to transfer an extra 12,000 troops to its force, Reuters reported.

Pentagon officials said the transfer of troops currently in Afghanistan's eastern region would entail the biggest deployment of U.S. troops under foreign command since World War II.

In Britain, Musharraf Is Questioned On Terror Ties (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 28 — President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan arrived here on Thursday and found himself facing accusations that his country's intelligence service had indirect ties to Al Qaeda and that his government committed widespread human rights abuses as an ally of the United States in its effort to curb terrorism.

He arrived after a rocky visit in Washington, where President Bush used a White House dinner to try to mediate between the Pakistani leader and President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan over their mutual accusations of responsibility for the resurgence of the Taliban, Afghanistan's former rulers.

Although the two leaders did not shake hands in public, General Musharraf indicated in remarks broadcast live on Pakistani television on Thursday that some tensions had eased. "The meeting that I held with President Bush and Hamid Karzai last night was very good," he said, according to The Associated Press. "It was decided that we should have a common strategy. We have to fight terrorism. We have to defeat it, defeat it jointly."

A report of a leaked document, which said that Pakistan's intelligence service indirectly supported the Taliban, played into the argument over the growing insurgency in Afghanistan, where Britain and the United States have sent forces. The document was said by the BBC to have originated in Britain's Defense Academy, a research agency sponsored by the Ministry of Defense.

Separately, Amnesty International, the human rights group, accused Pakistan of abuses, including the torture of terrorism suspects and the illegal transfer of detainees to the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0070865

Britain's Defense Ministry did not challenge the authenticity of the leaked document, but it said that the paper did not represent official policy and was part of academic research. The document, details of which were broadcast Wednesday night on BBC television, was quoted as saying that indirectly, Pakistan, through the security agency, "has been supporting terrorism and extremism, whether in London on 7/7," the date when suicide bombers attacked three subway trains and a double-decker bus last year, "or in Afghanistan or Iraq." It said Pakistan's security services played a "dual role," combating terrorism while at the same time promoting an Islamic coalition called Mutahida Majlis-e-Amal "and so indirectly supporting the Taliban."

"Pakistan is not currently stable but on the edge of chaos," the document said, urging the dismantling of the security service. Echoing a recent American intelligence assessment, parts of which were declassified this week, it also said the war in Iraq "has served to radicalize an already disillusioned youth, and Al Qaeda has given them the will, intent, purpose and ideology to act."

Before he arrived in London, General Musharraf took strong exception to the leaked document. The security agency, he said, "is a disciplined force, breaking the back of Al Qaeda," he told the BBC. He is to deliver a speech in Oxford on Friday after meeting Thursday evening with Mr. Blair at Chequers, the British prime minister's country retreat, west of London.

After the two-hour meeting, Mr. Blair's spokesman said the prime minister had assured General Musharraf that the leaked document did not represent official British policy.

In its report released late Thursday, Amnesty International said Pakistan had "committed numerous human rights violations as a result of its cooperation in the U.S.-led 'war on terror.' "

"Hundreds of people have been arbitrarily detained," it said.

In response to the report, a Pakistani Foreign Ministry spokeswoman, Tasneem Aslam, said, "As far as detentions go, yes, people have been detained, but we have a challenge, we have to weigh the costs."

"It's a tough call not only for Pakistan, but for all countries fighting terrorism," she said. "It is a challenge to strike a balance; while we respect individual rights, we have to prevent terrorist acts."

Blair, Musharraf Pledge To Fight Terror (AP)

By Jennifer Quinn

AP, September 28, 2006

The leaders of Britain and Pakistan pledged their commitment Thursday to defeating insurgents in Afghanistan, brushing aside a leaked British military document that claimed Islamabad's security forces are indirectly supporting terrorist groups.

Prime Minister Tony Blair and President Gen. Pervez Musharraf met for two hours, with both reinforcing their support of a NATO-led mission to support the Kabul government, a Blair spokesman said.

The meeting, at Chequers, Blair's official country residence west of London, followed Musharraf's visit to Washington, where he held talks with President Bush and Afghan leader Hamid Karzai.

Thursday's meeting had threatened to be overshadowed by a military document obtained by the British Broadcasting Corp. in which a senior officer maintained Pakistan's Directorate of Inter Services Intelligence — the country's top spy agency — should be dismantled.

The broadcaster reported the document was written by an unidentified senior researcher at the Defense Academy, a defense ministry think-tank and college.

It said the author was also linked to the intelligence services and the document was part of a private British review of efforts across the world to combat terrorism.

Musharraf rejected that allegations that its security forces had indirectly supported terrorist groups and raised the issue with Blair during their meeting.

"The president accepted that document is not government policy, so there was no further need to discuss it," said a spokesman for Blair's office, speaking on condition of anonymity in line with policy.

He said Blair also assured Musharraf that British troops would remain in Afghanistan for the "long term," as part of the NATO mission.

DOJ_NMG_0070866

Musharraf told Blair he recognized the need to continue working to reduce the amount of cross-border activity between Pakistan and Afghanistan.

Britain's defense ministry said the material obtained by the BBC was in no way a report or a policy statement.

Instead, the papers were merely research notes taken by an academic to reflect material seen or collected from a variety of sources — not a collection of facts meant to influence the government's position or policies, a ministry spokeswoman said, speaking on customary condition of anonymity in line with department policy.

The BBC quoted the document as saying that "indirectly, Pakistan (through the ISI) has been supporting terrorism and extremism — whether in London on (July 7, 2005) or in Afghanistan or Iraq."

It reported that the document said "Pakistan is not currently stable but on the edge of chaos."

The defense ministry spokeswoman, reading a strongly worded ministry statement, said the "academic research notes quoted in no way represent the views of either the MoD (defense ministry) or the government."

"To represent it as such is deeply irresponsible and the author is furious that his notes have been willfully misrepresented in this manner," the statement said.

"He suspects that they have been released to the BBC precisely in the hope that they would cause damage to our relations with Pakistan."

The ministry reiterated Britain's long-standing position that Pakistan is a key ally in the fight against terrorism.

Musharraf called the intelligence agency a critical player in the war on terror and said its work had led to the arrests of 680 suspected terrorists.

Following his Washington meetings, he said it was decided Afghanistan and Pakistan should have better intelligence coordination and interaction to meet the challenges of fighting militants. But a news conference following a dinner revealed a frosty relationship between the leaders, with Karzai and Musharraf not shaking hands with each other, after shaking hands with Bush.

When Hamid Met Pervez (NYT)

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

It will take more than a shared dinner at the White House to get Presidents Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan and Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan to think and say nice things about each other. Their quarrel is no mere war of words in competing press interviews. It is about the real war being waged on Afghan soil by a revitalized Taliban, which recruits fighters in Pakistan and sends them almost unimpeded across a shared border.

General Musharraf says he is doing his best to stop this infiltration. But his best has been strikingly ineffective, considering the powers he wields as a military dictator, accountable only to his fellow Pakistani generals.

His latest move on the Taliban front was discouraging, to say the very least. This month he agreed to a cease-fire deal with tribal allies of the Taliban in North Waziristan, the border region of Pakistan where Al Qaeda leaders, including Osama bin Laden, are thought to be holed up.

The agreement grants such foreign fighters the right to remain so long as local Taliban forces do not attack Pakistani soldiers and promise they will not cross into Afghanistan. As part of this understanding, Pakistani military checkpoints in the area are being dismantled.

President Karzai is understandably unhappy about this. President Bush should be too. Those Taliban fighters crossing into Afghanistan are not just killing Afghans. They are also killing American and NATO troops in growing numbers. This isn't the first time General Musharraf has put domestic concerns ahead of the larger fight against international terrorism. He is still a useful American ally in that fight, but a dangerously selective one.

It would be overly simplistic to blame General Musharraf alone for Afghanistan's increasingly perilous situation. In its hurry to move on to Iraq, the Bush administration never committed enough troops to establish the security needed for redevelopment and democracy to take root. And it has been too stingy with the kind of long-term development aid required to consolidate popular support.

DOJ_NMG_0070867

Mr. Karzai, for his part, has been far too indulgent of corruption and drug trafficking. And, in the hope of extending his authority beyond Kabul, he has made damaging deals with brutal warlords.

Now that the dinner is over, Mr. Bush needs to focus on the real problems of Afghan security and reconstruction. And he needs to remind General Musharraf that the very minimum America expects of its allies is that they not concede any form of sanctuary to such sworn enemies of the United States as the Taliban and Al Qaeda.

The Musharraf Exception (WSJ)

By Robert L. Pollock

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

Pervez Musharraf is America's favorite dictator. The Bush administration seems to consider the Pakistani general -- who took power in a 1999 military coup -- an indispensable ally, and has yet to publicly pressure him on the democracy front. Democrats and foreign policy thinkers of the "realist" school seem equally comfortable with the idea of Gen. Musharraf running Pakistan for the indefinite future. Indeed, if the purpose of the general's new autobiography -- "In the Line of Fire" -- was to win American sympathy ahead of an attempt to fiddle with next year's presidential election, he probably needn't have bothered.

A recent meeting of the Musharraf fan club took place at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York, where Gen. Musharraf gave brief remarks and took questions as he launched his book tour on Monday night. He was treated to standing ovations that exceeded mere politeness as he entered and left the hall. Not one questioner raised the democracy issue. And if the moderator -- former Clinton Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin -- was curious, he didn't let on. He was too busy extolling Gen. Musharraf's wisdom and the fact that he has been kind enough to employ as prime minister Mr. Rubin's ex-Citibank colleague, Shaukat Aziz.

Even among the "neocon" architects of President Bush's democracy-promotion agenda it's hard to find an unkind word about Gen. Musharraf, as I discovered while spending several days last year in Islamabad with former Undersecretary of Defense Doug Feith. Behind this bipartisan support -- or at least acceptance -- is Pakistan's nuclear arsenal, and the perception that Gen. Musharraf is the only thing standing in the way of its takeover by a radical Islamic government. But there are good reasons to doubt this perception, and to suspect that allowing a permanent "Musharraf Exception" to the democracy agenda will do more harm than good.

On the plus side of the Musharraf ledger is, indeed, the obvious fact that the man with the keys to Pakistan's bombs is not a raving Islamic fanatic. He has been an ally -- of convenience, at least -- in the fight against al Qaeda. And his rule, while autocratic, is not oppressive. With a smart and vibrant free press, Pakistan undoubtedly passes what Condoleezza Rice has called the "public square test" -- a fancy way of saying you can speak your mind without fear of being carted away by the cops.

At the same time, however, Gen. Musharraf suffers from his lack of legitimacy among the secular classes who have run Pakistan's democratic governments in the past, and who would almost surely win if another free poll is held. The Islamists got only 11% in the last parliamentary election, but the general is increasingly courting them as he attempts to hold power -- which may be one reason his antiterror efforts haven't included any attempts to crack down on the madrassas. For the same reason, Pakistan's efforts to control Taliban elements operating within its borders seem half-hearted. And when confronted with a question about this at the Council Monday night, Gen. Musharraf launched into an ethnocentric diatribe about supporting Afghanistan's Pashtun majority. Never mind that Afghan President Hamid Karzai is a Pashtun. Gen. Musharraf went on at length about the apparently unseemly fact that the late anti-Taliban leader Ahmed Shah Massoud -- a "minority" Tajik, he kept pointing out -- is revered in Kabul.

More broadly, Gen. Musharraf used his Council on Foreign Relations remarks to criticize the Bush administration's broader war on terror. "I feel that we are only using the instrument of the military to combat terrorism," he said, ignoring the democracy agenda. And what does he think the root cause of terrorism is? "Palestine is the core issue," he said, repeatedly. The audience could have been forgiven for thinking it was listening to the tired rhetoric of someone like Hosni Mubarak. But then, Gen. Musharraf seems increasingly like Mr. Mubarak, and less like the modernizer preparing Pakistan for a return to democracy that he claims to be.

DOJ_NMG_0070868

Don't get me wrong. Your humble correspondent is under no illusions about the feasibility of immediate democratic revolutions in every country of the Islamic world. But equally, let's have no illusions about Pervez Musharraf. He took power illegitimately in a country with some history of democracy, however imperfect. And now he seems to be in no hurry to give it up. The Bush Doctrine can survive the Musharraf Exception over the short run. But over the longer term, the credibility of our efforts to address the root causes of terror will require nudging Pakistan, too, back toward the democratic path.

Mr. Pollock is a member of the Journal's editorial board.

Rumsfeld Comments On Intelligence Report (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, September 28, 2006

It is impossible to know with any precision whether the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have created more terrorists than they've killed, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Thursday.

In his first extensive remarks about a recent U.S. intelligence report saying the threat of terrorism has risen, Rumsfeld told reporters at a NATO meeting that, in general, the value of intelligence reports can be uneven, and "sometimes it's just flat wrong."

But he added that, "the implication that if you stop killing or capturing people who are trying to kill you, then therefore the world would be a better place, is obviously nonsensical."

In the much-discussed National Intelligence Estimate initially reported last weekend, the government's top analysts concluded that Iraq has become a "cause celebre" for jihadists, who are growing in number and geographic reach. If the trend continues, they said, the risks to the U.S. interests at home and abroad surely will grow.

Rumsfeld did not specifically criticize or address the controversial intelligence report, but instead commented more broadly about the terrorist question that has gripped the political world since the report was disclosed last week.

"Are more terrorists being created in the world? We don't know. The world doesn't know," said Rumsfeld, adding that there are no good ways to measure "The world doesn't know. There aren't good ways to measure how many terrorists are being trained at camps around the world."

Disclosure of the classified report, and Bush's subsequent move to make public portions of it, has had broad political ramifications.

For Republicans, the report provides more evidence that Iraq is central to the war on terrorism and can't be abandoned without giving jihadists a crucial victory. And for Democrats, it furthers their argument that the 2003 Iraq invasion has inflamed anti-U.S. sentiments in the Muslim world and left the U.S. less safe.

Rumsfeld said any specific comments on the report should come from Bush. But he added that while it's hard to know how many terrorist are being created, officials have a better idea how many have been killed or captured.

On Thursday the new leader of al-Qaida in Iraq purportedly said in an audio message posted online that more than 4,000 foreign militants have been killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003 — the first apparent acknowledgment from the insurgents about their losses.

Rumsfeld also said there are multiple groups of extremists whose goal is to murder and terrorize free people and their goal is to topple any Muslim regime that disagrees with them and replace them with extremists.

"Ultimately they will fail," said Rumsfeld, adding that "anyone who thinks there is a single answer or a single reason, or a silver bullet that's going to solve the problem can't be right, its too complex... It's going to take time and its going to take a lot of work by people who are patient and believe in freedom."

Rumsfeld was attending a NATO defense ministers meeting here. During the meeting, the ministers approved extending NATO's control of military operations across all of Afghanistan — a move that Rumsfeld hailed as a "bold step forward" for the alliance.

Under the new arrangements, as many as 12,000 additional American troops will be put under foreign battlefield command, a number that U.S. officials said could be the most since World War II.

Rumsfeld Says Its Not Possible To Tell If Jihadist Ranks Are Growing (AFP)

AFP, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070869

Calling US intelligence uneven and "sometimes just flat wrong," US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said it is not possible to tell whether the ranks of Islamic extremists are growing or not.

Rumsfeld weighed in for the first time on a US intelligence estimate that warned that the war in Iraq has become a "cause celebre" for Islamic radicals, causing the ranks of "jihadists" to swell and disperse geographically.

Rumsfeld avoided direct comment on the key findings of the national intelligence estimate which were declassified on White House orders this week amid a political storm over its findings.

Instead, he said spoke in general terms about intelligence shortcomings that undercut the value of the reports.

"Every day people in policy positions get stacks like this of intelligence reports. Their value is uneven," he said at a press conference, using his hands to indicate the size of the stack.

"Their information is often qualified 'as one the one hand this, on the other hand that' because it is a difficult business," he said.

The reports are based on a wide range of sources from the public records to classified information to intelligence shared by allies in the US-led "global war on terrorism," he said.

"And frankly sometimes it's just flat wrong. It turns out not to be right. That's fair enough, too," he said.

Asking himself whether more terrorists were being created, Rumsfeld said: "We don't know. The world doesn't know."

"Over time how will they do? They will fail. Ultimately they will fail. In any given day, any given week, any given month, is the pool going up or down?" he said.

"The implication that if you stop killing or capturing the people who are trying to kill you that therefore the world would be a better place is obviously nonsensical," he said.

"On the other hand, it is not possible to know the answer to the question as to any given event," he said, referring to Iraq's impact on jihadist fortunes.

"There are multiple forces and anyone who thinks that there is a single answer or a single reason or a silver bullet that is going to solve the problem can't be right because it's not possible," he said.

Of Course Iraq Made It Worse (WP)

By Daniel Benjamin And Steven Simon

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

The declassified judgments from the National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism caused a stir in the political world this week, but for most -- we would guess almost all -- scholars of jihadist terrorism, they are largely uncontroversial. The war in Iraq, the lack of reform in the Muslim world and anger at its endemic corruption and injustice, the pervasiveness of anti-Western sentiment -- all these have long been identified as major drivers of radical Islamist terror.

What's striking, instead, is that anyone could still disagree with this assessment of the role of Iraq, as President Bush and commentators such as Robert Kagan ["More Leaks, Please," op-ed, Sept. 26] have done. It's a shame that more of the document wasn't released, because none of the evidence or argumentation to support the claim that Iraq has added fuel to the jihadist fire was included. And there's no good reason most or all of it shouldn't be released.

In fact, though, you don't need an NIE to demonstrate the most controversial judgment -- that the war in Iraq has worsened the terrorist threat. The official coordinated evaluation by Britain's domestic security and foreign intelligence services noted that "the conflict in Iraq has exacerbated the threat from international terrorism and will continue to have an impact in the long term." This conclusion is echoed by interior ministries, law enforcement agencies and intelligence services in every part of the world.

Since the United States invaded Iraq, there has been a significant increase in the number of people committed to the jihadist cause. There is, of course, no turnstile counting those hopping aboard the jihadist train, as the NIE excerpt concedes. Demands for an unattainable precision on this aren't realistic.

Although jihadist activity is burgeoning around the world, many of the new recruits can be grouped into three categories. The first are the "homegrown" terrorists who may have little connection to al-Qaeda or other existing groups but who have been won over by the ideas of Osama bin Laden and his followers. Self-starters have appeared not only in Madrid, Leeds and London but also in Canada, the Maghreb, the Middle East and Pakistan.

DOJ_NMG_0070870

Some question whether these people have really been spurred by Iraq. Just as President Bush urges that we take the terrorists at their word about their wish to create a new caliphate, we take them at their word about their motivation: Iraq has been crucial. The Madrid bombers were explicit about their desire to punish Spain for its support of the United States in Iraq; friends and neighbors recounted that those who bombed the London subway system were obsessed with Iraq. And time and again, investigators have found that these new recruits hoarded Internet videos packed with scenes of violence from Iraq -- part of a narrative of heroic defiance that is deeply compelling to some young Muslims.

The two other categories of recruits are centered in Iraq itself. One consists of the foreign fighters, who, it turns out, are not the remnants of al-Qaeda that the administration believed would flock to their doom in Iraq. According to both Saudi and Israeli scholars who have studied the biographies of foreign fighters killed in Iraq, very few had prior experience of Islamic radicalism. They were drawn by their perception that the indignity of Iraqi occupation had to be fought.

The final category is Iraqi jihadists. There were virtually none in Iraq before the invasion. Now Sunni insurgent organizations espousing jihadism are dominated by Iraqis, who number in the thousands. As the NIE judgments suggest, those groups, which have already carried out bombings in Jordan, are likely to look for more targets outside Iraq.

The terrorists are increasing not only in numbers but also in lethality. As leaked government reports and expert analyses have observed, jihadists have been able to improve their bombmaking and urban warfare skills in Iraq in a way they could not in Afghanistan. A Marine intelligence report indicated last month that they have also acquired a sanctuary in Anbar province that the United States is probably incapable of destroying.

Defenders of the war in Iraq, such as Vice President Cheney, contend that since the United States has not been hit since Sept. 11, the threat cannot be growing. In fact, the terrorists understand that for now it is easier to kill Americans in Iraq than in America, and at this they have succeeded. After the Heathrow plot to destroy U.S.-bound commercial jets and the disclosure of a homegrown cell next-door in Canada, suggesting that the danger is subsiding bespeaks obliviousness or denial.

Then there is the claim that Iraq has not had a catalytic effect because the terrorists were already after us, an argument the president repeated Tuesday. "We weren't in Iraq when we got attacked on September the 11th. . . . We weren't in Iraq when they first attacked the World Trade Center in 1993."

No doubt the United States would have had a serious struggle against radical Islam after Sept. 11 under any circumstances. But the occupation of Iraq, by appearing to confirm bin Laden's arguments about America's antipathy toward the Muslim world, has had an incendiary effect and made matters dramatically worse.

The invasion of Iraq was the wrong answer to the terrorist challenge, for which we will pay a high price for years to come. The continued need to defend that move by the administration and its partisans is preventing the nation from crafting the necessary strategy to meet the terrorist challenge and make Americans safer. The evidence is at hand.

Daniel Benjamin is a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. Steven Simon is a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations. They served on the National Security Council staff from 1994 to 1999.

U.N.: Al-Qaida Activity In Iraq May Drop (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, September 28, 2006

Al-Qaida's activity in Iraq may diminish as violence escalates and distinctions blur between sectarian attacks, criminal acts and the fight against Iraqi and non-Iraqi forces, according to a U.N. report.

In Afghanistan, the report said, Taliban rebels continue to benefit from a close relationship with al-Qaida and other foreign terrorist groups. As an example, it said, "new explosive devices are now used in Afghanistan within a month of their first appearing in Iraq."

The report by terrorism experts working for the U.N. Security Council committee monitoring sanctions against the Taliban and al-Qaida painted a grim picture of escalating violence and the spread of attacks.

"While the Taliban have not been found fighting outside Afghanistan/Pakistan, there have been reports of them training in both Iraq and Somalia," it said. Al-Qaida, however, is not only operating in Iraq but many attacks elsewhere have promoted al-Qaida objectives, "even if mounted by unconnected groups or individuals with narrowed sectarian or political aims."

DOJ_NMG_0070871

Security Council members discussed the report Thursday. Afterward, Argentina's U.N. Ambassador Cesar Mayoral, who chairs the committee, urged all countries to provide additional names of individuals and entities linked to the Taliban and al-Qaida to bolster the list of those subject to sanctions.

In the last six months, the experts said, "the violence in Afghanistan has increased considerably, and there has been no let up in Iraq, with al-Qaida's contribution remaining disproportionate to its size." A U.S.-led invasion ousted Afghanistan's Taliban-led regime in late 2001.

But as Iraq "continues to slide towards civil war, al-Qaida may paradoxically see more losses than gains," the experts' report said.

"It has gained by continuing to play a central role in the fighting and in encouraging the growth of sectarian violence; and Iraq has provided many recruits and an excellent training ground," it said.

But the experts said "the prominent role of al-Qaida may diminish as the violence escalates between communities, and distinctions blur between sectarian attacks on markets and places of worship, or purely criminal kidnapping and protection rackets on the one hand, and the fight against Iraqi and non-Iraqi forces on the other."

Also on the down side for al-Qaida, the report said several intelligence and security agencies told the experts that fewer foreign fighters have been killed or captured in Iraq in recent months, "suggesting that the flow has slackened." On returning home, they noted that some fighters had expressed dissatisfaction that they were asked to kill fellow Muslims rather than foreign soldiers and that the only role for them was to be suicide bombers.

The new leader of al-Qaida in Iraq purportedly said in an audio message posted online Thursday that more than 4,000 foreign militants have been killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003 — the first apparent acknowledgment from the insurgents about their losses.

The Internet message was posted by a man who identified himself as Abu Hamza al-Muhajir — also known as Abu Ayyub al-Masri — the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq. The voice could not be independently identified.

The U.N. experts said some intelligence officials believe al-Muhajir "is in fact an Egyptian veteran who became an explosives expert in Afghanistan before spending time in Lebanon and Yemen."

"If so, while this will continue to provide al-Qaida in Iraq with links to external groups, his appointment may give rise to further tensions between a `foreign' leader and the Iraqi regional commanders," they said.

The report cited the deaths of al-Qaida in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, Chechen warlord Shamil Basayev, who masterminded the 2004 school hostage-taking in Beslan, Russia, and other significant losses in Afghanistan and Iraq.

"There have been many arrests and disrupted plots, only some of which have been announced publicly," the report added, without elaborating.

Despite serious damage to al-Qaida's leadership, however, Taliban gains in Afghanistan are evident in the surge of violence that has led to more than 2,000 deaths between January and July, the experts said.

"While ideological support for the Taliban may be low, high levels of unemployment, poverty, hunger, illiteracy, and a general sense of insecurity have made farmers vulnerable to Taliban inducements on the one hand and intimidation on the other," they said.

"By murdering non-Taliban imams, school teachers and tribal and community leaders who might have encouraged a new generation of Afghans to believe in the possibility of peace, the Taliban have managed to undermine earlier progress and have further highlighted the huge problems that face the Afghan government," it said.

In July 2005, the Security Council unanimously adopted a resolution to clamp down on terrorist financing and expand sanctions to affiliates and splinter groups of al-Qaida and the Taliban.

Sanctions require all 192 U.N. member states to freeze financial assets and impose a travel ban and arms embargo against Afghanistan's former Taliban leaders, Osama bin Laden and al-Qaida and those "associated with" them. At the end of July, the list had 478 names.

Book Says Bush Ignored Urgent Warning On Iraq (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

DOJ_NMG_0070872

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 28 — The White House ignored an urgent warning in September 2003 from a top Iraq adviser who said that thousands of additional American troops were desperately needed to quell the insurgency there, according to a new book by Bob Woodward, the Washington Post reporter and author. The book describes a White House riven by dysfunction and division over the war.

The warning is described in "State of Denial," scheduled for publication on Monday by Simon & Schuster. The book says President Bush's top advisers were often at odds among themselves, and sometimes were barely on speaking terms, but shared a tendency to dismiss as too pessimistic assessments from American commanders and others about the situation in Iraq.

As late as November 2003, Mr. Bush is quoted as saying of the situation in Iraq: "I don't want anyone in the cabinet to say it is an insurgency. I don't think we are there yet."

Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld is described as disengaged from the nuts-and-bolts of occupying and reconstructing Iraq — a task that was initially supposed to be under the direction of the Pentagon — and so hostile toward Condoleezza Rice, then the national security adviser, that President Bush had to tell him to return her phone calls. The American commander for the Middle East, Gen. John P. Abizaid, is reported to have told visitors to his headquarters in Qatar in the fall of 2005 that "Rumsfeld doesn't have any credibility anymore" to make a public case for the American strategy for victory in Iraq.

The book, bought by a reporter for The New York Times at retail price in advance of its official release, is the third that Mr. Woodward has written chronicling the inner debates in the White House after the Sept. 11 attacks, the invasion of Afghanistan, and the subsequent decision to invade Iraq. Like Mr. Woodward's previous works, the book includes lengthy verbatim quotations from conversations and describes what senior officials are thinking at various times, without identifying the sources for the information.

Mr. Woodward writes that his book is based on "interviews with President Bush's national security team, their deputies, and other senior and key players in the administration responsible for the military, the diplomacy, and the intelligence on Iraq." Some of those interviewed, including Mr. Rumsfeld, are identified by name, but neither Mr. Bush nor Vice President Dick Cheney agreed to be interviewed, the book says.

Robert D. Blackwill, then the top Iraq adviser on the National Security Council, is said to have issued his warning about the need for more troops in a lengthy memorandum sent to Ms. Rice. The book says Mr. Blackwill's memorandum concluded that more ground troops, perhaps as many as 40,000, were desperately needed.

It says that Mr. Blackwill and L. Paul Bremer III, then the top American official in Iraq, later briefed Ms. Rice and Stephen J. Hadley, her deputy, about the pressing need for more troops during a secure teleconference from Iraq. It says the White House did nothing in response.

The book describes a deep fissure between Colin L. Powell, Mr. Bush's first secretary of state, and Mr. Rumsfeld: When Mr. Powell was eased out after the 2004 elections, he told Andrew H. Card Jr., the White House chief of staff, that "if I go, Don should go," referring to Mr. Rumsfeld.

Mr. Card then made a concerted effort to oust Mr. Rumsfeld at the end of 2005, according to the book, but was overruled by President Bush, who feared that it would disrupt the coming Iraqi elections and operations at the Pentagon.

Vice President Cheney is described as a man so determined to find proof that his claim about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq was accurate that, in the summer of 2003, his aides were calling the chief weapons inspector, David Kay, with specific satellite coordinates as the sites of possible caches. None resulted in any finds.

Two members of Mr. Bush's inner circle, Mr. Powell and the director of central intelligence, George J. Tenet, are described as ambivalent about the decision to invade Iraq. When Mr. Powell assented, reluctantly, in January 2003, Mr. Bush told him in an Oval Office meeting that it was "time to put your war uniform on," a reference to his many years in the Army.

Mr. Tenet, the man who once told Mr. Bush that it was a "slam-dunk" that weapons of mass destruction existed in Iraq, apparently did not share his qualms about invading Iraq directly with Mr. Bush, according to Mr. Woodward's account.

Mr. Woodward's first two books about the Bush administration, "Bush at War" and "Plan of Attack," portrayed a president firmly in command and a loyal, well-run team responding to a surprise attack and the retaliation that followed. As its title indicates,

DOJ_NMG_0070873

"State of Denial" follows a very different storyline, of an administration that seemed to have only a foggy notion that early military success in Iraq had given way to resentment of the occupiers.

The 537-page book describes tensions among senior officials from the very beginning of the administration. Mr. Woodward writes that in the weeks before the Sept. 11 attacks, Mr. Tenet believed that Mr. Rumsfeld was impeding the effort to develop a coherent strategy to capture or kill Osama bin Laden. Mr. Rumsfeld questioned the electronic signals from terrorism suspects that the National Security Agency had been intercepting, wondering whether they might be part of an elaborate deception plan by Al Qaeda.

On July 10, 2001, the book says, Mr. Tenet and his counterterrorism chief, J. Cofer Black, met with Ms. Rice at the White House to impress upon her the seriousness of the intelligence the agency was collecting about an impending attack. But both men came away from the meeting feeling that Ms. Rice had not taken the warnings seriously.

In the weeks before the Iraq war began, President Bush's parents did not share his confidence that the invasion of Iraq was the right step, the book recounts. Mr. Woodward writes about a private exchange in January 2003 between Mr. Bush's mother, Barbara Bush, the former first lady, and David L. Boren, a former chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee and a Bush family friend.

The book says Mrs. Bush asked Mr. Boren whether it was right to be worried about a possible invasion of Iraq, and then to have confided that the president's father, former President George H. W. Bush, "is certainly worried and is losing sleep over it; he's up at night worried."

The book describes an exchange in early 2003 between Lt. Gen. Jay Garner, the retired officer Mr. Bush appointed to administer postwar Iraq, and President Bush and others in the White House situation room. It describes senior war planners as having been thoroughly uninterested in the details of the postwar mission.

After General Garner finished his PowerPoint presentation — which included his plan to use up to 300,000 troops of the Iraqi Army to help secure postwar Iraq, the book says — there were no questions from anyone in the situation room, and the president gave him a rousing sendoff.

But it was General Garner who was soon removed, in favor of Mr. Bremer, whose actions in dismantling the Iraqi army and removing Baathists from office were eventually disparaged within the government.

The book suggests that senior intelligence officials were caught off guard in the opening days of the war when Iraqi civilian fighters engaged in suicide attacks against armored American forces, the first hint of the deadly insurgent attacks to come.

In a meeting with Mr. Tenet of the Central Intelligence Agency, several Pentagon officials talked about the attacks, the book says. It says that Mr. Tenet acknowledged that he did not know what to make of them.

Mr. Rumsfeld reached into political matters at the periphery of his responsibilities, according to the book. At one point, Mr. Bush traveled to Ohio, where the Abrams battle tank was manufactured. Mr. Rumsfeld phoned Mr. Card to complain that Mr. Bush should not have made the visit because Mr. Rumsfeld thought the heavy tank was incompatible with his vision of a light and fast military of the future. Mr. Woodward wrote that Mr. Card believed that Mr. Rumsfeld was "out of control."

The fruitless search for unconventional weapons caused tension between Vice President Cheney's office, the C.I.A. and officials in Iraq. Mr. Woodward wrote that Mr. Kay, the chief weapons inspector in Iraq, e-mailed top C.I.A. officials directly in the summer of 2003 with his most important early findings.

At one point, when Mr. Kay warned that it was possible the Iraqis might have had the capability to make such weapons but did not actually produce them, waiting instead until they were needed, the book says he was told by John McLaughlin, the C.I.A.'s deputy director: "Don't tell anyone this. This could be upsetting. Be very careful. We can't let this out until we're sure."

Mr. Cheney was involved in the details of the hunt for illicit weapons, the book says. One night, Mr. Woodward wrote, Mr. Kay was awakened at 3 a.m. by an aide who told him Mr. Cheney's office was on the phone. It says Mr. Kay was told that Mr. Cheney wanted to make sure he had read a highly classified communications intercept picked up from Syria indicating a possible location for chemical weapons.

Mr. Woodward and a colleague, Carl Bernstein, led The Post's reporting during Watergate, and Mr. Woodward has since written a string of best sellers about Washington. More recently, the identity of Mr. Woodward's Watergate source known as Deep Throat was disclosed as having been W. Mark Felt, a senior F.B.I. official.

DOJ_NMG_0070874

In late 2005, Mr. Woodward was subpoenaed by the special prosecutor in the C.I.A. leak case. He also apologized to The Post's executive editor for concealing for more than two years that he had been drawn into the scandal.

Bob Woodward: Bush Misleads On Iraq (CBS)

CBSNews.com, September 28, 2006

(CBS) Veteran Washington reporter Bob Woodward tells Mike Wallace that the Bush administration has not told the truth regarding the level of violence, especially against U.S. troops, in Iraq. He also reveals key intelligence that predicts the insurgency will grow worse next year.

In Wallace's interview with Woodward, to be broadcast on 60 Minutes this Sunday, Oct. 1, at 7 p.m. ET/PT, the reporter also claims that Henry Kissinger is among those advising Mr. Bush.

According to Woodward, insurgent attacks against coalition troops occur, on average, every 15 minutes, a shocking fact the administration has kept secret. "It's getting to the point now where there are eight-, nine-hundred attacks a week. That's more than 100 a day. That is four an hour attacking our forces," says Woodward.

The situation is getting much worse, says Woodward, despite what the White House and the Pentagon are saying in public. "The truth is that the assessment by intelligence experts is that next year, 2007, is going to get worse and, in public, you have the president and you have the Pentagon [saying], 'Oh, no, things are going to get better,'" he tells Wallace. "Now there's public, and then there's private. But what did they do with the private? They stamp it secret. No one is supposed to know," says Woodward.

"The insurgents know what they are doing. They know the level of violence and how effective they are. Who doesn't know? The American public," Woodward tells Wallace.

Woodward also reports that the president and vice president often meet with Henry Kissinger, who was President Richard Nixon's secretary of state, as an adviser. Says Woodward, "Now what's Kissinger's advice? In Iraq, he declared very simply, 'Victory is the only meaningful exit strategy.'" Woodward adds. "This is so fascinating. Kissinger's fighting the Vietnam War again because, in his view, the problem in Vietnam was we lost our will."

President Bush is absolutely certain that he has the U.S. and Iraq on the right course, says Woodward. So certain is the president on this matter, Woodward says, that when Mr. Bush had key Republicans to the White House to discuss Iraq, he told them, "I will not withdraw, even if Laura and Barney are the only ones supporting me."

Woodward reported for two years and interviewed more than 200 people, including top officials in the Bush administration, to learn these and other revelations that he makes in his latest book, State of Denial, published by Simon & Schuster, part of the CBS Corp.

Zarqawi Successor Exhorts Scientists (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 28 -- Al-Qaeda in Iraq's leader, in a chilling audiotape released Thursday, called for nuclear scientists to join his group's holy war and urged insurgents to kidnap Westerners so they could be traded for a blind Egyptian sheik who is serving a life sentence in a U.S. prison.

The fugitive group leader said experts in the fields of "chemistry, physics, electronics, media and all other sciences -- especially nuclear scientists and explosives experts" should join his group's holy war against the West.

"We are in dire need of you," said the speaker, who identified himself as Abu Hamza al-Muhajer -- also known as Abu Ayyub al-Masri. "The field of jihad can satisfy your scientific ambitions, and the large American bases are good places to test your unconventional weapons, whether biological or dirty, as they call them."

The 20-minute audio was posted on a Web site that frequently airs al-Qaeda messages. The voice could not be independently identified, but it was thought to be Muhajer's. He is believed to have succeeded Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was killed in a U.S. airstrike north of Baghdad in June, as head of the al-Qaeda-linked organization.

Thursday's message focused attention on Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, 68, an Egyptian cleric who was convicted in 1995 of seditious conspiracy for his advisory role in a plot to assassinate Egypt's president and blow up five New York City landmarks.

DOJ_NMG_0070875

"I appeal to every holy warrior in the land of Iraq to exert all efforts in this holy month so that God may enable us to capture some of the Western dogs to swap them with our sheik and get him out of his dark prison," said Muhajer, who is also Egyptian.

He also said more than 4,000 foreign militants have been killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003 -- the first known statement from the insurgents about their death toll.

It was unclear why Muhajer would advertise the loss of the group's foreign fighters, but martyrdom is revered among Islamic fundamentalists and could be used as a recruiting tool. Analysts said the announcement was probably a boast aimed at drumming up support.

"It's showing the level of dedication to their cause, the level of sacrifice jihadists are making," said Ben N. Venzke, director of the Alexandria-based IntelCenter, which monitors terrorism communications.

Audiotape Calls For Abduction Of Westerners (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, September 29, 2006

BAGHDAD — An audiotape allegedly from the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq urges followers to kidnap Westerners to barter for the release of a cleric imprisoned for his role in the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, and encourages them to fight on despite the deaths of 4,000 fellow insurgents.

The taped message, posted Thursday on the Internet, says the hostages would be used to force the release of Omar Abdel Rahman, serving a life sentence for his involvement in the first bombing of the Trade Center.

The identity of the speaker, alleged to be Abu Ayyub Masri, also known as Sheik Abu Hamza or "Al Muhajir" to U.S. intelligence officials, could not be independently verified.

The speaker also calls on tribes that have turned against Al Qaeda to rejoin the movement. In translated excerpts provided by the SITE Institute, a privately funded group studying terrorism, the speaker urges Islamic scholars to support Al Qaeda and praises Sunni Arab tribes "who secretly and publicly supported us and provided us with the financing and the men."

After Abu Musab Zarqawi, Masri's predecessor, was killed in a U.S. airstrike in June, and with the subsequent capture of several of his aides, officials said they had disrupted the group. A senior U.S. military official said Wednesday that several tribes in the western province of Al Anbar, a Sunni insurgent stronghold, had begun attacking Al Qaeda fighters.

The tape offers the first acknowledgment of the toll the conflict has had on Al Qaeda fighters. "We fear that our hard work will go to waste because the blood we shed in Iraq was too much — over 4,000 foreign fighters and more than double this number in supporters of good and blessed causes," the speaker says.

The speaker also calls on Muslims with specialized skills to join Al Qaeda:

"My final message is to the people with special qualifications, the highly experienced, the scientists of chemistry and physics, electronics and management, media — all the deep specialties — in particular nuclear scientists and explosive engineering. We say that we badly need you. The jihad battlefield needs your scientific ambitions, and all of the American camps are the best experimental fields for your knowledge."

After Burst Of Violence, As Many As 60 Bodies Are Found In Baghdad (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 28 —As many as 60 bodies, many of them shot in the head at close range and bearing signs of torture, were discovered across the city on Thursday, an Interior Ministry official said.

The death toll was one of the highest in weeks and came as American and Iraqi troops continued to sweep Baghdad's most dangerous neighborhoods in a broad effort to control the capital. Killings of this kind, often driven by sectarian hatred, increased sharply here after the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra in February.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, a United States military spokesman, said Wednesday that such killings and other murders continued to claim more people in Baghdad than suicide bombings. Military officials had predicted a rise in violence with the advent of Ramadan, the holy month that began earlier this week.

DOJ_NMG_0070876

Also on Thursday, an Islamist Internet site posted an audio clip of a man it identified as Hamza al-Muhajir, an Egyptian who the American military has said is Al Qaeda's new chief in Iraq. In the 20-minute clip, the man exhorts fellow Sunni fighters to "work hard in this holy month to capture some Christian dogs," to trade for an Egyptian sheik, Omar Abdel Rahman, who is imprisoned in the United States. Sheik Abdel Rahman, a blind Muslim cleric, was convicted in 1995 of plotting to blow up several New York City landmarks.

He also warned Sunni Arabs who he said had been working with the American occupation to change their ways by the end of Ramadan, considered by Muslims to be the month of forgiveness.

The authenticity of the audio clip could not be immediately verified.

Meanwhile, one of most damaging of several bombings in the capital on Thursday occurred in Shaab, a mostly Shiite neighborhood in northeastern Baghdad that had just been the focus of one of the concentrated sweeps by American and Iraqi troops trying to clear and hold problem-plagued areas as part of a new security plan for the capital.

A car parked near the headquarters of the Iraqi Army unit in the neighborhood exploded as a convoy of Iraqi military vehicles passed, an Interior Ministry official said. The blast, at about 7:15 a.m., killed two Iraqi soldiers and wounded eight others, as well as four civilians.

The blast was the first of several explosions across the city. Another car bomb exploded shortly afterward in Baya, a mixed neighborhood in the southwestern part of the city, killing one resident and wounding four others, the Interior Ministry official said.

A roadside bomb tore into a police patrol in Karada, a commercial district in central Baghdad at 8:30 a.m., wounding two policemen. Forty minutes later, another explosive device blew up in Yarmouk, in the western part of the city, killing a policeman and wounding three civilians.

A car bomb exploded around noon near one of the most popular movie theaters in Baghdad, Al Nasr. When the police arrived at the scene, another bomb went off. In total, four people, two of them police officers, were killed by the explosions, and 10 others were hurt.

There was also violence in the northern city of Kirkuk, where a suicide car bomber slammed into an Iraqi police convoy as it was leaving the American military base, said Col. Aiwa Khursheed, a police official. The explosion killed a policeman and wounded 11 others.

40 Torture Victims Found In Baghdad (AP)

AP, September 28, 2006

The bodies of 40 men who been tortured were found in the capital in a span of 24 hours, police said Thursday. Bombings and shootings killed at least 21 people in and around Baghdad, including five people who died from a car-bomb explosion near a restaurant.

Thirty-four people were wounded in the bombing. Many of them had serious burns, and some were not expected to survive, police Lt. Ali Mohsen said at the Kindi Hospital.

Although the Muslim fasting month of Ramadan is under way, some Iraqis — including Christians — are not abstaining from eating meals during daytime hours.

Two Iraqi soldiers were killed and 10 more injured when a suicide car bomb slammed into a checkpoint in northeast Baghdad, police said. The attack came in the Shaab neighborhood, one that just been cleared by U.S. and Iraqi troops as part of a security drive in the capital.

The bodies of 40 men, more apparent victims of sectarian death squads, have been found dumped in eastern and western Baghdad in the past 24 hours, police said. All showed signs of torture, had been shot, and had their hands and feet bound, police Lt. Thayer Mahmoud said.

Gunmen killed seven people, including five policemen and a woman, in different locations in the province of Diyala just north of Baghdad, police said. Six militants were killed in a shootout between Iraqi soldiers and a truckload of gunmen southwest of the capital, officials said.

Iraq's government warned residents that it will soon restrict vehicle access into the capital as part of a security crackdown targeting militants and death squads.

DOJ_NMG_0070877

The violence also came amid reports from a number of senior coalition military officials that a large and powerful militia run by radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr has been breaking apart into freelance death squads and gangs — some of which are being influenced by Iran.

Al-Sadr's Mahdi army is one of the largest and most powerful militias in Iraq, along with the Badr Brigades, which were once the military wing of Iraq's largest Shiite political group — the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

"There are fractures politically inside Sadr's movement, many of whom don't find him to be sufficiently radical now that he has taken a political course of action," said a senior coalition intelligence official who spoke to reporters in Baghdad on condition of anonymity because he was not permitted to speak publicly on intelligence issues.

The official added that "there have been elements. I can think of about at least six major players who have left his organization because he has been perhaps too accommodating to the coalition."

On Sept. 22, al-Sadr urged his followers not use force against U.S. troops, saying "I want a peaceful war against them and not to shed a drop of blood.

Al-Sadr's ability to control his militia is important both to the U.S. military and an Iraqi government seeking to control and disarm militias and death squads blamed for thousands of sectarian killings in recent months.

Iran has also sought to influence rogue or splinter elements that have broken away from the Mahdi army while it is still able to, the senior intelligence official said.

Chaos Moves Into A Neighborhood Called Liberty (LAT)

By Mohammed Rasheed And Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, September 29, 2006

BAGHDAD — Shiite militiamen kidnapped their brother.

So as the sun went down Wednesday, six of the relatives — all Sunni Arab members of the powerful Mashhadani tribe — picked up their AK-47s and a bomb and headed for the other side of Hurriya, a mixed enclave in northwest Baghdad that used to be a model of peaceful coexistence.

The explosive detonated near the local office of Muqtada Sadr, a firebrand Shiite Muslim cleric whose Al Mahdi militia is accused of killing thousands of Sunnis execution-style in Baghdad.

As the militia fighters ran outside to investigate the explosion, the Mashhadani men rushed into the building, hoping to find their brother.

But the fighters recovered more quickly than the Mashhadanis expected. The militia surrounded the building and killed the rescue party.

Then they dragged two of the bodies into the street and set them on fire.

"They kept them burning until 1 a.m.," said Faraj Mohammed, 30, a Shiite resident.

In Baghdad, where at least 5,100 people died in July and August, there is nothing unusual about the story of the Mashhadani brothers. Mutilated bodies appear daily, often by the dozens, in neighborhoods such as Hurriya, which have been swept into the tide of sectarian violence that washed over the nation with the Feb. 22 bombing of a revered Shiite shrine.

By Thursday morning, Iraqi police had found the bodies of at least 60 more people in Baghdad, most of whom had been shot at close range. Seven people were killed in bombings and shootings Thursday in the capital.

The killings continue even as U.S. and Iraqi forces are conducting a major operation to restore order to the capital. Senior U.S. officials complained to reporters in Baghdad this week about the reluctance of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's Shiite-led government to take decisive action against militias linked to his political base.

U.S. commanders say they expect to reduce the violence eventually, although they acknowledge that they don't have enough troops to secure every problematic area of Baghdad. They blame Maliki's government for failing to deploy an additional 4,000 Iraqi soldiers to the city.

Violence has flared before in Hurriya. A captured Sunni cleric from the neighborhood once confessed on television to killing 80 people there. But several months ago, there were reports that Sunni and Shiite clerics had worked out a cease-fire.

DOJ_NMG_0070878

Hurriya, Arabic for "liberty," is a working-class area known for its inexpensive food markets, tailors and electronics stores, and as the birthplace of famous ballad singers Basil Aziz and Kadhim Saher. Both men now live abroad, and Hurriya's shops are closed.

The neighborhood has 17 offices for rival political groups, including three linked to Sadr. All 17 are guarded by gunmen.

Residents are divided about who started the recent bout of violence, but most interviewed for this article agreed that Sadr's Al Mahdi militia now has the upper hand.

"Shiites are threatening Sunni families and forcing them to leave Hurriya," said Mohammed, the Shiite. "Anyone who doesn't obey will be killed. There used to be a lot of Sunnis in east Hurriya — now there are none."

Adnan Dulaimi, head of the Iraqi Accordance Front, a leading Sunni party that has offices in Hurriya, said 60% of the Sunni families that used to live in the neighborhood have fled.

Dulaimi said Shiite militiamen, some of them dressed in Iraqi army uniforms, attacked one of his party's offices less than two weeks ago. Several residents described a brutal firefight that ended when mortar rounds pounded the party building into ruins and killed two women living nearby.

Dulaimi has since acquired another office and brought in reinforcements to protect it.

"Yes, we have guards, and we have the right to defend ourselves," he said. "But we only have small arms, unlike the attackers who come with heavy weapons and missiles. Even with our simple weapons we were able to repel the attack — until the Iraqi army soldiers tipped the scale."

Residents said that Dulaimi's reinforcements, their rifles at the ready, recently marched through Hurriya's streets in a show of force. The display angered Al Mahdi militia members, who brought in fighters from nearby Shaab, one of the few Shiite neighborhoods targeted in the Baghdad security operation.

U.S. commanders complain that as soon as they move into one neighborhood, gunmen and militia fighters simply move into another.

A Sunni pharmacist who works in Hurriya said she and other business owners had closed their shops to avoid being caught in the crossfire. She said the fighting had peaked over the last four days.

"The worst day was yesterday, when an explosion happened and during the chaos a car passed near the office and shot at the Sadr office, killing four people," said the pharmacist, who asked for anonymity for fear of being killed by one of the warring factions.

"The Sadr people knew where they lived and attacked their houses," she added. "The brothers were killed and their bodies were taken into the street and burned. Then they burned their houses."

Abu Mustafa Saedi, an Al Mahdi militia commander in Hurriya, said his men were defending their community from Sunni terrorists. He said insurgents had attacked the houses of Shiites and driven families from the neighborhood.

"The U.S. forces are close by. But they are just standing still and watching the terrorists attack us," Saedi said. "When we arrest the terrorists and hand them over to the Americans, they release them. That's why the Shiites are striking the terrorists the same way they strike us."

A map provided by the U.S. military Wednesday showed that American and Iraqi forces had conducted operations in Ghazaliya but not in Hurriya, just across the Khair River.

Saedi said Dulaimi's recent show of force had only deepened the animosity toward the Sunnis, but he also said he was confident the conflict would be over soon.

"Hurriya's violence will soon end," he said. "Give us three days. The Mahdi army will clean out the area."

Insurgents Continue To Defy Security Drive (USAT)

By Zaid Sabah And Rick Jervis

USA Today, September 29, 2006

BAGHDAD — An unprecedented wave of violence this week in Baghdad threatens to collapse the U.S. strategy of imposing order on the capital as a first step in stabilizing Iraq, military experts said.

DOJ_NMG_0070879

"We're beginning to lose," said Michael O'Hanlon, a military analyst at the Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank. "This year has been a constant, gradual deterioration … from a starting point that wasn't very good to begin with. We're in bad, bad trouble."

Baghdad was rocked by mortar attacks Thursday. Bombings and shootings, mainly in and around the city, killed at least 23 people.

Police discovered 40 bodies, probably the victims of sectarian reprisal killings. Police Lt. Thayer Mahmoud told the Associated Press the victims had been shot, showed signs of torture and had their hands and feet bound.

Meanwhile Thursday, an audio message attributed to the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq said more than 4,000 foreign insurgents have been killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. The AP reported that the message could not be independently verified but was posted on a website that frequently carries al-Qaeda messages. It would be the first such statement from insurgents about their number of dead in Iraq.

Suicide bombings, death squad murders and other attacks have spiked since Monday, when the Muslim holy month of Ramadan officially began in Iraq, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, said Wednesday. He said suicide attacks have hit a record but didn't provide figures.

The reason for the upsurge in attacks is unclear, but the increase has undermined a massive U.S.-Iraqi security crackdown underway in the capital since summer.

U.S. and Iraqi forces have completed sweeps in about half of Baghdad's neighborhoods, confiscating weapons and arresting suspects. As violence has dropped in secured areas, attacks have risen in other parts of the city, said Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington, a spokesman for U.S. troops in Baghdad.

Charles Pena, a military and security analyst at the Independent Institute, a non-partisan research group based in Oakland, said, "We still don't have a handle on what this insurgency is and who's in it and why."

As part of the joint security drive, the Iraqi government announced it will soon impose traffic restrictions in the city. It also plans to start funneling vehicle traffic into and out of the capital through 28 checkpoints.

Rampaging death squads, some aligned with Shiite political parties in Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's coalition government, have surpassed attacks by Sunni insurgents as the No. 1 cause of civilian deaths, Caldwell said.

Iraqis expressed bitterness at the failure of U.S. and Iraqi forces to control the mayhem. Saad Hassan Saleh, a retired policeman, said he and other Sunnis fear attacks by rogue Interior Ministry police and the Mahdi Army militia of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. "If we defend ourselves, the Interior Ministry will announce that we are terrorists attacking (ministry) police. If we do nothing, we will get tortured and executed like sheep."

The Interior Ministry spokesman, Brig. Gen. Abdel Karim Khalaf al-Kenani, said 1,500 of the ministry's police have been fired in recent days. He disputed Caldwell's statement that attacks in the capital have increased. He said the latest violence "is coming from outside the capital" and accused news organizations of inflating attack and casualty numbers.

At Checkpoints In Baghdad, Disguise Is A Lifesaving Ritual (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Every time he drove, he feared this moment. Now, it was too late.

As Omar Adil Ahmed neared the checkpoint, he recalled, he saw armed men dressed in black ordering passengers out of a minivan and checking their identity cards. Some were told to get back into the van. Others were taken to a Shiite mosque across the street. The gunmen clutched Glock pistols, normally used by the Iraqi police.

Ahmed, 30, was a Sunni Muslim. And he was in Shaab, a volatile, Shiite Muslim-dominated neighborhood. Questions raced through his mind: Was the mosque a base for a Shiite militia? Were the men members of a Shiite death squad?

So Ahmed set in motion a ritual that many Sunnis across a divided Baghdad now practice. He pushed in a cassette tape with Shiite religious songs and turned up the volume. He wrapped a piece of green cloth that he brought from the Imam Ali shrine in Najaf, one of Shiite Islam's holiest sites, around his gearshift.

DOJ_NMG_0070880

And he hung a small picture of Imam Ali, the son-in-law of the prophet Muhammad and the most revered Shiite saint, from his rearview mirror.

To the world outside, he was now a Shiite.

In a city riven by religion, violence and politics, fearful Sunnis and Shiites are hiding their identities to survive. Their differences -- some obvious, most subtle -- have become matters of life or death in ways never before seen in modern Iraq.

As he reached the checkpoint, Ahmed recalled, he was petrified. His wife, his mother and two small daughters were with him in their gray Honda. He pulled out his fake identity card, on which his Sunni tribal name, al-Obeidi, was changed to al-Hussein, a Shiite tribe.

"Deep inside, I was frightened," he said.'What Is Your Sect?'

For centuries, from the Ottoman Empire to the British-installed monarchy to the republic eventually ruled by Saddam Hussein, Sunnis were the elite who got the bulk of government jobs. Shiites, in Hussein's time, were badly persecuted.

Yet in daily life hardly anyone cared about telling Sunnis and Shiites apart. It was considered rude to ask a person's sect, and it is practically impossible to discern from their looks, speech or dress. For generations, the two sects intermarried, making it difficult to differentiate them by surnames. They attended the same schools and lived in mixed neighborhoods.

Now, in the fourth year after a U.S.-led invasion toppled Hussein, a struggle for power is unfolding between Sunnis and Shiites in the political arena and in the streets of Baghdad. Since the bombing of a Shiite mosque in Samarra in February, sectarian strife and lawlessness have escalated.

At checkpoints set up by police or by sectarian militias, Iraqis said in interviews, it is common to hear questions such as "What is your sect?" or "What is your tribal name?" A wrong response could prove deadly.

On July 9, in Baghdad's al-Jihad neighborhood, Shiite militiamen allegedly killed 40 Sunnis after erecting checkpoints and checking identity cards. Three days later, unknown gunmen attacked a bus station in the northeastern town of Muqdadiyah and separated Sunni men from Shiites. They blindfolded and handcuffed the Shiites, then shot them in the head.

"People are basically killed or taken away simply because of their name, their identity or specific affiliations," said Gianni Magazzeni, head of the U.N. human rights office for Iraq.

In Baghdad, it is difficult to tell a real checkpoint from a fake one. Police uniforms and badges are easily available on the black market. Shiite militiamen have infiltrated the Iraqi security forces, while Sunnis have largely remained outside them. Sunni insurgents have set up checkpoints and targeted Shiites.A Fake ID and 12 Tips

"It is like Russian roulette," said Omar al-Azzawi, 33, a tall, broad-shouldered Sunni computer technician, who curled his fingers into the shape of a gun and pressed it against his temple. "I like my country, I like my people. But these days things are really different. To be in Iraq is to tempt fate."

Azzawi said Shiite militiamen abducted his aunt at a checkpoint in July in Baghdad's Shula neighborhood. Three days later, police found her body dumped on a street. Since then, Azzawi has taken measures to protect himself.

From his brown wallet, he pulled out a fake press credential from an Arabic-language newspaper. It cost him $35. On the red and white badge, Omar, a common Sunni name, became Amar, a common Shiite name.

Whenever he enters a Shiite neighborhood, Azzawi slips on a large silver ring worn by many Shiites, especially those considered to be descendants of Muhammad. He also carries a torba , a round piece of clay Shiites use to place their foreheads upon when they bow in prayer.

At work, Azzawi said, he often surfs Web sites to learn more about Shiites and their practices. For instance, he's been learning to recite the 12 imams of the Shiites, in perfect succession. He's heard that Shiite militiamen at checkpoints often use this as a test.

"I don't like to learn something that happened more than a thousand years ago," said Azzawi, who wore black jeans, a black shirt and a thin beard. "But I have to."

One Web site, http://www.iraqirabita.org , offers a 12-point plan for Sunnis to disguise themselves as Shiites. The No. 1 tip: "Get a forged ID card, especially if your name is Omar or Othman."

DOJ_NMG_0070881

Other tips include keeping a poster of Imam Hussein, the grandson of Muhammad, and a copy of a Shiite prayer book inside your house; keeping a set of black clothes, like those Shiites wear to commemorate special religious occasions; and learning the dates of the births and deaths of the 12 imams.

Tip No. 8: Learn how to curse Yazid, the Sunni caliph whose army killed Imam Hussein in the 7th century.

And if all else fails, tip No. 11 reads: "It is okay to claim that you were a Sunni but you were later 'enlightened' and became a Shiite." And tip No. 12 reminds Sunnis to practice all 11 tips well -- and to pray in a husseiniya, or Shiite mosque.

Azzawi's cousin keeps a latmiya -- sad Shiite chants about the 12 imams -- in his collection of ring tones in his cellphone. He activates it in majority-Shiite neighborhoods. Other Sunnis have images of Imam Ali or Imam Hussein on their cellphone screens.

Haki Ismael is a Shiite guard at a government ministry. He lives in Amiriyah, a mostly Sunni neighborhood. Every time he left, he said, he used his fake Sunni identity card. But one recent morning, he was kidnapped by members of the Mahdi Army, the Shiite militia aligned with firebrand cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. They thought he was a Sunni, he recalled.

So Ismael spoke with an accent typical of Shiites from the south. The militiamen began to relax. They released him.Judging by Appearance

Ghassan Khalaf, a Sunni shopkeeper, was saved by his short hair. In June, Shiite policemen stopped his black BMW at a checkpoint in the mostly Shiite neighborhood of Bayaa. They saw the picture of Sadr near the speedometer and Imam Ali on the windshield. But their eyes zeroed in on Khalaf's cousin, Ahmad Jabbir. He had a long, bushy beard and a white tribal head scarf, worn by many religious Sunnis.

The policemen asked him for his ID. He did not have a fake one. Worse, his tribal name was al-Douri, the same as Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri, who was a top deputy to Saddam Hussein. The policemen pushed Jabbir into their vehicle and ordered Khalaf to leave.

A few days later, Jabbir's corpse turned up in the morgue, Khalaf said. It had 24 holes from an electric drill; the head and beard were shaved.

Two weeks ago, a Shiite friend visited Khalaf's home, where photos of Sadr and Imam Ali are prominently displayed. Like most neighbors, he thought Khalaf was Shiite. He pulled out his cellphone and asked Khalaf:

"Did you see the last operation the heroes did?"

Then, Khalaf recalled, the friend played a grainy one-minute, 40-second video of armed men in black dragging a corpse by its shirt and dumping it in a sandy lot. "God help us get rid of the Salafis and Wahhabis," Khalaf told him afterward, referring to two Sunni branches.

"They think I am one of them," Khalaf explained later. "If you make a mistake, they'll find out you have some sympathy for Sunnis. They will kill me."

The friend asked Khalaf to pull out his blue cellphone with its latmiya ring tone. Then, he beamed over the video with a Bluetooth device.

"When my friend left, I cried because I remembered my cousin," Khalaf said.

"I thought, 'This is what happened to him.' "

Khalaf kept the video in his cellphone. It had become another piece of his disguise.A Song and a Blessing

At the checkpoint, one of the armed men in black ordered Ahmed to get out of his Honda. His family sat in silence, veiled in fear. The man looked inside the car and spotted the green cloth and the picture of Imam Ali. A Shiite religious song flowed through the speakers.

"Where are you coming from?" he asked Ahmed.

"From a ziyara ," he replied in a southern Shiite accent, using the word for a visit to a shrine.

"God bless you. Go fast," the armed man replied.

Ahmed stepped back into his Honda and drove away.

"I felt like life came back to me," Ahmed recalled.

Congressmen Say Iraq War Weakens Military Response To Other Crises (MCT)

DOJ_NMG_0070882

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - The war in Iraq has become such a drain on the Army and the Marines that it's seriously damaged the U.S. military's ability to respond if other crises arise, two Democratic congressmen said Thursday.

Speaking at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, Reps. John Murtha, D-Pa., and Neil Abercrombie, D-Hawaii, warned that because funding for the military has been siphoned off to pay for the war, the Army and Marines are running dangerously short of the necessary troops, equipment and training to stay combat ready.

"This makes deployments impossible unless we are prepared to put our troops at risk," said Abercrombie, a member of the House Armed Services Committee. "It also makes conducting homeland security or disaster response missions more difficult, if not unacceptable in terms of public confidence."

They said combat readiness for the Army especially had dropped to levels not seen since the end of the Vietnam War and would continue to deteriorate for as long as U.S. forces remained in Iraq. Because most of the active-duty U.S. ground forces are committed to the war, they said, the U.S. military lacks a strategic reserve to respond to other crises.

"We don't have a combat unit that is really trained to the point where it can be deployed," said Murtha, the ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations Defense Subcommittee. "We don't have a strategic reserve unless you say the Navy and Air Force are strategic reserves."

Abercrombie listed several concerns:

-"Only a handful" of Army and Marine Corps units that aren't deployed are combat ready with enough troops, equipment and training needed to go to war.

-National Guard units have only one-third of their authorized equipment, including tanks, trucks, radios, armored vehicles and night-vision devices. Most of their best equipment has been left in Iraq.

-The Marines were forced to call back 2,500 reservists involuntarily, many of whom had already served in Iraq.

Murtha's concerns, as outlined in a 12-page report, were:

-Funding shortfalls have created backlogs at the Army's key repair depots. At Anniston Army Depot, Ala., 600 M1 tanks are awaiting repairs. At Red River Depot, Texas, 700 Bradley Fighting Vehicles and more than 450 trucks haven't been serviced. About 2,600 Humvees are awaiting repair at various depots, along with "tens of thousands" of small arms, radios and other key items.

-Pressure to meet recruiting goals forced the Army to increase the number of Category 4 recruits, the lowest acceptable category, from 2 percent to 4 percent of the annual goal in 2005. The Army also has allowed in more recruits with medical problems, moral issues or criminal records, an increase from 10 percent in 2001 to 15 percent in 2005. That figure could go as high as 18 percent in 2006.

Pentagon spokesman Lt. Col. Mark Ballesteros, responding to the assertions, pointed to an Aug. 2 statement by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

"The truth is, as anyone in the Army leadership will tell you, is that the Army today is vastly better than it was two, four, six or eight years ago," Rumsfeld said. "It has much more equipment, much better equipment, and it's better trained and more experienced, and it is a better Army."

But last month Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, refused to submit a budget after being told that he'd have to come up with a spending plan of $114 billion for fiscal 2008, a $2 billion cut from 2007.

Maj. Gabrielle Chapin, a Marine Corps spokeswoman, took issue with the assertions about Marine Corps readiness. "Every unit that is going to Iraq is combat ready," she said. "The Marine Corps is not taking any short cuts."

Paul Boyce, an Army spokesman, also differed with several of the assertions about the Army's readiness, saying the soldiers received all the equipment they needed.

Boyce said Schoomaker and other generals have been working with Congress to make sure there are enough funds to cover readiness, modernization and equipment repair.

Boyce acknowledged that waivers for recruits have increased recently, but said most of the waivers were for recruits who committed misdemeanors. Serious crime waivers remain below 1 percent, medical waivers have decreased and drug and alcohol waivers remain below 1 percent. He said positive results for drug screen tests have dropped from 2.13 percent in fiscal 2002 to 1.91 percent in fiscal 2005.

Boyce said that fewer than 4 percent of Army recruits are in Category 4, compared with 10 percent in the 1980s.

Iraq Contractor's Work Is Further Criticized (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

The contractor that botched construction of a $75 million police academy in Baghdad so badly that human waste dripped from the ceilings has produced shoddy work on 13 out of 14 projects reviewed by federal auditors, the top official monitoring Iraq's reconstruction told Congress yesterday.

In a House hearing on what has gone wrong with reconstruction contracts in Iraq, Parsons Corp. quickly became the focus, taking bipartisan heat for its record of falling short on critical projects. The Pasadena, Calif., firm was supposed to build facilities at the heart of the $21 billion U.S.-led reconstruction program, including fire stations, border forts and health-care centers. But inspectors have found a litany of flaws in the firm's work. The one project reviewed by auditors that was being constructed correctly, a prison, was taken away from Parsons before its completion because of escalating costs.

In a report released yesterday, inspectors found that the Baghdad Police College posed a health risk after feces and urine leaked through the ceilings of student barracks. The facility, part of which will need to be demolished, also featured floors that heaved inches off the ground and a room where water dripped so heavily that it was known as "the rain forest."

The academy was intended as a showcase for U.S. efforts to train Iraqi recruits who eventually are expected to take control of the nation's security from the U.S. military. But lawmakers said yesterday they feared it will become a symbol of a different sort.

"This is the lens through which Iraqis will now see America," Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) said. "Incompetence. Profiteering. Arrogance. And human waste oozing out of ceilings as a result."

Stuart W. Bowen Jr., special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, said the project failed in part because Parsons had fallen down in its responsibility to manage the work.

"It boils down to a lack of oversight," Bowen said. His office will go back in the coming months to review all of Parsons' work in Iraq, which totals about $1 billion.

Parsons Senior Vice President Earnest O. Robbins II acknowledged the police academy construction was unacceptable, but told congressmen that poor work by Iraqi subcontractors, tight deadlines and a deteriorating security situation were to blame.

"We awarded over 1,700 subcontracts to Iraqi firms, and at the peak of construction we had over 11,000 Iraqis employed," Robbins said. "Even the day-to-day oversight of those Iraqi subcontractors was, as a result of cost and security reasons, conducted almost entirely by Iraqis hired and trained by Parsons."

Robbins said the company consistently faced "a shortage of capable Iraqi managers and skilled craftsmen."

Contractors in Iraq have been a frequent target of Democratic critics in the three and a half years since the U.S. invasion, with Texas oil services giant Halliburton Co. becoming the most prominent example of what many Democrats consider war profiteering. Until now, the work of Parsons -- an employee-owned engineering and construction firm that had $3 billion in revenue last year -- had not attracted much attention. But Parsons came under fire from Republicans and Democrats alike yesterday.

"On both sides of the aisle, we think this is outrageous. We want to get to the bottom of this," said Rep. Gil Gutknecht (R-Minn.).

Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) pressed Robbins to give the government its money back. "Don't you think that Parsons, given what turned out to be a very shoddy job, should return some of its profits to the taxpayer?" Van Hollen said.

"No sir, I do not," Robbins replied, explaining that it was up to the Army Corps of Engineers, which managed the contract, to determine how much profit the company makes. Parsons earns a basic profit amounting to 3 percent of its costs, but can make an additional 12 percent profit depending on its performance, Robbins said.

Robbins declined to say how much the company earned on the police academy contract but said the Corps of Engineers had deemed the company's work acceptable when construction wrapped up in the spring. Corps spokeswoman Suzanne

DOJ_NMG_0070884

Fournier said it had taken several months for the project's flaws to become apparent, and that Parsons has agreed to fix the problems at no additional cost. She said that work will probably be done by the end of October.

Bowen told lawmakers it would be nearly impossible for the government to get a refund on the work because of the way the contract was structured.

At the beginning of the reconstruction effort, work was parceled out to some of the largest U.S. construction firms. Because of the volatility in Iraq, the government agreed to bear the risk of any surge in costs. Instead of setting contract values ahead of time, companies were given "cost-plus" contracts that reimbursed the firms for expenses and included a built-in percentage for profit. Critics have said the arrangement encouraged companies to run up their costs.

Under the contracts, the firms were expected to design electricity facilities, prisons, medical centers, water stations and other infrastructure that Iraq would need to become self-sustaining. But the companies were also asked to divide as much of the actual work as possible among Iraqi subcontractors.

Now, those original contracts are ending, even though much of the work remains undone. In some cases, the Iraqi subcontractors have been elevated to prime contractor after the U.S. firms failed to complete their assignments.

Bowen said that of all the projects his office has inspected, about 70 percent have met the requirements in their contracts.

Congress Is Told Of Failures Of Rebuilding Work In Iraq (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 28 — In a sweeping new assessment of reconstruction failures in Iraq, a federal inspector told Congress on Thursday that 13 of 14 major projects built by the American contractor Parsons that were examined by his agency were substandard, with construction deficiencies and other serious problems.

The final project, a prison near the southern Iraqi city of Nasiriya, was terminated for other reasons, said the inspector, Stuart Bowen, who heads the Office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. Delays and cost overruns led to its cancellation.

Whether because the political stakes in Iraq have risen with the approach of the November elections, or simply because of the scope of the problems, Mr. Bowen's testimony set off outrage on both sides of the political aisle on a topic — reconstruction failures — that previously was mostly in the sights of Congressional Democrats.

"So when they get the construction right, something else goes wrong?" said Representative John M. McHugh, Republican of New York, referring to cost and schedule problems that had plagued many projects.

"Wow — thank you," Mr. McHugh said, seemingly speechless for a moment after Mr. Bowen answered in the affirmative.

Work by two of the other largest contractors in Iraq — Bechtel and KBR, which was formerly known as Kellogg Brown & Root and is a subsidiary of Halliburton — also came in for severe criticism during the lengthy hearing.

The problems with Iraq reconstruction have become notorious enough that protesters engulfed Cliff Mumm, president of the Bechtel infrastructure division, as he emerged onto the street and tried to hail a taxi after his testimony before the House Government Reform Committee.

"Eviction notice for Bechtel and its subsidiaries!" a protester shouted through a megaphone.

Democrats and Republicans on the panel posed some of the most scathing questions yet to executives from Parsons, a company that has received little but criticism in the last year for projects including prisons, border forts, clinics and hospitals.

Before his testimony, Mr. Bowen made available copies of an inspection report on one of the 13 substandard projects, a $72 million police college in Baghdad where plumbing work was so poor that the pipes burst, dumping urine and fecal matter throughout the college's buildings. The Washington Post reported on some of those problems on Thursday.

Earnest O. Robbins II, a Parsons vice president, struggled to explain how tests could have missed such fundamental problems, in which the pipes were often not joined by proper fixtures but simply set end to end and fastened with concrete.

How could the tests "not reveal these massive, massive problems?" asked Representative Chris Van Hollen, a Democrat from Maryland.

DOJ_NMG_0070885

"I have some conjectures and that's all it would be," Mr. Robbins said, "and that is, it took a while of use for this to manifest itself, for the fittings to come loose or whatever."

The industry witnesses also fired back at their Congressional questioners, pointing out that their work generally met with the approval of government entities that were supposed to be overseeing the work. Mr. Mumm, of Bechtel, brought a hush to the room when he listed 24 Iraqi employees on the hospital project who had been killed by local militias or insurgents, greatly slowing the work. The Iraqi site manager was murdered, the site engineer's daughter was kidnapped and "they summarily marched out our mechanical contractor and murdered 12 of them," Mr. Mumm said.

Democrats spent much of the day connecting the reconstruction effort, which has cost an estimated $30 billion to $45 billion in Iraqi and American financing, to the wider effort in Iraq.

"This debacle is not just a waste of taxpayers' funds, and it doesn't just impact the reconstruction," Representative Henry A. Waxman, the ranking Democrat on the committee, said of one of the failed projects. "It impedes the entire effort in Iraq. This is the lens in which the Iraqis will view America."

Representative Tom Davis, the Virginia Republican who is the committee's chairman, began his own remarks by charging that critics of the reconstruction "oversimplify, distort and prejudge the outcome of a complex contracting process to fit the preordained conclusion that everything goes wrong in Iraq."

But then even Mr. Davis concluded that when it came to reconstruction, "original plans were wildly optimistic," and that only a fraction of originally planned water and electricity projects had been completed. As the hearing wore on, Mr. Davis expressed shock at statistics like the 13 of 14 projects that Mr. Bowen had found were substandard.

"What is going on here?" Mr. Davis asked. The question was never fully answered.

The 14 Parsons projects included three border forts in the north with undersize and inadequate structural beams and incomplete security measures; five health clinics around Kirkuk with crumbling concrete; and a hospital in Babil Province that also had structural problems.

Plumbing Problems At Iraq Site Spur Wider Contractor Review (LAT)

By Jonathan Peterson

The Los Angeles Times, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — A special inspector general said Thursday that he planned to review all of the Iraq building projects overseen by Pasadena's Parsons Corp. in the wake of severe plumbing problems that have surfaced at Baghdad's new police academy.

Sewage is seeping through the floors at the academy, and in one of the buildings "the water has been dripping at such a rapid rate that the Baghdad Police College director refers to this room as the 'Rain Forest,' " the auditors said in a report delivered to Congress by Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction.

"It boils down to a lack of oversight," Bowen told lawmakers.

The blistering report follows earlier criticisms of Iraqi building projects overseen by Parsons. The privately held construction and engineering firm and its partners have been awarded contracts for police stations, health clinics, prisons and other facilities that are potentially worth $2 billion or more.

Parsons executives have noted in the past that the ever-present threat of violence in Iraq has made its work more difficult. In a statement Thursday, Parsons said that once the problems were pointed out in July, the firm directed its Iraqi subcontractor to fix them.

"The subcontractor currently is changing out the pipes at no cost to the U.S. or Iraqi governments," said Erin Kuhlman, vice president of corporate relations, adding, "Parsons is proud of our brave men and women who have performed extremely well under very difficult and dangerous conditions in Iraq."

Parsons has relied on local Iraqi contractors to carry out much of its work in Iraq, including at the police academy, a $75-million project that is considered to be a symbol of U.S. efforts to help reestablish peace and security in Iraq.

According to the audit, leakage from plumbing was so severe at the academy that it threatened the structural integrity of the floors in eight dormitories intended to house as many as 2,800 police cadets.

DOJ_NMG_0070886

The audit followed site visits to the police academy in August and September. It found that inferior plumbing techniques, methods and materials were causing a continual spread of water and human waste throughout the three-story buildings, from the top floor to the ground floor.

"For example, we witnessed a light fixture so full of diluted urine and feces that it would not operate," the auditors said in the report, which included photographs of the malfunctioning light and stained ceiling tiles. "As we continued our assessment throughout the second-floor bathroom, we identified evidence of large quantities of diluted urine dripping from the top floor down through the ceiling. The urine was so pervasive that it had permanently stained the ceiling tiles."

Parsons completed its work on the police academy in the spring, the company said Thursday, adding that Iraqi officials inspected the facility during April and May and accepted the work. Police and cadets then moved in.

At a hearing Thursday, Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), chairman of the House Committee on Government Reform, lamented the poor track record of U.S. building projects in Iraq.

"Poor security, an arcane, ill-suited management structure and a dizzying cascade of setbacks," he said.

"The committee is, of course, always concerned when there is defective workmanship under a government contract," said David Marin, the panel's staff director, though he noted that Parsons was addressing the problems through its subcontractor. "We will continue to follow this project closely to ensure that the Corps of Engineers takes appropriate remedial action."

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) emphasized the stakes in properly handling the police academy project.

"What could be a more important symbol than getting police trained for security, and buildings which will give them a boost?" Waxman asked.

jonathan.peterson@

latimes.com

Reuters was used in compiling this report.

Attacks Cost Iraq Oil Exports $16B (AP)

By Pauline Jelinek

AP, September 28, 2006

Iraq's most important moneymaker — its oil industry — lost $16 billion in potential foreign sales over two years to insurgent attacks, criminals and bad equipment, a secret U.S. audit says.

The Baghdad government "must take bold action" to protect its oil and electrical facilities, concludes an unclassified summary of the classified audit on Iraq's energy sector.

"Iraq cannot prosper without uninterrupted export of oil and the reliable delivery of electricity," Stuart W. Bowen, special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, said in the summary released Thursday.

In another report, Bowen said sewage drips through the ceilings of a newly constructed building at the Baghdad Police College because of poor construction and the use of inferior plumbing materials.

Bowen released both reports as he prepared to testify Thursday before the House Government Reform Committee, which has been looking into waste and fraud in billions of dollars worth of Iraq reconstruction projects.

In addition to the estimated $16 billion loss of potential oil export revenue between January 2004 and March 2006, Bowen said Iraq also is paying billions of dollar to import refined petroleum products it needs.

The United States has invested some $320.3 million to help Iraq's security forces better protect its oil and electricity infrastructure. And it has developed an array of plans to help the three Iraq ministries that share responsibility — Ministry of Defense, Ministry of Oil and Ministry of Electricity.

But Baghdad didn't have a permanent government in place until recently and some ministries showed "limited initiative," leaving Iraq with "much to do" to put the U.S. plans into action, the summary said.

Bowen said that even if attacks ceased, criminal activity and aging and poorly maintained infrastructure would still hamper oil exports and electricity production.

The full energy report remains classified, as do U.S. figures on the number of attacks to the sector. Though the unclassified summary was released Thursday, the classified report was completed in July.

DOJ_NMG_0070887

The Bush administration predicted three years ago that Iraq would finance its own reconstruction using oil revenues. Iraq, a founding member of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, has the world's third-highest proven reserves.

But oil production slipped after the invasion and the country has struggled to resume production to prewar levels of about 2.5 million to 3 million barrels a day. As of last May, production stood at about 1.9 million barrels a day, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration.

It is estimated that in 2005, oil exports earned the country about $26 billion.

In the report on Baghdad's police academy, Bowen said his inspectors found "construction deficiencies of such magnitude" they need prompt attention.

Among problems was plumbing so bad that dirty water from sinks and toilets drained through concrete upper floors throughout the building and dripped into first-floor cadet dormitories, threatening health and possibly weakening the structure.

The Bush administration has hung U.S. withdrawal from Iraq on it's ability to train Iraqi police and soldiers to take over the country's security.

The police facility existed before but was being expanded so more cadets could be trained at one time.

The audit findings on the academy raise questions about whether the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers did a poor job monitoring the construction.

"The answer has to be yes," said Maj. Gen. William McCoy, the corps' chief Army engineer for Iraq reconstruction. "We allowed the quality to be like that. I'm investigating this right now. We have been for two weeks."

McCoy said by telephone from Baghdad that the corps recognized there were problems in May and so ended the contract for the project with Parsons Corp. The American company has had problems with others projects among some nearly $1 billion worth of work it has in Iraq.

"We had to terminate them because there was deplorable construction," McCoy said.

Parsons did not immediately return a phone call seeking comment.

Applying Diplomacy To Conflict (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

BAQUBAH, Iraq -- Wearing an ethnic print jacket over a black shirt and slacks, veteran U.S. diplomat Kiki Munshi walks breezily across the gravel of the American military compound here, giving a tour of Forward Operating Base War Horse with the same finesse one would expect at a well-appointed embassy.

"This is our beloved generator," Munshi, 62, says with a graceful sweep of her arm and a deference appropriate for the hulking yellow piece of machinery that she regularly prays for.

Around the corner, Munshi stops beside some rectangular wooden boxes filled with parched dirt. "This is Armand's garden," she says with a wan smile, referring to her Iraqi bilingual-bicultural adviser. Glancing down at the lifeless display, her voice falls ever so slightly as she adds: "He hasn't gotten very far. . . ."

Munshi, the head of the State Department's 45-member provincial reconstruction team (PRT) in Baqubah, had comfortably retired after a 22-year career in the Foreign Service that included tours in Asia, Africa and Europe when her conscience nudged her into coming to Iraq. So she left her husband, two horses, a dog and a cat in Vandemere, N.C., and headed for the first time into a war zone.

"I felt a sense of moral obligation to try to help rebuild Iraq," she explained last month over a meal at the base chow hall, admitting that after a few months in Baqubah, she sees the prospects as "difficult at best."

The most urgent mission of Munshi's team is to promote "conflict resolution" in Diyala province, a demographically mixed region of strong sectarian and ethnic tensions that stretches from Baghdad to the Iranian border. The team works with local leaders on listening techniques and mediation -- "how to take a positive nucleus and expand it," Munshi explained.

In midsummer, the team's hopes soared when local leaders signed an 18-point peace manifesto in the troubled town of Muqdadiyah. The leaders agreed to stop kidnappings and killings, halt attacks on Iraqi security forces (if they "behaved") and -- in an important concession -- limit the weaponry of mosques to 10 AK-47 automatic rifles each (no heavy machine guns).

DOJ_NMG_0070888

"People were cheering them and throwing flowers. It was very emotional," Munshi recalled.

The peace held for 10 days. Then it was shattered by a mass kidnapping, followed by the slaughter of dozens of minibus and taxi drivers. "It was so horrific," Munshi said.

Munshi has not given up on the peace process in Muqdadiyah and other towns. Even Iraqi leaders who rely on militias "realize the violence has gotten out of hand," she said. But progress, she says, is hard to discern.

Sectarian and insurgent violence in Diyala also severely hamper Munshi's team in getting places and meeting Iraqis.

Until recently, the team's bodyguards consisted of 18 Blackwater security contractors who restricted "outings" to three times a week for a maximum of three hours each. All excursions were planned, she said. "If they hadn't checked it out, we couldn't go," Munshi said.

With so many security guards, convoys had only three seats left for team members. "They didn't want anyone to go anywhere," she said of the State Department regional security office, which hired Blackwater.

Despite the frustrations, Munshi said, being surrounded by Blackwater guards -- with such radio call signs as Elvis, Josh and Dave -- did boost her spirits.

"Here in Baqubah, the ultimate status symbol is your personal security detail," she explained with a knowing look. "So I'm weaving down the halls of the government center with these big hunks with guns -- they're very mean-looking -- and they're around me in a diamond formation, and I'm in the middle with my sandals and scarf."

The U.S. military took over security for the team over the summer because Blackwater was too expensive, Munshi said, and now the team can travel more freely. "Life is much easier," she said, "although my ego is not as well served."

When not busy with her primary job of conflict resolution, Munshi pursues other PRT initiatives, including an effort to provide Iraqi girls and women with a place to exercise in Baqubah. A building bought with U.S. funds for a women's organization had been taken over by the local telecommunications director, Munshi said.

"We were plotting . . . on how to get enough back to have a gym," she said, noting that Iraqi girls past age 10 "can't go out in shorts or pants and run around a field."

She hopes, too, to create a theater where girls can act onstage, something else that is "almost forbidden" for women in Iraq's Muslim society.

Munshi is also seeking funding for her latest idea: to provide riding therapy for Iraqi children injured in the violence.

Munshi signed up for a year on the U.S. military base, and said conditions are tolerable. She is one of the few with a shower and toilet in her trailerlike quarters, but she greatly misses her husband and pets. "There's no one to cuddle," she said. "I can't hug my team members."

Still, she perseveres. Munshi said one of her strongest impressions about Iraq is "how depressed people are."

Once she got into an argument with a young man who attributed his country's problems to Iraqis being "all bad people." Ultimately, the man joined Munshi's team. "We gave him a glimmer of hope," she said. "People are looking for some kind of evidence the future might be better."

Cost Of Iraq War Nearly $2b A Week (BOS)

By Bryan Bender

The Boston Globe, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A new congressional analysis shows the Iraq war is now costing taxpayers almost $2 billion a week -- nearly twice as much as in the first year of the conflict three years ago and 20 percent more than last year -- as the Pentagon spends more on establishing regional bases to support the extended deployment and scrambles to fix or replace equipment damaged in combat.

The upsurge occurs as the total cost of military operations at home and abroad since 2001, including the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, will top half a trillion dollars, according to an internal assessment by the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service completed last week.

The spike in operating costs -- including a 20 percent increase over last year in Afghanistan, where the mission now costs about $370 million a week -- comes even though troop levels in both countries have remained stable. The reports attribute the rising costs in part to a higher pace of fighting in both countries, where insurgents and terrorists have increased their attacks on US and coalition troops and civilians.

DOJ_NMG_0070889

Another major factor, however, is ``the building of more extensive infrastructure to support troops and equipment in and around Iraq and Afghanistan," according to the report. Based on Defense Department data, the report suggests that the construction of so-called semi-permanent support bases has picked up in recent months, making it increasingly clear that the US military will have a presence in both countries for years to come.

The United States maintains it is not building permanent military bases in Iraq or Afghanistan, where the local population distrusts America's long-term intentions.

But for the first time, a major factor in the growth of war spending is the result of a dramatic rise in ``investment costs," or spending needed to sustain a long-term deployment of American troops in the two countries, the report said. These include the additional purchases of protective equipment for troops, such as armored Humvees, radios, and night-vision equipment; new tanks and other equipment to replace battered gear from Army and Marine Corps units that have been deployed numerous times in recent years; and growing repair bills for damaged equipment, what the military calls ``reset" costs.

At least one lawmaker, referring to reports of equipment shortages in the war zones and at US bases where troops are training for combat, says some of the spending is misplaced. ``While we are spending billions in Iraq to build and maintain massive bases, we cannot [effectively] repair our abused equipment or replace it," US Representative Martin T. Meehan , a Lowell Democrat and member of the House Armed Services Committee, said in a statement.

The Pentagon, which had previously made public its own estimate of operating costs, has not released up-to-date war costs.

The Congressional Research Service report estimates that after Congress approves two pending bills, the total war costs since Sept. 11, 2001, will reach about $509 billion. Of that, $379 billion will cover the cost of operations in Iraq, $97 billion will be the price tag for Afghanistan operations, and $26 billion will have gone to beefed-up security at US military bases around the world.

Though the military's operational costs in Iraq and Afghanistan have gone up despite a level number of US troops, the report attributes a large portion of the increased spending to the military's ongoing preparations to sustain combat operations in the two countries for the foreseeable future.

For example, the report shows that under the category of ``procurement," the funds designated for ``resetting the force" -- replacing or repairing equipment damaged in combat and preparing for long-term fighting -- has jumped from $7.2 billion in 2004 to $20.9 billion in 2005, and $22.9 billion this year. Separately, the Army has told Congress that it estimates it will need at least $36 billion more for equipment, while the Marine Corps has reported it needs nearly $12 billion.

Another major war cost is for infrastructure -- bases, landing strips, repair shops -- for the forces in Iraq and Afghanistan. These ``operations and maintenance" costs remained steady at about $40 billion per year in 2003, 2004, and 2005, but have spiked to more than $60 billion this year.

Those factors alone, however, are ``not enough to explain" the spiraling increase in operating costs, according to the report.

``You would expect [operating costs] to level off if you have the same level of people," said the report's principal author, Amy Belasco, a national defense specialist at the Congressional Research Service. ``You shouldn't have as much cost to fix buildings that were presumably repaired when you got there. It's a bit mysterious."

The Pentagon has not provided Congress with a detailed accounting of all the war funds, making it impossible to conduct a full, independent estimate of how much Americans are spending in Iraq and Afghanistan -- or to predict what future costs might be.

``In congressional hearings, the Department of Defense has typically provided estimates of the current or average monthly costs over a period of time for military operations, referred to as the `burn rate,' " the report stated. ``While this figure covers some of the costs of war, it excludes the cost of upgrading or replacing military equipment and improving or building facilities overseas, and it does not cover all funds appropriated."

DOJ_NMG_0070890

Iraqi Journalists Add Laws To List Of Dangers (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

BAGHDAD — Ahmed al-Karbouli, a reporter for Baghdadiya TV in the violent city of Ramadi, did his best to ignore the death threats, right up until six armed men drilled him with bullets after midday prayers.

He was the fourth journalist killed in Iraq in September alone, out of a total of more than 130 since the 2003 invasion, the vast majority of them Iraqis. But these days, men with guns are not Iraqi reporters' only threat. Men with gavels are, too.

Under a broad new set of laws criminalizing speech that ridicules the government or its officials, some resurrected verbatim from Saddam Hussein's penal code, roughly a dozen Iraqi journalists have been charged with offending public officials in the past year.

Currently, three journalists for a small newspaper in southeastern Iraq are being tried here for articles last year that accused a provincial governor, local judges and police officials of corruption. The journalists are accused of violating Paragraph 226 of the penal code, which makes anyone who "publicly insults" the government or public officials subject to up to seven years in prison.

On Sept. 7, the police sealed the offices of Al Arabiya, a Dubai-based satellite news channel, for what the government said was inflammatory reporting. And the Committee to Protect Journalists says that at least three Iraqi journalists have served time in prison for writing articles deemed criminally offensive.

The office of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki has lately refused to speak with news organizations that report on sectarian violence in ways that the government considers inflammatory; some outlets have been shut down.

In addition to coping with government pressures, dozens of Iraqi journalists have been kidnapped by criminal gangs or detained by the American military, on suspicion that they are helping Sunni insurgents or Shiite militias. One, Bilal Hussein, who photographed insurgents in Anbar Province for The Associated Press, has been in American custody without charges since April.

And all Iraqi journalists have to live with the fear of death, which often dictates extreme security measures. Abdel Karim Hamadie, the news manager for Al Iraqiya Television, said he sometimes went months without leaving the station's compound.

"The last time I went home was three weeks ago," he said, showing off a small room adjacent to his office where he sleeps each night. "Before that, I spent three months at work. I used to hit my chair because I was so angry. But then I got a new chair."

American diplomats here say they admire the dedication of Iraqi reporters in covering the war and the government's efforts to create a democracy.

"Journalists here work under very, very difficult conditions," said a United States Embassy official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "They are taking fire from every direction. They've got the defamation law hanging over their heads. They've got their political opponents gunning for them. They are trying very hard, and we want to encourage them."

Under Mr. Hussein, reporters and editors were licensed and carefully watched. Even typewriters had to be registered with the government. During that time, some reporters got by on the conviction that their articles, about the government's glorious new water projects or certain victory in the war with Iran, were at least patriotic.

"I never praised Saddam himself, never," said Shihab al-Tamimi, 73, who runs the Iraqi Journalists Union from a battered old mansion here. "But I praised the project, for the good of the country."

Now, Iraqi journalists still operate with considerable freedoms, at least compared with those in Saudi Arabia and other neighboring countries, and many Iraqis have achieved a new level of professionalism by working closely with Western journalists. So despite the growing government pressure, the news media have become increasingly aggressive.

Ethical boundaries, though, often remain murky. It was disclosed last year that the Lincoln Group, an American public relations firm hired by the Pentagon, paid Iraqi news outlets to print positive articles on the American presence here and provided stipends to Iraqi journalists in exchange for favorable treatment.

Even though the Iraqi news media have made strides, the journalists themselves are being killed at an extraordinary rate.

Since the Iraq war began, more than 130 journalists — most of them Iraqi — have been fatally shot, beaten or tortured to death, according to the Journalistic Freedoms Observatory, the most prominent domestic advocacy group for journalists to emerge since the invasion. (The Committee to Protect Journalists, which requires more evidence to verify reported killings, lists 79 journalists and 28 news workers.)

DOJ_NMG_0070891

Most of the victims — reporters, photographers and editors — were working for local newspapers and television stations.

"Don't be surprised if you wake up one day to find that I have also been killed," said Habib al-Sadr, the chief executive of the government-financed Iraqi Media Network, the nation's largest media organization. In the network's office lobby, a display case holds the photographs of 13 reporters and editors killed on the job since 2003, including Amjad Hameed, the head of the network's television channel, Al Iraqiya.

"The road to democracy is not smoothly paved," Mr. Sadr said during a recent interview in his office, cigarette smoke curling around his face. "It is filled with bombs."

Despite the danger, Falah al-Mishaal, the editor of Al Sabah, the government-run newspaper in Baghdad, said he enjoyed his job now because he felt like a real journalist.

"Now, we are free," he said in an interview in late July. "We can write whatever we want."

Three weeks after the interview, a man drove a minibus filled with explosives into Al Sabah's rear parking lot and blew it up, killing two people and wounding 20 others.

September has been particularly deadly for journalists.

Safa Ismael Enad, a freelance news photographer, was buying film at his favorite print shop in eastern Baghdad on Sept. 13 when two men with guns walked in, fired two shots into his chest and dragged his bleeding body away.

Three days earlier, gunmen blocked Abdul-Kareem al-Rubaie, a designer for Al Sabah, as he traveled to work one sunny morning, and they shot him through the windshield. Last month, Mohammad Abbas Mohammad, a newspaper editor, was shot to death in western Baghdad, and Ismail Amin Ali, a blunt-spoken columnist, was killed on the street across town on the same day.

The disdain for truly free expression cuts across sectarian lines. The men who killed Mr. Karbouli after warning him to stop his critical reporting on the insurgency were almost certainly Sunni. The former governor of Wasit Province, and the judges and police officials who brought charges against the three journalists for questioning their ethics, were all Shiites.

In April, Mastura Mahmood, a young journalist for the women's weekly paper Rewan, was charged with defamation for an article that quoted an anti-government demonstrator in Halabja comparing the Iraqi police there with the Baathists who once ran the country. She was arrested and then released on bail.

In May, a court in Sulaimaniya, in Iraq's autonomous Kurdish region, sentenced two journalists, Twana Osman and Asos Hardi, to six-month suspended jail terms for an article claiming that a Kurdish official had two telephone company employees fired after they cut his phone service for failing to pay his bill.

"These cases show that Iraqi officials are quick to use the same kinds of onerous legal tools as their neighbors to punish outspoken media," said Joel Campagna, the Middle East program director for the Committee to Protect Journalists.

Last month, more than 70 news organizations signed a nine-point pledge supporting the national reconciliation plan of Prime Minister Maliki, promising not to use inflammatory statements or images of people killed in attacks, and vowing to "disseminate news in a way that harmonizes with Iraq's interests." Days later, the police barred journalists from photographing corpses at the scenes of bombings and mortar attacks. Since then, policemen have smashed several photographers' cameras and digital memory cards.

At Al Arabiya, the Baghdad station shuttered by the Iraqi authorities earlier this month, the studio door handle is sealed in red wax and bound in police tape. (The door is adorned with a photo of Atwar Bahjat, who was kidnapped, tortured and killed in Samarra in February while reporting on the bombing of a Shiite shrine.)

Some news executives express support for Al Arabiya's closing.

"It is the right of the Iraqi government, as it combats terrorism, to silence any voice that tries to harm the national unity," said Mr. Sadr, of the Iraqi Media Network.

Parents, Kids Both Welcome Reopening Of Private Schools (USAT)

USA Today, September 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070892

Under Saddam Hussein, all Iraqi children attended government-run schools that taught a standardized, state-approved curriculum.

Now, private schools that provide specialized programs and less-crowded classrooms are beginning to open in Baghdad and elsewhere in Iraq.

"In the pre-Saddam Hussein era, private schools were common in the country. But after 1979 (when Saddam became president), these schools were banned," says Ibrahim Abed Wali, manager of the private teaching sector of Iraq's Education Ministry.

Wali, who is responsible for licensing the new private schools, says a law passed in 2004 allowed private schools to open again. Since then, the Education Ministry has licensed 224 private schools and preschools with a total enrollment of 4,628 students around Iraq.

The al-Massara Private School for Girls was licensed to open two years ago. It's located in the capital's Zayouna neighborhood, an affluent area in east Baghdad where residents are a mix of Sunni Muslims, Shiite Muslims and Christians. The school is run by the Eastern Orthodox Church of Iraq.

Zaki Jamil Hawa, the school's staff manager and physics teacher, says al-Massara had two grades and 30 students when it opened. This year, enrollment is 90.

"When we noticed that a lot of parents came to register their children, we opened five grades. And next year, the number will be completed," he says.

There will be three intermediate grades, equivalent to an American middle school, and three high school grades. Intermediate school students pay $250 per year. High school students pay $350 — about a third of the average annual salary in Iraq.

Aboud Jalal, the church's supervisor of the school, says 75% of the students are Muslim and the rest are Christian. "That shows the great reputation we have for teaching in the country," he says. Most Christians, who represent less than 3% of Iraq's 26.7 million people, live in the Baghdad area.

Al-Massara offers a secular education that includes French, English and computer studies.

On Monday, the first day of school, Mariam Saif, 14, eagerly waited for the bell to ring.

"I'm so excited today and can't wait to start studying," said Saif, a Christian student whose parents moved her to al-Massara from a state-run school in the Palestine Street district.

She says she barely was able to get through her first year of intermediate school last year because of the poor quality of teachers.

Huda Ahmad, 42, a Muslim who was waiting outside the school for her daughter to finish class, said they switched to al-Massara for other reasons. "We believe in the Christian teachers' loyalty. No more bribes. No more private lessons at home," she said.

Hawa says the private schools generally have half the number of students in a class as their state-run counterparts. That alone is worth the price.

"It's not expensive at all if you want your children to build their future properly," he says.

NATO To Command 12,000 G.I.'s In Afghanistan (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

PORTOROZ, Slovenia, Sept. 28 — Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld agreed Thursday to put 12,000 American combat troops in eastern Afghanistan under NATO command, possibly as soon as next month, officials said.

The command shift, approved at a two-day meeting of NATO defense ministers at this Adriatic resort town, would extend the alliance's area of operations across all of Afghanistan. It would still leave about 10,000 American troops, including Special Operations units, under exclusive American control.

The Bush administration has long sought to draw the North Atlantic Treaty Organization into a larger role in providing security and reconstruction assistance in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0070893

Although the move would not increase the number of combat troops in Afghanistan, it comes as a show of unity at a time when Taliban rebels have intensified attacks against NATO forces that took over responsibility for security in the south just two months ago, several officials said. The American decision to place more than half its forces in Afghanistan under the Atlantic alliance's theater commander, Lt. Gen. David J. Richards of Britain, would put the alliance in control of 32,000 soldiers from 37 countries.

NATO has showed "resolve, a lot of resolve, to stay the course in Afghanistan," Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer told reporters after the foreign ministers approved the NATO expansion.

Mr. Rumsfeld told reporters that the extension of the alliance's command into the American sector in the east, along the border with Pakistan, would happen "in the days and weeks ahead." The exact timing of the move appeared linked to whether European governments themselves would provide additional forces that NATO military planners have requested for southern Afghanistan, as well as progress on easing country-by-country restrictions that limit their use in combat.

In discussions on Thursday, a NATO official said several countries discussed providing additional troops or equipment, including Denmark, the Czech Republic and Canada. But major European powers, including France, Germany, Italy and Spain, have not sent additional troops to the south.

Asked whether the American soldiers might be used to buttress the alliance's efforts in the south, where British, Canadian and Dutch forces have faced tough fighting while inflicting heavy casualties on Taliban fighters recently, a NATO spokesman, James Appathurai, said he knew of no limits imposed by Washington on where they could go.

But American officials said it was unlikely that American units would be shifted in large numbers to the south because they were needed on the Afghanistan-Pakistan border, where attacks have also intensified.

Mr. Rumsfeld said that, in addition to supplying more forces and equipment, NATO governments were under pressure to lift so-called national caveats that restrict how and where their forces could be employed in Afghanistan. The biggest hurdle, officials said, are countries that bar their troops from being moved to the south, where the toughest fighting has been occurring. It is "difficult for the commander when he is not able to move forces around," Mr. Rumsfeld said, adding that the caveats in the aggregate created a "situation that is not acceptable."

But Mr. de Hoop Scheffer said that Germany, which has around 3,000 troops in Afghanistan, mostly in the north where there is little fighting, informed other NATO ministers that it would not lift restrictions that prevented its forces from being moved to the south. Any such redeployment must be approved by the German Parliament, where there is strong opposition to involving its forces in possible combat.

Mr. Rumsfeld said it was impossible to know precisely whether wars in Iraq and Afghanistan were resulting in more terrorists being killed than they were creating. He did not make specific comments on a recently declassified intelligence report that said that Iraq had become a "cause célèbre" for jihadists. He said that because he had been traveling he did not know which portions of the report had been made public.

But, he said, "The implication that if you stop killing or capturing people who are trying to kill you, then therefore the world would be a better place, is obviously nonsensical."

Foreign Command To Direct U.S. Troops (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, September 28, 2006

A plan approved Thursday to extend NATO's military control across all of Afghanistan would put as many as 12,000 American troops under foreign battlefield command, a number that U.S. officials said could be the most since World War II.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld hailed the change as a "bold step forward."

The move is expected to take place in the next few weeks, NATO spokesman James Appathurai said.

The largest number of U.S. troops ever under the control of foreign battlefield commanders was about 300,000 during World War I, said military officials traveling with Rumsfeld to the NATO meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0070894

It was not clear how many troops were under foreign command during World War II. A U.S. officer, Gen. James L. Jones, is in charge of the overall NATO force, but the new arrangement would put the U.S. troops under foreign commanders on the battlefield.

The ministers also agreed to provide substantial amounts of military equipment for the Afghan army.

"There were in rough numbers thousands of weapons offered up, and I believe probably millions of rounds of ammunition," Rumsfeld told reporters.

Rumsfeld said at a press conference that some countries had stepped forward in response to appeals from NATO commanders for as many as 2,500 more troops to join the operation against the Taliban in the south. But he said more were still needed. He declined to say which countries had made offers.

NATO-led troops took command of the southern portion of Afghanistan just two months ago and have been struggling to stem the escalating violence there. This plan would extend their control to the eastern section, which U.S. troops now command.

Plans all along have been for NATO to take over the military in all regions of the country. NATO's takeover of the eastern section had been expected to happen later this fall, switching at least 10,000 American troops from U.S. command to alliance control — specifically that of British Lt. Gen. David Richards. Currently about 2,000 U.S. troops are serving under NATO commanders in other portions of Afghanistan.

In opening remarks, NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer indicated that commitments for troops and equipment for Afghanistan would be a main goal of the meeting.

According to a senior U.S. official, Afghanistan had compiled a list of needed equipment, from helicopters and vehicles to armor and guns, and officials will set up a program to coordinate the donations. This information was passed on to the 26 NATO defense ministers at the meeting.

NATO countries recently have been slow to meet needs for more coalition forces for the alliance in Afghanistan, where violence has surged. Jones, who also heads the U.S. European Command, asked other nations this month for about 2,500 troops and other equipment, and said last week that some had come through.

Currently there are about 20,000 NATO troops in Afghanistan and an additional 21,000 from the United States.

Under the expected equipment deal, allies will be able to coordinate and donate supplies to the Afghan National Army. The official could not estimate how much equipment was included on Afghanistan's wish list.

NATO To Expand Military Operations Into Eastern Afghanistan (BLOOM)

By Ed Johnson

Bloomberg, September 29, 2006

Sept. 29 (Bloomberg) -- The North Atlantic Treaty Organization will expand its military operations into eastern Afghanistan, bringing about 12,000 U.S. soldiers under alliance command as it battles a Taliban insurgency.

The decision, authorized by defense ministers from the alliance's 26 member countries, will ``expand the mission to the whole country," NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said. Member states also agreed to donate military equipment to the Afghan army, he added.

NATO took command of Afghanistan's six southern provinces on July 31 and has been battling fighters loyal to the Taliban regime that a U.S.-led coalition ousted in 2001. The alliance says resistance has been stiffer than expected and is appealing for 2,000 extra troops to bolster the 19,000-strong International Security Assistance Force it commands.

The expansion into 14 additional provinces in the east, decided yesterday at a meeting of defense ministers in Portoroz, Slovenia, will bring the number of soldiers under NATO command to more than 30,000, the alliance said. The 12,000 U.S. soldiers are already in Afghanistan and will be transferred to NATO command in the ``next few days," NATO said on its Web site.

ISAF commanders will be able to move U.S. soldiers from the east to the south, where the Taliban insurgency has been strongest. A two-week battle against Islamist fighters in southern Kandahar province earlier this month was the ``most intense ground battle in NATO's history," alliance spokesman James Appathurai said Sept. 26.

Taliban Fighters

DOJ_NMG_0070895

The offensive, codenamed ``Operation Medusa," killed more than 1,000 Taliban fighters, U.S. Marine General James Jones, NATO's supreme allied commander in Europe, said Sept. 20.

The Taliban underestimated NATO and thought it would be a ``soft touch," U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, who is attending the talks in Slovenia, said yesterday, according to the U.S. Department of Defense. The alliance pledged to give thousands of weapons and millions of rounds of ammunition to the Afghan National Army, he added.

NATO is still seeking commitments for extra troops to boost its mission in Afghanistan. ``If you are in an alliance based on solidarity, you have to deliver," Agence France-Presse cited de Hoop Scheffer as saying yesterday.

Canada, which has about 2,300 soldiers in Afghanistan, will immediately send an additional 200 soldiers, including military engineers, a tank squadron and an infantry company, the country's Chief of Defense Staff General Rick Hillier said Sept. 15.

Poland will speed up the deployment of 950 soldiers to bolster the ISAF force.

``The initial elements of the battalion will be going in relatively soon and will continue to flow into the country until early next year," Appathurai said in Brussels Sept. 26. The deployment, originally set for February, will start ``much earlier than previously planned."

Nations Limit Use Of NATO Forces (USAT)

By Jim Michaels

USA Today, September 29, 2006

PORTOROZ, Slovenia — Countries sending their troops to Afghanistan have placed a web of restrictions on how they can be used, creating headaches for combat commanders and hurting the coalition's ability to fight a resurgent Taliban.

The restrictions, also called caveats, vary and are imposed by governments who fear casualties or don't agree with all parts of the mission. Other caveats are due to a lack of training or equipment.

The result is some forces can't fight at night or in the most dangerous parts of Afghanistan.

At a NATO meeting here Thursday, U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said it's understandable that nations don't want their troops to perform specific missions, but when numerous countries impose restrictions, it creates a “situation that really is not acceptable.” Rumsfeld and NATO authorities are working to get countries to lift the restrictions.

“It is very difficult for a commander … when he is not able to move forces around and to have them go where they're needed, when they're needed, to do the things that needed to be done,” Rumsfeld said.

“If you sign on to the mission, you should sign on to the whole package,” said Canadian Lt. Col. Rejean Duchesneau, a spokesman for NATO's military arm.

Caveats have long been part of multinational military operations. Concerns about them have become more acute, however, as NATO expands its command over coalition forces. Ousted in 2001, the fundamentalist Islamic Taliban militia has regained strength, particularly in the south.

On Thursday, ministers agreed to soon expand NATO command over the remaining eastern part of the country, bringing about 30,000 troops under the alliance, including 12,500 Americans, spread over Afghanistan. There are about 20,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan, and some will remain independent of the NATO mission.

Of NATO's 26 countries, only six, including the United States, place no restrictions on the forces they contribute to NATO operations, the Pentagon says.

NATO does not release details about the restrictions for fear they could be exploited by enemy forces. A recent Congressional Research Service study said caveats on German troops mean they “do not go on extended patrols and do not respond to local security events.”

NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said Germany has not dropped its restrictions.

Removing restrictions might reduce the number of troops needed in Afghanistan, since commanders could shift available forces wherever they are needed.

However, eliminating the caveats will be hard, said Anthony Cordesman of the Center for Strategic and International Studies. “This is the price for having them all there.”

The Reliable Source (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0070896

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

Take Our Local Celebrities. Please.

Highlights from the 13th annual "Funniest Celebrity in Washington" fundraiser Wednesday at the Improv:

-- CNN Pentagon correspondent Jamie McIntyre (third-place winner), as a husband parrying his wife's questions in Don Rumsfeld "accountability avoidance" style: "Am I home late? It's unknowable. Was I out cavorting with women? Life is untidy. . . ."

-- Former Republican National Committee chairman Ed Gillespie and Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio) getting heckled by their own "Crossfire" dummies (winning second place). Kucinich: "Like most politicians, I've wanted to run for president in the worst way." His dummy: "Well, you did!"

-- The winner, Rep. Linda Sanchez (D-Calif.): "The Republicans are getting a little carried away on immigration. They just built a 200-mile wall around my office. . . . The Republican flacks are so good, I'm scared to death of my little brown mother. She called me last week and told me she wanted to drop off some food, but she wasn't fooling me. I knew she was going to steal my stereo."

Why He Fights (FOX)

FoxNews.com, September 28, 2006

Sat., September 30 at 8 p.m. ET

Hosted by Bret Baier

FOX News takes an exclusive look at what motivates Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and what makes him so controversial.

We'll examine why President Bush stands behind him and what drives the 73-year-old Rumsfeld to soldier on.

We'll show you how Rumsfeld set out to transform the U.S. military from a force designed to win past wars to make it faster, lighter, more efficient.

We'll examine how Rumsfeld used that concept to win a lightning victory in Afghanistan and, in the process, became one of America's most popular and admired leaders.

But that would change, however, with next front in the War on Terror: Iraq

We'll break down the success of Operation Iraqi Freedom, the ongoing battle to rebuild a nation that toiled for years under a brutal regime and why Rumsfeld faces heavy fire at home.

Louisville Paper Gets Disc With 232 Photos Of Nude National Guard Women (E&P)

Editor & Publisher, September 29, 2006

LOUISVILLE, KY. -- U.S. Army officials are taking a close look at whether women in a Kentucky National Guard unit posed nude for pictures with their M-16s and other military equipment, authorities said.

A local newspaper reported that it had a disc containing 232 of the photos, which they did not publish, and do not plan to publish, E&P has learned.

Andrew Wolfson, who disclosed the existence of the disc in the Louisville Courier-Journal today, told E&P it came from an "anonymous" source.

"This is not the kind of activity condoned by the command leadership of the Kentucky National Guard," Lt. Col. Phil Miller, a spokesman for the Kentucky Guard, told the newspaper. The allegations were reported to the commander of the 410th Quartermaster unit a week or so before the company shipped out for Iraq on Aug. 26 from Camp Shelby, Miss.

The newspaper reported a compact disc contained 232 photographs of at least a half-dozen nude and seminude women in various poses with military rifles and covering their breasts with American flag decals. An e-mail said the women photographed were from the Kentucky Guard.

Miller said 11 of the 107 soldiers who deployed with the Danville-based unit are women.

"The CD containing the photos was sent to the paper via mail from an anonymous source. After doing background checks and some investigating, the source was deemed credible," Wolfson told E & P.

DOJ_NMG_0070897

When questioned about the photos, he added, military officials did not ask to see them or get the paper's copy. He assumes, therefore, that the military has its own copy.

Several television outlets have asked the paper to release the photos, but Wolfson says: "We've been asked for it by several TV outlets, but obviously haven't given it."

It is unclear where the photographs were taken, but some of the women are shown wearing dog tags. And in many photographs, recent inoculations, like those given in preparation for service abroad, are visible.

One woman was photographed partially clad in a military uniform, and a last name is visible on the blouse. Seitz said the Kentucky Guard wouldn't confirm whether a woman with that name works in the unit.

Lt. Col. Rich Steele, a spokesman for the First Army at Fort Gillem, Ga., said that if the allegations are proved, punishment could range from informal reprimands to courts-martial. He said the investigation is being conducted in Iraq.

Maj. Dylan Seitz, a staff lawyer for the Kentucky Guard in Frankfort, said commanders there don't know how many soldiers allegedly were involved, who took the pictures, or how they were distributed.

"We don't know what happened, other than there are some photos out there," he said.

Marsha Weinstein, former executive director of the Kentucky Commission on Women, said that it would be hypocritical to punish women involved when there is a "long history of male soldiers posting pin-ups in their lockers" and of the U.S. military flying in female sex symbols to entertain mostly male troops. "I don't think these women should be court-martialed," she told the Courier-Journal.

Quartermaster units provide logistics and supply support for other troops.

E&P Staff and The Associated Press (letters@editorandpublisher.com)

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

House Panel Digs Deep In HP Spy Case (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi And Ellen Nakashima, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

Dunn, Hurd Shoulder Brunt of Tough Questioning at Hearing

Lawmakers fiercely challenged former Hewlett-Packard Co. chairman Patricia C. Dunn yesterday on her assertion that she did not know about potentially illegal tactics used in the company's spy scandal, while 10 other key figures in the case shunned interrogation by refusing to testify during a congressional hearing.

A total of 14 witnesses, flanked by their lawyers, came before a phalanx of House subcommittee members. Most of the seven hours of questioning was directed at Dunn, who coolly endured accusations that she aided or condoned a widespread surveillance campaign against HP board of directors, journalists and their families.

Despite being confronted with a copy of a memo saying it was "probable" that Dunn had been informed that pretexting -- impersonating people to obtain information -- was necessary to acquire phone records, Dunn repeatedly said she was not aware of the methods investigators used to obtain personal calling records while investigating leaks to the media.

Chief executive Mark V. Hurd, furrowing his brow and peering over his reading glasses, assumed more responsibility while denying knowledge of possible illegal tactics. He admitted that his lack of involvement contributed to an investigation that overreached and damaged the company's reputation.

"This is not my finest hour," he said, adding later, "I should have caught it, I didn't."

The day began with the resignation of HP general counsel Ann O. Baskins, a 24-year veteran of HP who, hours before testimony started, became the sixth major HP executive or board member to resign since HP disclosed early this month that its investigators might have illegally obtained private phone records.

Lawmakers confronted Baskins with handwritten notes, apparently written by her during a phone call or meeting, suggesting that she had encouraged investigators to "[c]all carriers Nextel, Sprint and use pretexts to extract info."

"Now this document and others show that you were aware that HP was engaging in pretexting," said Edward Whitfield (R-Ky.), chairman of the House Energy and Commerce oversight investigations subcommittee.

DOJ_NMG_0070898

Baskins declined to answer, citing her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

One by one, nine other HP employees and outside contractors also pleaded the Fifth Amendment, remaining silent after being confronted with the most vivid evidence suggesting they knew or should have known about the questionable surveillance activities. Those declining to testify included the main architects of the leak probe, HP's chief ethics director Kevin Hunsaker and global security head Anthony Gentilucci, and six private detectives.

The California attorney general and the FBI are conducting criminal investigations.

Later Dunn, Hurd, HP information technology security head Fred Adler and outside counsel Larry Sonsini sat somberly as subcommittee members chastised and interrupted them for presiding over a probe that led the venerable Silicon Valley company into such unethical behavior as sending bogus information to a reporter, sitting outside of journalists' and board members' homes and, most critically, impersonating people to obtain private phone records.

Taking turns, subcommittee members quoted from thick binders of internal documents and reports, and interrogated the panelists on what they knew and whether they still stood by their actions.

Dunn, who has resigned in the scandal, received or authored many of the e-mails. She acknowledged being party to briefings about the investigation but did not accept responsibility for the methods investigators used, saying she relied on guidance from Hunsaker, Baskins and Hurd. Dunn insisted she never approved the use of pretexting, saying, "I was unaware that the fraudulent misrepresentation of identity was a part of the standard arsenal of HP tactics or used in this investigation."

At one point, Rep. Diana DeGette (D-Colo.) said: "Ms. Dunn, you knew that a lot of these techniques were going on. You just didn't think it was your job to do anything about it."

Hurd, facing less confrontational questioning, called the investigators' methods "a rogue investigation that violated our own principles and values." He said he wished he had heeded signs that things were amiss, and added, "It will never happen again."

But subcommittee members said there were plenty of red flags in the case that should have made HP executives aware the company was entering unethical territory. In particular, HP executives approved sending false information to a News.com reporter, which contained an e-mail tracer that they hoped would lead them to the anonymous source quoted in her stories.

DeGette asked Dunn if she was at all concerned about the technique used in an operation to "sting" a reporter to trick her into revealing her source.

"I sent the team to management to get approval for their techniques," Dunn replied.

"Who was that in management?" DeGette said.

"Mr. Hurd," she said.

For his part, asked whether he knew about the monitoring of board members and their families, the monitoring of reporters and the phone pretexting, Hurd said no each time. He faced the sharpest questioning when it came to the e-mail ruse in which HP investigators made up a fictitious tipster named "Jacob."

DeGette asked Hurd if he thought it was "ethical for investigators to be coming up with a fake individual to be e-mailing reporters."

"Let me try to tell you what was going through my head," he began.

"Yes or no," she said.

Pressed to answer, he shook his head "no."

Dunn stood by her decision to investigate boardroom leaks, restating her position that it was necessary to protect company trade secrets and confidential deliberations. "I believe that these methods may be quite common, not just at Hewlett Packard, but at companies around the country," she said of corporate-sponsored investigations. "Every company of consequence has people who do detective-type work in order to ferret out the sources of nefarious activities." HP launched its effort to flush out who leaked boardroom secrets after a series of news stories appeared in early 2005, citing sources close to its board. Investigators' actions, which members of the subcommittee compared to B-grade movie scripts, have spawned both state and federal criminal probes.

Though most of the questioning was cutting, there were moments of levity.

Rep. Joe Barton (R-Tex.) said stealing phone records was theft. To underscore his point, he asked Dunn whether she would give him her phone records.

DOJ_NMG_0070899

"In your position, I would give you my phone records," Dunn said after some hesitation, soliciting laughter from the standing-room only crowd.

"I wouldn't give you mine," Barton retorted.

When a committee member encouraged Hurd to call the House majority leader and endorse legislation outlawing the unauthorized access to phone records, Hurd responded, "You have my support." There are four such bills pending in the House and Senate.

In addition to Hunsaker and Gentilucci, both of whom resigned from HP this week, and Baskin, others pleading the Fifth Amendment yesterday were Ronald DeLia, managing director of outside investigator Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc.; Joseph DePante, owner of Action Research Group; and Bryan Wagner, Charles Kelly, Valerie Preston, Cassandra Selvage, Darren Brost, all private investigators and subcontractors to Action Research Group.

H.P. Before A Skeptical Congress (NYT)

By Damon Darlin And Miguel Helft

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 28 — Hewlett-Packard's former chairwoman and its current leader faced an admonishing and sometimes incredulous House subcommittee on Thursday as they tried to explain why they never questioned the legal foundation of an internal spying operation.

The former chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, who authorized the operation but said repeatedly that she was not its supervisor, came under especially harsh scrutiny because she refused to express contrition when invited to do so.

"I get the sense that you still don't believe that you did anything wrong," said Representative Cliff Stearns, Republican of Florida. After trying to answer obliquely, Ms. Dunn finally said, "I do not accept personal responsibility for what happened."

On the other hand, an apologetic Mark V. Hurd, the chief executive and Ms. Dunn's successor, encountered gentler questioning when he accepted blame for the "mess," as he put it. "There is no excuse for this aberration," Mr. Hurd said. "It happened, and it will never happen again."

The hearing shed little new light into the aggressive methods used by Hewlett-Packard to plug leaks to the news media from its board. But it provided a fresh expression of outrage over the investigation, which included the use of deception to obtain private phone records of board members, journalists and others.

"I have to ask our witnesses, what were you thinking?" said Representative John D. Dingell, Democrat of Michigan, who called the effort "a plumbers' operation that would make Richard Nixon blush were he still alive."

In a hearing that stretched from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. with only a half-hour break, the legislators grilled Ms. Dunn over her responsibility for the investigation and her awareness of the methods, with only a few questions aimed at her fellow panel members. Mr. Hurd later testified alone.

The scene was remarkable for the gathering of so many officials of one company in a Congressional hearing room — at the behest of the Energy and Commerce investigations subcommittee, which once looked into quite different corporate scandals at Enron and WorldCom.

Before lawmakers got any answers, they had to dispense with a group of 10 recalcitrant witnesses, including three officials who have left the company and several of the investigators they employed. One by one, they declined to answer the committee's questions, invoking their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

They included the company's general counsel, Ann O. Baskins, whose lawyers announced early Thursday that she had resigned, while insisting that she had been repeatedly assured by subordinates that the operation was legal.

But the committee also released handwritten notes Ms. Baskins took in a meeting on June 15, 2005, that showed she was aware of the use of "pretexts to extract info."

It is the use of pretexting — obtaining another person's phone records through a ruse — that was the ostensible interest of the panel, which put forward legislation earlier this year to outlaw the practice. But as the day's hearing went on, the lawmakers' indignation extended to the investigators' whole bag of tricks.

Ms. Dunn provoked the most disbelief with her insistence that she did not supervise the investigation and that she believed that private phone records could be obtained legally. At one point, she said she believed until six months ago that one could simply call the phone company and obtain another person's records.

"You really believe that? You honestly believed that it was that simple?" asked Representative Greg Walden, Republican of Oregon.

Ms. Dunn was also questioned about her blessing of a plan to send a misleading e-mail message to a reporter, along with tracer software that would let H.P. detectives know to whom the document was forwarded.

Reading from a document, Representative Diana DeGette, Democrat of Colorado, noted that Ms. Dunn had said the plan was "clever" and should be sent to Mr. Hurd for approval.

"I regret the use of the word 'clever,' " Ms. Dunn said.

"I'm sure," Ms. DeGette replied.

By way of defending her actions — or rather, inaction — Ms. Dunn responded that it was not her role to approve investigative techniques.

"This is a very serious problem," Ms. DeGette said. "You can't say, 'I'm just a board member, but I'm not responsible for things that happen because I am not in the chain of command.' "

Ms. Dunn was repeatedly confronted with documents showing that Ronald R. DeLia, the outside investigator employed by H.P. and one of the witnesses who refused to testify, contended that she was aware of pretexting early in the investigation.

"I have no recollection of a conversation with Mr. DeLia that included the word 'pretexting,' " Ms. Dunn replied at one point. She later added, "I don't agree with Mr. DeLia's testimony."

Her main expression of remorse was in her opening statement when she said, "I deeply regret that so many people, including me, were badly let down by this reliance" on the expertise of others.

Questions for Mr. Hurd were rarely as tough. Representative Michael C. Burgess, Republican of Texas, asked him if he could restore integrity to Hewlett-Packard. Mr. Hurd pointedly removed his glasses and said, "I will."

It was an artful performance by Mr. Hurd, who acknowledged, as he had previously, that he was at two meetings where the operation was discussed. He said he did not pay attention because the investigation was not as high a priority as running the company. "I pick my spots where I dive into details," he said.

He also said he had approved sending an e-mail message with bogus information intended to smoke out a leaker, but said he had not approved adding tracer software.

Mr. Hurd was asked several times about the software's use. He did not say that the company would stop using it, only that it would investigate whether it should. Fred Adler, an investigator also called as a witness, said Hewlett-Packard had used it recently at least two dozen times.

Several members acknowledged that the panel had gone easier on Mr. Hurd than on Ms. Dunn. "We didn't have the documents on him that we had on her," Edward Whitfield, the subcommittee chairman, said later.

He said that Mr. Hurd's acceptance of responsibility also played a part in the way they questioned the two executives. Mr. Whitfield said with Ms. Dunn's extensive background in business and finance, he expected more sophisticated answers. "She portrayed herself as so far removed," he said.

And few people think Mr. Hurd is in any trouble with H.P.'s shareholders or its board. On Wednesday, Robert Ryan, a board member, was calling reporters — with the company's authorization — to express his and the board's support for Mr. Hurd, who has presided over a resurgence of Hewlett-Packard's business.

Investors appeared to agree, with Hewlett-Packard's stock rising 1.6 percent in regular trading and 1.5 percent more after hours, when Mr. Hurd made his appearance.

Charles R. Wolf, a computer industry analyst with Needham & Company, said the strong stock performance and Mr. Hurd's popularity among employees would make it difficult for the board to remove him.

"I'd say the likelihood of his being forced to resign over this is close to zero," he said. "He's done such a terrific job managing this company for the past year and a half, it would take a bulldozer to get rid of him."

DOJ_NMG_0070901

Before Mr. Hurd's appearance, the company's outside counsel, Larry W. Sonsini, whom many consider the most influential lawyer in Silicon Valley, appeared on the panel with Ms. Dunn.

He, too, was able to deflect much of the lawmakers' ire.

Mr. Sonsini said several times that a statement he had made in an e-mail message in June that the investigation appeared to be "within legal limits" had been misinterpreted. He said it did not amount to a legal opinion, but rather a statement reflecting what he was told by Kevin T. Hunsaker, the senior lawyer who led the investigation, and Ms. Baskins.

It was only later, after Hewlett-Packard asked his firm to investigate the investigation, that he fully understood the methods employed by Hewlett-Packard and concluded that "they are totally improper."

Lawmakers convened the hearing, in part, to emphasize the need for legislation that explicitly bans the use of pretexting to obtain phone records.

The committee approved a bill to that effect earlier this year, but it has yet to be taken up by the full House of Representatives.

In one of the few lighthearted exchanges, Representative Joe Barton, Republican of Texas and chairman of the full committee, told Ms. Dunn, "If I called you up, Ms. Dunn, and asked you for your phone records for the last six months, would you give me that?"

"In your position," Ms. Dunn said, then added after a pause, "I would give you my phone records."

The room exploded with laughter, and Mr. Barton replied, "Well, praise the Lord, I wouldn't give you mine."

Ousted HP Chairwoman Says She Consulted Others In Leak Probe, Believed Methods Were Legal (FINDLAW/AP)

By Marcy Gordon, Ap Business Writer

AP, September 29, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Hewlett-Packard Co.'s ousted chairwoman said it was her duty to stem boardroom leaks of sensitive information and that her decision to initiate an investigation was made in concert with others at HP, according to prepared testimony released by a congressional committee.

Patricia Dunn said she "never doubted" the legality of the methods used in the investigation, and that she discussed the conduct of the probe with the technology company's CEO, Mark Hurd, and board members - getting a clear impression that the directors were satisfied with it.

"I never doubted ... that what they were doing was legal," Dunn said in written testimony prepared for her appearance Thursday at a hearing by the House Energy and Commerce Committee. It was released by the panel late Wednesday.

She was referring to the probe led by Ronald DeLia, the operator of a private detective firm, whom Dunn said was used because he was under contract to HP. The investigation involved private eyes impersonating HP board members, employees and journalists to obtain their phone records, spying on targeted people and their relatives, sifting through their garbage, and using an e-mail sting to dupe a reporter.

"I asked Mr. DeLia at every point of contact for his representation that everything being done was proper, legal and fully in compliance with HP's normal practices," Dunn said.

The House committee is exploring a scandal has roiled Silicon Valley's largest and oldest technology company, brought federal and state criminal probes, and claimed Dunn, two directors and two high-level employees. California's attorney general has said he has enough evidence to indict HP insiders and contractors.

Hurd, whose testimony for the hearing also was made public Wednesday, again apologized to those whose privacy was violated in the cloak-and-dagger investigation conducted from early 2005 through last spring.

"How did such an abuse of privacy occur in a company renowned for its commitment to privacy? It's an age-old story. The ends came to justify the means," he said.

Hurd said Dunn had informed him of the existence of the investigation, "but I was not involved in the investigation itself."

Dunn, for her part, said she initiated the probe "in response to directors who urged me to take more serious action in response to leaks. I turned to resources that HP normally used to do this type of work."

"I was a director of the company, not an officer or employee, and had no authority to enter into contracts, approve invoices or handle any similar matters," Dunn said in her lengthy and detailed recounting of events.

She said she had assumed that Bob Wayman, HP's acting CEO, chief financial officer and director of administration in early 2005 - with ultimate authority to approve spending for corporate security - "had provided authorization for whatever work was undertaken."

Company executives say there were two phases to the leak investigation: the first from early 2005 through last November - which Hurd said yielded "inconclusive" results - and the second, prompted by new leaks to the media, from January through May of this year.

Five private investigators who allegedly served as the foot soldiers in the company's efforts to identify the source of leaks have been ordered to testify at Thursday's hearing.

The subpoenas, announced Wednesday, were the second batch issued by the Energy and Commerce Committee. The private eyes are believed to have masqueraded as journalists, HP directors and employees to obtain their phone records. Last weekend, two HP employees and DeLia, who runs Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc. of Needham, Massachusetts, were ordered to appear.

Besides Dunn and Hurd, who succeeded her as chairman on Friday, General Counsel Ann Baskins also has agreed to appear at the hearing. Also expected to appear is Larry Sonsini, HP's outside lawyer and one of Silicon Valley's most influential figures, who assured company executives of the legality of the spying probe.

The five private eyes summoned to appear are believed to have acted as "pretexters" who got phone records under false pretenses. They are Bryan Wagner of Littleton, Colorado; Charles Kelly of CAS Agency in Villa Rica, Georgia; Cassandra Selvage of Eye in the Sky Investigations, Dade City, Florida; Darren Brost of Austin, Texas, and Valerie Preston of In Search Of Inc., Cooper City, Florida.

Wagner told an investigator that he had destroyed his computer with a hammer, The Wall Street Journal reported in Wednesday's editions, citing an anonymous person familiar with a probe of the HP case.

Documents have shown that investigators working for HP intruded into the personal lives of seven HP directors, two employees, nine reporters and family members of the targeted individuals. In addition to impersonating those targeted to procure phone records, they also spied on an HP director and his wife, sifted through their garbage, and concocted an e-mail sting to dupe reporter Dawn Kawamoto of CNet Networks Inc.'s technology news site.

On the Net:

Dunn testimony: http://energycommerce.house.gov/108/News/09282006-Testimony-Dunn.pdf

Hurd testimony: http://energycommerce.house.gov/108/News/09282006-Testimony-Hurd.pdf

Congress Slams H-P Over Board Scandal (MRKTWTCH)

By Robert Schroeder, Marketwatch

Market Watch, September 29, 2006

Company's general counsel quits; refuses to testify

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- Corporate espionage met political outrage on Capitol Hill Thursday as current and former executives of Hewlett-Packard sparred with lawmakers over the technology giant's probe into leaks coming from its boardroom.

Hewlett-Packard Chief Executive Mark Hurd, former Chairwoman Patricia Dunn and others testified under oath in a standing-room-only hearing room adjacent to the Capitol, facing fired-up members of Congress demanding to know who knew about the leak probe and when they knew details of it.

Saying it "was not my finest hour," Hurd testified that while he felt it was necessary to find leaks coming from the company's boardroom, he wouldn't allow such an investigation to take place again.

Hurd's testimony capped a seven-and-a-half hour hearing during which members of a House Energy and Commerce subcommittee lashed out at Dunn for her role in overseeing and instigating a company probe into media leaks.

Several members also urged Congress to pass a bill approved by the Energy and Commerce Committee that would allow the federal government to impose civil penalties against obtaining personal information by using a false pretext. The bill would also beef up protections of customer-call records.

Also on Thursday, The Wall Street Journal reported that Verizon Wireless has filed a lawsuit in New Jersey federal court against individuals who obtained its customers' cellular phone records.

Verizon Wireless didn't identify defendants, but described the "pretexting" methods used to gain access to call records, The Journal's reported in its online edition. See Wall Street Journal story (subscription required).

The report added that an H-P director's account was subject to unauthorized access three times since last year, and the records of the director's spouse were also accessed, though the company couldn't determine what specific account information was obtained.

Earlier in the day at the congressional hearing, several former H-P executives and others close to the matter filed out of the room one by one Thursday morning after invoking their Fifth- Amendment rights and refusing to testify.

Contrite CEO

Hurd sounded contrite in accepting responsibility for not having what he called the "checks and balances" in place to signal possible problems with the company inquiry, which ultimately had outside investigators using Social Security numbers of board members to acquire private telephone records.

"I am in charge of the company. I'm responsible for H-P," Hurd said. "I should have been able to catch [investigation questions]. I didn't," Hurd told the panel's subcommittee on oversight and investigations.

Hurd, who joined H-P in March 2005, added that he felt it was appropriate to find out the source of the leaks, but he wasn't as concerned about the matter as he was about getting into the business of running one of the world's largest technology companies.

"Leaks were not the CEO's No. 1 priority," Hurd said.

The subcommittee's hearing focused on H-P's investigations of boardroom leaks in 2005 and 2006. Federal and California prosecutors are looking into the possibility that private investigators hired by H-P may have used illegal methods to obtain private phone records and other personal information.

Dunn's account

Hurd's testimony came after Dunn said that she "initiated [the investigation] at the request of the board," but had "no recollection" of any conversations regarding the use of pretexting or other methods of misrepresentation with H-P's then-general counsel Ann Baskins or outside investigator Ronald DeLia in 2005.

Thursday evening, Dunn's attorney James Brosnahan said a timeline provided by the company Wednesday contained "inaccuracies" about the leak probes that led to the scandal and Dunn's resignation as chairwoman. Brosnahan wrote that the first phase of the leak investigation started before Dunn became chairwoman.

Prior to the start of the subcommittee hearing Thursday, H-P announced that general counsel Ann Baskins had resigned, after 24 years with the company.

In a letter to the subcommittee, lawyers for Baskins said that their client "repeatedly sought and obtained assurances from a senior H-P counsel that the techniques about which she knew were entirely lawful."

Appearing briefly at Thursday's hearing, Baskins, along with former H-P senior counsel Kevin Hunsaker, former H-P global security chief Anthony Gentilucci and private investigators Joe Depante and DeLia all declined to answer questions, each invoking their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

'What were you thinking?'

The hearing Thursday began with committee members expressing their dismay over the actions that were taken by investigators in the name of H-P, long known for its reputation of having some of the strictest business and corporate ethics in the United States.

"We actually believed we had been a leader [in corporate privacy], and that's what's so disappointing about this," Hurd said.

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., chided Dunn, asking, "What were you thinking?" and adding that the steps taken by H-P's investigators were "an insult to the Keystone Kops."

Invoking memories of the Watergate scandal in the early 1970s, Dingell added: "It was a plumber's operation that would make Richard Nixon blush."

Some of the day's most-heated exchanges came between Dunn and Rep. Greg Walden, R-Ore., who peppered Dunn with questions about whether she knew that pretexting and other potentially illegal methods were used in the investigation.

"I had no reason to think that anything illegal was going on," Dunn said.

Among the methods investigators employed was the use of Social Security numbers to acquire telephone and other personal records of H-P board members. Dunn said that up until about six months ago, she believed that anyone could get another person's telephone records through something as easy as a Web search.

Walden was stunned by Dunn's response, asking her, "Do you believe I can call [a phone company] and get your phone records?"

Dunn replied: "That wouldn't surprise me."

H-P's investigation eventually determined that then-director George Keyworth was the source of the news leaks. Keyworth resigned from the board Sept. 12.

Tracing tool

Another issue that brought rebuke from the committee was an H-P effort to send a fake e-mail to a reporter from CNet News in an attempt to get her to forward the message to a source on the H-P board. The message was to include a tracing technology that would allow H-P to confirm the board member as the source of the leaks.

During an exchange with Rep. Jay Inslee, D-Wash., H-P outside counsel Larry Sonsini said "more clarity" is probably needed about the legality of using such a method.

"I think the law regarding that is not as clear as it should be," Sonsini added.

Jill Fisch, a corporate governance expert and law professor at Fordham University, said that she was surprised at the way Dunn and others maintained their positions about methods used in the leak investigations.

"I found the statements remarkably defensive in their continued attempt to justify the investigation and condemn the board leaks," Fisch added. "I don't think anyone questions the motivation of H-P officials in attempting to identify and stop the leaks; the only issue is the methods that were used. It seems like an attempt to deflect criticism from the main issue."

Dunn also testified that she told the company's investigation team members they needed to get approval from Hurd for the traceable e-mail messages. Dunn said that to her understanding, Hurd signed off on the e-mail ploy.

In testimony released Wednesday, Hurd said that while he approved the content of the e-mail, he didn't see mention of, nor approved the use, of the tracing technology.

It wasn't the first time H-P has employed such tracking technology to investigate employees and others. Fred Adler, H-P's head of information technology security, testified Thursday that while this was the first time H-P has used such tracking methods to investigate leaks, the company had deployed tracers as an investigative tool "one dozen, two dozen times" to tackle "issues such as theft and assisting law enforcement."

Separately Thursday, H-P said it has agreed to acquire VoodooPC, a designer and manufacturer of personalized gaming computer systems, for an undisclosed sum in a deal expected to close by November.

H-P added that it will form a separate business unit within its Personal Systems Group focused on the gaming industry, with VoodooPC co-owner Rahul Sood becoming chief technologist for the unit, and co-owner Ravi Sood becoming the unit's director of strategy.

Also Thursday, Mercury Interactive Corp. said it expects its $4.5 billion acquisition by H-P to close in the fourth quarter. Mercury said it has reached a proposed $35 million settlement with Securities and Exchange Commission staff on the SEC's formal investigation into the company's stock-option practices. H-P has consented to the settlement, and will be required to approve the final documentation.

H-P's shares, part of the Dow industrials, rose 58 cents to close at $35.97.

On Display At HP Hearing, Many Ways To Say 'Shocking' (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

The corporate spying scandal at Hewlett-Packard was so shocking that lawmakers had trouble even describing it as they grilled company executives yesterday.

"As I reviewed all of the documents for this hearing today, I felt like I was looking at a proposal for a made-for-TV movie," announced Rep. Diana DeGette (D-Colo.) at the start of a House Energy and Commerce subcommittee hearing into HP's use of "pretexting" to get phone records.

On the contrary, said Rep. Tammy Baldwin (D-Wis.), HP's wrongdoing "unfolded like the plot of a third-rate detective novel."

Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.) had a different take. "Calling the folks who did or allowed or participated in this Keystone Kops is an insult of the grossest sort to the original Keystone Kops," he said.

Rep. Cliff Stearns (R-Fla.) took Dingell's objection into account. "The evidence we've seen shows that this investigation is part 'Keystone Kops,' it's part 'Mission: Impossible,' and perhaps part of 'All the President's Men' all tied together," he proposed.

Perhaps, but it put Rep. Edward Markey (D-Mass.) in the mind of "Hogan's Heroes." "HP might be suffering from Sergeant Schultz syndrome," he diagnosed, referring to the rotund concentration-camp guard remembered for the refrain "I know noth - ing!"

When it comes to technology, Congress is frequently a mouse click behind the times. Not long ago, the Senate commerce committee chairman, Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), sagely declared that the Internet is "not a truck; it's a series of tubes." The difficulty grappling with technology surfaced again yesterday in two simultaneous House hearings.

As they probed HP in the Rayburn Building, lawmakers argued among themselves about whether pretexting -- using a phony identity to gain access to personal records -- is actually illegal. Or, as Rep. Joe Barton (R-Tex.) put it: "Pretexting is pretending to be somebody you're not to get something you probably shouldn't have to use in a way that's probably wrong." The lawmakers were united in wondering why a bill making pretexting illegal, which the committee passed unanimously five months ago, still hasn't been taken up by the full House.

Next door in the Longworth Building, the House Administration Committee assembled to watch a Princeton computer scientist hack into electronic voting machines -- the same machines that counties across the country spent billions of dollars on to satisfy new standards imposed by Congress.

The computer wiz, an appropriately geeky academic named Edward Felten, demonstrated how, by dipping a virus-tainted voting card into a Diebold voting machine, he could reverse the results in a theoretical election pitting George Washington against Benedict Arnold.

"Every record in the machine is consistent with this fraudulent result," said Felten, claiming he got the key to the voting machine from a jukebox supply company. The professor repeated the demonstration at a news conference after the hearing. "There is really no limit to the amount of mischief that could be done," he said.

But lawmakers couldn't be too outraged. They were the ones who, reacting to Florida's paper-ballot fiasco in 2000, passed a law in 2002 giving jurisdictions $3 billion to buy new equipment full of bugs. "What we've got on our hands here is a Model T Ford," said Keith Cunningham, an Ohio elections official. "Can it be improved? Absolutely. [But] who's going to pay to fix it?"

Back in the Rayburn Building, lawmakers were hurling epithets at the HP executives who had used subterfuge to get phone records.

"Unacceptable," said Rep. Edward Whitfield (R-Ky.).

"Horribly offensive," added Rep. Greg Walden (R-Ore).

"Gross stupidity," submitted Dingell.

"Mr. Chair," observed Rep. Jay Inslee (D-Wash.), "we're all disturbed in our own unique way."

The HP executives and their collaborators responded in their own unique ways, too. Ten of them took the Fifth and were led from the room in a hail of camera fire. Those who did talk pleaded ignorance.

"I relied on the expertise of people in whom I had full confidence," said Patricia Dunn, the former chairman.

"We were not involved in the conduct," said lawyer Larry Sonsini. "I was not even aware of them."

"I did not supervise this investigation," said Dunn.

"I had no knowledge of the methodologies," said Sonsini.

"I had no staff," said Dunn.

"I learned of it after the fact," said Sonsini.

HP's best defense, in the end, was blaming Congress. "A positive outgrowth of the recent troubles at Hewlett-Packard would be passage of legislation governing such conduct," Sonsini said, noting that he had told the company that its pretexting "was not specifically unlawful."

"Based on my experience," Dunn suggested, "I hope that Congress will help companies like HP . . . by establishing bright-line laws in this area."

The lawmakers acknowledged they were part of the problem. "Currently, the law regarding pretexting is ambiguous," said Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.), an author of the languishing legislation that would ban the practice.

"It isn't just a leadership failure at HP; there's been a leadership failure in the GOP," added Inslee, the other author. "HP leadership may look back up here to GOP leadership and say, 'How come you're not moving this bill?' "

To that question, nobody in the room offered an answer.

House Panelists Rail At HP (LAT)

By Jim Puzzanghera

The Los Angeles Times, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — The main players in Hewlett-Packard Co.'s corporate spying drama faced outraged lawmakers Thursday, agreeing on only one thing: Someone else caused the mess.

Chief Executive Mark V. Hurd said responsibility ultimately rested with him. But then he asserted he had been unaware of just how far HP had gone in snooping on board members and journalists.

Former board Chairwoman Patricia C. Dunn, who initiated the probe into boardroom leaks, said she had assumed that HP executives were running a legal investigation.

And three executives — all of whom have resigned over the scandal — along with seven private detectives and contractors who may have improperly obtained phone records in the probe, didn't say much at all. That's because they exercised their 5th Amendment right not to testify on the advice of their lawyers in the face of criminal investigations.

"It's a sad day for this proud company," Rep. Diana DeGette (D-Colo.) said.

Thursday began with HP announcing the resignation of General Counsel Ann O. Baskins, who executives and documents indicated helped direct the investigation. She later declined to testify.

It ended with Hurd vowing to restore the image of the Silicon Valley icon that started humbly in a garage and grew into one of the world's technology leaders.

"I pledge that HP will take whatever steps necessary to make sure nothing like this ever happens again," he told members of the House Energy and Commerce investigative subcommittee. "And I pledge that this company will regain not just its reputation as a model citizen with the highest ethical standards, but we will regain our pride."

That pride has taken a beating over the last several weeks as revelations have continued to emerge about the steps the Palo Alto-based company took to identify who was leaking information. Investigators working for the company followed board members, journalists and their relatives, impersonated them to obtain personal phone records, sent an e-mail with tracking software to a reporter and even combed through trash.

The House subcommittee summoned all of the main figures in the controversy to Capitol Hill — eight required subpoenas to show up — and administered a tongue-lashing.

Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) called HP's internal probe "a plumber's operation that would make Richard Nixon blush." Rep. Cliff Stearns (R-Fla.) said it was a mix of "Keystone Kops," "Mission: Impossible" and "All the President's Men."

And Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.) said the HP executives reminded him of the bumbling "Hogan's Heroes" character Sgt. Schultz: "I heard nothing, I saw nothing, I knew nothing."

Baskins, Senior Counsel Kevin Hunsaker and global investigations manager Anthony Gentilucci — all of whom have resigned from HP — invoked their constitutional right against self-incrimination in refusing to testify. They were joined by seven outside investigators and data brokers who worked on the probe.

The committee released one e-mail indicating that strong warnings were raised inside the company.

Vince Nye, a senior investigator in HP's security department, warned in a Feb. 7 e-mail that phone records were being obtained in a manner that was "very unethical at the least and probably illegal." But the e-mail was sent to Gentilucci and Hunsaker, who refused to testify, and Dunn said she never saw it.

Dunn was defiant in defending the goals of the internal investigation, while saying she was repeatedly assured by HP lawyers that no laws were being broken.

"If I knew then what I know now, I would have done things very differently," she said. "I do not accept personal responsibility for what happened. I am very sorry for what happened."

Dunn took most of the heat at the hearing. She said that although she knew investigators were obtaining phone records of people outside the company, she thought there were legal ways to get them. Rep. Greg Walden (R-Ore.) said that in one document he reviewed, Dunn suggested the records might have been available because of "administrative sloppiness" of phone companies.

The subcommittee released documents that indicated Dunn might have known that the legally questionable ruse known as pretexting — impersonating an account holder to obtain that person's records — was used in the investigation.

According to another document, private investigator Ronald DeLia, managing director of Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc. of Needham, Mass., said he told Dunn in 2005 how pretexting was conducted.

Dunn testified Thursday that she did not remember the conversation and that she did not learn of the practice until this June.

"Would you give me … your phone records?" Rep. Joe L. Barton (R-Texas) asked Dunn at one point, cutting to the heart of the controversy.

"In your position? I would give you my phone records," she responded.

"Well, praise the Lord! I wouldn't give you mine!" Barton said, as the packed hearing room exploded into laughter.

Then Dunn shot back: "I hope that doesn't mean you have something to hide."

Dunn asserted in the hearing that the privacy of board members was secondary to the damage to the company caused by leaks of confidential information.

But Hurd said plugging the leaks was not as high a priority for him as chief executive as running the entire company.

"Patti appropriately took it seriously," Hurd said. "It wasn't my personal No. 1 priority versus other things."

Everyone at Thursday's seven-hour hearing appeared to have vastly different goals.

Dunn was trying to salvage her reputation — her lawyer even passed out 87-page binders with her life story, letters of support and a DVD of her induction this month into a Silicon Valley business hall of fame.

Hurd is seeking to rescue HP's reputation and reassure investors who have seen him turn the company around, apologizing for the controversy and outlining how he plans to move forward.

People such as Baskins who were directly involved with the corporate spying wanted to avoid saying anything that could harm them if state law enforcement officials bring criminal charges. And lawmakers, with allusions to the Enron scandal, wanted to use HP's problems to push legislation forward that would clarify federal law to make pretexting illegal.

Legal and boardroom experts following what one called HP's monthlong "hemorrhaging of credibility and reputation" said they continued to be surprised by the lengths the company took and the knowledge that top executives had or should have had.

Dunn's insistence that she knew little and had no authority to direct managers is "a little disingenuous," said James Post, a Boston University business professor and lawyer.

Hurd, meanwhile, came out of Thursday's hearings as a "strong leader, making no excuses and pledging to get HP back on track," said Tim Bajarin, president of consulting firm Creative Strategies Inc.

Hurd and Dunn both supported the push by subcommittee members for pretexting legislation.

But Hurd said that, regardless of the law, HP failed itself.

"There's a difference between legality and ethical behavior, and I don't want to confuse the two," he said. "We have a standard of business conduct that this violated, regardless of the legality."

jim.puzzanghera@latimes.com

Times staff writer James S. Granelli contributed to this report.

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Key players in Hewlett-Packard Co.'s leak scandal

Patricia C. Dunn: Became a director in 1998, chairwoman in 2005. Ousted Sept. 22 for initiating the boardroom leak probe that has prompted state and federal investigations. Also vice chairwoman of Barclays Global Investors, where she previously served as chairwoman and CEO.

• Mark V. Hurd: Director since 2005, when he became HP's CEO and president. Named chairman Sept. 22 after Dunn stepped down. Previously CEO of NCR Corp. Low-key Midwesterner hired by the board under Dunn's leadership in 2005 to revive HP's sagging stock price and slumping morale. Hurd was briefed in March on the findings of the leak investigation but said he did not read a written report that outlined the techniques — including "pretexting," the practice of impersonating a person to access their private information. News reports have also linked Hurd to a plot to dupe a reporter by sending bogus e-mail news tips.

• George Keyworth II: Became an HP director in 1986. Resigned Sept. 12 after acknowledging that he was a source of a media leak. Science advisor to President Reagan and director of the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy from May 1981 to January 1986. Director of the Physics Division at Los Alamos National Laboratory, which he joined in 1968.

• Richard Hackborn: HP director since 1992 and chairman from January 2000 to September 2000. Named lead independent director when Dunn stepped down. Primary advisor and mentor to ex-CEO Carly Fiorina.

• Thomas J. Perkins: Resigned from board of directors in May after discovering HP's investigators used possibly illegal methods to gain home phone records of directors, journalists and other targets. Pressured HP to publicly disclose the reason for his departure.

• Ann O. Baskins: HP's general counsel who resigned Thursday. The company's top lawyer, Baskins' office oversaw the leak investigation using investigators from HP's global security team and outside contractors. Resigned amid criticism that she failed to protect the company's interests. E-mails suggest she assured others of the probe's legality.

• Kevin Hunsaker: HP's former chief ethics officer. Reported directly to Baskins and directed the second leak investigation that used pretexting to obtain phone records. Left the company Sept. 26.

• Lawrence W. Sonsini: HP's outside counsel. Reviewed HP's investigation after it was completed. Initially told Tom Perkins in an e-mail that the probe appeared to have been "well done and within legal limits." Later said he delivered that opinion based on information from HP's legal department before his firm had a chance to thoroughly review the case. Sonsini then changed his tune, and HP disclosed in a Securities and Exchange Commission filing that Sonsini's firm couldn't confirm that the tactics of the outside investigators "complied in all respects with applicable law."

• Ronald DeLia: Investigator with Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., a detective firm and longtime HP contractor commissioned to conduct the leak probe. DeLia's firm also participated in the inconclusive 2005 HP investigation into boardroom leaks.

• Vince Nye: A senior investigator in HP's global security department. Sent a Feb. 7 e-mail to his boss, Anthony Gentilucci, warning that he had "serious reservations" about the tactics, saying they could be illegal and should be halted immediately. It's not clear how Gentilucci responded. Gentilucci resigned Sept. 25.

Source: the Associated Press

Probing The Pretexters (WSJ)

By Peter Waldman And Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The investigative team that plunged Hewlett-Packard Co. into one of the seamiest corporate spy scandals in years held a reunion yesterday -- on Capitol Hill.

Summoned before a U.S. House subcommittee investigating the computer-and-printer maker's prying into personal phone records and what one House member called "sleaze" tactics, a cast of nearly two dozen top H-P executives, lawyers, security officials and outside investigators jammed the front rows of a Capitol Hill hearing room. Most asserted their right against self-incrimination. And no bombshells emerged in the testimony of those who didn't plead the Fifth. But in a methodical grilling of deposed H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn, H-P Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd and the company's outside lawyer, Larry Sonsini, H-P's astonishing failure to rein in a pair of cloak-and-dagger investigations of leaks on the company's board was laid uncomfortably bare.

DOJ_NMG_0070909

Mr. Hurd took the stand, sounding contrite about having unwittingly allowed what he characterized as a "rogue" investigation. But he didn't resolve the question about how much he knew about the privacy intrusions when they occurred. He said that his failure to read an internal report on the probe was "not my finest hour" and expressed regret about sending a booby-trapped email to a reporter, with the hopes that it would lead them to the leaker. The email was sent along with software known as a tracer that could allow H-P investigators to see where it may have been forwarded. H-P has said the mail was sent, but the tracer was never activated. "Today, with the benefit of hindsight, I wouldn't do it again," Mr. Hurd said.

The atmosphere was more Watergate than Wall Street, and members of Congress spared no opportunity to play the people's David against H-P's Goliath.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

1 • In his testimony before the House, H-P CEO Mark Hurd says2 the company believes it has been a leader on the issue of consumer privacy, and "that is what makes this so disappointing."

• Former H-P chairwoman Patricia Dunn testifies3 that she viewed finding the sources of leaks as a mandate from the board.

• Top H-P executives, including former general counsel Anne Baskins and chief ethics officer Mark Hunsaker, invoke the Fifth Amendment4 before the House.

"The H-P Way became synonymous with digging through people's trash, setting up bogus emails, stinging unsuspecting reporters, surveilling journalists using ex-FBI agents who sat in cars and watched, as if their subjects were busy making truck bombs," said Rep. Diana DeGette, Democrat of Colorado. Other lawmakers likened H-P to "The Keystone Cops," "Mission: Impossible" and "All the President's Men."

But the committee failed to answer the biggest unanswered question of the weeks-long scandal: How much did Mr. Hurd and Ms. Dunn know, and why didn't they know earlier? "Where did the buck stop?" asked Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R., Tenn.). "We don't have anybody who says 'Yes, indeed, I was in charge.' "

The day began with the surprising announcement that H-P General Counsel Ann Baskins was resigning from the company and would plead her constitutional right against self-incrimination at the hearing. Ms. Baskins had weathered weeks of media questions about her role in the spying affair; H-P officials had quietly said she wasn't implicated in any wrongdoing.

But in a packet of documents distributed at the hearing, it quickly became clear Ms. Baskins not only supervised H-P's leak investigations but was apparently informed about the use of "pretexting," or deceit, to obtain personal telephone records. In one of Ms. Baskins's handwritten notes circulated at the hearing, dated June 15, 2005 -- shortly after the start of H-P's first leak probe -- H-P's general counsel wrote: "Obtaining phone #'s is a time consuming process." Then, she added: "Call carriers (Nextel/Sprint) via pretext to extract info." Just under that, Ms. Baskins wrote "ie I didn't make the call."

Ms. Baskins's separation agreement came under attack at the hearings. Under an agreement that includes indemnification by H-P for her legal expenses, Ms. Baskins gets to keep nearly $3.7 million in vested stock options plus accelerated vesting of $1 million in other options she holds. Rep. Edward Markey (D., Mass.) labeled the deal a "$3.6 million golden parachute." An H-P spokesman declined to comment on the separation agreement.

Ms. Dunn said she received no severance package but said a board committee, in essence, "forced" her to accept $100,000 in stock this month in additional compensation for serving as the board's chairman. She didn't elaborate, and it wasn't clear whether she accepted the money. An H-P spokesman declined to comment.

In opening remarks, Ms. Dunn defended H-P's need to investigate its board leaks, and in a defiant tone, she showed little contrition for the privacy invasions that occurred. "I do not accept personal responsibility," she said.

She said she launched the investigations with the help of H-P's longtime chief financial officer and acting CEO at the time, Bob Wayman, and relied on the professional advice of the H-P investigators whom he recommended. She said she knew they were obtaining personal phone records but assumed they were acquired through proper, public sources. She said the first time she realized pretexting could entail fraud wasn't until June this year -- two months after the probe was complete -- when Mr. Sonsini discussed it in an email.

DOJ_NMG_0070910

"My understanding was that these records were publicly available," Ms. Dunn testified. "You really believe that...you honestly believe it was that simple?" demanded Rep. Greg Walden (R., Ore.).

Some of Ms. Dunn's statements, however, were belied by documents released at the hearing. Among them are several memos written by attorneys at Wilson Sonsini, H-P's Silicon Valley law firm, who interviewed several key witnesses during a review this summer of how the leak probes were conducted. For example, in the lawyers' interview with Ronald DeLia -- H-P's main outside investigator, who led the investigations -- they said Mr. DeLia, very early in the first leak probe, told Ms. Dunn that he had done similar investigations in the past by obtaining phone records of journalists and others "via pretexting."

Then, in June 2005, the Wilson Sonsini lawyers wrote, Mr. DeLia briefed Ms. Dunn and Ms. Baskins in a conference call. "DeLia explained pretexting," on that call, the lawyers found, "telling Dunn and Baskins that it involved investigators requesting information from operators orally, over the phone, 'pretending' to be someone else if necessary. DeLia informed Dunn and Baskins that pretexting had been used in connection with reporters." At yesterday's hearing, Ms. Dunn said she didn't learn reporters had also been pretexted until just this month.

The committee pressed for evidence that anyone inside H-P spoke up against the practice of pretexting. Fred Adler, H-P's global security manager, testified that he and other H-P employees had grown concerned that H-P's methods might be illegal and had appealed to H-P ethics manager Kevin Hunsaker and other higher-ups in H-P's general-counsel office, who, he said, concluded that the methods were legal.

Ms. Dunn said she relied heavily on the legal opinions of Ms. Baskins and Mr. Hunsaker, both now resigned. So did Mr. Sonsini; despite his reputation as Silicon Valley's most prominent lawyer, the longtime H-P outside counsel stressed that he initially simply relayed information from the H-P legal staff.

"It's important to note that I, too, did not understand pretexting," Mr. Sonsini said, saying that he was focused more on tensions at the board that were suggested by leaks. "There was a crisis in this boardroom," he said.

Ms. Dunn did pose a tantalizing suggestion that H-P's methods were well established within the company -- and in corporate America. "I believe these methods may be quite common," she said of pretexting, "at companies around the country."

The committee members generally treated Mr. Hurd with more deference than Ms. Dunn, perhaps because of his profuse apologies. They didn't press him to say what he was told at a July 2005 briefing by H-P's outside investigator that he attended, after several directors and journalists had already been pretexted. He said the first "trigger" of his concern about the probes wasn't until June this year, when he read an email mentioning pretexting by Mr. Sonsini.

Mr. Hurd also said leaks weren't a high priority for him, as they were for Ms. Dunn. However, in two speeches to employees in July 2005, he had railed about press leaks and threatened to deal with anyone found leaking "appropriately."

Some of the most pressing questions, though, couldn't be answered because of the refusal to testify by those who carried out the probe. Among those pleading the Fifth were Ms. Baskins, Mr. Hunsaker and Tony Gentilucci, who has resigned as H-P's manager of global security investigations. Also pleading the Fifth were outside contractors Mr. DeLia, operator of Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc.; Joseph DePante, owner of Action Research, a subcontractor to SOS; and people believed to be pretexters: Bryan Wagner, of Littleton, Colo.; Darren Brost, of Austin, Texas; Charles Kelly, of Villa Rica, Ga.; Cassandra Selvage, of Dade City, Fla.; and Valerie Preston, of Cooper City, Fla.

The House committee has proposed legislation designed to more clearly spell out that pretexting is illegal, but it failed to come to a vote the last time it passed out of committee. Representatives at the hearing expressed the hope that the H-P imbroglio could help provide the impetus to make the bill become law.

The hearing ended with Rep. Ed Whitfield, the subcommittee chairman, reading a February email from one of the two H-P employees who objected to pretexting people's phone records. "I think we need to re-focus our strategy and proceed on the high-ground course," wrote the H-P investigator. "That employee ought to get a day off," Rep. Whitfield told the H-P CEO.

---- Steve Stecklow contributed to this article.

Write to Peter Waldman at peter.waldman@wsj.com5 and Don Clark at don.clark@wsj.com6

Hewlett's Hunt For Leak Became A Game Of Clue (NYT)

By Matt Richtel

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 28 — They were looking for an academic. The suspect was conversant in computer chip technology. And he would have to be the kind of person who used the word "pooped" to mean tired.

In a case right out of CSI: Corporate America, a team of private investigators spent months obsessively hunting the source of a news leak from inside Hewlett-Packard about the company's corporate strategy.

By the time they had finished their search, the team had solved the mystery of what eventually became the most notorious investigation in Silicon Valley. And the way they did it seemed to resemble a bureaucratic version of a Dan Brown thriller.

But in building a clue-heavy reconstruction — part dossier, part "Da Vinci Code" — the detectives ended up wreaking the havoc that has forced out Hewlett-Packard's chairwoman, led to the resignation Thursday of its general counsel and spawned a series of criminal investigations that are far from over.

The Hewlett-Packard scandal turned into a spectacle Thursday as a House committee brought all those involved to a packed hearing room on Capitol Hill so that lawmakers could chastise them before the television cameras for the series of subterfuges used in the company operation that spied on its own directors, journalists and others.

"As I reviewed all of the documents for this hearing today," said Representative Diana DeGette of Colorado, the ranking Democrat on the House Energy and Commerce Committee, "I felt like I was looking at a proposal for a made-for-TV movie, and maybe this will be a made-for-TV movie. But I think it's awfully, awfully sad."

While many of those brought before the committee declined to answer questions, invoking their Fifth Amendment rights against self-incrimination, those who did testify were at pains to distance themselves from the details of the internal investigation.

Mark V. Hurd, the chief executive, apologized for what he termed a "rogue operation." And he accused the investigators of being "so focused on finding the source of the leaks that they lost sight of the values of this company."

The company's sleuths produced an 18-page report, released Thursday by the Congressional committee, that reads at times like a whodunit, at other times like a dissertation. They created a profile of the leaker by studying phone records and e-mail message trails, even delving into physical mannerisms and speech patterns.

In the end, the investigation fingered George A. Keyworth II, who recently resigned as a member of the board.

Mr. Keyworth acknowledged that he talked to a reporter from CNet, an online technology news service, but insisted that nothing he discussed was confidential or damaging to Hewlett-Packard.

Before the investigators even confronted Mr. Keyworth this May, they had gone through more than 10,000 articles about Hewlett-Packard, they said, trying to determine which ones included secret information and whether Mr. Keyworth had spoken to reporters around the time of sensitive articles.

The scrutiny included intricately parsing the language of a Jan. 23 CNet article in which Dawn Kawamoto, a reporter for the service, described a board meeting that month. The article quoted an anonymous source as saying, "By the time the lectures were done at 10 p.m., we were pooped and went to bed."

Like Kremlinologists (or maybe Encyclopedia Brown), the investigators for Hewlett-Packard drilled in on the use of the word "pooped."

"This is also an unusual term," the report reads. "A number of key witnesses interviewed indicated that contrary to a number of members of the board, Keyworth often uses casual, colloquial terms in conversation, so this is a term he may use."

The investigators also focused — in that same CNet quote — on the use of the word "lectures."

"This is an academic term, rarely used in the business environment. Keyworth is the only board member with an academic background."

The level of detailed scrutiny shows the depths to which the investigators inside and outside Hewlett-Packard went to connect the dots and to expose a high-level board member who some at H.P. believed was a highly disruptive force. Not all of the investigation involved wordplay; much of it entailed detailed and highly sophisticated surveillance.

Above all, the corporate sleuths unearthed numerous personal and professional details about Mr. Keyworth, a former White House science adviser to Ronald Reagan who had worked earlier at the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico.

The report is "both childish and chilling," said Reginald J. Brown, Mr. Keyworth's lawyer. The analysis "piles inference on innuendo to reach a predetermined and hopelessly flawed conclusion."

"It was developed through illegal and invasive means."

"Dr. Keyworth did not reveal confidential or damaging information about H.P. to CNet, and spoke with the reporter with H.P.'s best interests in mind," Mr. Brown added. "More importantly, neither Dr. Keyworth and his family, nor any journalist and his or her family, deserved to have their records purloined, homes monitored or trash picked through by private investigators."

State and federal prosecutors are now trying to determine if the methods used by Hewlett-Packard's hired guns broke any laws by using pretexting, a technique in which an investigator lies about his own identity to obtain phone calling and other personal records.

The report was prepared by Kevin T. Hunsaker, a senior lawyer and the director of ethics who is leaving the company, and was delivered May 24 to Mr. Hurd; Ann O. Baskins, the general counsel who resigned Thursday; and the company's board.

The report focuses on the relationship between Mr. Keyworth and Ms. Kawamoto, the CNet reporter; Investigators determined they met at the beginning of 2001. They did so, curiously enough, at the behest of Hewlett-Packard's chief executive then, Carleton S. Fiorina, whom the report concluded instructed Mr. Keyworth to establish a relationship with Ms. Kawamoto to spread word of the company's new exploits.

Sarah Cain, a spokeswoman from CNet, said the news organization would not comment on Ms. Kawamoto's sources, nor discuss whether Mr. Keyworth was a source. Ms. Cain said the organization was distressed over the investigation into the activities and lives of reporters. "We feel it's a huge violation to our reporters' personal and profession privacy," she said.

The team of investigators — which included Mr. Hunsaker, members of the company's internal global security operation and outside detectives — found that Ms. Kawamoto had written 10 articles since 2002 about the company that cited a confidential source.

"One of the first things the investigation team noted is that Kawamoto always cites just one 'source' rather than citing 'sources' or 'people familiar with the situation,' like other reporters who more frequently cover H.P. do," the report theorized.

And unlike some other reporters, the investigators noted, Ms. Kawamoto did not contact the company's media relations department to confirm her articles. Investigators concluded the reporter must have found the source so highly credible and well placed that she did not believe it was necessary to nail down the information.

Then there were the phone conversations. By studying calling records, the investigators determined that on Jan. 18, just before a CNet article was published, a call was made from Ms. Kawamoto's cellphone to Mr. Keyworth's home in Piedmont, Calif. The call was placed at 5:25 p.m. and lasted approximately one minute. (In the final report, the notation about the call is in bold type, highlighting significance.)

"It should be noted that the phone is listed in Keyworth's wife's name," the report states. "There is no documented 411 call from Kawamoto's cellphone prior to the call. This indicates that Kawamoto likely knew the home phone number."

The sleuths determined that another call, for 10 minutes, was placed on Feb. 3, at 2:21, from Mr. Keyworth's cellphone to Ms. Kawamoto's office. Again, the report notes, there was no 411 call, suggesting to the investigators that Mr. Keyworth knew the number.

Meanwhile, the report suggests that the tension was getting to Mr. Keyworth and Thomas J. Perkins, a friend and compatriot on the board. The report says that during a break at a March board meeting — as the scrutiny from the investigation was mounting — Mr. Keyworth and Mr. Perkins were overheard in a heated discussion.

According to the report, "The arguments were mainly one-sided, with Keyworth intently speaking and even pointing his finger at Perkins' chest several times. At the very end of the second argument/heated discussion, Keyworth was overhead saying: 'They don't have enough to go there.' "

The investigators also drew a link between Mr. Keyworth and Stephen Shankland, a reporter who collaborated with Ms. Kawamoto on three articles in which a confidential source was used. The report indicates that Mr. Keyworth worked for six years at Los Alamos Labs with Thomas Shankland, Stephen Shankland's father.

"Stephen and Keyworth's son, George, who are just two years apart, likely attended the same elementary school," the report states.

DOJ_NMG_0070913

But now that all their work has been exposed to the light of day, the investigators are unlikely to be taken up on the offer they presented in the final sentence of the report. “The investigation team,” they wrote, “would be pleased to participate in any discussions regarding proactive measures designed to reduce the likelihood of similar incidents occurring in the future.”

For Ten Witnesses, Nothing But The Fifth (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

Most Called to Testify at Hearing Refuse

One after another yesterday morning, 10 of the 14 people summoned by Congress to testify about their role in a spying scandal that has rocked Hewlett-Packard Co. spoke into the microphone and invoked a constitutional right against self-incrimination: the Fifth Amendment.

Pleading the Fifth isn't unprecedented in a congressional hearing. Executives from Enron to WorldCom to Qwest Communications have all exercised the right in front of lawmakers in recent years. And lawmakers have grown accustomed to it.

"As a former lawyer myself, I cherish the right of witnesses to invoke their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. It's one of our important constitutional provisions," said Rep. Diana DeGette of Colorado, the ranking Democrat on the subcommittee that conducted yesterday's hearing.

"But it's very difficult for us in Congress to have an investigation where all the witnesses come in and, at the very last minute, inform the committee that they're invoking their Fifth Amendment rights," she said.

Legal experts say that it's often advantageous for witnesses in potentially criminal cases not to testify because it could create a legal trap for them later.

"There are a lot of potential pitfalls in congressional testimony," said lawyer Michael Levy, who represented some of the Enron Corp. executives in hearings. "An officer or director in a publicly traded company has to weigh the known employment risks of asserting the Fifth, versus the unknown risks of testifying" and potentially giving investigators information that can be used against them in a criminal probe.

In some cases, witnesses -- some of whom are now in federal prison for their roles in scandals -- should have exercised the right, DeGette said.

However, during yesterday's hearing she said, "when you haul in a whole panel of people like this just to have them take the Fifth Amendment, I think it's a waste of the committee's time and resources, and I think it's a waste of the witnesses' time and resources and legal fees."

The first 10 witnesses were called before the committee together and sat next to each other at a long table. As each was asked a specific question about the scandal, each exercised the right to not answer.

Ann O. Baskins, who was the company's top lawyer until she suddenly resigned yesterday morning, was the only one of the first 10 to answer a question. She confirmed her resignation and then respectfully declined to answer questions.

Later in the day, four others -- including former chairman Patricia C. Dunn and chief executive Mark V. Hurd -- answered the subcommittee's questions.

DeGette said she hoped that future hearings would not begin in a similar fashion. "I would hope we could work with witnesses in the future to prevent this kind of action," she said.

Staff writer Mike Musgrove and staff researcher Richard Drezen contributed to this report.

H-P General Counsel Resigns, Won't Testify (WSJ)

By Ashby Jones

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

Baskins Quits Her Post As Dunn Says She Relied On Lawyer's Judgment

In the weeks after the first news broke about Hewlett-Packard Co.'s board-spying imbroglio, little clarity emerged about just what role the general counsel, Ann Baskins, had played. While others left the company, she held on.

DOJ_NMG_0070914

That all changed yesterday. As statements and documentation emerged that offered new details about her part, Ms. Baskins resigned and declined to testify before a congressional subcommittee, citing her constitutional right against self-incrimination.

Former H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn said in a statement released Wednesday in anticipation of the hearings that she had leaned heavily on Ms. Baskins's judgment about the propriety of the investigation. The fact that "attorneys were unambiguously overseeing the investigation ...reinforced my understanding that the investigations had been and were being handled appropriately," she said.

Ms. Dunn also said that at one point she had suggested hiring the "highly regarded" Kroll Associates to run an investigation. But Ms. Baskins instead recommended handing the matter to Kevin Hunsaker, a lawyer who worked for Ms. Baskins. "I had never heard of Mr. Hunsaker," said Ms. Dunn, "but his title and [Ms. Baskins's] strong positive opinion of his work were very reassuring to me; thus I concurred with her recommendation."

During congressional questioning, Ms. Dunn said of Ms. Baskins, "Her career is ruined. She made some errors in judgment. I relied upon her like many others."

A packet of documents distributed at the hearing suggested that Ms. Baskins was aware of the use of "pretexting," or deceit, to obtain personal telephone records. In one of Ms. Baskins's handwritten notes, dated June 15, 2005, shortly after the start of H-P's first leak probe, Ms. Baskins wrote: "Obtaining phone #'s is a time consuming process." She added: "Call carriers (Nextel/Sprint) via pretext to extract info." Just under that, she wrote, "ie I didn't make the call."

Mark Hurd, H-P chairman and chief executive, said: "Stepping down was a very hard decision for her, but by doing so she has put the interests of H-P above her own and that is to be commended."

Ms. Baskins's lawyers, K. Lee Blalack at O'Melveny & Myers in Washington, D.C., and Cristina Arguedas of Arguedas, Cassman & Headley in Berkeley, Calif., in a statement regarding her decision not to testify, said, "Please understand, however, that Ms. Baskins very much wants to testify and discuss these matters with the subcommittee. Were she to do so, we are firmly convinced that the subcommittee would recognize that she acted legally and ethically at all times. Given the current environment, however, Ms. Baskins simply has no choice." Her lawyers weren't reached for comment.

Under a separation agreement in which Ms. Baskins agreed to cooperate in H-P's investigations and not to sue the company, she retains rights to exercise vested stock options, valued at nearly $3.7 million as of Sept. 27. The company said it will accelerate the vesting of other options so that the "aggregate intrinsic value" of the unvested options equals $1 million on Nov. 20.

-- Don Clark, Peter Waldman and Peter Lattman contributed to this article.

Write to Ashby Jones at ashby.jones@wsj.com8

Hewlett Lawyer's Liability Is Unclear, Experts Say (NYT)

By Katie Hafner

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

If a company's most senior lawyer is assured by a subordinate that something the company is doing is legal, what is her liability if it turns out that it might not be?

According to documents provided to the House Committee on Energy and Commerce, those assurances were given to Ann O. Baskins, the Hewlett-Packard general counsel, who resigned yesterday over the company's spying case. Yet legal specialists say it is too soon to say what Ms. Baskins's legal liability might be.

"It really depends on what shoe drops next, what information comes out and what the authorities decide to do with the case," said Charles M. Elson, director of the John L. Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware.

Ms. Baskins was one of 10 witnesses who declined to answer the committee's questions yesterday, invoking their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. She is the fourth official to leave the company in the last week.

In a letter written to the House Committee on Energy and Commerce, K. Lee Blalack II, Ms. Baskins's lawyer, said Ms. Baskins "always believed that the investigative methods that she knew about were lawful, and she took affirmative steps to confirm their legality."

Ms. Baskins, he wrote, was led to believe in the legality of an investigation aimed at tracing news leaks from the company's board, which included the use of private detectives to use ruses to gain phone records — a method called pretexting. Those assurances came from a senior Hewlett-Packard counsel, Kevin T. Hunsaker, who directly oversaw this year's phase of the investigation.

Mr. Hunsaker, who is leaving the company, also cited his Fifth Amendment right.

Joel R. Reidenberg, a professor of law and the director of the Center on Law and Information Policy at Fordham Law School, said that too many questions existed to make an accurate evaluation of Ms. Baskins's legal vulnerability.

"There's an awful lot of information we don't know right now," he said.

"If she was giving the corporation bad advice, that's one thing, and it may be malpractice," Mr. Reidenberg said. "But if she was actively assisting in masking illegal activity being conducted on behalf of the corporation, it rises to another level and she could be a target of prosecution."

Ms. Baskins, 51, a native of California, joined Hewlett-Packard in 1982 as a lawyer, two years after receiving her law degree from the University of California, Los Angeles. She held a number of positions in the legal department before becoming general counsel in 2000.

The man she succeeded, Jack Brigham, said in an interview this month that Ms. Baskins was "the brightest and most hard-working lawyer we had at H.P."

Mr. Brigham said he had recommended her for the job because she distinguished herself when she took the lead in the complicated spinoff of Agilent Technologies in 1999. "She was not shy about taking on large amounts of responsibility," he said. She was on top of things all the time," he said.

He also said she handled detail well, but he never recalled her handling investigations.

The legal department includes several hundred lawyers in Hewlett-Packard offices around the world, and Ms. Baskins has been closely involved with some of the company's biggest deals, including its acquisition of Compaq Computer in 2001 and the ouster of Carleton S. Fiorina, the former chief executive, in 2005.

Through a negotiated resignation approved by the compensation committee of the Hewlett-Packard board, Ms. Baskins will receive stock options valued at $4.6 million as well as her full retirement plan, according to documents the company filed yesterday with the Securities and Exchange Commission. Ms. Baskins's lawyer sent the committee a two-page letter along with 24 pages of internal and legal documents, some labeled "privileged & confidential." The documents include a set of handwritten notes taken by Ms. Baskins in June 2005 in which she noted the use of "pretexts to extract info." The documents also show that Ms. Baskins made repeated inquiries of Mr. Hunsaker, who assured her of the legality of what was being done.

"Her overall message is, 'Look, I did the right thing,' " said Eric Goldman, director of the High Tech Law Institute at the Santa Clara University School of Law in California. "But underlying all of that is still this nagging doubt that she knew pretexting wasn't appropriate and that's why she kept asking questions."

The documents provided to the committee mention that the scope of Mr. Hunsaker's research into the legality of pretexting consisted of an "hour's worth of online research," as well as interviews with the outside investigators and an outside lawyer with ties to the investigators.

"Every interaction described in these documents suggests she's still bothered by this," Mr. Goldman said, "and if you have to ask the question, 'Is this legal?' so many times, common sense says it's probably not appropriate, if not illegal."

Although it might have been awkward to do so, Mr. Goldman said, Ms. Baskins should have taken matters into her own hands.

"What I would have done if I had that feeling in the pit of my stomach is do my own independent research," he said. "I would have said something more than just, 'Thanks for the research.' I would have said, 'Show me why you think this is legal.' "

And Ms. Baskins might agree with him. "With the benefit of hindsight," wrote Mr. Blalack in his letter to the committee, "Ms. Baskins wishes that she had more actively inquired about the methods being used and taken steps to halt any that were inconsistent with H.P.'s high ethical standards, such as pretexting."

Hewlett-Packard Rebuked By Lawmakers For Allowing Leak Probe (BLOOM)

By Connie Guglielmo And Christopher Stern

Bloomberg, September 29, 2006

Sept. 28 (Bloomberg) -- Hewlett-Packard Co. executives were rebuked by lawmakers for allowing a probe of boardroom leaks that spiraled into potentially illegal spying.

The investigation was a ``fine case study in deceit, dishonesty, improper behavior and possibly illegal behavior," Representative John Dingell, the ranking Democrat on the U.S. House Committee on Energy and Commerce said at a hearing today in Washington designed to uncover the methods company investigators used to find the source of leaks to the media. He described the behavior as ``shameful" and worse than Keystone Cops.

Hewlett-Packard Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd and former Chairwoman Patricia Dunn will testify today before the committee, which is seeking information on how Hewlett-Packard spied on its own directors and journalists. The scandal prompted the ouster of Dunn, General Counsel Ann Baskins and two company executives, and also has drawn scrutiny from the Justice Department and California's Attorney General.

Hewlett-Packard has said the probe extended to following directors, planting bugs on reporter's computers and going through trash. Investigators also took on false identities to obtain phone records, a practice known as pretexting that may be illegal.

The hearing is part of an eight-month inquiry by the House committee's Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations into pretexting and today's session is dubbed ``Hewlett-Packard's Pretexting Scandal."

Pretexting is ``pretending to be someone you're not, to get something you shouldn't have, to use in a way that's probably wrong," said Representative Joe Barton, chairman of the U.S. House Committee. ``We must make pretexting clearly illegal."

Testimony

Representative Greg Walden, a Republican from Oregon, said the conduct was ``outrageous." ``Where was somebody to say this just isn't right?" Walden said in his opening statement. Dingell, from Michigan, asked the Hewlett-Packard officials assembled for the hearings ``what were you thinking?"

Representative Ed Whitfield, a Republican from Kentucky, said he gives ``little credence" to the arguments that the company and executives didn't know its investigators were using unsavory tactics.

Dunn arrived at the hearing early flanked by friends and lawyers and took a front row seat. Hurd hasn't arrived.

Resigned

Baskins resigned today after Dunn's statement implicated her in the probe. Baskins plans to take the Fifth Amendment to avoid incriminating herself when she appears before the committee, her attorneys K. Lee Blalack and Cristina Arguedas said in a letter to the committee today.

Dunn was ousted Sept. 22 and two other employees agreed to leave.

``These resignations are very important to clear the decks," said Stanley Nabi, who helps manage $7.5 billion at Silvercrest Asset Management in New York, including about 982,000 Hewlett- Packard shares. ``I think Hurd as a result of these events will become more empowered to take whatever action is necessary."

Shares of Palo Alto, California-based Hewlett-Packard are down 2.9 percent since the company said Sept. 6 that its investigators may have broken the law. The stock rose 35 cents, or 1 percent, to $35.74 at 10:46 a.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

`The Right Thing'

Hurd's success in reviving sales and profit growth at the world's second-largest personal-computer maker have driven the shares up 24 percent this year, to near five-year highs. The shares stumbled last week on concerns that Hurd may have been more involved than he previously let on. The CEO said he wasn't involved in the operational aspects of the probe and wasn't aware of the tactics used.

In a statement prepared for the panel and released yesterday, Dunn detailed Baskins's involvement in the investigation and said she discussed the probe with Baskins in mid-2005. While Dunn mentioned Baskins's role, she added that ``no one rates higher in my estimation than Ann Baskins for her commitment to ethics, integrity and doing the right thing for Hewlett-Packard every step of the way."

``Ms. Baskins always believed that the investigative methods that she knew about were lawful," Baskins' lawyers said in the letter. ``We are firmly convinced that the subcommittee would recognize that she acted ethically and legally at all times."

Little Choice

Baskins, who joined Hewlett-Packard right after law school 24 years ago, had regular meetings with her subordinate Kevin Hunsaker, who ran the investigation and left the company this week, Dunn said. While Hunsaker asked Dunn directly several times for guidance, most of these conversations included Baskins, 51, Dunn said.

A weekly project conference call was set up on Friday afternoons ``so Ann and I could be brought up on any progress and I could answer questions as appropriate," Dunn said in her statement that she will deliver later today.

Baskins had little choice but to resign, said James Post, a professor of management at Boston University. ``Patti Dunn detailed Baskins's involvement in her testimony leaving Baskins with little room to explain herself lest she provide self-incriminating statements," Post said.

Opening Statements

Hewlett-Packard hired Baskins as attorney for their legal department in Palo Alto. She was promoted to a senior attorney in 1985, a corporate counsel a year later, and then made general counsel in 2000. Baskins holds a law degree from University of California, Los Angeles. As an undergraduate at Stanford University, Baskins majored in history.

Hunsaker will testify today, as will Anthony Gentilucci, a Hewlett-Packard investigator. The company's outside counsel, Larry Sonsini, and seven private investigators hired by the company have also been called.

Dunn and Hurd released their opening statements yesterday. Hurd distanced himself from the probe, saying he had no involvement and didn't read a report he was sent on the matter. The 49 year-old CEO also said he didn't recall authorizing the use of trace technology to track an e-mail sent to a reporter at Cnet.com.

Rogue Investigator

Dunn used her testimony to paint herself as a victim of a rogue investigator, Ronald DeLia. She said Hewlett-Packard used DeLia in the past and he had been recommended to her by director and Chief Financial Officer Robert Wayman.

DeLia gave her the ``clear impression" that assuming fake identities to get phone records, or pretexting, is legal. Dunn said she was told the practice had been used by Hewlett-Packard previously.

``I was fully convinced that HP would never engage in anything illegal," Dunn said in her testimony.

Dunn said she now isn't sure if pretexting is legal or not.

Dunn's remarks may pit her against Hewlett-Packard and Hurd. Dunn said the board never questioned methods used in the probe. Hewlett-Packard has depicted Dunn as complicit in the actions of the investigators.

``Ultimately, someone has to be responsible for it," said Charles Elson, director of the John L. Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware. ``The buck stops at the top."

Hewlett-Packard first gave details of the probe on Sept. 6 and mentioned only the pretexting. Last week the company added that investigators followed directors and used other means to find out who had leaked the information, including trawling through garbage.

Under Contract

DeLia's company had worked for Hewlett-Packard for eight or nine years, Dunn said, adding she had no reason to doubt the quality of his work.

``They were already under contract to HP when the leak investigation was initiated," Dunn said in the remarks titled ``My Role in the Hewlett-Packard Leak Investigation."

Dunn said she initiated an investigation at the insistence of a majority of the board. She said she received assurances through two phases of the probe, dubbed Kona 1 and Kona 2, that the methods used to obtain phone records were legal.

Hurd, 49, attended several meetings during the course of the investigations to root out the leaker, Dunn said. Hurd by contrast said he recalled attending one meeting briefly and didn't read a report sent to him by Hunsaker summing up the probe.

``He was included in perhaps two or three meetings, to my knowledge to review key milestones and provide his own input on the priority and motivations behind the investigation," Dunn said. ``Neither Mr. Hurd nor I designed or implemented the investigative techniques."

DOJ_NMG_0070918

Hurd has the unanimous support of the board as he works to contain the scandal, director Robert Ryan said yesterday.

``Mark Hurd has taken complete control of this," Ryan, a Hewlett-Packard director since 2004, said in a telephone interview. ``I feel confident that this is something that won't happen in the future."

To contact the reporter on this story: Leon Lazaroff in New York at llazaroff@Bloomberg.net .

Sonsini Grilled During House Committee Hearing On HP Spying Scandal (LAW)

By Susan Beck And Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, September 29, 2006

In a day of dramatic developments in the Hewlett-Packard Co. spying scandal, Larry Sonsini sat before a packed House committee for nearly five hours Thursday to answer harsh questions as the board's main outside counsel.

Sonsini flatly denied that he had any knowledge of the company's investigation into boardroom leaks until after that probe was finished. Members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, however, repeatedly pressed Sonsini on why he didn't raise concerns about the investigation's unseemly methods when he learned about them in an April report this year.

They also questioned the assurance he gave to former director Thomas Perkins in an e-mail, when he said that the methods used to uncover the source of boardroom leaks, including "pretexting," appeared to be "within legal limits."

BASKINS PARACHUTES OUT

Shortly before the hearings started, Hewlett-Packard announced that its general counsel, Ann Baskins, had resigned. Hewlett-Packard had earlier said that Baskins would testify before the committee, but the longtime HP employee had a sudden change of heart. In a letter hand-delivered to the committee on Thursday, Baskins' lawyers said that they had advised their client to invoke her constitutional right under the Fifth Amendment not to incriminate herself.

Her lawyers -- Berkeley, Calif., white-collar specialist Cristina Arguedas and K. Lee Blalack of O'Melveny & Myers -- said in their letter to the committee that Baskins "very much wants to testify," and if she did so, "we are firmly convinced that the subcommittee would recognize that she acted legally and ethically at all times."

But, they stated, "Given the current environment ... Ms. Baskins simply has no choice."

Arguedas told The Recorder that it was a last-minute decision for her client to leave HP.

"She offered her resignation last week, and Mark Hurd declined it because he wanted her to continue on as general counsel," Arguedas said. "She came to Washington, really, with no intention of resigning, but starting around Monday, she saw the continuing focus on Mark Hurd and [thought] how can he put this event behind him, and how could HP put this behind it, as long as she remained as general counsel."

At that point, Arguedas said, Baskins decided to resign. "They had to make a clean sweep," she said. "She resigned for the good of the company."

No longer an HP staffer, Baskins was left in a difficult position before Congress, Arguedas said. In the hearings, there's little opportunity for witnesses to present their side of events, Arguedas said, and no opportunity for them to present evidence in their own defense. For that reason, Arguedas said she persuaded Baskins to not testify.

"It is not because we were afraid of the facts," Arguedas said. The letter to the committee included pages of documents intended to show that Baskins is not to blame for the troubled leak probe.

Much of Thursday's testimony suggested Baskins had in fact become the designated scapegoat. Both Sonsini and HP's former chairwoman, Patricia Dunn, who sat side by side at the hearing, pointed to Baskins as the person primarily responsible for the oversight of the leaks probe.

Sonsini stressed that he relied on Baskins -- as well as HP in-house lawyer Kevin Hunsaker, who also quit Thursday and took the Fifth -- for advice on whether pretexting is legal. Nonetheless, HP announced in a securities filing Thursday that Baskins will get a severance package that legislators at the committee hearing described as a "$3.6 million golden parachute."

Baskins is holding vested options worth a little over $3.6 million, according to an 8-K HP filed with the SEC. Under the terms of her severance agreement, she can exercise those options before Nov. 22. In addition, HP will accelerate the vesting of up to $1 million of her unvested options so that she may exercise them before Nov. 22, when all her unvested options will otherwise expire.

When asked by the committee why Baskins should receive such a package, Dunn said, "She's a 26-year employee. She bled HP blue ink. Her career is ruined. She made some errors in judgment."

Sonsini looked thin and weary, but he spoke forcefully during the hearing, at times raising his voice slightly in a combative tone when questioned about his judgment. He explained that he received an April 6, 2006, draft report that mentioned that Hewlett-Packard had obtained the phone records of certain individuals, and also discussed the use of "covert intelligence-gathering operations."

At that point, he admitted, "I was concerned about the scope of the investigation." To allay his concerns, however, he simply asked Baskins if she had researched the legality of the techniques used, and she assured him she did, according to his testimony.

He also stated that he was more focused on other things at the time. "When I got the report, it was with the view of what do we do with the result in terms of a corporate governance point of view. I did not focus on this sub rosa investigation."

CAUGHT IN A CROSSFIRE

Although they sat next to each other, Sonsini and Dunn were not always in agreement. At several points, Dunn took issue with Wilson Sonsini memos that the firm wrote in August when the board asked it to investigate the methods used in the company's leaks investigation. The memos indicated that Dunn was aware early on of the use of pretexting to get phone records.

But Dunn repeatedly said she thought the Wilson memos inaccurately described what she told them. "I disagree with the transcription by the Wilson Sonsni lawyer," she said at one point, about an interview conducted by Wilson partner Steven Schatz. Sonsini, for his part, staunchly defended his firm's work product. "I believe Mr. Schatz's ... notes accurately reflect the interview."

Sonsini bristled when Marsha Blackburn, a Tennessee Republican, accused him of contradicting himself regarding his knowledge of pretexting. On the one hand, she pointed out, Sonsini repeatedly told the committee that he wasn't an expert, and had never heard the term before this problem arose. Yet, she said, Sonsini conveyed the sense that he was sufficiently expert enough to chastise former director Perkins for suggesting that the pretexting was illegal.

"With all due respect, I was not chastising Mr. Perkins," Sonsini insisted. "I was being as forthright as I could be in laying out what I knew. I was the first one to tell him about pretexting. I was relying on the HP legal department. ... There's no inconsistency whatsoever in my conduct at this time."

Near the end of the hearing, Sonsini had to wrestle with another hard question: "You were told that people at HP were lying about their identity," said Colorado Democrat Diana DeGette. "You did not raise questions or say this is unacceptable. I don't understand."

"That's a fair question," Sonsini answered. "I didn't know what pretexting was."

Sonsini said he now believes pretexting is "clearly wrong, unethical and improper."

A BRACE OF LAWYERS

Previously Wilson Sonsini had announced that Sonsini would be represented by Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, and partner Michael Madigan was present. But when the committee asked Sonsini who represented him, he named Cravath, Swaine & Moore partner Evan Chesler.

Other Wilson Sonsini lawyers were in the audience, including partner Boris Feldman. Michael Holston of Morgan, Lewis & Bockius, who has supplanted Sonsini to lead Hewlett-Packard in its dealings with state and federal authorities, was also in attendance.

Dunn's lawyer, Morrison & Foerster's James Brosnahan, sat behind her during her testimony. After it concluded, he held a press conference outside the hearing room, in which he described Dunn as the "victim" in this matter.

Susan Beck is a senior writer with The American Lawyer, a Recorder affiliate. Justin Scheck is a reporter at The Recorder.

Investigator Who Worked For H-P Tailed Reporter In Unrelated Probe (WSJ)

By Peter Waldman

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070920

Hewlett-Packard Co.'s outside investigator said he gained access to a Wall Street Journal reporter's hotel-phone records to identify the reporter's source in an unrelated episode before H-P's 2005-06 board-leak investigation, according to an email to H-P from its outside law firm.

Ronald DeLia and his company, Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., are suspected of leading the gathering of personal phone records through false pretenses, or "pretexting," as part of H-P's probe. H-P has acknowledged that nine reporters, including two for The Wall Street Journal, were pretexted as part of that probe. Mr. DeLia and SOS, a small private investigative firm in Needham, Mass., have been under contract with H-P for about eight years, H-P Chief Executive Mark Hurd said in Congressional testimony yesterday.

Private investigator Ronald R. DeLia leaves after taking the Fifth Amendment.

Mr. DeLia told lawyers interviewing him in August 2006, that he had informed Ms. Dunn that "he had undertaken a similar investigation involving leaks from a Big Five accounting firm to a Wall Street Journal reporter. Mr. DeLia was successful in finding the source of the leaks in that case," according to an email circulated at House Energy and Commerce hearings on the H-P scandal yesterday.

The email, titled "Interview of Ron DeLia" and addressed to "HP Securities Litigation Team," was sent on Aug. 25, 2006, from Bahram Seyedin-Noor and Bryan Ketroser, lawyers with Wilson, Sonsini, Goodrich & Rosati. H-P in August asked Wilson Sonsini to investigate H-P's probes of 2005 and 2006.

The email reports that Mr. DeLia said he "had conducted visual -- not electronic -- surveillance of the reporter at issue while on vacation and had skip tracers call the hotel the reporter had been staying at to obtain his hotel call records via pretexting, which revealed a call to a senior executive with the company. Pretexting was also used to determine where the reporter was vacationing -- somebody called the reporter's office saying the reporter had requested certain information and asking someone in the office for the hotel number."

The email doesn't make clear who the Journal reporter was, or where or when the pretexting took place.

"H-P declines to comment to the investigative practices that Mr. DeLia may have used in investigations that are unrelated to H-P," said an H-P spokesman. Ms. Dunn said, through a spokesman, that Mr. DeLia never told her about any prior investigations involving journalists. Mr. Ketroser of Wilson Sonsini declined to comment on his interview with Mr. DeLia. Mr. DeLia couldn't be reached for comment.

"We are looking into this," said a spokesman for The Wall Street Journal.

Write to Peter Waldman at peter.waldman@wsj.com1

Phone Firm Files Pretexter Lawsuit In H-P Leak Case (WSJ)

By Amol Sharma

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

Verizon Wireless filed a lawsuit in New Jersey federal court against individuals who obtained its customers' cellphone records as part of Hewlett-Packard Co.'s scandal-tainted leak investigation.

The company didn't identify any defendants in the "John Doe" suit but described in detail the "pretexting" schemes they used to gain access to call records.

"Defendants used fraud, trickery and deceit to access confidential customer information," the company wrote in the complaint.

Verizon Wireless examined its records after news reports surfaced several weeks ago on the details of H-P's leak investigation, including how the accounts of directors, employees and journalists were fraudulently obtained by private investigators and so-called pretexters working for the company.

The account of one H-P director, who isn't identified in the complaint, was subject to unauthorized access three times since last year, according to Verizon's legal papers. The records of the director's spouse were also accessed, the complaint says.

In May of last year, the complaint says, a pretexter gained access to the director's account by posing as a Verizon Wireless employee in a call with a customer-service agent. Later, the pretexter was able to sign into the customer's online account and change the user ID and password associated with the account.

The company said it couldn't determine what specific account information was obtained during the session.

Verizon Wireless, a joint venture of Verizon Communications Inc. and Vodafone Group PLC, is seeking, among other things, unspecified financial damages for violations of its customers' privacy and is asking for an injunction on all further pretexting activity by the individuals.

The company said it would amend the lawsuit when it learns the identities of the pretexters.

While the H-P case has raised the profile of pretexters, Verizon Wireless and other phone companies were already battling them. Verizon Wireless, Cingular Wireless, Sprint Nextel Corp., and T-Mobile USA have all taken pretexters to court in the past year. Sprint said it filed three such lawsuits this year and has settled two of them.

Write to Amol Sharma at amol.sharma@wsj.com13

Hewlett-Packard Scandal Catalyst Sails Far From Fray (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo And Connie Guglielmo

Bloomberg, September 29, 2006

Sept. 28 (Bloomberg) -- While lawmakers grilled Hewlett- Packard Co. executives in Washington today, the man who exposed the company to public scorn and scrutiny was sailing in his 300- foot yacht.

Venture capitalist Tom Perkins, 74, who resigned from Hewlett-Packard's board in May in protest over the company's handling of a probe into news leaks, is vacationing on his yacht, the Maltese Falcon, spokesman Mark Corallo said.

Perkins's disclosure that Hewlett-Packard had obtained his personal cell-phone and home-phone records sparked an outcry over its use of possibly illegal tactics. The company's probe is being investigated by the California Attorney General, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department.

``Tom takes no pleasure in any of this," Corallo said. ``He has expressed his sorrow about this mess over and over, but he believes this is the best thing for the company."

Perkins, co-founder of venture capital firm Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers, in an August letter to Hewlett-Packard's board accused the world's largest printer maker of improperly obtaining his telephone records and derided actions taken by then-Chairwoman Patricia Dunn.

Fake Identities

He also said the Palo Alto, California-based company covered up the reason he resigned as a director. The letter was made public, and Hewlett-Packard on Sept. 6 revealed in a regulatory filing that Dunn used private investigators who faked their identities to get phone records, a practice known as ``pretexting."

Representative John Dingell, the ranking Democrat on the U.S. House Committee on Energy and Commerce, said at a subcommittee hearing today in Washington that the incident is ``a fine case study in deceit, dishonesty, improper behavior, probably criminal misbehavior, and we have a fine display of arrogance, cover-up and probably gross stupidity."

Dunn, who was ousted last week, and Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd testified as part of a probe into privacy abuses. Dunn said she didn't have direct supervision of the techniques used by investigators and was assured they were legal. Perkins wasn't called to come before the panel.

``He's a footnote," said Nell Minow, editor of Portland, Maine-based Corporate Library, which tracks corporate governance issued. ``It's not his story now."

Perkins had been in the Mediterranean, Corallo said. He didn't know the current whereabouts of the yacht, he said.

`Great Anger'

Perkins factors prominently in Dunn's written testimony submitted to the committee yesterday. She said Perkins ``erupted in great anger" at her during a May 18 board meeting in which directors were told that director George Keyworth was the leaker.

Dunn said Perkins claimed that they had an agreement to ``cover up the name of the leaker" and he resigned because he was angry at her ``betrayal." He made no complaint about the investigation until a week later, she said in her testimony.

Perkins ``didn't feel there was a need for a board member to be singled out," spokesman Corallo said.

``He has made his feelings about the illicit investigation and the unprofessional manner in which it was conducted well known, no matter what is being claimed."

To contact the reporter on this story: Karen Gullo in San Francisco at kgullo@bloomberg.net .

Comverse Ex-CEO Alexander Has Namibia Case Postponed (Update5) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 29, 2006

By Vernon Wessels

Sept. 28 (Bloomberg) -- Jacob ``Kobi" Alexander, the former Comverse Technology Inc. chief executive officer who became a fugitive after being charged with securities fraud, has to stay in a Namibian prison pending a bail hearing on Oct. 2.

Alexander, 54, was arrested at the Windhoek Country Club casino resort in the Namibian capital yesterday and spent the night in jail. The U.S. government said it will ask that he be extradited to face the fraud charges. Alexander's application to be let out on bail while dealing with extradition was postponed today for four days by Magistrate Uaatja Uanivi, who ordered him kept in custody in the meantime.

``Things are very fluid at the moment, and they can change," Alexander's wife Hana said in an interview after the judge's bail ruling at a court in Katatura, near Windhoek. She declined to comment further.

The ex-Israeli intelligence officer turned high-technology entrepreneur was charged by U.S. prosecutors on Aug. 9 with backdating stock options to boost compensation of executives at New York-based Comverse, the world's largest maker of voicemail software. The probe of backdating at Comverse led to the most wide-ranging fraud charges yet from the more than 130 inquiries started by U.S. authorities and companies into manipulations of stock options timing.

The ex-CEO wore a dark blue open-collared shirt, a leather jacket, gray casual pants and black slip-on shoes in court where he repeatedly glanced at the ceiling and reporters during the hearing, which lasted about eight minutes. He sat through the morning and early afternoon in an interview room beside prisoner cells in the building.

Prison

Before being taken back to the prison Alexander was handed a black sports bag by one of his lawyers, advocate Rudi Cohrssen, who told reporters it contained clean clothes and toiletries.

Alexander has been in Namibia for a few months and had enrolled his three children in a local school, Cohrssen said, declining to give more details until the Oct. 2. bail hearing.

The Alexanders bought a brown, 500 square-meter two-story house about a month ago in a secure housing complex attached to the Windhoek Country Club's golf course, said the seller, Colleen Matthysen, who lives two doors away.

``The sale of the house went smoothly" Matthysen said. ``They were very accommodating. They still have some of our stuff in their garage."

$457,000 House

Her husband, Ludwig, sold the house to Alexander for 3.5 million Namibian dollars ($457,000) before the former CEO moved in Aug. 22. He had been staying in a hotel beforehand, Matthysen said.

``I sold through an estate agent," Matthysen said in an interview outside stables two-thirds of a mile from the country club. ``We never even spoke before the transaction."

The Windhoek Country Club is a hotel, golf and casino complex. Its standard rates are 1,400 Namibian dollars ($183) a night in a double room, according to the club Web site.

An official at Namibia's bank regulatory agency about a month ago noticed the transfer of ``tens of millions of dollars" into an account of Alexander, who had arrived days before, the Wall Street Journal reported. The transfer raised suspicions because Alexander had no known Namibian connections, and the official notified Interpol, the Journal said.

Alexander is the second CEO charged in the U.S. government probe of illegal stock-option backdating. Former Brocade Communications Systems Inc. CEO Gregory Reyes pleaded not guilty to 12 counts of securities fraud and other charges that he improperly backdated options at the San Jose-based company, the world's largest maker of switches for storage networks.

Interpol

Alexander was arrested by Interpol and local police on a Namibian warrant issued at the request of the U.S., which has to make an extradition request within 30 days of the arrest, said Dennis Khama, a Namibian justice official who will handle the request.

Namibia amended its laws governing extradition effective yesterday to allow the rendering of fugitives to the U.S., according to a letter from Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf's office filed in Brooklyn federal court. There is no formal extradition treaty between the countries.

Mauskopf's office, which will prosecute Alexander, said today that the government has until Oct. 27 to file a formal extradition request with the Namibian government to return him to the U.S. to face charges.

Mostly Desert

Namibia, a mostly desert country on Africa's southwest coast, shares its border with South Africa, Botswana, Zambia and Angola. It depends on diamonds, fish and tourism for much of its income, with De Beers mining the world's best quality gems from dredging boats in the Atlantic off the country's coast.

Katatura, the site of the court, means ``place we don't want to stay'' in the local Herero language and was founded as a township to settle black Namibians removed from other areas in 1958, when the country was under South African control.

Former subordinates of Alexander, David Kreinberg, Comverse's ex-chief financial officer, and William Sorin, a former general counsel, were also charged last month and released on $1 million bail each.

The three men were accused in a criminal complaint July 31 of changing the dates on millions of Comverse stock options so employees, including themselves, could buy shares at low prices. Kreinberg and Sorin pleaded not guilty.

Linda Lacewell, a prosecutor in Mauskopf's office, said yesterday the government is in talks regarding possible plea agreements with the two former subordinates. The two men would likely be required to cooperate in the prosecution of Alexander in exchange for pleading guilty to lesser charges.

First Charged

After Alexander was first charged, Interpol sent out a global ``red notice,'' asking police to arrest the former CEO. Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for Mauskopf, said Alexander, a citizen of Israel, is also a permanent resident of the U.S.

Alexander wired $57 million to Israel in July from an account at Citigroup Inc.'s Smith Barney Unit, the U.S. government said, calling the transfer an effort to ``launder the proceeds of the fraud.''

A 32-count indictment unsealed yesterday in Brooklyn federal court charged Alexander with crimes relating to an alleged ``slush fund'' and the backdating of stock options from 1998 to 2006. He is charged with conspiracy, securities fraud, making false filings with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, mail fraud, wire fraud and money laundering.

If found guilty of the charges, Alexander may be sentenced to up to 25 years in prison, according to Mauskopf's statement.

The case is U.S. v. Jacob Alexander, 06-CR-00628, U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York (Brooklyn).

To contact the reporter on this story: Vernon Wessels in Windhoek at wessels@bloomberg.net .

U.S. Fugitive In Options Case Displeased By His African Jail (NYT)

By John Grobler And Julie Creswell

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

WINDHOEK, Namibia, Sept. 28 — Brad Pitt and Angelina Jolie had a better time in Namibia than Jacob Alexander is having.

The celebrity couple praised the southwest African country and its government after the birth of their daughter there in May. Mr. Alexander, known as Kobi, is complaining to his lawyers that the food in jail is not quite up to par.

On Thursday, Mr. Alexander, former chief executive of the software communications company Comverse Technology, made his first appearance in front of a magistrate in Windhoek, the Namibian capital.

Appearing unshaved and wearing a black leather jacket, Mr. Alexander, 54, seemed calm at a hearing on his application to be released on bail. The proceeding was postponed until Monday to allow his local lawyers more time to prepare.

That means that Mr. Alexander will spend the next few days in the H-Section of Windhoek Central Prison, the country's largest.

His lawyers said they had been allowed to provide him with a change of clothing and some personal items. But they noted that Mr. Alexander had complained about the quality of the food there and that they were not sure if they would be allowed to bring him food from the outside.

His new surroundings are a vast difference from the Windhoek Country Club Resort and Casino, which he has apparently called home since he, his wife and three children entered the country late in July.

Mr. Alexander was arrested by the Namibian police at lunchtime Wednesday at the golf resort, situated on the city's southern outskirts.

Chief Inspector William Lloyd said Mr. Alexander remained calm when a preliminary warrant from the Justice Department, forwarded to the local Interpol office, was read to him. "But he got very nervous when we handcuffed him," Inspector Lloyd recalled. "He could see there was something serious coming at him."

Before his arrest, Mr. Alexander and his family appeared intent on putting down roots in Windhoek.

A former colleague recalled that they had gone on safari in Africa — he did not know if Namibia's game reserves were on the itinerary — at some point in the last four years or so.

Mr. Alexander's children had been enrolled at a local school, Inspector Lloyd said. Bloomberg News reported Thursday that he had bought a small house next to a golf course in the last month for $457,000.

A deputy prosecutor here, Johnny Truter, said the authorities intended to oppose Mr. Alexander's formal bail application on Monday.

What is unclear is whether he will fight attempts to bring him back to the United States to face charges, including conspiracy, securities fraud and money laundering in connection with a scheme to backdate stock options at Comverse. A 32-count indictment against Mr. Alexander was unsealed on Wednesday by federal prosecutors in Brooklyn.

Two other former executives — the chief financial officer, David Kreinberg, and the general counsel, William F. Sorin — pleaded not guilty to federal charges filed early in August.

After Comverse began an internal investigation into Mr. Alexander's role in the altering of dates of option grants, he resigned early in May. He left the United States and traveled to Israel with his family late in June or early in July, according to a person briefed on his travel.

The United States does not have an formal extradition agreement with Namibia. Nonetheless, Washington intends to request Mr. Alexander's extradition with the understanding that Namibian law permits extradition in the absence of a treaty in some circumstances, according to a State Department spokeswoman.

Dennis Khama of the Namibian Justice Ministry said: "Within the next 30 days, the U.S. must provide us with a formal extradition request or he must be released. He is allowed a formal bail application. If bail is refused, he will be remanded into custody for the next 30 days."

There have been instances of foreigners' fighting extradition proceedings from the country.

Hans-Jürgen Koch, a millionaire who faces tax and related fraud charges in Germany and who owns a luxury lodge and hunting estate in this country, has spent the last four years in a Namibian jail fighting efforts to return him to his homeland.

"What happened there is not going to happen here — that I can say for sure," said Herman Oosthuizen, a local lawyer representing Mr. Alexander. Mr. Oosthuizen is also representing Mr. Koch.

During the proceeding, Mr. Oost- huizen asked the court to refer to Mr. Alexander as "the respondent" and not "the accused."

"My client has not been charged with any crime here in Namibia," he added.

Royal Ahold Will Avoid Prosecution (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 29, 2006

Royal Ahold, the parent of U.S. Foodservice, will not be prosecuted in connection with a criminal fraud investigation that led to charges against a top company official and a shareholder lawsuit, the Justice Department disclosed yesterday.

Ahold and U.S. Foodservice agreed to cooperate with federal investigations of the company and its employees, the United States attorney of New York, Michael Garcia, said in a Sept. 25 letter to company lawyers released yesterday. In light of a $1.1 billion settlement with plaintiffs in a shareholder suit, the government is not asking for additional restitution, the letter said.

The agreement came three weeks after Michael J. Resnick, a former U.S. Foodservice chief financial officer, pleaded guilty to conspiracy in what prosecutors said was an $800 million fraud. His co-defendant, Mark P. Kaiser, a former U.S. Foodservice marketing chief, is set to be tried in New York next month.

Prosecutors said Mr. Resnick helped U.S. Foodservice, based in Columbia, Md., overstate earnings by about $800 million from 2000 to 2003, using false promotional allowance documents provided by vendors.

Ahold, which owns Stop & Shop Stores, admitted in 2003 that it overstated profit by $1.28 billion, mostly related to fraud involving promotional allowances at U.S. Foodservice.

Former Citibank Exec Guilty Of Fraud (NSDY)

By Robert E. Kessler, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 29, 2006

A Great Neck man who formerly headed the worldwide commodities trading division of Citibank admitted Tuesday to doctoring his unit's profits to make them appear to be $20 million greater than they actually were, according to officials.

David Becker, 40, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Manhattan to conspiracy to falsify bank records and wire fraud in a 2003 scheme to improve his job performance and increase his eligibility for bonuses, according to Michael Garcia, the U.S. attorney for the Southern District.

As part of his plea, Becker agreed to forfeit the extra $200,000 he earned through the scheme.

It is a federal crime to defraud bank officials such as Becker's superiors at Citibank.

After the plea, Becker's attorney, Ira Sorkin of Manhattan, said his client was "happy to put this behind him and to get on with his life."

As part of the scheme, Becker conspired with the head of the American trading unit at Citibank to input false data into the firm's computer models and accounting systems, according to court documents. That official was not identified. In addition to creating falsely inflated profits, the scheme underreported the risk in the operations they were undertaking.

U.S. District Judge Alvin Hellerstein scheduled sentencing for Becker for Jan. 26. He could get up to 5 years in prison.

Ex-head Of Citibank Commodities Desk Pleads Guilty In NYC (AP)

AP, September 29, 2006

NEW YORK - The former head of Citibank's worldwide commodities trading activity pleaded guilty Tuesday to conspiracy in a scheme the government says was aimed at inflating trading profits and boosting his eligibility for bonuses.

David Becker, 40, of Great Neck, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Manhattan to conspiracy to falsify bank records and to commit wire fraud. Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein set sentencing for Jan. 26, when Becker could face up to five years in prison.

Becker was charged in a scheme to inflate the trading profits of the Citibank commodities desk by as much as $20 million during 2003.

Federal prosecutors said he wanted to enhance his job performance and his eligibility for bonuses from Citibank.

The government alleged that Becker headed Citibank's worldwide commodities trading activity when he conspired with the head of American commodities trading and sales to overstate the financial performance and understate the market risk of Citibank's commodities desk during 2003.

Becker told Hellerstein that his wrongdoing on $5 million in trades alone generated an extra $1 million in profits on the company's books.

The judge asked him if the appearance of enhanced performance increased the amount of money he was eligible for in bonuses; Becker said that it did.

Prosecutors said Becker essentially doctored the books, manipulating data in the computer so it appeared that profits were higher by millions of dollars than they actually were.

DOJ_NMG_0070926

The government said Becker and his co-conspirator, whose identity it didn't reveal, also caused false information to be reported to the Citibank financial control department, which was responsible for monitoring the commodities desk.

Danielle Romero-Apsilos, a Citibank spokeswoman, said the company fired Becker after an internal investigation, the results of which were immediately referred to authorities, who began a criminal inquiry.

"Citigroup fully cooperated with the authorities and is committed to upholding the highest standards of integrity," she said.

Gatekeeper GCs Increasingly Becoming Targets For Liability (NLJ)

By Sheri Qualters, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, September 29, 2006

An SEC fine of $40K against a general counsel illustrates increased scrutiny

Corporate counsel are starting to look over their shoulders.

When the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission went after Biopure Corp. and its executives for misleading public statements about the U.S. Food and Drug Administration's review of its products, the biopharmaceutical company escaped without financial repercussions.

But the Cambridge, Mass., company's general counsel ended up with a $40,000 civil penalty this month.

The government's cases against Biopure's former president and CEO and former senior vice president of regulatory affairs and operations are ongoing. But the SEC's settlement with general counsel Jane Kober illustrates the escalating government scrutiny of so-called "gatekeepers," including general counsel responsible for safeguarding shareholder's interests.

In-house counsel and their law firm advisers say they're increasingly concerned about potential liability faced by in-house lawyers, who are stepping up their documentation of advice and even taking on additional professional liability insurance as precautionary measures.

Biopure, which settled its case without admitting or denying the SEC's charges, agreed to an injunction against future violations of securities laws and hired an independent consultant to overhaul the company's disclosure policies.

The company did not return calls for comment, but in a Sept. 12 statement, Chairman and CEO Zafiris Zafirelis said that the settlement "removes a cloud over the company." Kober, who also settled with the agency without admitting or denying allegations, also did not return calls for comment.

INCREASED GC SCRUTINY

General counsel are increasingly scrutinized for their actions, said Karl Chen, co-chairman of the securities committee for the Washington Metropolitan area chapter of the Association of Corporate Counsel.

Chen, who is also a lawyer with Arlington, Va.-based recruiting company Watson Wyatt Worldwide Inc., pointed to a 2004 SEC order against John E. Isselmann Jr., former general counsel of Electro Scientific Industries Inc. of Portland, Ore. The SEC did not charge Isselmann with involvement in a fraudulent accounting scheme hatched by other corporate executives. But it brought a case against him for failing to provide information about a transaction to the company's board, auditors and audit committee.

That omission, which the SEC believes allowed other executives to hide the fraud from the auditors and board, resulted in the false reporting of a profit instead of a loss during a quarter in 2002. Isselmann settled the case with the agency for $50,000 and agreed to cease and desist from causing violations of SEC rules.

"If [the SEC] finds or believes there was a failure to convey material information they're certainly going after them and penalizing them," said Chen. "You probably have to fully document advice you provide."

Although he doesn't believe that the SEC treated him fairly, Isselmann said he was glad he resolved the case without litigation or a finding of wrongdoing.

He now practices government law and administrative law at his Vista Strategies consulting company in Salem, Ore.

Whatever the outcome, lawyers say their professional credibility is on the line from the first day the SEC brings such a case.

"It's not just your company at stake, it's your reputation at stake," said Lee Braem, president-elect of the New Jersey Corporate Counsel Association.

DOJ_NMG_0070927

Braem said general counsel need to be concerned about rulings like Biopure because as officers and executives of companies, they "fit into that category of individual the government is allowed to go after."

The government often overreaches when it brings criminal charges against lawyers and accountants who are trying to fix problems in their companies, said white-collar defense lawyer Robert Ullmann of Boston's Nutter McClennen & Fish. "Just because a lawyer or an accountant doesn't quit or doesn't do enough fast enough in the government's eyes, that's not a proper basis for a criminal charge," Ullmann said.

'SCRIVENERS' NO MORE

The current mindset at enforcement agencies is that general counsel need to protect the shareholders' best interests, not just do the management team's bidding, said William Schuman, a securities litigation lawyer in McDermott Will & Emery's Chicago office.

"The days when in-house lawyers were thought of [as] scriveners are over," Schuman said. "We're seeing more inquiries and investigations where the conduct of in-house counsel is being examined every bit as much as the businesspeople's."

That SEC philosophy leads to tension for general counsel, who both serve on an executive team and have responsibilities as company watchdogs under the rules of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, said Frederick Gonzalez, general counsel of network security device maker SonicWALL Inc. of Sunnyvale, Calif.

"There's a fundamental tension between all the constituencies that look to the general counsel for ethical leadership, moral leadership and compliance leadership," Gonzalez said.

Sarbanes-Oxley added layers of responsibility for lawyers, but a well-known speech made by former SEC enforcement director Stephen M. Cutler two years ago at the University of California at Los Angeles School of Law raised awareness throughout the legal community, said Susan Hackett, senior vice president and general counsel of the Washington-based Association of Corporate Counsel.

In that speech Cutler said that the agency had stepped up its scrutiny of the role of lawyers and other gatekeepers in corporate fraud cases since 2002.

An SEC spokesman said that the agency brought more than two dozen enforcement actions against attorneys, including gatekeeper and stock market manipulation cases, in the fiscal year that ended on Sept. 30, 2005.

Holding corporate gatekeepers, including general counsel, responsible for the company's misleading or incomplete disclosures is still a priority, said David Bergers, district administrator of the SEC's Boston office.

"The commission will continue to focus on misleading disclosures in the biotechnology industry and other industries to ensure investors receive accurate info," Bergers said.

Most lawyers who face SEC sanctions had their hand in the cookie jar, according to a March 2005 study by the corporate counsel association, but the overall scrutiny of lawyers is much tighter and the number of cases is on the upswing, Hackett said.

"General counsel are seen as a fiduciary leader," Hackett said. "Therefore, they are now responsible [for what the company does]."

EXTRA INSURANCE

Relying on the advice of outside lawyers has proven an effective way to avoid at least criminal liability for a lawyer who is not actually involved in the wrongdoing, Hackett said.

Some lawyers are investing in extra insurance protection in case the government comes knocking.

Layering an employed-lawyer insurance policy on top of directors and officers liability insurance is one strategy, said Jennifer Camacho, vice president of intellectual property and chief patent counsel at Cambridge, Mass.-based Codon Devices Inc.

Camacho, who said employed-lawyer insurance runs about $3,000 to $4,000 per year, said she negotiated for the insurance during her employment offer.

"The D&O insurance isn't sufficient for in-house counsel," said Camacho. "It wasn't five years ago and it certainly isn't now."

Yet, ultimately, staying out of trouble can be as simple, and as difficult, as accepting that the general counsel's role is often to play the heavy among highly optimistic business leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0070928

Insisting on disclosure of potential problems with the company's product can be challenging among a crowd that relies on sheer force of will to overcome obstacles to build new companies, said RoseAnn Rotandaro of Armor Legal Counsel in Palo Alto, Calif., who was formerly general counsel at two high-tech companies.

"It's hard to be a general counsel in an emerging growth company," Rotandaro said. "At times you have to really kind of help people understand why you're always the bad-news person. You have to be strong and stubborn and not be afraid to be in people's faces."

Hedge Fund Shrinks Staff And Faces S.E.C. Inquiry (NYT)

By Jenny Anderson

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

Pirate Capital, a hedge fund that takes pride in attacking management at underperforming companies, now finds itself under fire.

Pirate Capital, a $1.7 billion fund based in Norwalk, Conn., lost half its investment team this week, according to a letter from the founder and portfolio manager, Thomas Hudson. In addition, Pirate, an "activist" fund that pressures management to increase shareholder value, is being investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission on suspicion of failing to alert the commission when it was selling stock, according to one person briefed on the inquiry.

Mr. Hudson's letter, dated Sept. 28 and on stationery with a pirate ship logo, said that Pirate would close to new investors Sunday, to focus on delivering returns rather than collecting more money.

"I've decided to return the firm to its roots," Mr. Hudson wrote. "The goal is to focus on returns and not the size of the assets we manage."

Pirate Capital has had a difficult year: its flagship Jolly Roger Fund is up only 3.3 percent, while its activist fund is up 2.86 percent, according to materials sent to investors. Those returns are well below the average activist fund. Hedge Fund Research in Chicago tracks the returns of 44 funds that operate solely activist strategies; through August those funds have returned 10.39 percent.

An S.E.C. spokesman, John Nester, declined to comment. Isa Bolotin, head of investor relations at Pirate Capital, did not return calls seeking comment.

Pirate is known for its unusually brash tactics and unabashed style. A New York magazine cover article reported that Zachary George, 27, an analyst with the firm and former competitive snowboarder, told the chief executive of the Cornell Companies, a prison operator, that "You work for us," and that Mr. George and Pirate wanted Cornell sold and the chief executive sacked. "Next year we're going to be here, and you won't," Mr. George told the chief executive, according to the article.

Mr. Hudson said two investment professionals, including Mr. George, resigned on Monday. On Wednesday, Carl Klein, a portfolio manager, resigned, and Mr. Hudson asked two more analysts to leave. Five people, including Mr. Hudson, remain.

Pirate, which uses terms like "shipwrecks" and "treasures" in its investor letters, is considered rare for its openness to publicity.

Not all investors welcome that approach. "Any fund that promotes itself in the news indicates one of two things," said Gordon C. Haave, director of investment and consulting at the Asset Services Company, a consulting firm. "That the fund manager is spending a lot more time worrying about his image in the community than about his investments, or two, that he is advertising to the rest of the world how everyone ought to copy his or her strategy."

The result, he said, was more money flowing into activist funds and the prospect of too many people chasing the same returns.

According to documents provided to prospective investors, Pirate Capital was started in 2002 with $2 million by Thomas Hudson, who worked in the distressed-asset area at Goldman Sachs, and his wife, Gabrielle Katz Hudson, who was responsible for "legal transfer documentation for private assets" at Goldman. The same document says that Mr. Hudson sued Goldman Sachs for wrongful dismissal after being asked to leave the firm because of a "consensual extramarital affair with a co-worker." That woman, according to the same document, became his wife, Gabrielle. The litigation, according to the document, was dismissed.

DOJ_NMG_0070929

The S.E.C. is investigating whether Pirate was late in reporting to the commission material changes in its holdings. Investors with at least a 5 percent stake must report any changes to those holdings.

Some of Pirate's top investments took a drubbing recently, after a significant rise at the end of August. For example, Cutter & Buck, the apparel company, traded from $9.40 up to $11.17 toward the end of August before falling back to $9.48 yesterday. Walter Industries, which Pirate owned 8.1 percent of at the end of August, rallied to $55.12 at the end of August and has fallen to $43.56. Strong month-end buying can reflect portfolio managers buying stock to push up prices. It is not clear what drove those two stocks.

Regulators are increasingly concerned about "clustered" trades, or copycat trades among hedge funds, according to two regulators.

Pirate has planned a call for Tuesday to address investor concerns.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Pirro Wants Wiretap Leaks Investigated (NSDY)

By John Riley

Newsday, September 28, 2006

An embattled Jeanine Pirro Thursday asked U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to investigate the leaking of wiretaps that implicate her in a plot to bug her husband as she tried to dig her state attorney general campaign out from under the rubble of disclosures that she is the target of an FBI probe.

"To date, the leak is the only crime committed here," the former Westchester County district attorney wrote to Gonzales one day after confirming at a dramatic news conference that she asked former New York City police commissioner Bernard Kerik to plant a recording device on a family yacht to try to catch her husband Albert in a tryst.

The FBI is investigating whether Pirro violated federal wiretapping laws.

In the letter, as well as an appearance in the Bronx and an interview with Fox News' Bill O'Reilly, Pirro spent the day frantically trying to move offensively. She asked for a special prosecutor to fast-track the probe and conclude it before Election Day. She called for the federal prosecutor who convicted Albert Pirro of tax fraud in 2000, Elliot Jacobson, to be removed from the new inquiry for alleged bias.

She also tried to draw her Democratic foe, Andrew Cuomo, into the fray, telling Gonzales that 20 years ago, Jacobson and Cuomo briefly worked together for the Manhattan district attorney, and taking a pass when a reporter asked if she thought Cuomo was somehow involved in leaking the wiretaps of her conversations with Kerik to a New York television station.

"What I can tell you is this: We're going to find out," Pirro said in response to a question. Cuomo's campaign said he didn't know Jacobson, and noted that Republican prosecutors are running the inquiry. Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia, a Republican appointee, has denied any political motivations in the probe.

Pirro was also struggling to line up political support. Republican State Senate Majority Leader Joseph Bruno and Gov. George Pataki both waited a day to say they backed her, but last night the campaign said both had agreed to host fundraisers. Rudolph Giuliani backed out of a fundraiser Wednesday.

"This is a dispute between a husband and wife," Pataki said.

Outside the world of politics, that view got some support. "We sympathize with anyone whose privacy has been invaded," said Marcia Pappas, president of the New York chapter of the National Organization for Women. "If they were having marital problems, it's their private issue."

But the GOP candidate for governor, John Faso, called the allegations "very troubling," and political experts said Pirro's outlook was grim. "If you're running for attorney general and under investigation for criminal wrongdoing, it's not the stuff of which successful campaigns are made," said pollster Lee Miringoff.

As she did Wednesday, Pirro continued to maintain that Kerik never actually planted the bug they discussed, and that even if he had, it wasn't illegal for one spouse to surreptitiously tape another. In her letter to Gonzales, she cited three New York federal cases from the 1970s and 1980s for that assertion.

DOJ_NMG_0070930

But her position drew sharp disagreement from several legal experts, such as Patricia Bellia, a Notre Dame law professor who co-authored a respected treatise on wiretapping. She said the federal statute contains no spousal exception, and the civil cases Pirro cited were all outdated.

"The trend is that courts are rejecting the idea that intraspousal surveillance is exempt," Bellia said.

"I don't think from a personal point of view that the government should be investigating a familial situation," said John Pollok, a Manhattan criminal-defense lawyer. "But on the other hand, the statute is pretty clear that what she did is illegal."

"She's a former district attorney, and she knows better," said Lynne Gold-Bikin, a former chairwoman of the American Bar Association's committee on family law. "Even if there's some case from the 1970s, you don't want the person who's supposed to enforce the law looking for back doors."

Pirro Hits Trail After Inquiry Emerges (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

After acknowledging on Wednesday that she is under investigation by federal prosecutors in New York, Jeanine F. Pirro, the Republican candidate for state attorney general, was back on the campaign trail today, insisting that she would not drop out of the race and calling for a federal inquiry into the leak of sealed transcripts of court-ordered wiretaps.

“I am calling on the United States attorney, Alberto Gonzales, to begin an investigation, to appoint a special prosecutor, to get Elliott Jacobson off this witch hunt,” she said, referring to the prosecutor who is heading the investigation of her and who sent her husband to jail for 11 months in 2000.

The investigation of Ms. Pirro is focused on whether she and Bernard B. Kerik, the former New York City police commissioner, illegally taped conversations of Ms. Pirro’s husband last year to determine if he was having an extramarital affair.

This afternoon Ms. Pirro’s campaign released the text of the letter she sent to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales in which she asked that a special prosecutor be appointed to conduct an investigation of the leak and to report the results within 20 days.

“To date, the leak is the only crime committed here,” the letter says.

Her letter echoes comments she made this morning at a meeting of the New York Hispanic Clergy Organization in Morris Park. “Court documents that were sealed documents were released to the press,” Ms. Pirro said. “Ladies and gentlemen, that is a felony. That is the only felony that has occurred in this situation.”

She added, “I have fought to keep my family together and I’m proud of it.”

Ms. Pirro got a warm reception from the clergy members, who praised her for standing by her husband.

“She deserves our praise, she deserves our admiration, she deserves our sympathy,” said State Senator Ruben Diaz Sr., a Democrat and president of the clergy organization. “She is a heroine.”

Republican leaders in the state were not rushing to her defense. Speaking at a meeting of county officials in Lake George, the Republican candidate for governor, John Faso, called the accusations against Ms. Pirro “very troubling.”

“All I know about this is what I’ve read in the newspapers,” Mr. Faso said today. “Obviously, it has to play itself out and we’ll hear what authorities say and what she says in coming days, but they’re very troubling, obviously.”

But Joseph L. Bruno, the State Senate majority leader, released a statement today supporting Ms. Pirro: “As we have learned in the past, people can see beyond a public official’s marital difficulties and focus on their qualifications and record of service.

“I am confident that the people of New York will see beyond Jeanine Pirro’s situation, recognize her qualifications and see that she is the best choice to be New York State’s next attorney general.”

And the state chairman of the Conservative Party, Michael Long, said of Ms. Pirro, who is also his party’s nominee: "Very much she’s still a viable candidate. This is a bump in the road," according to The Associated Press

At a hastily arranged news conference on Wednesday, called because of an imminent television report on the inquiry, Ms. Pirro conceded that she had her husband, Albert, followed in the summer of 2005. She said she had discussed bugging the family's boat with Mr. Kerik, an old friend who was then running his own security business. But Ms. Pirro, who was the district attorney of Westchester County at the time, said she never went through with the plan, and she insisted that she broke no laws.

DOJ_NMG_0070931

Seething with anger, and choking up as she laid bare her marital problems, Ms. Pirro said that two federal agents approached her at her home late one recent night and revealed that the United States attorney's office for the Southern District of New York was investigating her surveillance discussions. They had been caught on tape by Bronx authorities who were conducting a separate investigation of Mr. Kerik.

With less than six weeks to go until the Nov. 7 election, Ms. Pirro said she was being hounded by authorities as part of a "political witch hunt and smear campaign" led by the same federal lawyer who helped convict Mr. Pirro of tax evasion in 2000. But the United States attorney for the Southern District, Michael J. Garcia, a Republican appointee, issued a statement denying that the inquiry was politically motivated.

Ms. Pirro said she would remain in the race against the Democratic nominee, Andrew M. Cuomo, although top Republican leaders appeared torn over her fate, and former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani canceled a fund-raiser for her next month. A telegenic politician who has often appeared as a commentator on legal matters, she has been considered a potential future leader of the party and perhaps a candidate for governor. Republican leaders had considered Ms. Pirro's bid to replace Attorney General Eliot Spitzer as the party's best hope of capturing a statewide office.

At her news conference on Wednesday, Ms. Pirro acknowledged that she was angry with Mr. Pirro, who fathered a child in an extramarital affair in the 1980's, and with whom Ms. Pirro has two children. But she said she was guilty only of the anger of a woman scorned. And she also said her political fate should be a matter of concern to women.

"There is no way — when I have the opportunity to be the first woman attorney general in the history of this state — that I am going to be pushed out of this race because somebody wants to delve into the personal lives of my husband and myself," she said. "I'm standing up for myself and I'm standing up for women."

Ms. Pirro, a former three-term district attorney, repeatedly said her actions were not illegal. Legal experts said the law was murky, and one important factor was whether the boat, owned by Mr. Pirro, would be treated the same way as a marital home. Mr. Pirro did not return telephone calls for comment.

Details of the conversations between Ms. Pirro and Mr. Kerik were rushed onto the air by WNBC-TV, which broke into its regular programming. Minutes later, Ms. Pirro held her news conference, in which she said prosecutors had no business investigating her "matrimonial discord," and she demanded an investigation into how the report of her conversations with Mr. Kerik was leaked.

Joseph Tacopina, Mr. Kerik's lawyer, said Wednesday that nothing illegal was discussed or done. "Bernie spoke to a friend in distress regarding a domestic conflict," Mr. Tacopina said.

WNBC said the conversations included profanity-laden rants by Ms. Pirro about her husband, as well as politically damaging remarks. At one point, according to WNBC, she is said to be heard dismissing the attorney general's job as a "been there, done that kind of thing" for her; at another, she suggests she could be governor if not for Mr. Pirro's baggage. Ms. Pirro had initially run to unseat Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, but pulled out of that race late last year at the urging of party leaders.

Ms. Pirro blamed for the revelations a man far less known to most New Yorkers, Elliott B. Jacobson, an assistant United States attorney who prosecuted Mr. Pirro in 2000 and sent him to jail for 11 months. She said Mr. Jacobson's motives were "personal and highly improper" and, as a result, federal agents were now "prying into the personal lives of married couples."

"Let me reiterate my disappointment with the United States attorney's office for allowing an unethical overzealous prosecutor with a partisan political agenda using taxpayers' money and public resources to pursue a baseless investigation into a marital situation and seek to affect the outcome of an election," Ms. Pirro said.

The United States attorney, Mr. Garcia, confirmed the investigation in a statement on Wednesday and disputed Ms. Pirro's accusation that the inquiry was politically motivated.

"Because the investigation is ongoing, we will not comment as to its substance, except to say that we do not take politics into account in deciding either the subject matter or timing of our investigations," said Mr. Garcia, who was appointed by President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0070932

The new revelations set the latest scene in one of the most Shakespearean political dramas in New York, the complicated lives of the Pirros, and immediately set off speculation about Ms. Pirro's future. State Republican leaders, who have suffered through the Pirro marriage for years now, watching her scuttle past plans to run for lieutenant governor and United States Senate, appeared torn over what to do.

The chairmen of the Republican and Conservative Parties, which are both running Ms. Pirro on their November ballot lines, issued statements supporting her candidacy. But these are two parties with a history of sacrificing problematic candidates, and Mr. Giuliani's move to cancel his Pirro fund-raiser was widely seen by top Republicans as a sign of things to come.

Other respected party leaders, like Edward F. Cox, a son-in-law of President Nixon, said openly that they doubted her candidacy could survive this latest controversy.

"The political issue is not whether she broke any laws, but the fact that she would think about doing this to her husband raises questions about her judgment and about whether you want that individual as attorney general," said Mr. Cox, a Manhattan lawyer who briefly ran against Ms. Pirro for the Republican nomination for the United States Senate against Mrs. Clinton last year.

Ms. Pirro said on Wednesday that she was staying with her husband, and she came close to tears as she explained why.

"My husband is a great father. I have two beautiful children in school, a teenage son who needs his father with him," she said, and then choked up audibly as she added, "These are personal choices that I have made, and I shouldn't have to keep explaining them."

Mr. Pirro, a prominent lawyer, Westchester power broker and a friend of state Republican leaders, has been a frequent source of embarrassment to his wife. Besides his prior conviction on tax evasion charges, investigations of his business practices have drawn scrutiny, particularly his ties to reputed mob figures, and he was ticketed twice for speeding this summer.

Ms. Pirro's lawyer, Paul Shechtman, maintained Wednesday that case law existed to support a spousal exception to the federal wiretapping statute. Regardless, he added emphatically, Ms. Pirro had never actually bugged the boat.

"There were no devices, no devices were put in anywhere," Mr. Shechtman said.

The tape recording of the Pirro-Kerik conversation was made by the Bronx district attorney's office and later provided to the F.B.I. It was made as part of the investigation into Mr. Kerik's acceptance of a free apartment renovation from a contractor looking for city work.

Ms. Pirro spoke to Mr. Kerik when she was dragging out deliberations in the summer of 2005 over whether to run for governor, senator or attorney general in 2006. She said at that time that she took so long to make her choice because her mother had been ill; it became clear for the first time on Wednesday that her concern about her husband's behavior was also a factor in the much-delayed decision.

"This was one of the reasons we wanted her to run for Senate — all this awful Al Pirro stuff would cloud her credentials to be the top law enforcement officer," said one Republican Party official who spoke only when granted anonymity.

The campaign of Mr. Cuomo, the son of former Gov. Mario M. Cuomo, and Democratic Party officials said they had nothing to do with the revelations. Ms. Pirro did not accuse her opponent, though associates of hers suggested that Mr. Cuomo and Mr. Jacobson might have worked together long ago.

Yet it is another man, Mr. Pirro, who has done more damage to Ms. Pirro than anyone else over time, Republicans and political analysts said Wednesday. Ms. Pirro acknowledged as much at her news conference, urging voters not to hold her accountable for a husband who had driven her to profound bitterness.

"I was a very angry woman and I said a lot of things, but what matters is what I did and didn't do, and I didn't do anything here other than vent," Ms. Pirro said.

New York Family Feuds Go Public (WP)

By Michael Powell

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

NEW YORK, Sept. 28 -- This is proving to be quite a hellish year or so on the campaign trail for Jeanine Pirro.

Pirro, a longtime Republican district attorney who is running for state attorney general, acknowledged this week that she asked Bernard B. Kerik, a former New York City police commissioner, to plant a listening device on her family yacht. She hoped to catch her husband, who already has fathered one child out of wedlock, in flagrante delicto .

Kerik, who has a few potential legal problems of his own, is heard on a government tape cautioning Pirro that her request comes laden with risk. "Everyone is panic-stricken because it's you," Kerik is heard telling her on tapes obtained by a local NBC affiliate. "I've gone out on a limb."

"What am I supposed to do, Bernie?" she is heard replying. "Watch him [vulgar verb for intimate activity] her every night?"

Federal prosecutors in New York have launched an investigation of whether Pirro's conversations with Kerik jumped the tracks from angry spouse to conspirators to illegal bugging. That investigation outraged Pirro, 55, who insists her behavior reflects nothing more than the fury of a long-suffering spouse with a philandering husband.

"Sometime last year I came to believe my husband was seeing another woman," she said during a news conference Wednesday that was fraught with emotion. "I was angry, and had him followed to see if what I suspected was true."

The real crime, she has repeatedly emphasized, was committed by whomever leaked word of the investigation -- and the tapes -- to reporters. She strongly suggested that the leak came from the office of the federal prosecutor, who years ago obtained a felony conviction against her husband.

"Prying into the personal lives of married couples is not the business of a federal prosecutor, and it's time to stop," she said.

Pirro summarized her grievances in a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales. So by Thursday, there was this intriguing spectacle: A Republican candidate had demanded that a Republican attorney general investigate a Republican federal prosecutor, accused of submarining her candidacy.

In pointed response, federal prosecutor Michael Garcia promptly released a statement confirming the investigation.

"This office is, as Jeanine Pirro said today, investigating allegations recently brought to our attention by other law enforcement agencies," Garcia said. "Their actions, and those of the FBI agents with whom they are working, have been approved by several layers of supervisors, including me."

It already has been a long strange campaign cycle for Pirro. Last fall, she announced her intent to challenge Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). The early betting line was for a doozy of a race, as two smart, rhetorically sharp and polished pols had at it.

But Pirro faltered out of the gates, losing a page of her televised announcement speech and falling silent for 32 very long seconds. Then she talked about New York's border with Ohio, forgetting that Pennsylvania lay in between. Then her husband, Albert Pirro, a millionaire lobbyist, was caught trying to persuade Republican powerbrokers to force his wife to drop out of her race.

Pirro, the husband, has been a source of unending problems for Pirro, the wife. An influential fellow, he has served 11 months in prison for hiding $1 million in taxable income. He claimed his purchase of dozens of gilded items -- from pet pigs to his Ferrari and her Mercedes-Benz -- as business expenses. (Jeanine Pirro signed those tax forms but was not implicated.)

Then there is his child fathered out of wedlock, whom Albert acknowledged only after being confronted with DNA evidence.

Events have left Jeanine Pirro, who already was trailing her opponent, Andrew M. Cuomo, the son of the former governor, by double digits in recent polls, looking at a long slog to election day. "Looked at crassly, women very often get a pass on jerk husbands," said Joseph Mercurio, a political consultant in New York. "But this? It's a nail in her political coffin."

Pirro: Emotional Outburst Or Something More Sinister? (WNBC-TV)

WNBC-TV, New York, September 29, 2006

NEW YORK -- Now that Jeanine Pirro has openly discussed the criminal investigation focused on her, the big question revolves around her thoughts about eavesdropping on her husband: Was it a passing notion, or a lingering obsession?

In fact, NewsChannel 4 has learned the New York attorney general candidate may have spoken more than once about the possibility of spying on her husband.

DOJ_NMG_0070934

Pirro denies any criminal wrongdoing and claims all she did was complain about her husband to former New York City Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik. However, NewsChannel 4's Jonathan Dienst has learned phone conversations between the two might have taken place over a longer period of time.

In one call, Pirro called Kerik and apparently complained that for weeks she had been waiting for Kerik's people to plant a recording device on Albert Pirro's boat. Records now in the hands of numerous defense attorneys and at least six different state and federal agencies show Pirro complained bitterly.

"He went through the whole thing about, you know, who had the right to be on the boat and all this stuff and I said to him, 'Look,' I said, 'It's my, my ... it's (the boat's) in his name, but I have a right to be on it. I'd like to go on it when he's (Albert's) playing golf.' Um, he wasn't comfortable with that and with that I just said, 'Thank you very much.' He said he couldn't trust the fact that, you know, at some point I might say that he did it. And, um, I got to tell you Bernie, he wasted a month of my time," Pirro said in the recording, according to documents.

Yesterday, Pirro described her talks with Kerik by saying, "I didn't do anything here other than vent."

Pirro, a Republican, is handling the investigation by denying the allegations and trying to attack the professionalism of prosecutors. U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia is a career prosecutor who was appointed by a Republican, President George W. Bush.

Pirro is calling on U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez to conduct a probe, saying one of the assistants on the case is biased in part because he also prosecuted her husband Albert on tax fraud charges years ago.

Pirro: I'm Determined To Stay In Race (WP/AP)

By Mark Johnson, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. -- The National Organization for Women came to the defense of Jeanine Pirro and Republican leaders said there were no plans to drop her as their candidate for state attorney general Thursday after it learned she is under federal investigation over a plan to secretly record her unfaithful husband.

A defiant Pirro said she is determined to stay in the race and will seek a federal investigation into the leak of sealed court documents regarding her discussions with former New York City Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik about taping her husband, Albert Pirro.

The leak "is the only felony that has occurred in this situation," Pirro told the New York Hispanic Clergy Association in New York City.

Pirro said that she had talked with Kerik about her desire to tape her husband and find out whether he was having another affair. But she denied any taping took place, and said she was was simply venting her anger in discussing the idea with Kerik.

Albert Pirro, a millionaire lobbyist, spent 11 months in prison after being convicted of tax fraud in 2000. He fathered an illegitimate daughter after the couple's wedding in 1975.

Marcia Pappas, president of the New York state chapter of NOW, said her group supports Jeanine Pirro "completely for fighting back on this intrusion."

"It's absolutely horrendous the government would intrude on anyone's life in this way," she said. "They are targeting her because she is a woman. If anyone believes in the right to privacy, they should be enraged by the behavior by our government."

Pirro, former district attorney of Westchester County, just outside New York City, has long been regarded as a rising star in the New York GOP.

Ryan Moses, executive director of the state Republican Party, said there are no plans to try to replace Pirro on the ticket. The only way to get off the ballot at this late date would be death, a move out of state, or a nomination for another office, such as a judgeship.

Asked if Pirro should quit the race or if his support for her was wavering, Republican Gov. George Pataki said, "No, not at all. This is a dispute between a husband and wife." Pataki called Pirro "the best-qualified candidate" for the post.

DOJ_NMG_0070935

Pirro said she would contact Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez requesting that a special prosecutor be assigned to find the leak. And she said she would seek to have Assistant U.S. Attorney Elliott Jacobson removed from the case. Jacobson successfully prosecuted her husband on tax charges. Pirro has called the taping investigation a partisan witch hunt.

Asked if she thought her Democratic opponent, former federal Housing Secretary Andrew Cuomo, was involved in the leak, Pirro said, "What I can tell you is this: We're going to find out."

Cuomo campaign spokeswoman Wendy Katz said: "Ms. Pirro can refer any questions to the Republican Westchester District Attorney, the Republican U.S. attorney and the Republican head of the FBI investigating this matter."

The U.S. Attorney's office in New York declined to comment, and the Justice Department in Washington did not immediately return a call.

___

Associated Press writers Marc Humbert in Albany and Beth Fouhy in New York contributed to this report.

___

On the Net:

Jeanine Pirro: http://www.jeaninepirro.com

Andrew Cuomo: http://www.andrewcuomo.com

Candidate And Erring Spouse Rose To Power In Partnership (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton And Mike McIntire

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

To hear Jeanine F. Pirro's supporters tell it, she is a wronged woman leg-shackled to a loser, an ambitious and effective wife brought low by her badly behaved husband, Albert.

Now her fears about his philandering have set off a federal investigation into possible eavesdropping and have threatened to derail her quest to become New York attorney general.

But to many people who have been watching the couple for decades, the Pirros look a lot like an echo of that other Westchester power couple, the Clintons, who are also political and financial partners whose fates and fortunes are profoundly intertwined. The Pirros live in Rye, the Clintons in Chappaqua.

When it comes to the Pirros, "There's no question they are partners, there's no question it's a symbiotic relationship," said Murray Richman, a Bronx defense lawyer who knows both of the Pirros. "There's no question Jeanine would never be where she is without Al."

Mr. Pirro, 59, a lawyer and lobbyist, has provided money and political contacts for his wife's career and has financed their way of life: the fancy cars, the expensive houses, the pampered pot-bellied pigs. Her campaigns have been heavily financed by his business associates in Westchester, where he has a hand in many real estate projects. She, in turn, reflected her glamour and political power onto him.

"Picture those two as the celebrities, the royalty, the power brokers in Westchester," said Bennett L. Gershman, a former prosecutor and professor of law at Pace University who has been a frequent critic of Ms. Pirro, 55.

The Pirros' relationship has often come with a cost to Ms. Pirro, starting two decades ago when she dropped her bid for lieutenant governor in the face of questions about her husband's ties to a company in the garbage-hauling business, an activity that was often linked to the mob. (At the time, she said Mr. Pirro was not comfortable revealing his clients.)

During Mr. Pirro's 2000 trial on charges of tax evasion, it became clear that she had benefited from his largess. But prosecutors said they were not accusing her of knowing that her husband improperly deducted as business expenses items ranging from her two-seater Mercedes to a $135 gold mirror. More recently, mobsters were caught on tape claiming that Mr. Pirro had tipped them off to an investigation conducted by the Westchester district attorney's office when Ms. Pirro ran it, a claim he denied.

Ms. Pirro's loyalty to her husband has confounded those inside and outside the political world, and this week she hinted at why she stood by her man. At a news conference on Wednesday, she confirmed that she had talked to Bernard B. Kerik, the former New York police commissioner who is now a security consultant, about planting a listening device on her husband's boat.

DOJ_NMG_0070936

But she said no taping was done, and claimed that federal investigators looking into the matter were conducting a "political witch hunt."

Then she said she was tired of having to justify her relationship with her husband. He is a "great father" to their children, she said — a teenage son and a daughter in college. "These are personal choices that I have made, and I shouldn't have to keep explaining them."

But earlier in her career, she was happy to talk about Mr. Pirro, whom she once described as "the most exciting person I knew: quick, bright, always doing, very much an activist."

Jeanine and Albert Pirro met at Albany Law School, and were married in 1975, the year she graduated. She went to work in the Westchester district attorney's office, eventually becoming head of its domestic violence unit.

Mr. Pirro, meanwhile, became one of the leading real estate lawyers in Westchester, representing developers of offices, garages, malls and movie theaters. He represented Donald J. Trump in his effort to buy an island off New Rochelle in Long Island Sound.

Raising money for Republicans like George E. Pataki, Mr. Pirro became "the consummate political insider," in the words of Michael R. Edelman, a lawyer and Republican political commentator who has been a friend of the Pirros for three decades.

From her very first serious race — for judge in 1990 — Mr. Pirro used his connections to help his wife, according to a 1997 interview. That year, Mr. Pirro was under investigation for paying $5,000 to a Republican ward leader in Yonkers while he was seeking approvals for a theater complex there.

Mr. Pirro said the money was not a bribe but payment for a consulting arrangement that he initiated in order to gain inroads into the Republican establishment in Yonkers, where Ms. Pirro was largely unknown.

"What occurs is that we start to build a relationship in Yonkers," Mr. Pirro said, "which is not atypical in a political power move."

Mr. Pirro was never charged in connection with the payment, which was investigated by the same federal prosecutor, Elliott B. Jacobson, who Ms. Pirro said is involved in the current investigation of her dealings with Mr. Kerik.

Over the years, as Ms. Pirro's stature within the Republican Party grew, she developed a solid fund-raising base of her own and could reliably attract contributions from an array of companies and wealthy individuals, many of them her neighbors in Westchester.

Still, some of her largest contributors continue to be her husband's clients and business associates, who collectively have contributed tens of thousands of dollars to her campaigns.

Louis Cappelli, a longtime lobbying client and business partner of Mr. Pirro's, gave $25,000 to her campaign for attorney general in July and $4,200 to her Senate campaign last year. Mr. Cappelli is a developer who, most recently, retained Mr. Pirro to assist with a project to develop a Catskills resort.

Mr. Cappelli's wife, Kylie Travis, gave $33,900 to Ms. Pirro's main campaign committee in March, and an additional $10,800 to two other committees related to her endorsement by the Conservative and Independence Parties, state campaign finance records show.

Another of Mr. Pirro's business associates, Louis L. Ceruzzi, a Connecticut developer, has given $33,900 to Ms. Pirro's attorney general campaign. Mr. Ceruzzi and people associated with his company gave $31,500 to her Senate race. Mr. Ceruzzi builds stores for Home Depot, a client of Mr. Pirro's.

Mr. Cappelli declined to comment, and Mr. Ceruzzi did not return a message left at his office.

In 1993, Ms. Pirro was elected district attorney in Westchester, and her star continued to rise. Noted for her snappy suits and stiletto heels, she became a regular on television shows — Geraldo Rivera, "Nightline," Court TV — commenting on cases from O. J. Simpson to Martha Stewart. In 1997, People magazine named her one of its "50 Most Beautiful People."

In her personal life, there was trouble when DNA tests proved that Mr. Pirro had fathered a child with another woman while the Pirros were married.

Yet in terms of bad publicity, probably nothing compared to Mr. Pirro's tax evasion case. In 1998, the Pirros paid close to $1 million in back taxes, but Mr. Pirro was indicted the following year, basically for billing personal expenses to his businesses and taking tax deductions on them.

DOJ_NMG_0070937

Among the purchases were a portrait of the Pirro children commissioned by Ms. Pirro, the set for her cable television show when she was a judge, furniture for their vacation home in West Palm Beach, Fla., and drivers and maids (in uniforms) to tend to the children, the wine cellar and the family's pet pot-bellied pigs.

In June 2000, a jury convicted Mr. Pirro on 34 counts of conspiracy, tax evasion and filing false returns. His brother, Anthony, an accountant, was also convicted. Albert Pirro served 11 months in federal prison.

While some people suggest that Mr. Pirro remained a formidable force in Westchester even after he got out of jail, others are not so sure. Mr. Edelman, the Republican lawyer, said Mr. Pirro is "out of the loop, not fund-raising, can't pull strings, doesn't have clout."

Indeed, he is mostly famous these days for accumulating speeding tickets. William O'Shaughnessy, who owns two radio stations in New Rochelle and is friendly with both of the Pirros, said: "I think she loves him, and the feeling is mutual. These episodes are a cri de coeur. He's saying, 'Jeanine, don't forget me!' "

Political Drama In New York (NYT)

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

Jeanine Pirro, the Republican candidate for attorney general, accomplished one thing this week that no one else has managed to do this year. She got New York voters talking about a state election race.

At a press conference Wednesday, Ms. Pirro denied that she had illegally taped her husband's conversations to determine whether he was having an affair in 2005, when she was Westchester district attorney. But she acknowledged that she had talked about the idea with Bernard Kerik, the former New York City police commissioner who by then had been disgraced in scandals that cost him the job of secretary of homeland security.

Ms. Pirro accused federal prosecutors, who are investigating whether she broke any laws, of "prying into the personal lives of married couples" and announced that she was "standing up for women" by staying in the race.

Three thoughts:

1. Women can get along without her help.

2. It's hard to count all the things about this latest mess that reflect badly on Ms. Pirro. Surely a seasoned district attorney should have known that it was not a good plan to ring up Mr. Kerik, who had already drawn the attention of prosecutors for accepting free housing renovations from a contractor with possible ties to organized crime, and urge him to get cracking on that potentially illegal bug.

3. The fact that Ms. Pirro was taped dismissing the attorney general's job as a "been there, done that kind of thing" might not have been quite so damaging if her entire campaign had not been such a running example of idea-free ineptitude.

While Ms. Pirro has been the story of the week, a second campaign scandal, involving Alan Hevesi, the state comptroller, deserves more attention. Mr. Hevesi, who is running for re-election, turns out to have been using a state driver to chauffeur his wife around for the last three years. Mr. Hevesi says he is now reimbursing the state $82,000 for the service. But it is unlikely that he would ever have done that if his opponent, a little-known Republican, Christopher Callaghan, had not raised the issue.

Mr. Hevesi has apologized, and asked the public to remember that his wife has been seriously ill. But the issue is not whether Mrs. Hevesi should have had a driver. It is whether Mr. Hevesi should have been paying for it. He asked the State Ethics Commission that very question three years ago, and the commission said that unless the assignment involved some overriding security issue related to his job, reimbursement was in order.

Unlike Ms. Pirro, Mr. Hevesi is an incumbent who has performed well in office. But now he is going to have to explain to the voters how he can continue telling officials around the state that there is no tolerance for mishandling public money when he has broken the rules so egregiously himself.

Report Links White House And Lobbyist (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070938

WASHINGTON, Sept. 28 — A bipartisan Congressional report documents hundreds of contacts between White House officials and the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his partners, including at least 10 direct contacts between Mr. Abramoff and Karl Rove, the president's chief political strategist.

The House Government Reform Committee report, based on e-mail messages and other records subpoenaed from Mr. Abramoff's lobbying firm, found 485 contacts between Mr. Abramoff's lobbying team and White House officials from 2001 to 2004, including 82 with Mr. Rove's office.

The lobbyists spent almost $25,000 in meals and drinks for the White House officials and provided them with tickets to numerous sporting events and concerts, according to the report, scheduled for release Friday.

The authors of the report said it was generally unclear from available records whether the aides reimbursed Mr. Abramoff for the meals or tickets. Ethics rules bar White House officials from accepting lobbyists' gifts worth more than $20.

A White House spokeswoman, Dana Perino, said Thursday that while White House officials had not seen the report, earlier evidence showed that Mr. Abramoff had exaggerated his ties to the administration and was "ineffective in terms of getting government officials to take actions."

Ms. Perino added, "It's a real shame that so many of his clients were taken advantage of, lied to and ripped off."

The report describes several instances in which Mr. Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to bribe public officials, failed to get the action he desired from the White House, and described his overall record in lobbying the White House as "mixed." But it also suggests that Mr. Abramoff's lobbying resulted in Bush administration actions that benefited Abramoff clients, including decisions to distribute millions of dollars in federal money to Indian tribes with large gambling operations.

After an especially aggressive lobbying campaign in 2001 and 2002 involving 73 contacts with White House officials, Mr. Abramoff claimed credit for an administration decision to release $16.3 million to a Mississippi tribe for jail construction despite opposition from the Justice Department, the report found.

A copy of the bipartisan report was provided to The New York Times by Congressional officials who were granted anonymity because the document had not been released publicly.

Mr. Rove has described Mr. Abramoff as a "casual acquaintance," but the records obtained by the House committee show that Mr. Rove and his aides sought Mr. Abramoff's help in obtaining seats at sporting events, and that Mr. Rove sat with Mr. Abramoff in the lobbyist's box seats for an N.C.A.A. basketball playoff game in 2002.

After that game, Mr. Abramoff described Mr. Rove in an e-mail message to a colleague: "He's a great guy. Told me anytime we need something just let him know through Susan." The message was referring to Susan Ralson, Mr. Abramoff's former secretary, who joined the White House in February 2001 as Mr. Rove's executive assistant.

Ms. Ralston, who did not return phone calls seeking comment Thursday, was lobbied scores of times by Mr. Abramoff and his partners, the report found, and was instrumental in passing messages between Mr. Abramoff and senior officials at the White House, including Mr. Rove and Ken Mehlman.

Mr. Mehlman, now chairman of the Republican National Committee, was then a senior White House political strategist. A national committee spokeswoman, Tracey Schmitt, said Thursday that in Mr. Mehlman's White House job, "it was not unusual" that he "would be in contact with supporters who had interest in administration policy."

In October 2001, the report said, Mr. Abramoff asked the White House to withhold an endorsement from a Republican candidate for governor of the Northern Marianas Islands, an American commonwealth in the western Pacific where Mr. Abramoff had clients; Mr. Abramoff was backing another candidate.

On Oct. 31, 2001, the report said, Ms. Ralson sent an e-mail message to Mr. Abramoff that read: "You win :) KR said no endorsement."

In March 2002, the report said, Mr. Abramoff contacted Ms. Ralson to offer tickets to Mr. Rove and his family for use of a skybox during the N.C.A.A. tournament at the MCI Center in Washington.

"Hi Susan," Mr. Abramoff wrote in an e-mail message." I just saw Karl and mentioned the N.C.A.A. opportunity, which he was really jazzed about. If he wants to join us in the Pollin box, please let me know as soon as you can."

Ms. Ralston replied: "Karl is interested in Fri. and Sun. 3 tickets for his family?"

DOJ_NMG_0070939

Mr. Abramoff responded: “Done. Does he want to go Friday night or Friday afternoon or both?” The report said that Mr. Rove offered to pay for the tickets, prompting Mr. Abramoff to propose that Mr. Rove pay $50 per ticket “payable to me personally.”

The report cited numerous e-mail messages in which Mr. Abramoff referred to Mr. Rove and his visits to Signatures, a Washington restaurant owned by Mr. Abramoff.

On learning in July 2002 that Mr. Rove planned to dine at Signatures with a party of 8 to 10 people, Mr. Abramoff wrote to a colleague: “I want him to be given a very nice bottle of wine and have Joseph whisper in his ear (only he should hear) that Abramoff wanted him to have this wine on the house.” In another e-mail message, Mr. Abramoff directed his restaurant staff to “please put Karl Rove in his usual table.”

Ms. Perino, the White House spokeswoman, said the offer of a free bottle of wine was actually proof of how little acquainted Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Rove were because “Karl doesn’t drink alcohol.”

Disclosure of the report’s findings came as a federal judge in Miami agreed on Thursday to delay Mr. Abramoff’s imprisonment, but not for as long as the Justice Department wanted.

In court papers this week, the department asked that Mr. Abramoff, who has been sentenced to nearly six years in prison, not have to surrender for three months because of the need for his continued cooperation in the influence-peddling investigation in Washington that is said to involve several members of Congress.

But the judge, Paul C. Huck, agreed to allow Mr. Abramoff to remain free only until Nov. 15, saying “there comes a time when people have to pay the piper.” Mr. Abramoff pleaded guilty in Miami as part of an agreement with the Justice Department in which he confessed to corruption charges in Washington, and to fraud charges in Florida involving his purchase of a casino-boat fleet there.

Abramoff Put White House Contacts At 400 (WP)

By Susan Schmidt

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his colleagues billed their clients for more than 400 contacts with White House officials between 2001 and 2004, according to a report released yesterday by the House Government Reform Committee. The report did not determine how many of those contacts -- referenced in e-mails and Abramoff's often falsified client bills -- actually occurred.

The 93-page report was jointly issued by the committee's chairman, Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), and its ranking Democrat, Rep. Henry A. Waxman (Calif.). They wrote that their investigation found the current reporting requirements "failed to protect public officials from the ethical undertow generated by Abramoff's claims of access to executive branch deliberations, particularly at the White House."

The report, based on 14,000 e-mails and other documents, conveys many assertions by Abramoff and his team about their efforts to lobby White House officials on matters affecting their Indian tribal clients.

Abramoff's team offered officials tickets to 19 sporting events and concerts, the report states, but "in many instances the documents do not indicate whether the White House officials requested or attended the events." One who did accept tickets, the report said, was Susan Ralston, executive assistant to White House presidential adviser Karl Rove.

The report also cites documents suggesting that former White House political director Ken Mehlman, now chairman of the Republican National Committee, may have helped Abramoff's team get money for a tribal client from the Justice Department. But the committee did not corroborate the claim.

"In many instances, there is little or no corroboration of the events described in the documents," the report's executive summary stated. "While the documents described in this report are authentic, that does not mean that the events actually transpired or that Abramoff and his associates did not exaggerate or misrepresent their actions."

Abramoff, once one of Washington's most powerful Republican lobbyists, has pleaded guilty to conspiracy and fraud, along with three former members of his lobbying team. He is cooperating in a federal investigation into corruption in Congress and executive branch agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0070940

"The only thing this report demonstrates is what a lot of us already know: Jack Abramoff had a penchant for exaggerating and charging his clients for minor contacts with government officials," White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said.

The committee subpoenaed Abramoff's client billing records and other documents from Greenberg Traurig LLP, his former firm. The report said the Abramoff team billed clients for $23,981 in meals and drinks with White House officials. But the report said it could not determine how many of those meals took place or whether White House officials paid their own way.

One exchange of e-mails cited in the report suggests that former Abramoff lobbying team member Tony C. Rudy succeeded in getting Mehlman to press reluctant Justice Department appointees to release millions of dollars in congressionally earmarked funds for a new jail for the Mississippi Choctaw tribe, an Abramoff client. Rudy wrote Abramoff in November 2001 e-mails that Mehlman said he would "take care of" the funding holdup at Justice after learning from Rudy that the tribe made large donations to the GOP.

Mehlman did not return a call to comment late yesterday. Perino called the suggestions of improper influence by Mehlman "triple hearsay by people who have admitted to having lied and oversold their influence with policymakers."

The committee report said Abramoff and his team were in frequent contact with Ralston, who was once Abramoff's executive assistant and who in February 2001 went to work in the same capacity for Rove.

Ralston passed along information about prospective political appointees and helped Abramoff's team "secure access to the White House and obtain photo opportunities for clients," the report said. It cited 69 e-mails and other contacts between Ralston and the Abramoff lobbyists, and said she was treated to tickets to sporting events on nine occasions.

Contacted by The Washington Post, Ralston said she had no comment. Perino declined to comment on the propriety of Ralston accepting gifts from her former associates, but said, "the president has very high standards, and he expects those standards to be met." Federal law bans government officials from accepting more than nominal gifts from lobbyists.

Report Details Abramoff Ties To White House (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And Walter F. Roche Jr., Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 29, 2006

The convicted lobbyist and his associates had hundreds of contacts with the executive branch, a bipartisan House probe finds.

WASHINGTON — In 2002, the nation's capital was abuzz with March Madness as it prepared to host the NCAA basketball tournament's first- and second-round regional games. For highflying lobbyist Jack Abramoff, it was a chance to do what he did best — cozy up to powerful politicians.

So when he bumped into Karl Rove, the White House political advisor, Abramoff wasted no time. He invited Rove to sit in the private box of MCI Center owner Abe Pollin. The lobbyist followed up with an e-mail to Susan Ralston, his onetime aide who had gone to the White House as Rove's assistant, telling her that her boss was "really jazzed" about the idea.

"Karl is interested in Fri. and Sun.," Ralston messaged back. "3 tickets for his family?"

"Done," Abramoff replied.

The episode — reflecting the modus operandi of the lobbyist whose dealings have cast a shadow over some of Washington's most powerful figures — is captured in a congressional report to be released today. The report documents hundreds of direct contacts between the White House and the now-disgraced Abramoff and his colleagues, including 82 with Rove's office; nine of those were with President Bush's chief strategist himself.

Capping a months-long investigation by the Republican-controlled House Government Reform Committee, the report said its findings provided "an unusually detailed glimpse into a sordid subculture of fraud and attempted influence peddling."

Examining 14,000 pages of e-mails and other documents obtained from Abramoff's law firm, investigators found that between January 2001 and March 2004, the lobbyist and his associates had more than 400 contacts with White House officials. Many came in official meetings, and others involved pricey restaurants and sporting events such as the NCAA basketball playoffs.

In one instance, the report suggests, Abramoff's team secured $16.3 million in public money for a key client — the Choctaw Indian tribe — after a meeting with then-White House political director Ken Mehlman. The Department of Justice was resisting release of the funds, which were intended to finance a new jail for the tribe. But Abramoff partner Tony Rudy recounted in e-mails that he reminded Mehlman during their meeting of the Choctaws' contributions to Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0070941

"Mehlman said he would take care of this," Rudy wrote. "He's a rock star."

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to federal charges as part of an ongoing congressional bribery investigation that has prompted Democrats to accuse the Republican Party of fostering a "culture of corruption" in Washington. A Senate subcommittee concluded that Abramoff fleeced Indian tribes out of millions of dollars in fees that he split with one of his associates.

Rudy, a onetime aide to former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), has pleaded guilty to conspiracy. He admitted accepting favors, cash and other gifts while working in DeLay's House leadership office and after leaving to become a lobbyist.

Bush and White House aides have said they had little if any meaningful contact with Abramoff.

Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman, said Thursday that the new report merely confirmed "what we already knew, that [Abramoff] had a penchant for exaggeration and for charging his clients for minor contacts with government officials."

A spokeswoman for Mehlman — now chairman of the Republican National Committee — said it would not have been unusual for him, while serving as White House political director, to "be in contact with supporters who had interest in administration policy."

The House committee's ranking Democrat, Rep. Henry A. Waxman of Los Angeles, said Thursday that the report portrays a "much closer relationship between Mr. Abramoff and White House officials than the White House has previously acknowledged."

"The documents reviewed by the committee, if accurate, contain evidence that White House officials at the most senior levels of government repeatedly took actions requested by Mr. Abramoff," Waxman said. "And they raise serious questions about the legality and ethics of the actions of multiple White House officials."

The committee's Republican chairman, Rep. Thomas M. Davis III of Virginia, said Thursday that the report raised questions about activities in the White House — rare criticism from a member of the GOP leadership.

A news release from Davis' office said the 95-page report revealed only "scant and circumstantial evidence that Abramoff's encounters and entreaties had a dispositive impact on administration policy or personnel decisions." But it singled out Ralston — Rove's assistant and Abramoff's former employee — who was lobbied 69 times, the most contacts with any individual named in the report. She also received numerous tickets to concerts and sporting events.

"Her role in brokering requests to Rove from her former boss raises questions … about some of her activities," the release said.

Even though Davis signed on to the critical report just six weeks before the midterm election determines control of Congress, he offered a cautionary note.

"These records are just one side of what was often a multi-party conversation," Davis said. "The almost complete absence of reply e-mails from Abramoff's lobbying targets … speaks volumes about how seriously most people in the White House took Jack Abramoff's schemes."

According to documents cited in the report, Abramoff said he and Rove discussed Israel and other issues during the basketball game March 17, 2002. The lobbyist later e-mailed an associate that Rove was "set to help us when we need it.… He's a great guy. Told me anytime we need something just let him know through Susan."

The e-mails cited in the report suggest that Rove paid Abramoff $50 per ticket he received to the game.

The report also cited a number of e-mails discussing Rove's visits to Signatures, a Washington restaurant owned by Abramoff. In one case, Abramoff heard that Rove was coming with a party of eight to 10 people and ordered: "I want him to be given a very nice bottle of wine and have Joseph whisper in his ear (only he should hear) that Abramoff wanted him to have this wine on the house."

The lobbyist apparently did not know that Rove does not drink — a point offered Thursday by the White House as further evidence that Abramoff was not as close to the strategist as he might have bragged.

peter.wallsten@latimes.com
walter.roche@latimes.com

House Report Details 485 Contacts Between Abramoff Team And White House Officials (RC)

By John Bresnahan And Paul Kane

Roll Call, September 29, 2006

A House committee has documented hundreds of contacts between top White House officials and former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his associates, as well as tens of thousands of dollors worth of meals and tickets to sporting events and concerts that were offered to these officials during a three-year period starting in early 2001.

A 95-page report, which was released by the House Government Reform Committee on Thursday evening, includes an analysis of more than 14,000 pages of documents provided to the panel by Abramoff's former lobbying firm, Greenberg Traurig.

Democrats and Republicans on the committee immediately began to fight over the report's findings, with each side portraying the results in the context of its own political needs.

Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.), chairman of the Government Reform Committee, released a statement portraying Abramoff's efforts to lobby the Bush administration as largely ineffective.

Davis also pointed out that Abramoff's billing records and e-mail exchanges do not mean that events unfolded as he claimed to either his firm or his clients.

"These records are just one side of what was often a multi-party conversation," Davis said in a statement released by his office. "The almost complete absence of reply e-mails from Abramoff's lobbying targets in the White House has to be seen as telling. In an environment that lives and breathes on e-mail exchanges, that silence speaks volumes about how seriously most people in the White House took Jack Abramoff's schemes."

"A number of individuals appear to have been offered tickets to sporting events and concerts," said the statement from Davis' office. "The Committee does not know in all cases if executive branch employees accepted them, if they were allowed to accept them without paying for them, or if they indeed paid for them themselves. The Committee is confident the appropriate authorities will examine whether the tickets were accepted, required to be paid for, and if so, whether they were paid for."

A summary prepared for Democratic leaders by staffers for Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), ranking member of Government Reform, stated that the information provided by the Abramoff documents may show wrongdoing on the part of top White House officials.

Democrats suggested that the documents obtained by the committee "raised serious questions about the legality and ethics of the actions of multiple White House officials."

The Government Reform Committee report singled out two of President Bush's top lieutenants, Karl Rove and Ken Mehlman, as having been offered expensive meals and exclusive tickets to premier sporting events and concerts by Abramoff and his associates.

In total, the committee was able to document 485 contacts between White House officials and Abramoff and his lobbying team at the firm Greenberg Traurig from January 2001 to March 2004, with 82 of those contacts occurring in Rove¹s office, including 10 with Rove personally. The panel also said that Abramoff billed his clients nearly $25,000 for meals and drinks with White House officials during that period.

Rove, Mehlman, and other White House officials have denied having any close relationship with Abramoff, despite the fact that Abramoff was a "Pioneer" who raised hundreds of thousands of dollars for Bush's White House campaigns.

Democratic committee staff wrote in a three-page summary that accompanied the report: "The documents depict a much closer relationship between Mr. Abramoff and White House officials than the White House has previously acknowledged." Davis and Waxman this summer subpoenaed e-mails and billing records from Greenberg Traurig and other firms, including Alexander Strategy Group, which was run by one-time aides to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas). They examined more than 14,000 pages of documents from Greenberg Traurig, including 6,600 pages of billing records and 7,700 pages of e-mail.

During the period examined by the committee, Bush administration officials repeatedly intervened on behalf of Abramoff's clients, including helping a Mississippi Indian tribe obtain $16 million in federal funds for a jail the tribe wanted to build.

Abramoff was able to block the nomination of one Interior Department official using Christian conservative Ralph Reed as a go-between with Rove, according to e-mails between Abramoff and Reed.

DOJ_NMG_0070943

Abramoff also tried to oust a State Department employee who interfered with their efforts on behalf of the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, one of Abramoff's most lucrative clients.

White House officials were allowed to view the draft report on Wednesday evening.

Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman, dismissed Abramoff's claim of pull with the Bush administration. She also noted that Abramoff has pleaded guilty to a number of felonies during the last year, including fraud and conspiracy to bribe public officials.

"The billing records that are the basis of this report are widely regarded as fraudulent in how they misrepresented the activities and influence of Abramoff," Perino said. "There's no reason those records should be suddenly viewed as credible."

Perino added that she was unaware of any link between Abramoff's lobbying and White House intervention in policy or personnel matters affecting his clients. "Not that I'm aware of as a result of a direct contact," Perino said.

Perino did not specifically address whether White House officials ever accepted meals or tickets from Abramoff.

"We have high standards and expect them to be met," she said.

In a bipartisan executive summary of the new report, committee staff said that "there are certain caveats" about Abramoff's actions that are impossible to verify because the report is based solely on the records of Abramoff and Greenberg Traurig employees.

"There is little or no corroboration of the events described in the documents," the summary states. "In other instances, the documents are vague about who was lobbied and what was said. While the documents described in this report are authentic, that does not mean that the events actually transpired or that Abramoff and his associates did not exaggerate or misrepresent their actions."

Tracey Schmitt, a spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee, which Mehlman now chairs, said Mehlman and Abramoff would have interacted when Mehlman served as White House political director.

"In his capacity as Political Director of the White House, it is not unusual that Mr. Mehlman would be in contact with supporters who had interest in Administration policy," Schmitt said in a statement.

The committee was able to uncover numerous times when Abramoff and his associates attended social events with senior White House aides using tickets or passes supplied by Abramoff. For instance, Abramoff attended an NCAA Tournament college basketball game with Rove in March 2002. Afterward, Abramoff told an associate that Rove was "a great guy" who told him "anytime we need something, just let him know" via Rove's assistant, Susan Ralston. Ralston worked for Abramoff before moving over to the White House.

In June 2001, while he was still working at the White House, Mehlman was offered two tickets to a U2 concert by Abramoff. The documents do not indicate whether Mehlman paid for the tickets or attended the concert.

"If White House officials failed to pay for these meals and tickets, their actions would be a violation of these legal requirements," Democratic committee staff wrote in their summary, noting a ban on gifts from lobbyists worth more than $20 to executive branch officials.

The committee said its investigation is continuing.

Report Reveals Hundreds Of Contracts Between Lobbyists And Bush Aides (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

LOBBYING TEAM SPENT $25,000 on meals for White House officials, report says.

House Government Reform Committee finds 500 contacts between members of since-disgraced lobbyist Abramoff's team and Bush aides over three years. An email shows one offering White House strategist Ken Mehlman, now national Republican chairman, two tickets to a sold-out U2 concert.

The administration has distanced Bush from Abramoff. But the report documents instances in which White House officials may have helped him. In another email, lobbying partner Tony Rudy tells Abramoff that "Mehlman said he would 'take care of' " a funding request. An RNC spokeswoman called it "not unusual" for Mehlman to talk to supporters interested in policy while working at the White House.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino dismissed the report as "nothing new" and Rudy as an "an admitted liar."

UNFINISHED BUSINESS awaits lawmakers after October campaigning.

Senate accedes to White House pressure and restores $5 billion in proposed cuts in defense spending. But that money must now be cut from domestic spending bills in lame-duck session; stopgap funding bill expires Nov. 17.

Action on offshore drilling slips as falling gas prices ease pressure. Though House-backed border-fence measure may reduce conservatives' incentive to compromise, Senate backers of comprehensive overhaul aim to restart talks in November. "We must act on this issue," says Republican 2008 hopeful McCain.

REPUBLICANS HOPE better political conditions benefit open House seats.

Party strategists say lower gas prices, higher stock values, and stronger Bush ratings help most in races with no incumbent. Those include seats in Iowa, Florida, Minnesota and Colorado that Republicans are surrendering to seek higher office.

Yet, nonpartisan Cook Political Report shows 36 Republican seats still at risk, one more than in mid-August, bolstering Democratic arguments that national mood isn't shifting enough to turn campaign. "It is clear the political environment is better for Republicans" than before, analyst Amy Walter says, but it's still comparable with Democrats' predicament before 1994 defeat.

House Republican poll shows suburbanites no longer favor Democrats on economy, but still lean Democratic for elections.

DESPITE SCHWARZENEGGER'S recovery, fate of his $20 billion road bond issue is uncertain. A nonpartisan poll shows just 51% support. In Michigan, Democratic strategists envision expanded minority turnout for Gov. Granholm and Sen. Stabenow from effort to stop antiaffirmative action ballot measure; top Republicans also oppose it.

GRAND OLD RALLY: A National Bureau of Economic Research study shows during 1880-2004 period, a Republican victory raised equity values about 2%. Since Reagan administration, Republican wins also have lifted government bond interest rates about 0.12%.

DEMOCRATS SEEK margins among women. While Republicans' security rhetoric helps split men's vote, minority party targets "security moms" and single women. To woo the latter group of "women on their own," Democrats will shift focus to health costs from gas prices; a pollster cites "80% rise in health-care premiums" during Bush presidency.

FRIST FRUSTRATES Senate tax-writers Grassley and Baucus by refusing to permit passage of "extender" tax credits before Congress leaves. Though backers of research-and-development tax credit eye action in lame-duck session, the issue moves into 2007. If Democrats take over, "it would become an opportunity for GOP in next Congress," a leadership aide says.

DUBAI PORTS WORLD still hasn't sold U.S. assets.

Months after furor over port deal, lawmakers scramble to save efforts to tighten U.S. government's foreign investment reviews. House leaders will seek compromise bill at lame-duck session.

They fear New Jersey Democratic Sen. Menendez, facing challenge, may block bill while advocating stricter scrutiny. An executive involved says sale of DPW assets may occur "a little beyond" six-month deadline set in March.

A senior U.S. official says the company has pared bidders to three.

MINOR MEMOS: Financial regulators see two categories of threat: "blowups" like Sept. 11, and "meltdowns" like plunging prices. ... Noting a prediction of steep home-price drops, Harvard economist Greg Mankiw notes, "Good news for affordable-housing."

Judge Delays Prison Again For Abramoff (AP-Y)

By Curt Anderson

AP, September 28, 2006

A judge agreed Thursday to again put off prison for disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and a former business partner, but the delays were shorter than what lawyers on both sides sought.

Federal prosecutors and defense lawyers had jointly requested delays of 90 days beyond Monday's scheduled prison surrender date so Abramoff can continue to cooperate in a Washington corruption investigation, and Adam Kidan can provide more information about the gangland-style murder of former SunCruz Casinos owner Konstantinos Boulis.

U.S. District Judge Paul Huck reluctantly agreed to let Abramoff remain free until Nov. 15, and Adam Kidan until Oct. 23.

DOJ_NMG_0070945

"I don't feel good about this," Huck said. "My main concern is, there comes a time when people have to pay the piper, so to speak. I think that time has come."

Abramoff and Kidan were each sentenced to nearly six years in prison after they pleaded guilty to charges of concocting a fake wire transfer to close a deal in 2000 to buy SunCruz Casinos from Boulis, who was shot down the following year.

Huck approved a 90-day delay for Abramoff and Kidan in June.

Judge Postpones Prison For Abramoff (MCT)

By Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-Sentinel

McClatchy Newspapers, September 29, 2006

MIAMI - A federal judge postponed for a third time the date Jack Abramoff must begin serving his 70-month prison sentence Thursday so the disgraced former super lobbyist can continue aiding federal authorities in an ongoing corruption investigation.

During a conference call with lawyers, U.S. District Judge Paul Huck expressed exasperation with the slow pace of the Washington, D.C., investigation and advised attorneys not to expect any further extensions.

"I don't feel good about it," Huck said as he reset Abramoff's surrender date to Nov. 15.

Huck gave Abramoff business partner Adam Kidan until Oct. 23 to turn himself in. Kidan also faces 70 months in prison.

Prison terms for both men were to have started Monday.

The men, who pleaded guilty to federal fraud and conspiracy charges in connection with their 2000 purchase of SunCruz Casinos, were sentenced in March.

At that time, Huck granted a request to defer their incarceration. He gave another 90-day extension in June at the urging of defense attorneys and federal prosecutors.

Lawyers asked for an additional 90-days last week for the men to continue working with federal and state authorities in different investigations.

Abramoff, who also pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges in Washington, D.C., has been cooperating with prosecutors in a wide-ranging Justice Department inquiry of bribery and influence peddling in the federal government.

Kidan is assisting state authorities investigating the slaying of former SunCruz owner Konstantinos "Gus" Boulis, who was gunned down six months after selling the casino cruise line to Abramoff and Kidan, the lawyers said.

Kendall Day, a Justice Department lawyer, said Abramoff has spent seven days debriefing government officials, put in 300 hours reviewing possible evidence, and turned over roughly 13,000 pages of electronic documents to investigators since June.

Four public officials pleaded guilty, including U.S. Rep. Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican, and one was convicted at trial, partly due to Abramoff's full cooperation, Day said.

Abramoff's incarceration would make it more difficult for him to access electronic files and attend meetings, slowing the ongoing investigation and making it more expensive, he said.

Joseph Conway, who represents Kidan, said similar considerations apply to his client and his cooperation with state prosecutors on the Boulis case.

Three men hired by Kidan at SunCruz are awaiting trial in Boulis' slaying. State prosecutors recently informed Kidan he could be called as a witness, which means lawyers representing the three suspects have a right to interview him under oath, Conway said.

Huck rebuked the lawyers for not taking the Oct. 2 deadline seriously.

"There comes a time when people must pay the piper," he said. "You knew this date was coming."

The bank fraud case against Abramoff and Kidan rested on a fake wire transfer the men arranged to secure a $60 million loan for the purchase of SunCruz. The fraudulent document made it look like Abramoff and Kidan were putting $23 million of their own money into the deal.

At the time the men purchased SunCruz, Abramoff was a highly influential Republican lobbyist with ties to many Washington power players. In his plea agreement with the government, Abramoff admitted giving officials gifts to secure their support for his clients.

Gotti's Prosecutors Discovered New Evidence Failed To Help (NYT)

By Timothy Williams

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

Not long after word filtered into the courtroom on Wednesday that for the third time since last September a racketeering case against John A. Gotti would end in a mistrial, prosecutors had a chance to speak to the jury.

What they heard was that the most important new evidence against Mr. Gotti — secret F.B.I. recordings made while he was in federal prison — seemed not to have swayed a single juror.

"I'm not sure it changed anybody's mind," said one juror, who asked to retain the anonymity he was granted by the court while on the panel. "It just solidified people's opinions."

A federal official has said Mr. Gotti will probably not be prosecuted on the same racketeering and extortion charges a fourth time unless further evidence is uncovered.

Even if Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney in Manhattan, approves another prosecution of Mr. Gotti, Judge Shira A. Scheindlin of Federal District Court, who has presided over the three trials and would likely oversee a fourth, seems reluctant to allow it.

Almost immediately after she declared a mistrial on Wednesday, Judge Scheindlin asked Mr. Gotti's lawyers whether they wanted to file any motions — referring to a move to dismiss the charges, which include orchestrating the kidnapping of Curtis Sliwa, the radio talk-show host.

Even before the third trial started, Judge Scheindlin expressed reservations about the fairness of the government trying Mr. Gotti three times.

Federal prosecutors, who declined to discuss the case yesterday, are expected to announce a decision about a retrial during the next 10 days.

In any case, Mr. Gotti found himself a relatively free man yesterday, for the first time since he was sent to prison on various racketeering and other offenses in 1999. Though he is still officially criminally charged, the United States attorney's office agreed to release him from two conditions of his bail, house arrest and electronic monitoring.

That government concession contrasts starkly with the aftermath of Mr. Gotti's first trial in September 2005, when Michael McGovern, a federal prosecutor, argued that Mr. Gotti should not be released from prison before a second trial because he might try to intimidate witnesses.

After the first trial, the government had attributed its failure to convict Mr. Gotti to a holdout juror who voted for acquittal on the extortion and racketeering conspiracy counts. A single juror also stood in the way of Mr. Gotti being convicted on charges of loan sharking as part of a racketeering enterprise.

The second trial, which started in February, ended in another hung jury, but this time the jury split 8 to 4 on most counts, in favor of acquittal.

The sticking point for jurors was the same problem that arose in the third trial — the difficulty in determining whether Mr. Gotti had truly retired from the Mafia in July 1999 as he said. The defense maintained that since he was no longer in the mob, he could not have been part of any conspiracy.

For the third trial, the government went to court with two determined prosecutors, Victor Hou and Miriam E. Rocah, and the F.B.I. recordings, which had not been used in the first two trials.

Instead of the tapes revealing Mr. Gotti's continued membership in the Gambino organized crime family, they clouded the issue, according to jurors.

"The tapes didn't help," said a second juror, who also requested anonymity.

Jurors complained about the recordings' poor sound quality and the fact that Mr. Gotti seemed to make conflicting statements about whether he was in or out of the Mafia. On that question, the jury split 8 to 4.

The sheer volume of evidence the government presented contributed to the deadlock, the first juror said.

"We could have really used a road map here," he said.

Gotti Jr. Presses On As A Free Man (NSDY)

By Anthony D. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 29, 2006

Freed of his electronic ankle bracelet and conditions of house arrest, John A. Gotti Thursday came and went from his Oyster Bay home with a freedom he hasn't known for years.

On Wednesday, after declaring the third mistrial in the racketeering case against Gotti, Manhattan federal Judge Shira Scheindlin relaxed the tough bail conditions Gotti had been living under since September 2005. It was then, after the first mistrial, that Gotti was freed on a $7 million bond, but restricted to his home. Gotti had been in federal prison on a previous racketeering case from 1999 to 2005.

Scheindlin late Wednesday allowed Gotti to take off the electronic ankle bracelet that tracked his movements and said he could come and go from his home on Redmond Drive as he pleased, said defense attorneys Seth Ginsberg and Charles Carnesi.

Gotti, 42, the son of the late Gambino crime boss, was seen leaving his property at least least three times as he was driven by another man in a black Ford Explorer.

Though Gotti didn't comment about his activity, he had said he planned to take his children to school and later attend the football practice of his son, John, 13, at nearby St. Anthony's High School in South Huntington.

Federal prosecutors in Manhattan have yet to decide if they will attempt to try Gotti a fourth time, a step that many defense attorneys and legal experts think is unlikely given the way three prior attempts had failed.

The jury Wednesday told the judge it couldn't agree on a key question: whether Gotti had withdrawn from the crime family by July 1999. That date was important because it would put the indictment outside the statute of limitations.

Gotti's attorneys said they will draft a motion to dismiss the indictment within the next two weeks if prosecutors don't announce that they are throwing in the towel.

Gotti told Newsday Wednesday that if he doesn't have to labor through a fourth trial he intends to leave the New York area, write a book, buy a ranch and move his wife, Kim, and the couple's six children out west. He said he intends to get a college degree and work with children.

After the mistrial, Gotti went straight to the home of his mother, Victoria, 65, in Howard Beach and then to Oyster Bay. Early Wednesday evening, Gotti, Carnesi and Ginsberg had dinner at the Altadonna restaurant in Douglaston.

Gotti's mother, sisters Angel and Victoria, and brother Peter ate elsewhere. The elder Victoria Gotti didn't want to comment Thursday, saying she wanted time to unwind.

In Ozone Park, across the street from the late John Gotti's former Bergin Hunt and Fish social club, Robert Jeremiah, of Jeremiah's Florist, wistfully remembered the excitement of the old days.

"The whole neighborhood has changed, all of those people from the '70s have moved to the Island," said Jeremiah, who loved the July Fourth fireworks display the late Gotti sponsored.

Staff writers Wil Cruz and Andrew Strickler contributed to this story.

Canterbury Woman Pleads Guilty To Falsifying Data On Cell Batteries Used In Astronaut Space Suits (NORBULL)

Norwich (CT) Bulletin, September 29, 2006

CANTERBURY — A Canterbury woman could face up to a year in prison and a $100,000 maximum fine for falsifying test data on battery cells used in NASA space suits, U.S. Department of Justice officials said today.

Susan Belliveau, 46, of North Canterbury Road, pleaded guilty today in Hartford to one count of falsifying test data for battery cells her employer, BST Systems Inc. in Plainfield, had manufactured for NASA, the Department of Justice said.

Justice department spokesman Tom Carson said the investigation does not show institutional problems at BST Systems, and the charge applies only to Belliveau.

Company officials were not available for comment tonight.

Calls to the Belliveau residence were not answered. Her attorney responded to the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0070948

"Sue has been an extremely hardworking, loyal and conscientious employee of the company for nearly 20 years and had a lapse in judgment that she deeply regrets," David T. Grudberg of New Haven said. "And we sincerely hope she will continue contributing her hard work and skills to the company for many years to come."

According to the Department of Justice, Belliveau, a lab supervisor, was responsible for overseeing the testing of cells to be used in batteries that power NASA space suits and are used by astronauts during space flight. The battery cells had been manufactured with a new component and were being tested to determine the period of time the cells will function correctly, called the "wet life," after being activated and then repeatedly being charged and discharged.

When the cell being tested failed prematurely, Belliveau created false documents, making it appear the cell functioned as it should have, according to the release.

NASA took corrective action when it learned of the premature failure of the cell and of what Belliveau had done. There were no injuries as a result of Belliveau's conduct.

Belliveau's sentencing for the misdemeanor charge is scheduled for Dec. 19.

Convicted Ex-procurement Chief Granted Sentencing Delay (GOVEXEC)

By Kimberly Palmer

Government Executive, September 29, 2006

David Safavian, the former head of the Office of Management and Budget's procurement policy shop convicted in June of obstructing justice and making false statements, has been granted a delay in his sentencing.

The sentencing was originally scheduled for Oct. 12, but will be moved to Oct. 27. Safavian was convicted on three counts of making false statements and one count of obstructing an investigation. The case revolved around his dealings with former lobbyist Jack Abramoff while Safavian was at the General Services Administration, where he served as chief of staff.

Prosecutors apparently are seeking a two-point sentence enhancement -- which would add to the recommended prison time -- by arguing that Safavian obstructed justice during his trial. Safavian testified at his trial that he did not lie, make false statements, or obstruct an investigation, but the jury found him guilty of doing those things.

Each count on which Safavian was convicted carries a certain number of points that corresponds to a recommended sentencing range. Not including the potential two-point enhancement, the charges he faces carry 14 points, corresponding to a 15- to 21-month recommended sentence. The actual sentence will be up to the judge's discretion.

Prosecutors often seek to extend the recommended sentence for convicted defendants by arguing that they obstructed justice or committed perjury by testifying that they did not commit the crime that they were later convicted of committing. The judge ultimately decides whether to take the alleged perjury into account during sentencing.

"It's an extra risk of testifying," said Peter Henning, professor of law at Wayne State University Law School and author of a blog about white-collar crime. "You run the risk of both making yourself look bad and then you could get hit with an enhancement."

Safavian's lawyer, Barbara "Biz" Van Gelder, said in her request for the delay that the court's probation officer needed more time to review Safavian's testimony since it would affect the sentencing recommendations. In an e-mail to the court and prosecutors, Van Gelder wrote, "After hearing the government's representation that they intend to argue that Mr. Safavian lied during his testimony, I believe it is important to have [the probation officer] review his testimony."

In an e-mail response, Justice Department prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg said he did not think the delay was necessary, but that he was not opposed to the delay if the court believed it was necessary.

U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman granted the request for the delay in late August.

Earlier this month, Friedman granted Safavian permission to travel to the Eastern Shore of Maryland or Delaware for vacation before his sentencing.

On Monday, Van Gelder filed a notice to appeal Safavian's convictions.

Prosecutor: Bus Company Had Shoddy Fleet (AP)

By Lynn Brezosky, The Associated Press

AP, September 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070949

MCALLEN, Texas - Proceedings were cut short Thursday in a trial of a bus company accused of ignoring safety and maintenance and falsifying logs because the defense didn't have witnesses ready.

U.S. District Judge Ricardo Hinojosa scolded Charles Banker, attorney for James Maples and Global Limo, Inc. for the witness shortage and suggested Banker was reading a lengthy motion for acquittal out loud to buy time.

"I'm not going to sit here and be filibustered by a motion for acquittal," Hinojosa said.

The routine motion after a prosecutor rests his case was denied. Hinojosa dismissed the jury until Friday.

Maples is the owner of Global Limo, which operated the bus that burst into flames during the evacuation of Hurricane Rita last year, killing 23 elderly nursing home residents. He and his company are charged with conspiracy to falsify time logs and failure to maintain his fleet and require drivers to keep inspection logs.

He is not charged with any of the deaths in the Dallas wreck, but could face prison time and up to $750,000 in fines against him and the company on the conspiracy charge, which is the most serious of the three counts.

The prosecution rested its case early Thursday afternoon.

Banker said he thought the government would take longer. Hinojosa told Banker the trial was scheduled more than a month ago and he had plenty of time to get his witnesses to court.

"Why don't you just admit you did something you shouldn't have done?" Hinojosa said.

Hinojosa has also snapped at Assistant U.S. Attorney John Kinchen for not including the accident in the actual charges in the indictment. Earlier in the day, he struck mention of the accident from the indictment's introduction, calling the placement a "back door" tactic and a "public relations play."

That means jurors may never see or hear reference to the accident that brought the company to the Justice Department's attention.

Prosecutors believed that because federal transportation regulations were lifted during the hurricane evacuation, they could not use the accident as evidence against Maples and Global Limo. Hinojosa told them they were wrong, but barred mention of it because it was not in the charge portion of the indictment.

High school band director Wilberto Perez testified for the prosection that on a cross-country bus trip with students and some parents, the air conditioning wasn't working properly and the VCRs couldn't play movies. He said one bus was too small, and four students had to ride on the floor for five hours until the bus was exchanged in the middle of a rainy night in San Antonio. He said they were late to sightseeing trips because New Mexico inspectors spent time citing the drivers for lack of proper log books and failure to pay certain road fees.

Perez also said parents stayed up talking to the drivers for fear they'd fall asleep. But on cross-examination he said that that had been the practice on long trips with other bus companies as well.

A former bus driver has said Maples told him to always mark eight hours off duty on trips for sleep, even though the buses had no sleeper compartments. Federal regulations require drivers who mark off duty and remain on the bus is if he is in a sleeper berth. The drivers would sleep in a passenger seat while a co-driver took the wheel.

Other drivers also said they incorrectly marked log books. Drivers also testified to driving buses despite problems including broken brake lights, malfunctioning wipers, and a windshield crack that was a foot in diameter.

Witnesses also testified that a post-accident investigation turned up evidence that mechanical problems with the buses were never corrected and logs and maintenance records were falsified.

Regulators shut the company down two weeks after the accident.

Vigil Case Ready For Jury (KRQE-TV)

KRQE-TV, September 29, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE -- The question of the day in U.S. District Court is what will this jury decide in the federal corruption retrial of former State Treasurer Robert Vigil.

Attorneys for both sides rested their cases today and then presented closing arguments to jurors who must decide if Vigil demanded and accepted kickbacks while in office.

Vigil's attorney followed the same strategy as the first trial and choose not to call a single witness. That decision, announced after lunch today, allowed closing arguments to begin about 2:30 p.m.

For the last three weeks federal prosecutors have been trying to prove that Vigil accepted kickbacks from a California investment advisor named Kent Nelson.

In their closing argument, prosecutors focused much of their attention on undercover video of Nelson handing Vigil thousands of dollars in cash. Vigil's attorneys have been arguing that payments were campaign contributions...

The jury in the first trial could not reach a verdict in May.

Outside the courtroom, Jason Bowles, one of Vigil's attorneys, declined to comment on the strength of the prosecution s second case as compared to the first.

In his argument to the jury, Bowles said federal prosecutors and federal agents have been twisting innocent facts to make it seemed Vigil accepted kickbacks when in fact he did not.

The courtroom was packed this afternoon with about two dozen of Vigil's family members present to give support.

Closing arguments were continuing late in the day and it appeared jury deliberations would being Friday morning.

Vigil is charged with a total of 24 counts of racketeering, conspiracy and extortion.

No Defense Case Again In Vigil Trial (AP)

AP, September 29, 2006

The attorney for ex-state Treasurer Robert Vigil declined today to present any evidence in his client's public corruption trial.

Immediately after jurors and lawyers returned from their lunch break, U.S. District Judge James Browning asked Sam Bregman if he wanted to present any evidence or witnesses.

Bregman stood up and said, "Your honor, the defense rests."

Bregman declined to put on a case when Vigil was tried last spring on 24 federal extortion, racketeering and conspiracy counts, saying prosecutors never met their burden to prove Vigil's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

That trial resulted in a mistrial May 22 when one juror held out for an acquittal.

Vigil has pleaded not guilty to all charges.

Browning began reading jury instructions today, and attorneys for both sides were expected to present closing statements.

The government wrapped up its case just before noon with testimony from FBI agents Margaret Russin and Drew McCandless. Immediately after the prosecution rested, defense attorney Jason Bowles asked U.S. District Judge James Browning to dismiss the case.

Browning heard arguments from both attorneys for sides, then said he was inclined to let the jury determine whether Vigil committed any crimes.

"I do think there is evidence Mr. Vigil took a payment for which he was not entitled and that it was given in exchange for his official acts," Browning said.

The judge also said he wanted to further consider a defense request to eliminate an extortion count involving George Everage, a former treasurer's office employee who said he was pressured by Vigil to hire the wife of former Treasurer Michael Montoya for a job.

Earlier, Russin testified about discrepancies in Vigil's campaign finance reports, which didn't include an $11,500 contribution from a California investment adviser until seven months after Vigil's arrest last September.

The figure represented the amount that investment adviser Kent Nelson gave to Vigil while he was cooperating with the FBI. McCandless testified that on the day Vigil was arrested, Vigil denied receiving such a contribution

Papers Fight Secrecy In Fumo-related Case (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 29, 2006

The Inquirer yesterday asked a federal judge to reject a proposed confidentiality order in the case of two computer technicians charged with thwarting an FBI investigation of State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo.

The public's interest in open and honest government outweighs any need for secrecy, the newspaper's lawyers said.

"It is fundamental that the public is entitled to information about its government and those in whom the public has placed its trust," lawyers Amy B. Ginensky and Michael E. Baughman wrote on behalf of The Inquirer and the Philadelphia Daily News, which are owned by Philadelphia Newspapers L.L.C.

Federal prosecutors have sought an order barring defense attorneys from sharing pretrial discovery material - including grand jury transcripts - with anyone beyond the defense team and potential witnesses.

Prosecutors said they feared the information would be leaked to the media, causing embarrassment to people who may never be charged in the case.

Defense lawyers said they were offended by the notion that they might leak evidence. They said the prosecution's proposed restrictions would make it difficult for them to interview potential trial witnesses.

U.S. District Judge William H. Yohn Jr. held a hearing on the matter Wednesday and asked prosecutors and defense lawyers to try to settle their differences by next week.

The obstruction-of-justice trial for former state Senate computer technicians Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister is scheduled for Jan. 8.

The underlying investigation - whether Fumo or others misused a South Philadelphia for personal or political gain - should be finished by Christmas, officials said Wednesday.

FILTH, OR FREE SPEECH? (ORLWEEK)

By Jeffrey C. Billman

Orlando (FL) Weekly, September 29, 2006

Feces porn brings the feds to Orlando. Welcome to Bush's war on obscenity

Under no circumstances would Toilet Man 6 be considered family viewing. As the title suggests, this fetish flick features feces-eating and vomit-smearing, and it stars a guy who calls himself Mike, "The Prince of Scat."

Disgusting as it may sound, the original was popular enough to warrant five sequels, so somebody's watching it. Until at least Sept. 5, according to documents filed in federal court, you could go to the website www.scatinbrazil.com, place an order and have your own Toilet Man 6 DVD shipped right to your door. Other titles available from Lexus Multimedia, based off South Kirkman Road in Orlando, included Bukkake 3 and Scat and Fist Fucking 2.

Enter the U.S. Department of Justice. Earlier this month, federal prosecutors filed criminal charges against Danilo Simões Croce of Orlando, who the feds say ran Lexus Multimedia. Croce was charged with accepting Internet payment for obscene materials, then shipping those obscene materials through the mail. (Obscenity is typically prosecuted at the local level, but the feds get involved if the material is distributed through the mail or Internet.) If convicted, he faces up to five years in prison for each of the two counts against him.

Attorneys familiar with free-speech issues say this prosecution is the first of its kind in Orlando, at least as far back as they can remember. Local authorities have prosecuted a few cases, but the feds have mostly stayed out of it in Central Florida. No more. In fact, the decision to prosecute Croce came straight from Washington, D.C., as part of a crackdown on hard-core porn.

While federal prosecutors went after some porn producers — mainly in Southern states — in the 1980s and early 1990s, those cases largely died out during the Clinton administration, says Lou Sirkin, a noted First Amendment attorney in Cincinnati. (Sirkin successfully challenged a federal law banning "virtual" child porn, and defended the director of Cincinnati's Community Arts Center when he was indicted for displaying Robert Mapplethorpe's photography in 1990.) That drop-off came much to the chagrin of family groups that wanted the government to crack down on smut, usually in the name of protecting children. After George W. Bush's election in 2000, the groups ramped up their pressure.

Former attorney general John Ashcroft was receptive to their cause. "Obscenity invades our homes persistently through the mail, phone, VCR, cable TV and now the Internet," Ashcroft told the Federal Prosecutors' Symposium on Obscenity at the National Advocacy Center in 2002. "This multimillion dollar industry with links to organized crime has strewn its victims from coast to coast. Never before has so much obscene material been so easily accessible to minors."

His successor, Alberto Gonzalez, continued the campaign. In 2005, Gonzalez formed the Obscenity Prosecution Task Force, which, according to its website, is "dedicated exclusively to the protection of America's children and families through the enforcement of our nation's obscenity laws." Two task force attorneys are working on the Croce case with one local federal prosecutor. (The task force's website links to www.moralityinmedia.org, which "works to inform citizens and public officials about the harms of pornography and about what they can do through law to protect their communities and children.")

DOJ_NMG_0070952

The problem with enforcing obscenity laws, as has always been the case, is determining what exactly is obscene. Does penetration or sodomy count? Masturbation? Courts have relied on a handful of U.S. Supreme Court cases, the most notable of which is 1973's Miller v. California, to form a three-pronged test for obscenity: One, that the work appeals to "prurient interests"; two, it's "patently offensive"; and three, it has no artistic, literary or satirical merit. But all three of those tests rely on "the average person, applying contemporary adult community standards." That's about as vague as it gets.

For instance, what's patently offensive in San Francisco and Lawrence, Kan., are two very different things. But if you make a video in San Francisco and ship it to Lawrence, federal prosecutors can still apply the more conservative obscenity standards and charge you. Currently, the federal government is prosecuting a case in Pittsburgh against a California-based company because the company, Extreme Associates, shipped a porno flick to Pittsburgh through the mail. The community standards are more conservative in Pittsburgh than California. It is, in a very real sense, stacking the deck.

But even the U.S. Department of Justice has trouble defining exactly what constitutes obscenity. "There's not a list we work off of," spokesman Bryan Sierra says. "We don't charge cases by content, per se."

In other words, there's no memo that says bukkake is obscene but anal sex isn't. Instead, Sierra says, the department tries to train its 93 district attorney's offices in the requirements of the Miller case. "They know what in the community would be considered obscenity versus pornography. … It's a judgment call. They have to apply prosecutorial discretion."

Not everyone's a fan of the DOJ's new push.

"Adults make movies other adults wanted to see," says Larry Walters, a prominent Orlando free-speech attorney. Walters defended Chris Wilson, purveyor of the now-defunct www.nowthatsfuckedup.com, which featured both images of war casualties and porn, against obscenity charges in Polk County last year. In January, Wilson pleaded guilty to five misdemeanor counts, turned over his site to authorities and was put on probation. "The U.S. Attorney's [Office is] trying to censor what other people watch and see."

"The material is consensual," Sirkin adds.

Sirkin is working on obscenity cases similar to U.S. v. Croce in Pittsburgh and Phoenix, and he's heard about a handful of other prosecutions around the country. "They've been making sound waves that they'd be bringing things," he says.

Sierra couldn't say how many obscenity-related cases the Justice Department has brought during the Bush administration, or whether that number has peaked since Gonzalez formed the obscenity task force last year. (That task force was, however, responsible for the $2.1 million hit Girls Gone Wild producers took earlier this month for violating federal laws designed to protect minors from sexual exploitation, Sierra says.) He referred questions about the Croce case to the feds' Orlando office. Roger Handberg, one of the lawyers prosecuting Croce, did not return phone calls.

No trial date has been set for Danilo Croce. His attorney, David Fussell, did not return phone calls.

One thing is clear: Had 537 Florida votes swung differently in 2000, Croce probably wouldn't be worrying about federal prison. And, unless you were among the handful who get off on such things, you never would have heard of Toilet Man 6.

Tennessee Man Sentenced For Threatening Bush, Cheney, Others (AP)

AP, September 29, 2006

ATLANTA - A federal judge on Thursday sentenced a Tennessee man who threatened to kill the president, vice president and cabinet-level officials to more than three years in federal prison.

James Herman Bartholomai of Johnson City was sentenced to three years and one month in prison and three years of supervised release. He was convicted on June 29.

Federal prosecutors said Bartholomai, 35, was serving time as an inmate at the Atlanta federal prison for similar threats in August and September 2004 when he wrote several letters and made a threatening statement to a Secret Service agent.

DOJ_NMG_0070953

In one letter, authorities said Bartholomai described President Bush and Vice President Cheney as "a darkness upon America" and wrote, "I am the avenger ... a terror and an act of treason shall begin ... with their death my quest to bring down the American government."

At his sentencing, Bartholomai said he needed mental health care, and the judge ordered continued psychological treatment and alcohol abuse counseling during his incarceration.

Bartholomai also threatened Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, then-Secretary of State Colin Powell and Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld.

Feds Indict Two For Welfare Housing Fraud (LYNNIT)

By David Liscio

Lynn (MA) Daily Item, September 29, 2006

LYNN - The Justice Department has charged two women with stealing credit card and bank account numbers from the U.S. mail, filling out stolen courtesy checks to make fraudulent deposits, and using phony identification to obtain welfare housing in Lynn and Revere.

Esther Arias, 28, of Malden, and Gladys Cabrera, 31, of Brockton, were indicted Wednesday by a federal grand jury in Boston on multiple counts related to the thefts, according to U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan.

The 47-count indictment charged Arias with 19 counts of mail fraud, seven counts of theft and receipt of stolen mail, two counts of bank fraud, one count of identity theft, and three counts of theft of government property involving U.S. Housing and Urban Development (HUD) benefits.

Cabrera was charged with conspiracy, six counts of mail fraud, 10 counts of theft and receipt of stolen mail, one count of bank fraud, and one count of theft involving HUD benefits.

Court documents indicate the pair began the crime spree in 2003 and continued through Jan. 10, 2004. The women allegedly "stole mail and used information contained within to obtain personal checks of people living in Lynn, which they altered and used to get cash and to make deposits to their bank accounts, as well as bank accounts opened under fictitious identities," according to U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman Samantha Martin.

The women were also indicted for obtaining credit cards by fraud and charging purchases to those cards in the names of other people and without their knowledge. Prosecutors further charged Arias with obtaining a bank automobile loan by using someone else's identify and without their knowledge, and with using stolen checks and credit cards to make the loan payments, Martin said.

HUD joined the investigation after learning that Arias allegedly had obtained federal housing benefits for three apartments simultaneously under different identities, and that Cabrera had participated in the scam related to the third apartment, according to court documents.

Lynn Housing Authority and Neighborhood Development (LHAND), the local agency that oversees federal public housing in the city, had no record of either defendant under their real names, according to Barbara Morrison, supervisor of the authority's fraud unit. The aliases allegedly used by the women to obtain HUD Section 8 welfare apartments were unavailable.

If convicted on the conspiracy, mail fraud and theft charges, the defendants face up to five years behind bars, followed by three years of supervised release, and a $250,000 fine on each charge. Each count of theft of government property carries a maximum of 10 years' imprisonment, six-figure fines and additional supervision upon release. The bank fraud charges can lead to a 30-year jail term and $1 million in fines.

Arias is currently in federal custody pending trial under a separate indictment, charging her with conspiracy in a scheme to file bogus federal and state tax returns in the name of other people, according to Martin.

The U.S. Postal Inspection Service, HUD, the U.S. Internal Revenue Service, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Lynn Police Department investigated the case, related to housing fraud and mail theft in Lynn and Revere.

Witness Tells Court About Gang Rape In MS-13 Trial (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070954

The petite young woman was a 16-year-old Laurel High School student three years ago when she decided to skip classes one day to join two other girls at a party at a Hyattsville apartment.

At the party, she said, Oscar Ramos "Casper" Velasquez took her into a bedroom, where he kissed her and told her that if she didn't have sex with him, as many as 15 other teenagers and young men at the gathering would have sex with her.

When she resisted, two more young men entered the room, the woman told jurors yesterday in federal court. One man threw her on the bed and choked her, the other held down her arms and "Oscar pulled out a gun," she testified.

"He put it to my head, and he said if I didn't shut up, he was going to kill me," the woman told jurors.

Eight men raped her, the 19-year-old woman said. Two assaulted her simultaneously. Outside the room, she said, she heard one man say, "Five minutes each."

The graphic testimony about the May 12, 2003, assault was given in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt, where Velasquez, 21, of Baltimore, and Edgard Alberto "Pony" Ayala, 28, of Suitland, are on trial on federal racketeering charges.

They are the first two of 19 alleged members of Mara Salvatrucha, also known as MS-13, who are to be tried under the federal RICO law. In an indictment handed up last year, and in two later indictments, federal prosecutors say that the gang conspired to commit murder, rape and other crimes.

The young woman's appearance represented the first direct testimony about violence allegedly committed by MS-13 members. Prosecutors say she is one of two teenage girls sexually assaulted at the Hyattsville party.

During nearly three hours on the witness stand, the woman, a Salvadoran immigrant, maintained her poise as she testified through a translator. She did not appear to look at Velasquez, seated about 20 feet away.

The Washington Post does not identify victims of sexual assault without their consent.

Under direct examination by Assistant U.S. Attorney Sandra Wilkinson, the woman said that after Velasquez threatened her with the gun, another man came in and threatened her with a stick. As she continued to cry and plead to be left alone, yet another man came into the room and said, "I'll go first," she said.

The other four left the room, and the new man raped her, the woman testified.

Outside the room, she could hear teenagers and young men hollering and laughing.

The woman said she tried to get dressed between attacks.

Eventually, 10 men entered the room, but two did not rape her, the woman said. She testified that Velasquez did not sexually assault her.

Some of the attackers used condoms, she said. Eventually, a man came into the room and picked up the used condoms.

Asked by Wilkinson how the assault made her feel, the woman said, "Weak, in pain. Lost. Bad."

The woman said she heard one of the other girls yelling, just before all the men and teenagers in the apartment ran away. The woman said she got dressed and went outside, where she used the cellphone of a neighbor to call 911 and report that she had been raped.

Federal prosecutors also called to the witness stand a Los Angeles police detective who testified about the origins of MS-13 and a court translator who read her translations of letters written by gang members.

MS-13 members live by the motto "We kill, we rape, we control," a federal prosecutor said in her opening statement Tuesday.

Federal prosecutors say that MS-13 committed six homicides and four attempted homicides between April 2003 and June 2005 in suburban Maryland. Eight attacks were in Prince George's, two in Montgomery.

An indictment handed up last week charges that the gang was responsible for a seventh homicide, in Fairfax County in January 2005, when two MS-13 members allegedly fired into a group of youths sitting outside an apartment building. One man was killed, and two juveniles were wounded.

Ayala is accused of driving with fellow gang members to the Fairfax attack.

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Denies Stay Motion In Government Case Against Tobacco (MRKTWTCH)

By Mark H. Anderson

Market Watch, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- A federal judge Thursday denied a motion by several tobacco companies asking for the stay of a U.S. District Court ruling in the Justice Department's racketeering lawsuit against the tobacco industry.

U.S. District Judge Gladys Kessler's rejection of the request means the companies now must focus on filing appeals in the case in the Washington, D.C.-based U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Philip Morris USA, a unit of Altria Group Inc. (MO), said it will immediately appeal for a stay of the tobacco judgment with the D.C. Circuit while it prepares its broader appeal of Judge Kessler's ruling.

"Philip Morris USA believes a stay in this case is warranted," said William S. Ohlemeyer, associate general counsel at Philip Morris.

Judge Kessler, in an order denying the stay request, said "there is a very substantial likelihood that many individuals will be harmed if the stay is granted" and that "those considerations far outweigh defendants' purely economic concerns about losing what may, at most, be unrecoverable market share if the stay is denied."

Philip Morris, Reynolds American Inc. (RAI), Loews Corp.'s (LTR) Lorillard Inc. and British American Tobacco PLC (BTI) all asked that the Aug. 17 ruling be set aside pending appeals. Judge Kessler's decision said the cigarette makers violated civil racketeering law by defrauding the public on the dangers of tobacco and ordered a series of remedial actions that include changes and restrictions on the marketing of light and low-tar cigarettes.

The companies argued the marketing restrictions and expenses of complying with the court order would substantially harm them economically. But Judge Kessler said "their complaints about the costs of compliance with the remedial order ring hollow."

Judge Kessler's denial of a stay, which would have set aside her 1,653-page decision, was expected. The appeals process at higher federal courts is likely to play out over the next couple months as the companies prepare to litigate at the appeals court level.

-Contact: 201-938-5400

What's The Judge Smoking? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

Jack Weinstein is a federal judge in Brooklyn, New York, who's well-known for indulging class-action lawyers. His honor certainly didn't disappoint them this week when he granted class-action status to a $200 billion claim against Big Tobacco. That eye-popping dollar amount has garnered big headlines, but the real news rests on whether the decision holds up on appeal, which isn't likely.

Unlike so many past (and unsuccessful) lawsuits against tobacco companies, this one isn't about the health risks of smoking per se. Instead, plaintiffs attorneys argue that Philip Morris, R.J. Reynolds and other cigarette manufacturers fooled customers into thinking "light" and "low-tar" products are safer and less addictive, even though a pack of Marlboro Ultra Lights carries the same warning label as a pack of Camels.

Never mind, too, that a D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals ruling last month on the marketing of "light" cigarettes resulted in no damages being awarded. Or that a similar consumer fraud claim was rejected last year by the Illinois Supreme Court. In the latter case, which also involved Philip Morris, the court ruled that the Federal Trade Commission had authorized tobacco companies to use the terms "low tar" and "light" in marketing cigarettes. "If the FTC has specifically authorized the use of the term," said the court, "[Philip Morris] may not be held liable under the Consumer Fraud Act, even if the terms might be deemed false, deceptive or misleading."

A more immediate concern for plaintiffs is whether Judge Weinstein's class certification will be upheld by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals. If that happens, it would be the first "lights" case to be certified in federal court, and an estimated 50 million Americans -- anyone who's purchased a "light" cigarette since they went on the market in the 1970s -- could be part of the class.

DOJ_NMG_0070956

If you're among those 50 million, however, don't spend your share of the money just yet. The federal courts have not looked kindly on certifying nationwide classes that are predicated on state consumer protection statutes. That's mainly because state laws vary so widely as to make class status untenable, particularly when it comes to remedies.

In a 2002 decision by Judge Frank Easterbrook, the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals denied nationwide certification on those grounds to owners of SUVs who claimed their Firestone tires were unsafe. And just last year, the Second Circuit decided that another national class action against tobacco companies did not meet federal requirements, and that the judge who certified the class was out of bounds in doing so. The activist judge overturned in that case was none other than Jack Weinstein.

Our point is not to sympathize with tobacco companies, which obviously sell a dangerous (if legal) product. But neither should the tort bar be permitted to use current public sentiment against Big Tobacco to create a more lawsuit-friendly legal environment, which is what these "consumer fraud" cases are really about.

Looser requirements for class certification is their real long-term goal. But giving trial lawyers license to cobble together plaintiffs nationwide, and then shop around for the Judge Weinsteins of the bench, puts not only tobacco manufacturers but every deep-pocketed manufacturer at risk. Often, certification of a class -- before any evidence addressing the merits has been introduced -- is all that's needed to force a defendant to settle rather than risk a jury trial that could wipe out a business or industry. If you think that's alarmist, consult a manufacturer of breast implants, lead paint, asbestos or guns. Shares of Altria, the parent company of Philip Morris, fell 6.4% on news of the ruling, before recovering a bit.

Lax certification requirements are a green light for trial lawyers to push the envelope -- and a class that includes one-sixth of the U.S. population is really pushing it. It encourages more frivolous filings, which in turn crowd out the legitimate ones. Which is why Judge Weinstein's ruling deserves to be reversed.

Tenet Agrees To "Integrity" Pact (AP-YBIZ)

AP, September 29, 2006

Tenet Healthcare Agrees to "Corporate Integrity" Pact With Federal Authorities

DALLAS (AP) -- Tenet Healthcare Corp. on Thursday said it has agreed to a "corporate integrity" pact with federal authorities -- an offshoot of the hospital manager's $900 million settlement resolving investigations into alleged over-billing of Medicare.

The agreement with the Office of the Inspector General and Department of Health and Human Services establishes annual training requirements and compliance reviews by independent organizations. It targets Tenet's clinical standards, code of conduct and procedures in billing and reimbursement, among other areas.

Tenet, the nation's second-largest hospital operator, agreed in June to pay the $900 million to end investigations by the Justice Department and several U.S. attorneys into allegations that it overbilled Medicare for the most costly cases, made illegal kickbacks to doctors to refer Medicare patients to its hospitals, and used improper billing codes to bilk the health care program. The settlement did not include a determination that Tenet broke the law.

In a statement, President and Chief Executive Trevor Fetter said the company already has in place many of the procedures and systems called for under the corporate integrity pact, due to changes made over the past three years since the company came under investigation.

The agreement runs through September 2011.

Federal Judge Rejects Ohio Law Restricting Use Of Abortion Pill (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, September 29, 2006

(AP) - CINCINNATI-A federal judge struck down an Ohio law restricting the use of an abortion-inducing pill, calling the law vague and saying it could jeopardize women's health.

Wednesday's ruling by U.S. District Judge Susan Dlott came two years after a court challenge by Ohio abortion providers.

The 2004 law, which had never taken effect, bars doctors from prescribing mifepristone, or RU-486, after the seventh week of pregnancy.

The American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, which joined the suit this year, said the law interfered with medical decisions and criminalized practices that could be in the best interest of patients.

DOJ_NMG_0070957

State officials argued the law was intended to protect women in accordance with Food and Drug Administration guidelines, which recommend that RU-486 not be prescribed to women more than seven weeks pregnant.

The judge said the law was unclear and contained no exception to allow use of the drug in cases where a woman's health was at risk.

In September 2004, Dlott issued a temporary injunction barring enforcement of the law one day before it was to take effect.

Plaintiffs celebrated the new ruling. "This is another piece of legislation that is intended to scare doctors away from providing reproductive health care," said Al Gerhardstein, an attorney for Planned Parenthood.

Mark Anthony, a spokesman for Attorney General Jim Petro, said Thursday that his office was reviewing the ruling and had not decided whether to appeal.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Complex Designers And Builders Settle Discrimination Suit (AP)

AP, September 29, 2006

AUSTIN — Two apartment complexes will be retrofitted to make them more accessible for people with disabilities and settle a discrimination lawsuit the U.S. Justice Department filed against 10 companies involved in the design and construction of the facilities, the federal government said Thursday.

The settlement requires court approval, the Justice Department said in a news release.

The companies have to work on the parking areas, walkways, the interior of ground-floor units and common areas of the St. John's Village and Hunting Meadows Apartments. They also will pay $10,000 in civil penalties to the government and establish a $50,000 fund to compensate people harmed by the inaccessible housing.

A lawsuit against the developers, builders, architects and engineers alleged the dwellings didn't include features that make them more accessible to people with physical disabilities. It was filed in U.S. District Court for the Western District of Texas.

The companies are Legend Communities Inc., which does business as SDC Austin, Communities; Randall Jones Engineering, Inc.; Alexander Consulting Engineers, Inc., which does business as Professional Design Group; Trugreen Landcare, L.L.C., which does business as Land Design Studio; Hatch Partnership, L.L.P., Architects; Danze & Davis Architects, Inc.; St. John's Housing Partnership, L.P.; SMDC Development, Inc.; Decker Lane Partners, L.P. and SDCW Development Corp.

Two Groups Request Voting Monitors For Augusta November Election (WRDW-TV)

WRDW-TV, Augusta, GA, September 29, 2006

There's just over a month before voters head to the polls, but the Augusta NAACP is taking steps now to make sure the election is carried out fairly.

They're asking the US Justice Department to step in and oversee the election.

Under the Voting Rights Act, any voter or group has the right to ask for federal assistance if they have a serious concern about the fairness surrounding an upcoming election. Two local groups say they have several concerns and that's why they're asking for help.

"On election day, we want to make sure every vote is tallied, every vote is accurately counted," said Dr. Charles Smith, president of the Augusta NAACP.

Dr. Smith sent a letter to the US Department of Justice saying the citizens of Richmond County do not have trust and confidence in the reliability of the Diebold electronic voting machines.

"These machines are unreliable," he told News 12. "It's like a credit card. You scan it. If a person does not go through the whole process, or forgets to push the button, the vote won't count."

So Dr. Smith and Sharon Paschal of Taxpayers for Economic Justice are asking the Justice Department to deploy federal observers to Augusta to monitor the November election.

"Again, you have somebody that's back on the ballot that was on the ballot in the previous election, so you want to make sure the machines are cleared," Paschal said.

DOJ_NMG_0070958

The groups have organized a petition with over 600 names.

Other than the voting machines, they're concerned about Deke Copenhaver's former campaign manager, Tim Moses, serving on the Board of Elections, which oversees the tabulation of votes.

"He recused himself during the hearing, but the Board may still be contaminated with his views," Paschal said.

While it's uncertain if the Justice Department will actually grant the groups' request, voters we talked to had mixed opinions about this step being taken.

"If you've got people to protect you and get it done right then it goes right," said Alma Stringfeller.

"Were I a minority person, I might have some questions too, but I'm not sure if anything of untoward is going on at this point," said Lowell Barnhart.

Federal observers are trained by the Justice Department.

If they came to Augusta, they would watch, listen, and record everything that happens inside the polling places.

They would not be allowed to interfere with the election, but they would prepare a report, and that report would be used in court if there was a challenge.

Federal monitors have never been deployed to Augusta, but they have been sent to dozens of counties over the last few years.

So how long will it be before we know if the justice department will send the monitors.

We probably won't know for a couple of weeks whether the Justice Department will send the monitors. The decision lies with the Attorney General.

Secretary of State Cathy Cox says it will be expensive for extra security on those electronic voting machines.

She submitted a cost plan to the governor for providing paper trails for the electronic ballots.

The estimate is between $19.5 and $75 million for the system.

The state spent $75 million to switch to electronic ballots in 2002.

Lawmaker Questions E-voting Paper Trail (AP-Y)

By David Hammer

AP, September 28, 2006

A House committee chairman and an election official on Thursday punched holes in the notion that paper records will solve the problems with new electronic voting machines.

About a month before voters put their trust in computerized ballots, Rep. Vernon Ehlers, R-Mich., chairman of the House Administration Committee, subtly mocked the "Got Paper?" catchphrase of activists calling for paper audits of those votes.

Ehlers pointed to a photo of a pollworker in the 2000 Florida recount, his one eye appearing massive as it peered through a magnifying glass at a punch-card ballot.

"You can see this man has 'got paper,'" Ehlers said. "Simply saying let's use paper does not mean the problems go away."

Keith Cunningham, former head of the Ohio Association of County Elections Officials, testified that a recount of Cuyahoga County's voter-verified paper audit trail showed massive failure of the printouts — 10 percent of the receipt-like rolls were missing, blank or unreadable.

"I equate it to planting several hundred acres of wheat with a state-of-the-art machine and then going out and harvesting it by hand like the Amish do," Cunningham said.

Legislation proposed by Rep. Rush Holt, D-N.J., and backed by more than 200 lawmakers would require paper audit trails for all new electronic voting machines. About 39 percent of voters will use electronic ballots and about 41 percent will use paper ballots read by optical scanners in the Nov. 7 elections.

"It must be done this week," Holt wrote in a letter to colleagues. "Voter confidence — both parties — is unraveling."

Activists have filed lawsuits in at least nine states contending the new electronic voting machines are not secure and prone to as many errors as punch cards and other mechanical voting methods.

DOJ_NMG_0070959

Princeton University Professor Edward Felten testified that Diebold Inc.'s computerized voting machines could be easily hacked. He used a generic jukebox key he said he bought on the Internet to break into a Diebold voting machine and change the outcome of a mock election.

Diebold has questioned the methods of Felten's analysis and of the paper trail review in Ohio.

Michael Shamos, a software researcher and Pennsylvania voting examiner, warned against condemning the whole expensive electronic voting system because of some fixable security concerns. He said Holt's legislation would do just that by imposing standards that no electronic voting machines can currently meet.

"If passed in its current form there could be no more electronic voting in this country," Shamos said. "Congress would be in position after spending $3 billion on new voting machines, of spending millions more to replace what it just paid for."

___

The House resolution is H.R. 550

___

On the Net:

Congress: http://thomas.loc.gov

ANTITRUST:

Congressmen Ask For Delay In BellSouth, AT&T Merger (AP)

By John Dunbar, Associated Press

AP, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON – The chairman and ranking member of the House Judiciary Committee have asked the Justice Department to delay approval of the merger of AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp. until a federal court decides whether two previous mergers were in the public interest.

Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., and ranking member John Conyers, D-Mich., sent a letter Thursday to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking the department delay its decision until a federal judge rules on the merger of SBC Communications Inc. and the old AT&T Corp., as well as the merger of Verizon Communications Inc. and MCI Inc.

Also Wednesday, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sens. Patrick Leahy of Vermont and Herb Kohl of Wisconsin, wrote a similar letter questioning whether Justice has been approving mergers too hastily, counter to the intent of federal law.

The Justice Department had no immediate comment.

Pols Call For Delay Of AT&T-BellSouth Merger (AJC)

By Scott Leith, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 29, 2006

Two congressmen have asked the Justice Department to slow down a review of the pending merger of AT&T and BellSouth.

The representatives, James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) and John Conyers (D-Mich.), sent a letter Wednesday to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, questioning the possible approval of the AT&T-BellSouth deal before a judge completes his review of two other telecommunications mega-mergers from last year.

The letter, along with one sent to Justice by two senators, was touted Thursday by a group called the Competition Coalition, which opposes the AT&T-BellSouth combination.

The spotlight on the pending deal is intensifying as the Justice Department and the Federal Communications Commission both move closer to approving the merger. AT&T wants to complete its purchase of BellSouth as soon as next month, while opponents want to place certain restrictions on the deal.

The Justice Department must review mergers, and then a court must conduct its own review.

DOJ_NMG_0070960

At the moment, a judge is looking at the approvals of two big mergers from 2005: Verizon Communications-MCI and SBC Communications-AT&T. The review is required under what is known as the Tunney Act.

"The court is examining the sufficiency of proposed remedies intended to alleviate competitive harm," Sensenbrenner and Conyers wrote. "Any court decision in the pending Tunney Act proceedings would necessarily affect the department's review and analysis of the proposed AT&T-BellSouth merger."

AT&T, however, disagrees with requests for the Justice Department to slow down its review of the BellSouth deal to wait for the judge's decision regarding last year's deals.

"We see no reason for a delay," said AT&T spokesman Dave Pacholczyk. "These are different mergers. Our merger with BellSouth is proceeding along a separate path and is not part of the court's review."

The current AT&T was created when SBC Communications of San Antonio bought the old AT&T and took on the famous name.

In a separate letter, senators Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) and Herb Kohl (D-Wis.) objected to the Justice Department's practice of letting mergers close before Tunney Act review.

"Serious questions arise as to whether endorsing the parties closing their deals in advance of Tunney Act review effectively negates the requirement of public interest judicial review," the letter said.

The Justice Department does not comment on pending reviews, as in the AT&T-BellSouth case.

Andrew Schwartzman, a member of the Competition Coalition, supports requests for a delay. "Were the DOJ and FCC to approve the AT&T-BellSouth merger before federal judicial review of prior Bell mergers, this administration will have demonstrated yet again that it has never met a merger it won't approve," Schwartzman said, in a prepared statement.

Last week, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin circulated a plan to approve the AT&T-BellSouth deal without conditions. The FCC's next meeting is currently scheduled for Oct. 12. Typically, the FCC lets the DOJ announce its decision first.

Lawmakers Call For Delay In AT&T/BellSouth Merger (SABIZ)

San Antonio Business Journal, September 29, 2006

The House Judiciary Committee's chairman and ranking member have sent a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking the Justice Department to put off approval of AT&T Inc.'s planned $67 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp.

The letter asks that the approval be delayed until a federal court can determine if the previous SBC/AT&T and Verizon/MCI mergers are in the public interest.

A 2004 amendment to the Tunney Act requires the court to make this public interest determination, House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.) and Ranking Member John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) said in the letter.

"In the current Tunney Act proceedings, the court is examining the sufficiency of proposed remedies intended to alleviate competitive harm, particularly in the local private line marketplace associated with the SBC/AT&T and Verizon/MCI mergers," the letter said.

"At the same time, the (Justice) Department is evaluating precisely the same question -- whether a proposed merger would produce competitive harm in the local private line market and what remedies could address this harm -- in the context of the proposed AT&T/BellSouth merger. As a result of this concurrent examination, any court decision in the pending Tunney Act proceedings would necessarily affect the department's review and analysis of the proposed AT&T/BellSouth merger."

The two lawmakers also urged the Justice Department to carefully review the AT&T/BellSouth merger "due to the size and scope of the transaction" and to "mitigate the risk of competitive harm and to ensure that it is consistent with the public interest."

In March, San Antonio-based AT&T (NYSE: T) reported its plans to acquire Atlanta-based BellSouth (NYSE: BLS). The merger also will streamline the ownership and operations of Atlanta-based Cingular Wireless LLC, which AT&T and BellSouth own together.

The new company will be more innovative, nimble and efficient, providing benefits to customers by combining the Cingular, BellSouth and AT&T networks into a single fully integrated wireless and wireline Internet Protocol network that offers a full range of advanced technology, the companies contend.

The AT&T/BellSouth merger only needs approvals from the Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission in order to close. A spokeswoman for AT&T said Thursday the company still expects to clear these regulatory hurdles later this fall.

Lawmakers Seek Delay Of AT&T-BellSouth Deal Review (MRKTWTCH)

By Siobhan Hughes

Market Watch, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- Two powerful House lawmakers are asking the Justice Department to postpone a review of AT&T Inc.'s (T) $67 acquisition of BellSouth Corp. (BLS) until a federal judge completes his determination of whether two prior telecommunications mergers are in the public interest.

The letter from House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., and Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., the top Democrat on the panel, may throw a new kink into efforts to speed up a review of the merger. Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin has set the stage for an Oct. 12 vote on the transaction, and it had been expected that the Justice Department might issue its own decision before then.

A Justice Department spokeswoman wasn't immediately available to comment.

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan is currently reviewing the mergers of Verizon Communications Inc.'s (VZ) with MCI Inc. as well as the former SBC Communications Inc.'s takeover of AT&T, under expanded power Congress gave the courts in the Tunney Act of 2004 to more closely scrutinize Justice Department antitrust pacts with companies.

Two groups representing Bell competitors as well as New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer have challenged the mergers, arguing that the conditions imposed by the Justice Department failed to boost competition.

"As a result of this concurrent examination, any court decision in the pending Tunney Act proceedings would necessarily affect the Department's review and analysis of the proposed AT&T/BellSouth merger," Sensenbrenner and Conyers wrote to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Sept. 28.

They also said that giving courts the power to review Justice Department approvals "is not only a reasonable request, but a clear directive Congress reaffirmed in its 2004 amendments to the Tunney Act."

Separately, two top Senate Judiciary Committee Democrats wrote Justice antitrust chief Thomas Barnett to complain the agency has allowed high-profile telecommunications mergers to close before congressionally-mandated court reviews have been completed.

"Serious questions arise as to whether endorsing the parties closing their deals in advance of Tunney Act review effectively negates the requirement of public interest judicial review," Sens. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and Herb Kohl, D-Wis., said in a Sept. 27 letter. "We write to inquire as to why the Justice Department is permitting parties to close deals prior to Tunney Act review."

Leahy and Kohl referred specifically to the Verizon and MCI merger in the letter. A federal judge is reviewing both that merger and the separate merger of SBC Communications and AT&T.

The letter asks Barnett to explain why the Justice Department is allowing some mergers to complete before court reviews are final. The letter doesn't set a deadline, however, for when the antitrust chief must respond.

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- Two powerful House lawmakers are asking the Justice Department to postpone a review of AT&T Inc.'s (T) $67 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp. (BLS) until a federal judge completes his determination of whether two prior telecommunications mergers are in the public interest.

(In a story published around 12:24 EDT, the amount of the transaction was incorrect.)

(Adds more details from House letter in third paragraph; comment from DOJ spokeswoman in fourth paragraph; FCC chairman's Tuesday comments in 10th paragraph; adds background on internal FCC political situation in 11th paragraph; analyst quote in 12th paragraph; moves section on Senators seeking conditions up to 13th paragraph)

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- Two powerful House lawmakers are asking the Justice Department to postpone a review of AT&T Inc.'s (T) $67 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp. (BLS) until a federal judge decides whether two prior telecommunications mergers were in the public interest.

The letter from House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., and Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., the top Democrat on the panel, may throw a new kink into efforts to speed up a review of the merger. Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin has set the stage for an Oct. 12 vote on the transaction, and it had been expected that the Justice Department might issue its own decision before then.

"We request the Department postpone concluding its examination of the proposed AT&T/BellSouth merger," the lawmakers' letter says.

"We're aware of it and will respond as appropriate," said Gina Talamona, a Justice Department spokeswoman. She declined to provide a timeframe for a response. An FCC official said that Martin had received a copy of the letter and a separate letter from the leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee, but declined further comment.

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan is currently reviewing the mergers of Verizon Communications Inc.'s (VZ) with MCI Inc. as well as the former SBC Communications Inc.'s takeover of AT&T, under expanded power Congress gave the courts in the Tunney Act of 2004 to more closely scrutinize Justice Department antitrust pacts with companies.

Two groups representing Bell competitors as well as New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer have challenged the mergers, arguing that the conditions imposed by the Justice Department failed to boost competition.

"As a result of this concurrent examination, any court decision in the pending Tunney Act proceedings would necessarily affect the [Justice] Department's review and analysis of the proposed AT&T/BellSouth merger," Sensenbrenner and Conyers wrote to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Thursday.

They also said that giving courts the power to review Justice Department approvals "is not only a reasonable request, but a clear directive Congress reaffirmed in its 2004 amendments to the Tunney Act." FCC Chief Supports Deadline

On Tuesday, the FCC chairman had suggested that sticking to a self-imposed deadline of reviewing mergers within 180 days was more important than allowing the federal judge's review to run its course. Although the Tunney Act doesn't apply to the FCC, its officials and Justice Department officials coordinate on telecommunications mergers, and have been doing so in this case. The Justice Department review typically is concluded first.

"We could stop the clock, obviously, and we don't always make 180 days," Martin told reporters after an FCC meeting on Tuesday. "But that's our goal of trying to and I think it's important for the commission to still continue to try to make that 180 day clock."

Even so, Martin already faces the possibility that he may not have a Republican majority on the five-member FCC to approve the transaction. FCC Commissioner Robert McDowell has indicated he may recuse himself from voting since his previous employer, a trade group for small phone companies, opposes the deal. The result would be to empower the FCC's two Democrats, who are likely to want stricter conditions than those Martin would request.

"The FCC can choose to act however it sees fit, because it's not part of the Tunney act review," said Jessica Zufolo, an analyst at Medley Global Advisors LLC. But the letter "definitely is intended to make the commission pause, and it may cause some consternation in the process at the commission." Senators Want Conditions

Meanwhile, Kohl and another committee member asked the Justice Department and the FCC to consider imposing conditions on the merger. Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, the top antitrust lawmaker on the judiciary panel, and Kohl said in a letter Thursday that they were concerned about allegations the new company would stockpile the wireless spectrum it controls and keep it out of the hands of competitors, slowing the deployment of broadband wireless technologies known as "Wimax."

"We urge your agencies to carefully examine the market for spectrum, which types of spectrum may be necessary to efficiently and economically provide Wimax service, the impact of this merger on that spectrum market, and any allegations of warehousing, and to take whatever steps are appropriate," their letter says.

The senators also asked the FCC and Justice Department to examine whether AT&T and BellSouth should divest themselves of some so-called local loop facilities in BellSouth's territory in the southeastern U.S.

Two Senate top Senate Judiciary Committee Democrats added to the pressure, writing to Justice antitrust chief Thomas Barnett to complain the agency has allowed high-profile telecommunications mergers to close before congressionally-mandated court reviews have been completed.

"Serious questions arise as to whether endorsing the parties closing their deals in advance of Tunney Act review effectively negates the requirement of public interest judicial review," Sens. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and Herb Kohl, D-Wis., said in a letter Wednesday. "We write to inquire as to why the Justice Department is permitting parties to close deals prior to Tunney Act review."

Leahy and Kohl referred specifically to the Verizon and MCI merger in the letter. A federal judge is reviewing both that merger and the separate merger of SBC Communications and AT&T.

The letter asks Barnett to explain why the Justice Department is allowing some mergers to complete before court reviews are final. The letter doesn't set a deadline, however, for when the antitrust chief must respond.

-Contact: 201-938-5400

'We Think It Will Pass' (FWST)

By Maria Recio

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House will vote Friday on legislation that would repeal the Wright Amendment in eight years, after leaders changed the bill to conform to a Senate version.

"We've got the support to pass it," Rep. Kay Granger, R-Fort Worth, said. "I'm very happy about it. We think it will pass."

Granger, according to one lawmaker, has more than 300 votes for the bill. That's more than the two-thirds needed to pass bills under "suspension" of the rules, a calendar for typically noncontroversial legislation.

Those bills can't be amended, and House leaders have placed the bill on the suspension calendar to try and assure its passage.

In a bow to the power of the Texas GOP delegation, the House majority leader, John Boehner, R-Ohio, attended the group's weekly lunch Thursday to tell them he scheduled the vote for today.

Boehner worked this week to mollify House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., who stripped antitrust immunity from a version of the legislation earlier this month.

The Wright Amendment legislation to be voted on has been changed to include language on antitrust issues negotiated last week by Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, and Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the Senate Judiciary Committee chairman. The new version also reinforces safety language.

The Wright Amendment, passed by Congress in the late 1970s to protect Dallas/Fort Worth Airport, restricts most passenger flights at Dallas Love Field to within Texas and several nearby states. Scheduled nonstop and connecting flights beyond that perimeter are prohibited, which critics say hampers competition at Love and keeps airfares high here.

The bill being voted on by the House reflects an agreement reached by Fort Worth, Dallas, American and Southwest airlines and Dallas/Fort Worth Airport in June that would reduce the number of Love's gates to 20 from 32, permit immediate through-ticketing beyond Texas and the eight states covered by existing Love Field limits, and abolish those limits in eight years. After eight years, airlines would be free to fly nonstop domestically from Love.

In modifying the House bill this week, negotiators removed the antitrust language that troubled House and Senate judiciary committee members.

The language said the signers to the agreement were protected "from any competition laws." The new language makes clear that the city of Dallas "shall reduce the number of gates," giving the parties legal cover for acting under congressional direction.

A House-passed bill with the changes should ease the way for passage in the Senate, where Hutchison has been working to get the bill approved.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., has raised questions about antitrust and has placed a hold on the Senate version.

The House and Senate are aiming to recess today for the fall elections, although the Senate could work through the weekend.

The Wright Amendment legislation could fall into a December session of Congress. The local Wright Amendment deal could be voided if Congress doesn't pass it intact before the end of December.

Jamie Loftus, Hutchison's spokesperson, said Hutchison is "still pursuing a unanimous consent option" in the Senate.

"We're still optimistic that we'll get the language passed by the Senate before the recess," said Marc Short, a Hutchison aide.

Meanwhile, American and Southwest airlines attempted to mobilize employees to help. Both airlines sent e-mails to their work forces Thursday, asking them to contact their representatives in Congress.

"You've got 120,000 people who are very involved in this issue," said John Carpenter, vice president of corporate affairs at American. "And they're all voters."

While events unfolded in Washington, the owners of the Legend Airlines terminal at Love Field filed a federal lawsuit against the city of Dallas in an attempt to stop the deal from progressing.

The suit accuses Dallas officials of having violated state open-meetings laws in negotiating the compromise, and asks the court to throw it out.

The suit named the city, Mayor Laura Miller and council members Angela Hunt, Linda Koop, Pauline Medrano, Ron Natinsky, Ed Oakley and Steve Salazar. The defendants were on a committee that negotiated the deal with representatives from Fort Worth, American, Southwest and D/FW.

The suit requested an injunction voiding the compromise and requiring the city to produce minutes and records of meetings held behind closed doors.

The terminal owners have opposed the agreement because the deal would require the city to seize and close the facility's gates. The owners say they were on the verge of a deal to sell the building for $100 million to Pinnacle Airlines, a regional partner of Northwest Airlines, before the Wright compromise was struck.

Dallas officials were not available to comment on the suit late Thursday.

Staff writers Trebor Banstetter and David Wethe contributed to this report.

Officials Make Another Pitch For Wright Compromise (AP)

AP, September 29, 2006

DALLAS - Officials from Dallas and Fort Worth made another pitch Thursday for a compromise on the Wright Amendment to lift restrictions on long-haul flights from Dallas Love Field after eight years, sending a letter to lawmakers in Washington who have expressed concerns about antitrust issues.

An agreement forged by Love-based Southwest Airlines, AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, Dallas Fort Worth International Airport and the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth calls for eventually repealing the Wright Amendment and eliminating some gates at Dallas Love Field.

The U.S. House is expected to take up the issue on Friday before recessing for the election break. The compromise is contingent on passage before the end of the year.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., has continued to block the legislation in the Senate over concerns about whether it sidesteps federal antitrust laws.

The letter from Dallas Mayor Laura Miller and Fort Worth Mayor Mike Moncrief as well as attorneys for the two cities said the compromise reached earlier this year is "a sensible solution to a decades-old problem," according to a news release from DFW Airport.

"The cities of Dallas and Fort Worth spearheaded this effort not only to repeal the Wright Amendment and thereby improve air competition, but simultaneously to improve the regional transportation infrastructure serving Dallas and Fort Worth, to stimulate to the greatest extent possible regional economic growth, and to address community concerns about the noise, traffic, and air pollution associated with increased service at these airports," they said in the letter.

In an accompanying letter, DFW board chairman Jan Collmer and other former chairmen said the goal of the legislation is open the North Texas market to more competition, not less. They said they expected $259 million a year in fare savings.

Under the Wright Amendment, flights from Love Field must land in Texas or eight nearby states.

Justice Formally Drops Exelon Case (AP-YBIZ)

AP, September 29, 2006

Justice Drops Exelon Antitrust Case in Wake of Collapse of Acquisition of PSEG

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Justice Department on Thursday said it has formally moved to dismiss its antitrust case against utility company Exelon Corp. for its purchase of New Jersey utility Public Service Enterprise Group, now that Exelon has given up on the acquisition.

Chicago-based Exelon sought to purchase Newark-based PSEG in a $17 billion deal announced in December 2004, but the acquisition fell apart in the face of opposition from New Jersey's utilities regulators. Exelon announced Sept. 14 that the two companies had dropped their plans to merge.

Justice approved the merger in June, but only on condition that Exelon sell six power plants. Those conditions were set out in a proposed settlement to an antitrust lawsuit the department had filed, but has now filed notice to dismiss.

Shares of Exelon finished down 40 cents, at $61.30 on the New York Stock Exchange. PSEG shares closed down 49 cents, at $61.63 on the NYSE.

West Penn Tries To Stop UPMC's Mercy Deal (PPG)

By Christopher Snowbeck

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, September 29, 2006

The head of the region's second-largest health system is moving aggressively to try to block the merger of University of Pittsburgh Medical Center and Mercy Hospital, raising concerns with the U.S. Justice Department, the state attorney general and others.

The moves by Jerry J. Fedele, chief executive officer of West Penn Allegheny Health System, come as questions swirl about what a merger, announced a week ago, would mean for health care costs in the region.

Mr. Fedele argues that a merger would further UPMC's goal of creating a health care monopoly that would drive up costs by using its market share to demand better reimbursements from health insurers like Highmark Inc.

UPMC officials would not directly respond to the charge, but said they pursued the merger as a way to save the county's last Catholic hospital. The merger, which Mercy officials have said was initiated by them, primarily would benefit UPMC by giving the health system room for a needed expansion of hospital services.

Still, concerns remain about the cost impact of the merger, which Mercy and UPMC officials hope to conclude by the end of the year if they successfully clear a barrage of regulatory and other hurdles, including approval from Rome.

A report being released today by the Pennsylvania Health Care Cost Containment Council notes that charges for patients treated at UPMC's Presbyterian and Shadyside hospitals are consistently and considerably higher than the charges at Mercy.

For example, the study finds that UPMC Presbyterian Shadyside charges anywhere from 37 percent to 92 percent more than Mercy for patients with any of 30 common diagnoses.

Insurance companies rarely pay the sticker prices, which is what the report measured, acknowledged Christine Whipple, executive director of the local employer coalition Pittsburgh Business Group on Health.

So it would be wrong, she said, to suggest the spread in charges between UPMC and other hospitals precisely mirrors the difference in payments received by the hospitals.

But the report does raise questions, she said, about why the gap in charges is so large; whether the addition of Mercy to the UPMC stable might widen the spread between UPMC and other hospitals; and whether having UPMC control that much more of the market might drive costs up further.

"We have a highly concentrated market as it is," Ms. Whipple said.

"To continue to highly concentrate that market -- does that have the possibility of making someone too strong, or an entity so big that it can start to set prices?"

For now, the lack of transparency in what hospitals are paid by health insurers makes it difficult to judge the competing claims that have been made by Mr. Fedele and Robert Cindrich, UPMC's chief legal counsel.

Both have suggested that their advanced or "tertiary" hospitals receive lower reimbursements from Highmark than their competitor gets for providing the same service.

Mr. Cindrich has said he believes Mercy Hospital's reimbursements are better than UPMC's, as well.

DOJ_NMG_0070966

That claim is doubted by some members of the business community, who question why insurers other than Highmark that have Mercy in their networks have had such trouble negotiating contracts to add UPMC Presbyterian and Shadyside.

Highmark, for its part, does not release information about payment rates to the hospitals, which means the cost containment council had to base its findings on the reported sticker prices for various procedures, not on the reimbursements the hospitals actually got.

Still, Michael Weinstein, a spokesman for the insurer, said the proposed merger would have no impact on the reimbursements received by UPMC because the two parties are operating under a 10-year contract that won't expire until 2012.

Beyond that, it's not clear what impact the merger might have, he said. "There are too many variables to know what impact hospital and health system consolidations have on a market place."

The report on hospital charges, which is being released today, notes that patients with respiratory failure who needed mechanical ventilation at UPMC Presbyterian Shadyside between October 2004 and September 2005 faced average charges of $95,676. Patients with the same diagnosis at Mercy saw average charges of $54,494.

The council's report also notes that on average, hospitals in southwestern Pennsylvania received about 33 cents overall in net patient revenue for every dollar they actually charged.

While UPMC's charges might look high compared with Mercy, they're not as high as charges at academic medical centers in Philadelphia, said UPMC spokeswoman Wendy Zellner.

"The charge for an abnormal heartbeat case is $80,394 at Temple University Hospital vs. $27,505 at UPMC Presbyterian Shadyside," she said. "As a major academic medical center, we typically are treating the sickest patients and the most complex cases, which is reflected in those charges."

One things seems beyond dispute: A merger with Mercy would make UPMC bigger.

Pennsylvania Department of Health statistics indicate that as of June 2005, UPMC controlled 2,410 staffed hospital beds in Allegheny County -- 42.9 percent of the countywide total. Adding Mercy's beds would have given UPMC a majority -- 52.2 percent.

UPMC also controls the county's two premier specialty hospitals -- Children's Hospital of Pittsburgh, which had 260 staffed beds last year, and Magee-Womens Hospital, which had 223 staffed beds. Taking those beds into account, UPMC would have controlled about 56 percent of all staffed beds in the county.

Considering UPMC's size in the market already, Mr. Fedele, the West Penn Allegheny chief, said leaders of Mercy Hospital had an obligation to undergo a more thorough process in finding a merger partner.

"Mercy Hospital is a terribly important community asset," he said. "To say, 'We've decided we're going to cease doing business as Mercy Hospital' and default to the largest alternative that increases UPMC's quest for a monopoly, I think is inappropriate."

(Christopher Snowbeck can be reached at csnowbeck@post-gazette.com or 412-263-2625.)

West Penn Chief Blasts UPMC-Mercy Merger (PTR)

By Luis Fabregas

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, September 29, 2006

The top executive at West Penn Allegheny Health System on Thursday called on employers, insurers and regulators to challenge the recently announced merger between Mercy Hospital and University of Pittsburgh Medical Center.

"This is a bad transaction," Jerry J. Fedele, president of West Penn Allegheny Health System said in an interview. "It's clear that they (UPMC) have a strategy of putting every competitor out of business."

In his first public comments about the merger, Fedele called the UPMC-Mercy deal "another step in UPMC's march toward monopoly" that could deteriorate quality, increase costs and limit choice for patients.

UPMC, which recently posted record profits of more than half a billion dollars, controls nearly half the hospital market in Allegheny County. Its $120 million merger with Mercy, which was announced Sept. 20, could be completed by year's end.

Under terms of the proposal, UPMC will take over operations of Mercy Hospital and Mercy Primary Care -- the hospital's employed physician practices. But other parts of the system, such as Mercy Behavioral Health and Mercy Jeannette Hospital in Westmoreland County, will remain under the direction of the Pittsburgh Mercy Health System.

Fedele said he has sent letters expressing his opposition to the U.S. Department of Justice, the Federal Trade Commission and the Pennsylvania Attorney General and expects to meet with those regulators in the next several weeks.

UPMC would not respond to Fedele's comments and instead issued a written statement from chief counsel Robert Cindrich.

"Although UPMC rarely hesitates to engage its competitors, we do not view this as an adversarial situation between UPMC and WPAHS," Cindrich wrote. "Rather, the heart of this matter is simply that UPMC, along with other key charitable organizations, have come together to insure the survival of Mercy Hospital, a valued community asset, and to preserve the important mission of the Sisters of Mercy."

It is unclear whether West Penn Allegheny's objections will get the government's attention, experts say.

"The FTC tends to place less weight on the views of the competitors," said Mike Cowie, a former FTC antitrust specialist who headed the agency's task force on hospital mergers. "It tends to place more weight on the views of customers."

Those customers are the payers who negotiate prices with hospitals on behalf of employers. The dominant private payer in Western Pennsylvania is Highmark Inc., which insures about 3.1 million people.

Highmark officials have said they support the UPMC-Mercy deal because it will preserve the choice of having a faith-based hospital in Pittsburgh four years after the loss of St. Francis Medical Center in Lawrenceville.

Fedele would not comment about Highmark's position, but said the merger will not preserve choice because UPMC will make fundamental changes to Mercy.

"To acquire a losing institution and maintain it without fundamental changes doesn't make sense," he said. "They're not acquiring it to maintain choice and lose $42 million a year. This is not about maintaining choice. This is a further erosion of choice in this market."

Only eight of about 900 hospital mergers in the U.S. since 1994 have been challenged by state and federal antitrust enforcers, according to a July 2004 report from the FTC and the Department Justice.

Federal agencies lost seven of those cases in a row, with only the most recent one -- in October 2005 -- resulting in a federal judge ordering the undoing of a two-hospital merger in northern Chicago.

That recent victory is under appeal, said FTC spokesman Mitch Katz.

But even if the Illinois case winds up an unsuccessful challenge, the court's initial decision could be a sign that the FTC is getting better at scrutinizing hospital mergers, Cowie said.

"The FTC has updated its thinking," he said, noting that the FTC is using better tools to analyze an organization's geographic market. "I wouldn't say they are more aggressive, but they have more current thinking."

The West Penn Allegheny network, which includes Allegheny General, West Penn and four other hospitals, is expected to post its third consecutive year of profits for the fiscal year that ended June 30, Fedele said.

But even then, Fedele worries that UPMC may inflict damage on West Penn Allegheny by luring away West Penn Allegheny doctors with bigger paychecks.

"They will state explicitly to those physicians that they want to damage our hospitals and put them out of business," he said.

Fedele said the UPMC-Mercy pact could have broader implications: It may become harder for the region to lure new business if there isn't a more competitive health care market. And he said health care professionals will find themselves unable to advance their careers because there will be no work alternatives.

"The facts tell a story that should be of great concern to the community and of great concern to the regulators," he said.

Luis Fabregas can be reached at lfabregas@tribweb.com or (412) 320-7998.

ENVIRONMENT:

Company Acts In Outbreak From Spinach (NYT)

By Libby Sander

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070968

The California produce company at the center of the recent E. coli outbreak announced steps yesterday to improve its food safety inspections and said it would offer to pay the out-of-pocket medical costs for those made ill.

The company, Natural Selection Foods, based in San Juan Bautista, Calif., processes fresh spinach for more than two dozen brands, including Earthbound Farm, Dole and Ready Pac. Government officials have found that several bags of Dole spinach that proved positive for the bacteria had been packed by Natural Selection, which on Sept. 15 recalled all its bagged spinach with "use by" dates of Aug. 17 through Oct. 1.

There has been no finding, however, that the spinach was contaminated at the company's plant rather than earlier, in the fields where it was grown.

In fact, Charles Sweat, the company's chief operating officer, said tests conducted by the Food and Drug Administration and the California Department of Health Services had found no E. coli contamination at the Natural Selection plant.

But neither the F.D.A. nor the state agency would confirm Mr. Sweat's statement.

"We have not completed the inspection of the firm," Julie Zawisza, an F.D.A. spokeswoman, said in an e-mail message late yesterday. "The investigation of the fields and farms is ongoing."

Dr. Kevin Reilly of the California Department of Health Services implied that the Natural Selection announcement might have been premature. "We have not cleared any processing plants at this point," he said.

The E. coli outbreak has sickened 187 people in 26 states, killing one. So far, Natural Selection faces federal lawsuits in Oregon, Utah and Wisconsin on behalf of victims, but a company spokeswoman, Samantha Cabaluna, said the offer to reimburse for medical expenses was in no way part of a strategy to fend off legal action.

Of the company's new safety inspections, Mr. Sweat said there would be tests of all raw produce coming into the plant from the growers' fields, similar to the method used in the beef processing industry to screen for contaminated products.

Clean Air, Murky Precedent (NYT)

By William Sweet

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

ON Wednesday, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California signed a bold bill pledging the state to cut its greenhouse gas emissions 25 percent by 2020. It was refreshing to hear a politician of national stature explain, with an air of true conviction, why global warming is an urgent problem. "It creeps up on you," he told ABC News, the day he said he would sign the bill. "And then all of a sudden, it is too late to do something about it. ... We don't want to go there."

Just so. For the last nine years, since the United States refused to join in the Kyoto program to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, the country has acted in stubborn defiance of the obvious facts. Thus California is setting the country an admirable example. But there are a couple of worrisome aspects to the initiative: one is a possible reaction against greenhouse reductions elsewhere in America should California fail to meet its goals; the second is the question of whether this approach, even if successful, has much relevance for the rest of the country.

The new bill gives the California Air Resources Board, the state's air-quality watchdog, sweeping powers to create and put in place a plan to slash the state's greenhouse gas emissions back to 1990 levels. Although that still falls short of what the Kyoto Protocol asked of the United States — a cut to 7 percent below 1990 levels —the bill's objectives are formidable enough.

Working with other state agencies and building on a wide variety of regulations already in place, the board is in effect authorized to set rules for everything from making plastics to toasting English muffins. No doubt the plan will include stricter energy standards for residential and commercial construction, emissions caps for major industries like electric power and petrochemicals, and new practices for farmers. Inevitably, stricter limits on motor vehicles, which account for about 40 percent of the state's greenhouse gas emissions, will be a big part of the program.

Those involved in formulating the new law express confidence that its strategy is workable, based as it is on proved technologies identified by a climate panel that reported to Mr. Schwarzenegger this year.

But, paradoxically, the plan is threatened by California's previous success on the issue. The state is a world leader in green technologies, and the progress it has already made in constraining its emissions will make it harder in some ways to achieve even greater advances. Its per capita consumption of electricity and gasoline already are much lower than the national average — its annual per capita electricity use is less than 8,000 kilowatt/hours, while the country's is greater than 12,000. It is one of the nation's leading wind energy producers, and has the country's most ambitious solar roofs program.

DOJ_NMG_0070969

The United States as a whole gets about half its electricity from coal, the most carbon-intense of fuels, and coal generation accounts for more than a third of its greenhouse gas emissions. So if the United States decided to get with the Kyoto program, it could comply just by replacing half its coal-fired plants with proven low-carbon sources like wind, natural gas and nuclear energy. A simple tax on carbon emissions or a national cap-and-trade system could get the job done.

In California, however, most electricity already comes from relatively low-carbon sources — there are no coal-fired plants in the state — so the burden of cutting the state's greenhouse gases necessarily falls on widely dispersed activities: cars, manufacturing, buildings, appliances.

That means that the air board will have to issue a huge number of very complicated regulations, which will set the stage for industrial interests and free-market advocates to mount a sustained counterattack on the whole idea of the bill. The argument that the bill puts California at a disadvantage economically will be a powerful weapon in their hands.

Supporters of the plan like Devra Wang, the director of energy research at the Natural Resources Defense Council in San Francisco, feel that political motivation can be sustained. She points out that the greenhouse bill had strong support from the leaders of both parties, and that the air board has a record of making good decisions based on science.

But the air board's record of trying to force the adoption of zero-emission cars in California does not inspire much confidence. Its efforts to make automakers provide lower-carbon vehicles, which began with a 2002 law, are tied up in federal court.

Even if California's program overcomes these obstacles and cuts emissions radically, its approach to doing the job is not likely to be a model for other states. What is more, there's a danger that failure could be taken incorrectly as proof that the job of radically cutting emissions cannot be done at all. Its goals may well be too ambitious for the state to meet, and be based on a flawed premise that greenhouse gas control can be done ad hoc and state by state.

No matter what happens, the end message will surely be that there's no real substitute for concerted national action. Simply put, though California deserves praise for attacking the climate problem head on, it may be trying to do too much on its own.

More Comfort For The Comfortable (NYT)

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

Congress, which has done so little this session to address the nation's real problems, is expected to vote today on a deeply misguided giveaway for big real estate developers. The bill would create new property rights that could in many cases make it difficult, if not impossible, for local governments to stop property owners from using their land in socially destructive ways. It should be defeated.

The Private Property Rights Implementation Act would make it easier for developers challenging zoning decisions to bypass state courts and go to federal court, even if there was not a legitimate federal constitutional question. Zoning regulations are quintessentially local decisions. This bill would cast this tradition aside, and involve the federal government in issues like building density and lot sizes.

The bill would also make it easier for developers to sue when zoning decisions diminished the value of their property. Most zoning does that. Developers would make more money if they could cram more houses on small lots, build skyscrapers 200 stories tall, or develop on endangered wetlands. The bill would help developers claim monetary compensation for run-of-the-mill zoning decisions on matters like these. It would also make it easier for them to intimidate local zoning authorities by threatening to run to federal court.

Zoning is not an attack on property rights. It is an important government function, and most Americans appreciate that it helps keep their own neighborhoods from becoming more crowded, polluted and dangerous. If more people knew the details of this bill, there would be wide opposition. As it is, attorneys general from more than 30 states, of both parties, have joined the U.S. Conference of Mayors, the National Conference of State Legislatures and leading environmental groups in opposing it.

DOJ_NMG_0070970

The bill does a lot of things its supporters claim to abhor. House Republicans were elected on a commitment to states' rights and local autonomy, and opposition to excessive litigation and meddling federal judges. It is remarkable how quickly they have pushed these principles aside to come to the aid of big developers.

Take It Back (WP)

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

THE HOUSE of Representatives is scheduled to take up today a terrible piece of legislation designed to strengthen the hands of developers in their battles with government. Congress considered and rejected a similar bill in 1997 and again in 2000. Now it's back -- only worse.

The bill deals with legal claims under the "takings" doctrine -- a requirement of the Fifth Amendment under which government has to compensate property holders when it seizes their land. Under current law, landowners must give local governments a chance to resolve such disputes and state courts a fair chance to adjudicate them before bringing the federal courts into the picture. The House bill would let developers make federal courts their first stop. This would give developers a big club to wield over local policymakers, gum up the federal courts with local land-use disputes, and diminish the rightful autonomy of state and local governments on the most local of questions.

Then -- and here's where this year's bill is even worse than its predecessors -- the substantive rules concerning takings and other constitutional challenges to land-use regulations also would be changed in developers' favor. Right now, federal courts are leery of such challenges in land-use cases, generally deferring to local authorities. Under this proposal, however, they would have to invalidate as a violation of due process any local decision that was "arbitrary, capricious, [or] an abuse of discretion." The bill, in short, would make it easier for landowners to get into court and, once there, easier to block regulations or to demand payment for compliance with them.

Conservatives often style themselves as champions of federalism, and some conservative judges -- including Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. while he served on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit -- have taken principled stands on preserving local authority over land use. In 1994, Judge Frank H. Easterbrook of the 7th Circuit wrote in frustration: "Federal courts are not boards of zoning appeals. This message, oft-repeated, has not penetrated the consciousness of property owners. . . ." It's time for it to penetrate the consciousness of members of Congress.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

2 Colombians Guilty Of U.S. Drug Charges (AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 29, 2006

MIAMI --Two members of Colombia's largest rebel group pleaded guilty Thursday to federal drug conspiracy charges, the first from the organization known as FARC to be convicted of narcotics trafficking in the United States, prosecutors said.

Cesar Augusto Perez-Parra, 43, and Farouk Shaikh-Reyes, 41, pleaded guilty to charges that they plotted to smuggle more than 4,400 pounds of cocaine about once a month from Colombia to Miami. They were arrested last year before they could import any of the drugs, said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta.

Both were associates of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, which is designated as a terrorist organization by the U.S. and European Union. Dozens of other FARC members have been indicted on drug trafficking charges, but Perez-Parra and Shaikh-Reyes are the first to be convicted in the U.S., Acosta said.

FARC is believed responsible for more than half of the U.S. cocaine supply.

The guilty pleas, coming on the heels of this week's conviction and sentencing in Miami of the two brothers who founded Colombia's Cali cocaine cartel, demonstrate that U.S. law enforcement officials are not easing up efforts to staunch the flow of the drug, Acosta said.

"With the death of the cartels, U.S. law enforcement has not walked away from Colombia," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0070971

The suspected supervisor of the two men who pleaded guilty, Ferney Tovar-Parra, is in custody in Colombia and is awaiting extradition to face similar charges in Miami. He is accused of overseeing FARC coca fields and laboratories and of collecting "taxes and fees" for much of the group's cocaine industry.

Perez-Parra and Shaikh-Reyes could face several decades in prison when sentenced in January by U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore.

FARC, created in 1964 and dedicated to overthrowing Colombia's government, boasts as many as 20,000 armed guerrillas whom U.S. officials and Colombian officials blame for bombings, murders, kidnappings, hijackings and other violent acts in addition to the drug trade. U.S. prosecutors say FARC uses drug proceeds to purchase weapons.

Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela were sentenced this week to 30 years in prison and ordered to forfeit $2.1 billion in assets after pleading guilty to drug charges stemming from operation of the Cali cartel. That cartel once supplied 80 percent of the world's cocaine but is now essentially defunct.

Feds Consider Death Penalty In Red River Valley Drug Killing (AP)

By Dave Kolpack

AP, September 29, 2006

FARGO, N.D. - Attorneys on Thursday were discussing whether to seek the death penalty against a man accused in a Red River Valley drug killing. In a separate case, the victim's mother, charged with conspiracy, was sentenced to life in prison.

U.S. Attorney Drew Wrigley said he has a Monday deadline to tell a federal judge whether his office will seek the death penalty for Michael Petzold in the shooting death of Lee Avila, 28, of East Grand Forks, Minn.

"I wouldn't call it a fever pitch, but there's a sense of urgency on all sides today," Wrigley said Thursday.

The prosecutor said he had filed his sentencing recommendations with the Justice Department but would not say what it was. A decision to seek the death penalty would be a first in North Dakota for a drug-related crime, he said. The state does not have the death penalty, but it is allowed in federal cases.

A federal jury last week sentenced convicted sex offender Alfonso Rodriguez Jr. to death for kidnapping resulting in the death of University of North Dakota student Dru Sjodin. It was the first death penalty case in North Dakota in nearly 100 years.

Petzold, of Norfolk, Neb., is charged with murder in furtherance of a continuing criminal enterprise. Police said they got a 911 call and found Avila shot to death in East Grand Forks on June 30, 2005. They said Avila had earlier criminal convictions and his death was the result of a drug dispute.

Avila's mother, Francisca Avila Vargas, was sentenced Thursday to life in prison without parole for her roles in a drug distribution ring in the Red River Valley.

A federal jury found Avila Vargas, of St. Paul, Minn., and Miquel Garcia, of Perley, Minn., guilty on May 23 of conspiring to distribute controlled substances and operating a continuing criminal enterprise. Police said Avila Vargas, 45, also known as "Poncha" and "Mama," supplied more than 30 pounds of methamphetamine to an organization in Fargo.

Garcia was convicted of distributing drugs. He also was sentenced to life in prison.

"This case is another example that repeat drug traffickers will be dealt with in an aggressive manner," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Chris Myers, who prosecuted the case.

Avila Vargas and Petzold were indicted in January along with four others in a separate case stemming from Avila's death. Investigators said Petzold was the leader of a drug ring that brought large amounts of methamphetamine, cocaine and marijuana from Mexico to the area over several years. His trial is scheduled for January.

Avila Vargas was not charged directly with her son's death, but she was charged with conspiracy in the case.

Wrigley said he will meet the deadline to notify U.S. District Judge Ralph Erickson on the death penalty recommendation.

"We will notify the court on Monday, unless we had to request an extension of that," Wrigley said. Extending the deadline is "not my preference at this point," he said.

Authorities Keep Watch For Secret Meth Labs (HA)

Honolulu Advertiser, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070972

As the amount of methamphetamine coming into Hawai'i dwindles, law enforcement agencies are closely watching for the possible spread of secret laboratories used by dealers to dilute the illegal drug.

Dealers build labs to double or triple the volume of the methamphetamine they have, sacrificing the drug's purity in the process. The methods used to "step on" or "cut" the drug involve volatile chemicals, heat and combustible concoctions that leave toxic residue and create harmful fumes.

"Even if there is only one or two (labs) on this island, if they have a toxic spill or bury it underground, it can get into the water and wreak havoc," said Keith Kamita, chief of the narcotics enforcement division for the Department of Public Safety.

In response to the possible increase in lab activity, the state Department of Health this week released rules meant to govern the recognition and cleanup of clandestine drug laboratories. Most of the meth laboratories that are seized in Hawai'i are small "conversion" laboratories capable of manufacturing ounce quantities out of small amounts of pure methamphetamine, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

"Proliferation (of labs) is always a concern; there are some nasty things there," said Laurence Lau, DOH deputy director for environmental health. "Like people say about hurricanes, we may not have the numbers, but one can ruin your day or year. We're trying to provide guidance for cleanups ... and to let people know what procedures to follow."

Fumes and residue from the labs saturate carpets and other surfaces, exposing unsuspecting tenants to hazardous chemicals. Runoff from labs can contaminate soil and groundwater.

DECLINE IN POTENCY

The ice being taken off the streets in Hawai'i is half as potent as that of three years ago, with purity levels between 40 percent and 45 percent, compared with 90 percent to 98 percent in 2003, authorities said.

Ice arrests are headed toward a four-year low, and laws restricting access to methamphetamine's key component, pseudoephedrine, have cut the supply.

With less pure methamphetamine coming in from foreign countries and the Mainland, law officers are concerned dealers are going to build labs to create their own product or maximize their smuggled supply.

Law enforcement officials say that just because a slew of labs haven't been found, it doesn't mean they aren't out there. The cost to clean a drug lab is between $2,000 and $10,000, according to law enforcement and environmental services technicians.

Producing one pound of methamphetamine leaves 5 or 6 pounds of toxic waste.

"It's a danger; there is a real danger in the labs," said Larry Burnett, director of the Hawai'i High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area, a partnership of federal, state and county law enforcement agencies. "Every pound of product creates 5 to 7 pounds of waste, and here we have a fragile ecosystem."

NEW LAWS

Kamita hopes that laws put in place in the last year will deter would-be chemists from cooking up meth.

On Oct. 1, a law will take effect that limits consumers without a prescription to 3.6 grams or about one package of pseudoephedrine medicine a day and 9 grams or three packages a month. Consumers also will have to show identification and sign a log that may be examined by law officers.

Retailers will be required to put pseudoephedrine products behind the counter or in locked display cases. The new law mirrors federal pseudoephedrine controls added to the USA Patriot Act this year.

The Honolulu Police Department's clandestine laboratory unit makes use of two full-time officers dedicated solely to locating and taking down drug labs. Other officers within the narcotics/vice unit also have drug lab training, and the unit works jointly with the Hawai'i High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area, the DEA and state narcotics enforcement officers.

"The law enforcement community will continue to monitor the clandestine lab situation in Hawai'i. We are all aware of the dangers clandestine labs can cause to the public and the environment," said Anthony D. Williams, assistant special agent in charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Honolulu district office. "It is equally important for the public to contact law enforcement if the existence of a clandestine lab is suspected."

U.S. Aims To Financially Impair Suspects (AP)

By The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0070973

AP, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) --The Bush administration moved Thursday to paralyze financially nine people suspected of having links to a Colombian group that the United States says traffics in drugs and terror.

The action by the Treasury Department means that any assets belonging to those people found in the United States must be blocked and that Americans are forbidden to do business with them.

Six of the nine people suspected of links to the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia were indicted by a federal court in Washington as part of a narcotics conspiracy, the department said. Those six were: Jose Juvenal Velandia, Jose Lisandro Lascarro, Alvaro Alfonso Serpa Diaz, Gener Garcia Molina, Gerardo Antonio Aguilar Ramirez and Gentil Alvis Patino.

Also designated was Ferney Tovar Parra, described as a member of the Colombian group, who has been indicted on federal drug trafficking charges in the Southern District of Florida, the department said.

Rodrigo Granda Escobar, an international representative for the Colombian group, and Jesus Emilio Carvajalino, a member of the group's governing body, also were designated, according to the department.

The group also is known by FARC, the acronym for its Spanish name Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia.

"Today's action exposes key figures in the violent underworld of the FARC, one of the world's largest suppliers of cocaine and a notorious Colombian terrorist organization," said Adam Szubin, director of the Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control.

Separately, the department acted to block the financial assets of five Mexican companies and six people who have acted on behalf of fugitive Manuel Aguirre Galindo, a key leader of the Arellano Felix Organization, a major drug trafficking outlet.

The targeted companies are the Tijuana real-estate firms Playa Mar S.A. de C.V; Inmobiliaria Esparta S.A. de C.V.; Inmobiliaria La Provincia S.A. de C.V.; Inmobiliaria Estado 29 S.A. de C.V.; and Inmobiliaria Tijuana Costa S.A. de C.V.

The people targeted included "long-term financial associates" of Aguirre Galindo, including Alberto Afredo Valencia Martinez, Urbano Hernandez Somero and Aguirre Galindo's son, Manuel Francisco Aguirre Ramos, the department said.

^------

On the Net:

OFAC: http://www.ustreas.gov/offices/enforcement/ofac/

Feds Sue Utah Couple Over Faked Cancer (SLT)

Salt Lake Tribune, September 28, 2006

Tania Clark's plea to her husband's supervisors at the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency was so convincing, the DEA paid the family's moving expenses from Texas to Utah so she could be close to loved ones as she battled cancer.

Now that it's known she faked her illness, the feds want their money back.

In a lawsuit filed Wednesday in U.S. District Court, the DEA accuses Tania and Jeff James Clark of making false claims. The agency is seeking triple the amount it shelled out - or $143,418 - and $10,000 for each false claim the couple allegedly made.

The agency was sympathetic to the family at one time. In an emotional letter, Tania Clark described her struggle with cancer and the burden taken on by her husband, DEA agent Jeff Clark.

"Jeff was left to pick up all the pieces dropped by the rest of us when my illness was diagnosed," Tania Clark wrote in 2001. "Meals, shopping, kids, bills and housework all had to be juggled as he tried to manage his own job and our house and provide all of us with the reassurance we badly needed." Based on that plea and a letter purportedly from a Texas doctor, the DEA paid $47,806 to move the Clarks from Houston to West Jordan, where they could be close to family. Once in Utah,

Advertisement

Tania Clark also collected thousands of dollars from friends and neighbors by pretending to need a bone marrow transplant. Her story began to fall apart when an article in the weekly South Valley Journal prompted an e-mail from her sister, who said Clark could not be trusted.

An investigation showed that Clark had never been a patient at M.D. Anderson Cancer Center in Houston or the Huntsman Cancer Institute, where she had claimed to be receiving treatment. And no person with the name of the doctor who supposedly treated the woman in Texas had ever practiced medicine at Anderson.

Tania Clark was sentenced last year in a state court to 30 days in jail and ordered to pay restitution to the contributors to her transplant fund. Charges against her husband, who insisted he also had been duped, were dropped.

Rethinking Plan Colombia: Some Ways To Fix It (CSM)

By Danna Harman

The Christian Science Monitor, September 29, 2006

BOGOTÁ, COLOMBIA

The Colombian soldiers look young. A little disinterested, perhaps. Or maybe just scared. One by one, they politely stand in the spare courtroom and state their names and ranks. They are charged with planning and carrying out the murder of 10 US-trained counternarcotic policemen and a civilian - at the behest of narcotraffickers.

But this is simply a preliminary hearing. More than four months after the May 22 massacre in Jamundí, the prosecution of this high-profile case has barely begun.

Oscar Hurtado, the civilian judge tapped in June, passed the case to a military tribunal in July: "I'm not going to risk my life," he explained. "I feel threatened ... there are no guarantees of my security."

In August, the Attorney General's office angrily sent the case back to Judge Hurtado - who proceeded to check into the hospital, citing heart-related problems.

"This fits squarely with an ongoing pattern of impunity," says Maria McFarland, Human Rights Watch's Colombia researcher. "For years, the Colombian military has had problems with committing human rights abuses ... and it's extremely rare for anyone to get arrested or prosecuted."

Local papers are already dubbing Jamundí another Guaitarilla, in reference to a southwestern town where seven police officers and four civilians were shot dead by the Colombian military in March 2004. In that case, evidence was destroyed, the facts were never aired in civilian court, and the accused soldiers were eventually absolved by a military court.

* * *

But in Washington, Jamundí continues to resonate, giving ammunition to those who say that Plan Colombia, the US' six-year $4.7 billion program to fight the drug trade, needs a serious overhaul.

"The US has to stop being a cheap date ... doing everything and expecting nothing in return," fumes Rep. Jim McGovern (D) of Massachusetts. "We are sending billions of dollars to bankroll the Colombian military and are being told everything is terrific. And then bang, this happens. Where is the outrage?"

Congressman McGovern sees Jamundí as indicative of a much larger, institutional problem. "Just how far have the drug mafias penetrated the military? Just how cowered are the courts?" he asks. "All the money we have sent down there has basically not worked."

Right after the massacre, McGovern proposed cutting US aid to Colombia's military and police next year - expected to be over $700 million - by $30 million, a symbolic gesture. The proposal failed, but 174 congressmen supported it.

Meanwhile, the Senate appropriations committee has balked at the State Department's certification of Plan Colombia monies this year - a certification that came three days after the massacre and did not mention it. The committee continues to withhold its support for the funding, a portion of which is supposed to be tied to human-rights practices, until it receives satisfactory explanations for what happened in Jamundí and in several other reported cases of abuse and corruption.

"The White House insists it is winning the war against drugs. Those boasts fly in the face of the facts, but the White House would rather stick to a flawed plan than to admit that their approach isn't working and to fix it," says committee member Sen. Patrick Leahy (D) of Vermont. "Congressional oversight ... has been sorely lacking," he says. "It is past time for an honest reassessment of Plan Colombia."

* * *

DOJ_NMG_0070975

Reevaluating Plan Colombia, say critics, requires a look at the priorities set by Washington that shape the way the war against drugs is waged. When experts and politicians are asked what changes might yield better results, the responses often divide into two different approaches.

The first is the school of alternative development. Sandro Calvani, director of the UN's office on Drugs and Crime in Colombia (UNODC) argues that Plan Colombia's heavy focus on aerial spraying needs to be supplemented with increased efforts to deal with the social and economic roots of Colombia's coca industry. Specifically, he wants the US and others in the international community to offer strategies - and funds - for rural development that would ensure alternative livelihoods for poor farmers who face destruction of their chief cash crop.

"Why do Colombians go back to replanting coca? Because it's easy, and no one talks to them about doing something else," says Mr. Calvani. The alternative development programs that have been attempted, he says, show clear, impressive results. A UNODC survey released in June shows that 70 percent of the fields eradicated through Plan Colombia are replanted. But if farmers receive alternative development assistance, states Calvani, the percentage of coca fields replanted dives to 3 percent. They're replaced with coffee, hearts of palm, and red beans. "Once coca peasants live on licit crops for one year, they never go back to the illicit economy," he says.

Pablo Casas, a security expert at the Bogotá-based Security and Democracy foundation, says aerial spraying also comes at the expense of combating the criminal structure higher up. "Eradication targets the smallest cogs in the machine," he says, "We need to focus on the money laundering businesses, on attacking the imports of cocaine precursors into Colombia, on intercepting the final product, and on weeding out corruption." Targeting the farmers and failing to provide them with alternatives is not only an opportunity cost, he argues, it is counterproductive, causing greater poverty and displacement.

Some $1.2 billion has been spent directly on eradication between 2000 and 2005, but alternative development projects have garnered $213 million in the same period. "When it comes to fighting drugs, there is no real division of the pie," says Calvani. "Practically the entire pie is used for interdiction ... and anything else gets thrown a cookie."

White House drug czar John Walters replies that security must be established in an area first. "Alternative development is most effective when conditioned on a police presence," he says.

At a Congressional hearing in Washington last week, House Republicans noted the rising cocaine use in Europe, and called for European governments to engage more in Colombia's drug fight. Rep. Dan Burton (R) of Indiana said Europe needs to fulfill its pledges of "soft-side assistance."

Europe says it opposes aerial eradication on environmental grounds and extols the alternative development option. "The US does not have enough faith in alternative development, and the Europeans have faith, but do very little," says Calvani.

Increasingly, Colombian President Alvaro Uribe himself has also voiced criticism of the eradication focus and begun calling for a more "multidimensional approach."

"We cannot disconnect alternative development from this war," he said last week, speaking to the Colombian American Association in New York. "It is necessary to eliminate crops, yes. But we need to combine this with options, and with better access to markets," he said.

Mr. Uribe's administration is lobbying for Colombia to be reclassified as a US "strategic partner" in the war on drugs - a move that would give Bogotá greater control of where money was spent.

If awarded this freedom, he would, for example, suggest expanding the Forest Warden Families program that pays farmers monthly stipends in return for keeping their land free of illicit crops. "We have 43,000 families looking after 1.7 million hectares. In that area, coca production has fallen 80 percent and we have recovered 236,000 hectares of forest where coca was being grown," said Uribe last week. "The results are spectacular."

The continued US focus on aerial spraying, despite questionable results, has to do in part with who's in charge of the drug fight, admits one State Department official. Development and social experts have, historically, been far less involved and listened to, she claims, speaking off the record because she is not authorized to discuss the subject. The defense and security voices - with their more combat-oriented approach - have the upper hand, she notes.

The post-Sept. 11 discourse used by President Bush and adopted by Uribe (including rechristening narcotraffickers and guerrillas as narcoterrorists) has made it even harder to replace "hard" measures with softer ones. The US political cycle also plays a part in drug-fighting methods, adds Bruce Bagley, an expert on drug trafficking at the University of Miami. "No one in the US wants to look 'soft' on drugs, and nothing looks tougher than spraying hundreds of thousands of hectares of coca fields," he says. "Talking about [alternative] development won't get you re-elected."

DOJ_NMG_0070976

* * *

The second school of criticism wants to take the drug-war debate off Colombian soil. These critics say the solutions lie on the side of drug consumption, not production. The Washington Office on Latin America (WOLA), an advocacy group, argues for dedicating more funds toward drug prevention, treatment, and rehabilitation programs in the US - and for scaling back altogether on programs aimed at stopping the supply of drugs from Colombia. US treatment programs, in particular, have been proven effective. They cite a 1994 RAND Corp. study that found that if the goal was to reduce cocaine use in the US, treatment of heavy cocaine users was 23 times more cost-effective than drug-crop eradication and other source-country programs, and three times more effective than mandatory minimum sentencing.

But only about 17 percent of Americans who needed treatment for an illicit drug use problem in 2004 received it, because of prohibitive costs, insurance limits, or other barriers, according to WOLA.

Assertions by the White House drug czar's office that the vast majority of the drug-control funding already goes toward battling domestic demand are dismissed by WOLA, which does not consider spending in the US on law enforcement as part of the demand-side solution.

"Six years into Plan Colombia the mili- tary is murdering in broad daylight. We are bolstering militaries and ignoring human rights," says John Walsh, a drug policy expert at WOLA. "Yet we continue to perpetuate the illusion that some supply-side solution exists. The opportunity cost of that is that we are not investing enough in managing the demand in the US. The real game is here."

* * *

Monica Fernando Santacruz Ospina is tired.

Her husband, Maj. Elkin Molina, the officer in charge of the police unit slain in Jamundí, would have turned 36 this month. Normally, Ms. Fernando, his wife of 10 years, would buy a giant cream cake for the occasion. She is a great cook, she clarifies, but she has trouble with cakes. And a birthday demands a cake.

This year, she went to put flowers on his grave instead. It was raining, and she was crying, and she felt like just lying down in the ground beside him.

They had lunch together the day of his death - grilled chicken and vegetables, she remembers, because he was on a diet. She had said: "May God be with you," when he left the house. He kissed their 9-year-old, and told him to stop playing Xbox and do his homework.

Later, while visiting with a neighbor, Fernando's police walkie-talkie started crackling (she was issued the radio as the wife of the unit commander).

"Don't shoot us! Have mercy! We are police. We are fathers!" she heard familiar voices screaming. She knew who was yelling, but she refused to accept it. Again and again, she tried to reach her husband on the radio.

"I want to know who ordered this," she says today, pushing her hair away from her face. "I am scared no one will pay."

Since the massacre, Fernando and her son have relocated from Cali to Bogotá, and, with the help of the police and the US Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) agents who had trained her husband, she has gone back to school. She's studying criminology.

"I want to make sure my husband's death was not in vain," she says defiantly. "I refuse to be scared out of fighting back." Fernando then slowly puts her head in her hands and begins to sob. She is stressed, she apologizes, because she does not really know how or when it will all end.

In Washington, Anthony Placido, the DEA's chief of intelligence, understands. "A war has a definable beginning and end. This is not that," he admits, putting aside the usual terminology. "We are more like gardeners, pulling up the weeds," he says. "We are not going to raise a flag and say, we have won. We can't declare an end, a victory."

Back at the courthouse in Bogotá, the preliminary hearing for the Colombian soldiers on trial for the Jamundí massacre is cut short because of a technicality. The young soldiers shuffle out of the courtroom.

DOJ_NMG_0070977

• Last of three parts. Parts 1 and 2 appeared on Sept. 27 and 28.

Doubts Aside, U.S. Set To Boost Colombia Aid (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, September 29, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia — Despite growing bipartisan concern over alleged corruption in the Colombian army, the U.S. Congress appears likely to approve increased funds for this country's war on drugs.

A final vote on Plan Colombia funding — the largest U.S. foreign aid program outside the Middle East and Afghanistan — probably won't take place until after the November congressional elections. But staffers and analysts in Washington say Colombia will receive more than $750 million, exceeding the $728 million for the current fiscal year.

Separate House and Senate versions to fund Plan Colombia each call for at least that much to be granted to the government of President Alvaro Uribe, the United States' staunchest ally in South America.

But even Republican stalwarts such as Rep. Henry J. Hyde of Illinois, chairman of the International Relations Committee, are voicing concern over allegations of corruption in the Colombian army, an institution the U.S. has spent billions of dollars to train and expand.

This month, the Colombian Defense Ministry said it was investigating media reports that army officers planted explosives in Bogota, the capital, in the days leading up to Uribe's second inauguration in August, in an apparent scheme to collect rewards for discovering the bombs.

The alleged plot, which reportedly involved explosives supplied by a former member of Colombia's largest rebel group, is still under investigation. Uribe went on national television recently to deny the story, saying there was no evidence linking the officers to the bombs.

In August, army units in the Caribbean port of Barranquilla killed six people, an incident at first portrayed as accidental deaths during a kidnapping rescue attempt, then as drug-gang killings. Eight army officers and soldiers have been arrested on suspicion of murder in the case.

But the most disturbing incident for some U.S. legislators happened in May, when Colombian army troops killed 10 U.S.-trained anti-narcotics police officers and an informant in the village of Jamundi, near Cali in the west of the country.

The shootout was first described as a case of mistaken identity. But one high-ranking Uribe official has since then called it "a criminal act" in which the army units allegedly did the bidding of narco-traffickers. Fifteen army officers and soldiers are being held while a civil judge investigates the case.

Concerned about a possible whitewash of the episode, Hyde wrote a letter to Uribe this summer requesting "assurances that the Jamundi case will conclude with the exposure of the full truth and all of the facts wherever they may lead."

A senior staffer on Hyde's committee said Thursday: "Everyone wants to see justice done and not have this swept under the rug. This was one of Colombia's best-trained units that worked side by side with the U.S."

Tim Rieser, an aide to Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), said the incidents raised unsettling questions about U.S. aid and oversight. "The Jamundi case and other cases in which civilians have been targeted and killed by the Colombian army illustrates that six years into Plan Colombia and after more than $1 billion in U.S. aid to the armed forces, it remains a flawed institution whose officers are rarely accountable under the law."

Plan Colombia also faced scrutiny this year after a United Nations survey showed that five years of effort and $4.7 billion had not put much of a dent in overall coca-leaf cultivation.

Nonetheless, it appears unlikely that Plan Colombia aid will be suspended or cut, said Adam Isaacson of the Center for International Policy, a Washington-based think tank that has been critical of the aid program.

"It shows the Colombian government has managed to do an excellent job of lobbying," Isaacson said. "Uribe knows he is one of the only friends the U.S. has in Latin America, and he is taking advantage of it."

Several Colombian analysts say that, scandals aside, the security forces need an overhaul. They say the 35% growth in army and national police units since Plan Colombia began in 2000 has put too much strain on the institutions' command structures and oversight mechanisms.

DOJ_NMG_0070978

"The repeated incidents leave little credibility to the notion that these are isolated events," said Alejo Vargas, a political scientist at the National University of Colombia. "The problems are profound and indicate management is inadequate."

Officials Investigate Fire At Indicted Woman's Home (PALHER)

By Paul Stone, The Palestine Herald

Palestine (TX) Herald, September 29, 2006

PALESTINE — Authorities are investigating a fire earlier this week which destroyed the $440,000 Anderson County home of a California woman federally indicted this past spring for allegedly operating brothels in Los Angeles and Dallas.

Jong Ock Mao, 47, who is also known as Kimberly Mao and June Mao according to authorities, was arrested April 11 in Madisonville after being one of four defendants named in a 40-count federal indictment charging her with money laundering and violations of the Travel Act.

MX-Oasis Motocross track, located on her property on FM 322, approximately 3 miles south of Palestine, was the subject of multiple noise complaints in the days and weeks prior to Mao's arrest last spring.

Anderson County Sheriff Greg Taylor said the residence at 6032 FM 322 owned by Mao – adjacent to the motocross track – was completely destroyed by fire Monday night. The blaze was reported to authorities by a passing motorist at 6:27 p.m. Monday, according to records.

Three volunteer fire departments headed by the Southside Volunteer Fire Department responded to the fire.

"It was a complete loss," Taylor said Tuesday. "It was completely involved when they got there. The top floor (of the two-story house) had collapsed to the lower level."

No one has been living at the residence in recent weeks, according to Jay Russell, Anderson County sheriff's investigator, although Mao's son reportedly was residing there back in the spring around the time of his mother's arrest.

"The house was full of property and furniture," Russell said Wednesday, "but evidently no one had been living there for the past month.

Firefighters did not uncover any evidence at the scene to suggest the fire was intentionally set, although Taylor pointed out the federal government is in the process of attempting to seize the residence and property listed in the name of Jong's Consulting Inc., one of several businesses allegedly owned by Mao.

Russell said it "appears it started in the center of the residence."

"The fact it was unoccupied makes it suspicious," Taylor added.

Russell said representatives of the U.S. attorney's office in Santa Ana, Calif. have been notified of the fire. A team of specially-trained ATF agents could be assigned to come to Palestine since the federal government is in the process of attempting to seize the residence and property, he added.

"They (the U.S. attorney's office) could possibly get a (ATF) response team to come look at it to see if it's worthy of an investigation," Russell said Wednesday.

According to records of the Anderson County Appraisal District, the 3,866-square foot, two story residence constructed in 1997 had a value of $442,580.

According to a press release issued by the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) at the time of her arrest, Mao violated the Travel Act by using interstate facilities to promote and establish an illegal business which is described in the indictment as a prostitution ring.

The indictment alleged Mao owned five brothels in Los Angeles and one in Dallas. The brothels were housed in a variety of businesses, including chiropractic offices, acupuncture clinics, spas, tanning salons and massage parlors, according to the indictment.

Federal authorities have alleged that Mao used proceeds from illegal activities to purchase four private motocross tracks in California, Florida and Texas, including the MX-Oasis Motocross Track in Palestine.

Under federal law, properties acquired with the proceeds of illegal activities are subject to forfeiture.

Taylor said Tuesday his agency has not received any complaints concerning the motocross track for weeks.

Pet Store Arson Kills Animals; Rescued Reptiles On Brink (BOSH)

DOJ_NMG_0070979

By Laura Crimaldi

Boston Herald, September 29, 2006

At least 21 reptiles and 60 fish are dead and dozens more are fighting for their lives after an arson at a crowded Cambridge pet store on which the message "NO MORE Exploitation OF ANIMALS" had been spray-painted.

"The state fire marshal's office is not at a point that we would definitely link the fire to the environmental terrorism motive," said State Fire Marshal Stephen Coan, who confirmed that the fire at Boston Tropical Fish & Reptile on Wednesday night was arson.

Animal rights extremists in other cities have freed animals from pet stores and then set the shops ablaze, fire officials said. The FBI is monitoring the situation, a spokeswoman said. Store officials could not be reached.

Among the dead animals at the shop are three boa constrictors, two South American wood turtles, two California king snakes, two Mexican king snakes, three leopard geckos and three fat-tailed geckos, said Lt. Alan Borgal of the Animal Rescue League of Boston.

"It's never a good sight where you see animals caught in a fire and can't escape," said Cambridge Animal Control Director Mark McCabe.

A nearby Petco is caring for surviving fish and rats, Borgal said. The rescued reptiles are being cared for by a Beverly herpetologist.

"Some of the reptiles have a poor prognosis," Borgal said. "They're concerned about smoke inhalation and the animals are very stressed."

Pet Shop Blaze Deliberately Set, Fire Officials Say (BOS)

By Brian R. Ballou, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, September 29, 2006

A fire that killed more than two-dozen exotic snakes, frogs, fish, and other reptiles in a Cambridge pet shop Wednesday night was deliberately set, perhaps by the person who spray-painted the message ``No more exploitation of animals" on the store front, fire officials said yesterday.

State Fire Marshal Stephen D. Coan said that investigators were not focusing on any single motive for the blaze, which apparently started on the second floor of the Boston Tropical Fish and Reptiles building on Monsignor O'Brien Highway around 9:45 p.m. and sent animals slithering and scurrying from the flames and heat.

Referring to the note sprayed on the front of the store, Coan said: ``The investigation team is not ruling out the graffiti. We're looking at a number of potential scenarios."

Store owner Dianne San Filippo took offense at the message. ``One of our largest snakes was found melted in his tank," she said, standing outside her gutted store yesterday morning. ``Is that kind of death better than exploitation? I don't think so."

San Filippo said her manager had trouble with several people about two weeks ago. ``He had to tell a couple of people who came in to leave, after they started yelling at him and giving him a hard time about the feeder mice," she said, of the stock of mice the store keeps to feed some of the reptiles. ``I don't know if that has anything to do with the fire, if it's a coincidence."

Authorities said the fire appeared to have started on the second floor of the two-story building. It was put out at 10:33 p.m.

``This case is peculiar, because there is no evidence any animals were freed, which is certainly contradictory to that message," Cambridge Fire Captain Gerry Mahoney said. ``It's cause for alarm, because usually animal rights groups attempt to set the animals free."

Alan B. Borgal, a state humane officer with the Animal Rescue League of Boston, said a portion of the store that was untouched by flames appeared to be cluttered and unsanitary, in violation of state codes.

Borgal said 14 animals, mostly reptiles, and up to 75 fish were carried out of the fire alive. The number of fish that died was unknown; Borgal said those that survived were taken to an emergency hospital set up at a Petco store near the Cambridgeside Galleria. Rainforest Reptiles in Beverly took all the reptiles. The Animal Rescue League of Boston took the rats.

Senator To Put 'Hold' On Gun Dealer Bill (AP)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. Dianne Feinstein said Thursday she would block the Senate from taking up a House-passed bill that would change how the government handles gun dealer violations.

The House on Wednesday voted 277-131 in favor of the legislation to change how the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, or ATF, pursues gun dealer violations.

"This legislation would make it difficult, if not impossible, for the ATF to penalize gun dealers who have broken the law, and to prevent rogue dealers from continuing to sell guns," Feinstein, D-Calif., said in a statement.

A single senator can put a "hold" on legislation, preventing it from being offered on the floor without the approval of 60 senators.

The legislation differentiates penalties based on the seriousness of the violation and the size of the firearm business. It requires that any ATF decision on a dealer's license be reviewed by an administrative law judge.

Rep. Howard Coble, R-N.C., who sponsored the House bill, said it would give the ATF greater flexibility to deal appropriately with minor violations while going after gun dealers who are breaking the law. "Despite what the critics said," Coble said in a statement, "our bill puts additional muscle in the arm of the ATF."

But Rep. Carolyn McCarthy, D-N.Y., a leading gun control advocate, said the bill would make it harder to revoke the licenses of corrupt and negligent gun dealers. "Even if the ATF is able to revoke a corrupt gun dealer's license, this bill gives the dealer 60 days to sell off his remaining inventory. This defies common sense," she said.

The ATF bill was part of the House GOP's "American Values Agenda" announced last June which included flag protection, a ban on gay marriage, a ban on human cloning and tax cuts.

*—

The bill is H.R. 5092

On the Net:

Congress: http://thomas.loc.gov/

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Moves Toward Action On Border Fence (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 28 — The Senate agreed on Thursday night to end debate and press ahead with a final vote on the construction of 700 miles of fencing along the United States border with Mexico to help stem the tide of illegal immigration.

The bill would require construction of two layers of reinforced fencing in stretches of California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas that are considered among the most porous parts of the 2,000-mile border with Mexico.

It would also require officials of the Department of Homeland Security to establish “operational control” over all American land and sea borders by using Border Patrol agents, fencing, satellites, cameras and unmanned aerial vehicles. The Senate, which voted 71 to 28 to end debate, is expected to hold a final vote on the measure by Saturday.

The fence represents one of the few elements from the broad bipartisan immigration measure approved by the Senate in May to win support from House Republicans, who passed their own fencing bill this month. The Senate bill also provided for the creation of a guest worker program and the legalization of most of the nation’s illegal immigrants, measures hailed by President Bush.

House Republicans rejected that approach, refusing to consider any bill that could be called amnesty for illegal immigrants, and choosing instead to focus on toughening border security.

On Thursday, the Republican architects of the Senate bill — including Senators John McCain of Arizona, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, Mel Martinez of Florida and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska — supported the decision to bring the fencing measure to a final vote. The lawmakers, who still favor the legalization of illegal immigrants, have said they view the fence as one step toward achieving their broader legislative goals.

DOJ_NMG_0070981

One Republican, Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, voted against shutting off debate on the fence. Eighteen Democrats voted in favor of it.

Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama, described the vote as a crucial effort toward stopping the flood of illegal immigrants pouring into the United States.

"We know that fencing works," Mr. Sessions said. "It's time to make it a reality. Then we'll have some credibility with the American people. Then we can talk comprehensively about how to fix an absolutely broken immigration system."

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, derided the bill as "a good-feel, bumper-sticker vote" intended to energize conservative voters before the midterm elections. He noted that nearly half of the illegal immigrants in the country entered the country legally, without sneaking across the Mexican border, and overstayed their visas.

"This is a waste of money," Mr. Kennedy said. "It isn't going to work, and it's going to be enormously costly."

The fence is one of several border security measures the Senate hopes to pass this week before Congress recesses to campaign for the Nov. 7 elections. On Monday, House and Senate negotiators agreed to provide $1.2 billion for several hundred miles of fencing as part of a $34.8 billion spending plan for the Department of Homeland Security for the coming year.

The border security spending is one of several major policy initiatives that Congressional leaders decided to insert into the annual appropriations bill. It includes money to hire 1,500 new Border Patrol agents, increasing the force to 14,800, and to add 6,700 detention beds. The $1.2 billion for border security is designated for a traditional fence, vehicle barriers and a so-called virtual fence, which includes lighting, cameras and ground sensors.

The fence would be built near Tecate, Mexico, and Calexico, Calif.; Columbus, N.M.; and El Paso, Del Rio, Eagle Pass, Laredo and Brownsville in Texas.

Senators still sparred late into the night on Thursday, however, over two amendments to the fencing measure.

One amendment, proposed by Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison, Republican of Texas, would require the Department of Homeland Security to work with state and local officials in border states to determine where the fencing should be.

The second amendment, proposed by Mr. Martinez, would give the secretary of homeland security greater flexibility in determining when operational control of the borders is achieved.

Border Bill Takes A Detour (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate set the stage Thursday for a vote by week's end on a bill to wall off 700 miles of the U.S. border from Mexico, but a lastminute push by senators concerned about the severe shortage of agricultural workers could derail the measure's progress.

Senators agreed, by a vote of 71-28, to limit debate on the House-passed measure — a tally that many see as an indicator of the outcome of a final vote, which could come as early as today.

But a surprise move by Sens. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho) to add a guest worker program for agricultural workers has complicated matters.

The two senators planned to meet with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) this morning to press him yet again to consider adding their AgJobs proposal, intended to help farmers faced with rotting crops and thousands of dollars in lost revenue because they do not have enough workers to harvest their crops this year.

The senators' move creates a dilemma for Frist, eager for victories to counter criticism of a GOP "do-nothing Congress."

It also highlights the long-standing tension over immigration that is coming to a head in these waning days of the 109th Congress.

Republicans have built a broad-based election campaign based on security, saying their party can make America safer at the border and in the fight against terrorism. As part of this, House Republicans insist on an enforcement-only approach to immigration.

DOJ_NMG_0070982

If Frist adds an agricultural guest worker program to the fence bill, the House is very unlikely to support it. If he refuses to add the agricultural program, as he has done for some time now, he will face strong opposition from Feinstein and Craig, who could rally other lawmakers against the measure. Craig said 80 lawmakers supported the AgJobs proposal.

On Thursday night, Craig said he believed there would be enough votes in the House to support the AgJobs proposal, but he acknowledged the tension surrounding immigration. "The House is in such a political panic about this issue," he said.

In introducing the Secure Fence Act of 2006, Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) described fences as "absolutely effective" at stopping illegal immigration and reducing crime.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) blasted the measure. "They think this simple bumper sticker will work, but it won't," he said. "It's a crass political effort by those more interested in saving their seats than securing the border."

Approval of a fencing requirement could represent a victory for the House in its ongoing battle with the Senate over how immigration laws should be overhauled.

The chambers' approaches differ: The Senate has supported a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for those now here illegally, along with stronger border security. The House has focused solely on enforcement. House leaders, who have refused to negotiate with the Senate, have pushed this week to get a series of enforcement-only measures through Congress.

But in a quiet power struggle that has unfolded behind closed doors this week, influential Republican senators have blocked House leaders from attaching the enforcement provisions to a series of spending bills.

The measures, which the House passed last week, include a provision that would make it easier to detain and deport suspected gang members.

The struggle over these provisions continues even as the legislative session enters its final days, and is holding up a defense policy bill.

Lacking legislative triumphs, Republicans in both chambers are representing the Homeland Security spending bill, with its funding for border security, as a victory.

The entire budget for border protection, immigration enforcement and related activity for fiscal 2007 is $21.3 billion, a 10% increase from last year.

"I think it's very important for the American people to know that … regardless of what happens to the fence bill, which I support, we will have, through the appropriations process, added 4,000 new border agents. We will have 10,000 detention beds, we will have $1.2 billion for building that fence, at the end of the week whether or not that fence bill passes," Frist said Wednesday.

When asked about stymied House attempts to attach additional enforcement measures to spending legislation, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) acknowledged: "There is clearly some concern about some of the border security issues that the House passed last week. We would have liked to have seen them in, but having said that … if you look at the additional funds that did get in there, we've taken a big step on securing our border."

The Secure Fence Act would direct the Department of Homeland Security to study installing a state-of-the-art security system along the border with Canada, and would encourage the Customs and Border Protection agency to consider new ways of stopping smugglers — options that Republican staffers say could include the use of rubber bullets.

The legislation recommends unmanned aerial vehicles, vehicle barriers and all-weather access roads, and specifically outlines requirements for at least two layers of reinforced fencing. Whereas the House bill dictates exactly where the fence should go in areas around Tecate and Calexico, Calif., and near border towns in New Mexico, Arizona and Texas, the Senate bill allows these communities to have more input on placement.

It also tones down House language giving Homeland Security 18 months to stop all illegal entries into the U.S.

Cost estimates for the 700-mile fence range from $2 billion to $9 billion.

The Senate approved its own 370-mile fence measure this year.

The fence requirement prompted fierce opposition from border communities, religious groups, advocates and lawmakers. The Tohono O'odham Nation of Arizona, whose land runs along 75 miles of the U.S.-Mexico border, has also expressed deep concern that the fence would threaten wildlife and the desert ecosystem.

DOJ_NMG_0070983

Critics have also argued that it would make the border more violent; would force illegal immigrants to take more dangerous routes through the desert; would harm trade and relations with Mexico; and still wouldn't solve the problem of illegal immigration.

Kennedy pointed out that at least 40% of illegal immigrants had entered the U.S. legally, through an airport, and simply overstayed their visas.

Supporters of such fences argue that they are an invaluable aid to border patrol agents and reduce the impact of illegal immigration on border communities. They often cite a 56% drop in crime in San Diego County since a fence was built in that area.

If the Secure Fence Act is not approved, the Homeland Security spending bill for fiscal 2007 will provide the department with $1.2 billion to continue adding physical reinforcements and barriers along the southern boundary with Mexico.

The department already erects fences, roads, vehicle barriers, lights and cameras along the border, complying with relevant laws and working with private and public land owners in doing so.

TAX:

Merck Faces $2.3 Bln Tax Bill In U.S. Expense Dispute (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Angela Zimm And Ryan J. Donmoyer

Bloomberg, September 29, 2006

Sept. 28 (Bloomberg) -- Merck & Co., already facing thousands of lawsuits related to its withdrawn Vioxx painkiller, may have to pay as much as $2.32 billion to the Internal Revenue Service in connection with disputed expenses on its tax returns.

The IRS has sent notices that it won't allow royalty-related expenses Merck claimed on its tax returns from 1993 through 1999, the Whitehouse Station, New Jersey-based drugmaker said in a Securities and Exchange Commission filing. The Wall Street Journal reported today that the IRS is contesting an arrangement by which Merck cut its U.S. tax bill by $1.5 billion over 10 years by paying a Bermuda-based unit to use its own patents.

The dispute relates to a ``partnership transaction" that Merck set up in 1993, according to the Aug. 7 filing. The IRS is increasingly challenging cross-border transactions that companies are using to lower their federal tax bills. It also has taken regulatory steps to curb the transfer of assets such as patents and licenses to subsidiaries in low-tax countries.

Merck said in the quarterly filing that it ``vigorously disagrees" with the IRS's proposed adjustments to its tax returns.

``An unfavorable resolution could have a material effect on the company's results of operations or cash flows in the quarter in which an adjustment is recorded or the tax is due or paid," Merck said in the filing.

Reserves

Merck has set aside reserves for the tax liability, spokesman Raymond Kerins said in a telephone interview. He didn't disclose the amount. Merck has outlined the tax liability in its quarterly filings ``for years," he said. He declined to comment on the particulars of the dispute with U.S. tax authorities.

``We don't disclose any communications with the IRS," Kerins said today in a telephone interview. ``The partnership transaction was in full compliance with IRS rules and regulations."

Shares of Merck fell 34 cents to $42.06 at the close of New York Stock Exchange composite trading. They have climbed 53 percent in the past 12 months.

The IRS also issued a summons in January requesting information in connection with a ``minority interest equity financing transaction" from 1995, according to the filing.

Vioxx Litigation Costs

Merck, the fourth largest U.S. drugmaker, is defending itself against more than 18,000 lawsuits over Vioxx, which it pulled from the market two years ago because of a link to an increased risk for heart attacks and strokes. The company has set aside almost $1 billion for litigation-related costs.

According to the Wall Street Journal article, which cites documents and people familiar with the situation, Merck set up a subsidiary in Bermuda in 1993 to which it transferred patents covering its Zocor and Mevacor cholesterol-lowering drugs. The IRS is challenging the tax benefits Merck gained from the transaction, the journal reported.

The transaction is similar to one used by General Electric Co. to save $62 million in taxes in the 1990s by shifting about $310 million in income from leases on old airplanes to a pair of Dutch banks via a Bermuda-based partnership called Castle Harbour LLC, according to court filings.

The arrangement is designed to take advantage of different tax rules in different countries. In the Merck and GE cases, the U.S. company essentially generates tax deductions without offsetting income. Foreign partners take advantage of rules in their own countries that don't tax income earned outside of their borders.

American companies choose foreign partners in places such as the Netherlands because of accommodating banking laws and favorable tax treaty rules.

GE Ruling

The Second Circuit Court of Appeals in New York ruled on Aug. 3 that the GE transaction had no business purpose other than to save taxes and was thus a sham, reversing an earlier district court decision that the transaction was legitimate.

At the time, Eileen O'Connor, assistant attorney general for the Tax Division at the Justice Department, called the ruling ``another paving stone in the Department's path to stopping abusive tax shelters.'' GE is appealing.

GE spokesman Russell Wilkerson didn't immediately return a phone call or respond to an e-mail.

Dow Case

A third case with similar allegations is pending in federal court in Louisiana, where Dow Chemical Co. is fighting to restore more than $130 million in claimed tax benefits. The company has paid tax bills the IRS has sent so far, said Dow spokesman Chris Huntley.

In that case, the U.S. government said it will seek information from five European banks as well as ``extensive discovery'' of third parties involved with the transaction, including Goldman Sachs Group Inc. According to the Wall Street Journal, Goldman Sachs helped structure both the Dow and Merck transactions.

``This was a legitimate financing arrangement,'' Huntley said today in a telephone interview. ``We firmly believe our position is entirely justified.''

Goldman Sachs spokesman Peter Rose said the company had no comment.

The IRS is taking action on the arrangements on the heels of other enforcement in the area of international tax avoidance. On Sept. 11, GlaxoSmithKline PLC, Europe's largest drugmaker, agreed to pay about $3.1 billion in taxes to settle what the IRS said was its biggest dispute ever.

Transfer Pricing

That case involved transfer pricing, a common practice for multinational businesses. Multinational companies also regularly use partnerships to reduce their tax liability, said Lee Sheppard, a contributing editor at the journal Tax Notes.

``Use of a partnership to send taxable income in one direction and cash in another is a longstanding tactic,'' she said.

The government has also taken regulatory steps intended to prevent companies from undervaluing patents and intellectual property when they're transferred to subsidiaries located in tax havens.

The low-cost transfers allow companies to maximize their income in tax havens such as Ireland while providing their U.S. parent companies with deductions for research and development expenses.

Existing rules have helped companies stockpile more than $650 billion in cash overseas. Many U.S. companies are repatriating those funds to the U.S. under a one-year tax holiday passed by Congress for 2005 that can be used this year in certain circumstances.

Rules the U.S. Treasury Department issued last year now require companies to value assets at the same price they would charge a competitor to acquire them.

To contact the reporter on this story: Angela Zimm in Boston at azimm@bloomberg.net ; Ryan Donmoyer in Washington at rdonmoyer@bloomberg.net .

War Stress May Hit Part-time Soldiers The Hardest (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, September 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070985

WASHINGTON — The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan appear to be taking a greater toll on the mental health of the so-called weekend warriors than on that of active-duty troops, the Army's leading expert on combat stress said during a congressional hearing Thursday.

Army Col. Charles Hoge testified that 41% of National Guardsmen and reservists raised concerns about their mental health in answers to a survey taken three to six months after they returned from combat.

That compares with 32% of active-duty troops who responded to the survey, says Hoge, a psychiatrist with the Walter Reed Army Institute of Research and an expert in post-traumatic stress disorder.

In addition, a third of the citizen soldiers complained of problems serious enough that they were referred for mental health counseling; only 13% of active-duty soldiers were referred.

The findings come as the Army, under enormous strain from fighting on two war fronts at once, considers greater use of its part-time soldiers in combat.

The program to screen soldiers for health problems began earlier this year. More than 70,000 troops have been screened. Soldiers are asked whether they have suffered depression, abused alcohol, had relationship problems or felt suicidal.

Hoge, who testified before aHouse Veterans Affairs subcommittee Thursday, said he did not know why Guard and Reserve troops showed more evidence of mental health problems. He said more research was needed. "It is important not to misinterpret these data as suggesting that they are in some way less mentally healthy than the active-component soldiers," Hoge said.

He said one of the differences could be that the part-time soldiers are concerned about access to health care after returning to their hometowns, while active-duty soldiers are guaranteed access on their bases.

Another reason, Hoge said, could be that active-duty soldiers remain together after combat and can discuss their experiences.

More than 160,000 members of the National Guard have served or are serving in Iraq and Afghanistan.

VA Didn't Spend All Money Appropriated For Mental-health Services, GAOsays (MCT)

By David Goldstein

McClatchy Newspapers, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Department of Veterans Affairs failed to fully spend a promised $300 million since 2005 to fill critical gaps in mental-health services for returning troops and others, congressional investigators said.

The money was supposed to be used to improve awareness of the VA's mental-health programs and provide better access to them for soldiers who served in Iraq and Afghanistan, women and other veterans suffering from mental illnesses.

But a Government Accountability Office (GAO) report released Thursday found that the agency underspent the money, and not all of what it did spend went to those programs.

"Veterans expect that wounds suffered in service, be they to mind or body, will be cared for by the nation they served," Rep. Henry Brown Jr., R-S.C., said during a hearing he chaired Thursday on mental health issues. "We will exercise greater oversight ... to ensure that funds allocated by the American people are used as intended."

The VA did not respond to requests for comment.

The Kansas City Star reported in May that the VA had dramatically underestimated the number of troops that would return from Iraq this year suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder. The GAO reached a similar conclusion in a separate report last week.

In Thursday's GAO report, investigators found that the VA spent only $53 million of the $100 million it planned to use in fiscal 2005 on gaps in care under a mental-health strategic plan. It sent $35 million of the $100 million to a VA general fund, where the money could be spent on a variety of programs.

Investigators also said that the VA didn't tell its hospital and health-care officials that the $35 million was available, and they "were unaware that any specific portion of their general allocation was to be used for mental health strategic plan initiatives."

The GAO said that in fiscal 2006, which ends Saturday, the VA budgeted $200 million for the strategic plan, but $42 million remains unspent.

DOJ_NMG_0070986

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Term Should Indicate New Justices' Influence (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court will begin its annual term Monday with a schedule that includes cases on abortion rights, school integration and global warming, topics that will test the impact of the court's two new conservative members.

Such disputes, and a slate of business cases, could offer significant clues on how Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito will influence the law. Both have roots in Ronald Reagan's administration and were touted by President Bush as reliable conservatives.

Roberts replaced another conservative, the late William Rehnquist. Alito succeeded the retired Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate justice who was at the court's ideological center. As her views evolved over her quarter-century tenure, O'Connor became the key vote on a divided, nine-member court. By voting with the court's four liberals, she helped to ensure abortion rights and the use of affirmative action in college admissions.

That's why the new cases could be poignant signs of how the court has changed with Alito on the bench instead of O'Connor. Alito's record as a lower court judge suggests he would be less open to abortion and affirmative action than she was.

"The outcome of these new cases will tell us a great deal about the future direction of the Roberts court, on specific issues and more generally on the court's respect for past rulings," American Civil Liberties Union legal director Steven Shapiro says.

Washington lawyer Helgi Walker, a former law clerk to conservative Justice Clarence Thomas, says that although "we could see watershed decisions" this term, it's also possible "the cases could be decided on incremental grounds" that don't dramatically change the law.

Six years ago, O'Connor joined the court's liberals in a 5-4 decision that struck down a state ban on a procedure abortion foes call "partial birth" abortion. The court cited the law's lack of an exception for when a physician believed the procedure to be best for a woman's health.

The justices will consider a federal ban on the "partial birth" procedure, which Congress passed in 2003 while asserting that the method is never necessary to preserve a woman's health.

In urging the court to uphold the ban, U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement says the dispute is a crucial test of Congress' power to make findings and set policy. On the other side, lawyer Eve Gartner of Planned Parenthood says the ban could affect most abortions in the second trimester — roughly 12-20 weeks of gestation, before the fetus can survive outside of the womb.

According to the Guttmacher Institute, which compiles nationwide abortion data used by both sides of the debate, about 1.3 million abortions are done in the USA each year: 89% in the first trimester, 10% in the second and 1% in the third.

Disputes over abortion rights have been a staple of the high court's docket since the Roe v. Wade decision in 1973, when the court first declared that there is a constitutional right to end a pregnancy. The ruling transformed national politics and generated a stream of cases over government limits on the abortion procedure.

Through the years, as the court became more conservative, the justices have allowed regulation of abortion but have affirmed the core right to end a pregnancy. The current case does not challenge the basic right to abortion. Rather, it tests whether the court, for the first time, will allow a particular method of abortion to be outlawed.

The banned procedure, in which a physician partially delivers the fetus before collapsing its skull, covers medical methods known as "dilation and extraction" and intact "dilation and evacuation."

A pair of cases that will come before the court focus on the divisive debate over racial preferences and school desegregation.

In Louisville, the Jefferson County School Board makes sure the enrollment of each elementary and secondary school is at least 15% African-American, but no more than 50%. In Seattle, a student assignment plan on hold because of the litigation seeks to achieve a racial balance in high schools. When a school has too many applicants, officials use "tiebreakers" to fill openings. One of the tiebreakers considers the applicant's race.

DOJ_NMG_0070987

Parents of children who did not get their first choice of schools sued, citing the Constitution's guarantee of equality. School officials say they have a compelling interest in racially diverse schools and in not having campuses mirror the separation of whites and blacks found in housing patterns.

In 2003, O'Connor's vote in a University of Michigan case ensured colleges could use applicants' race for campus diversity.

The justices also will take up several key business cases, including those that test limits on punitive damages and pollution regulation.

Jesse Williams, who smoked two packs of Marlboros a day for 45 years, died of lung cancer in 1997. His widow sued Philip Morris, which makes Marlboros. She won a jury award of $79.5 million in punitive damages, nearly 100 times the damages set for her loss.

Philip Morris argues that the award was unconstitutionally excessive and that the jury was improperly allowed to consider harm to other Oregon smokers.

The justices also will hear their first case focused on global warming, in an appeal from a dozen states and several cities that want the federal government to regulate gases emitted from tailpipes of new cars and trucks. The question is whether the Clean Air Act gives the Environmental Protection Agency the power to regulate "greenhouse gases," which many scientists blame for global warming.

The EPA says it doesn't have authority to regulate such emissions. Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly countered recently, "The federal government is shirking its responsibility to apply the law."

Key Cases On Court's Docket (USAT)

USA Today, September 29, 2006

Key cases to be considered by the Supreme Court during its 2006-07 term, and the legal questions they pose:

•Gonzales v. Carhart; Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood — Whether a federal ban on a procedure called "partial birth" abortion violates a woman's constitutional right to end a pregnancy because the ban lacks an exception for cases in which a physician believes the procedure is the best option to preserve a woman's health.

•Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1; Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education — Whether a public school district's consideration of a student's race in school assignments as part of an effort to achieve racial diversity in schools violates the constitutional guarantee of equality.

•Philip Morris USA v. Williams — Whether a judge reviewing a jury's punitive-damages award may find that a company's conduct was reprehensible enough to override the usual requirement that such damages be reasonably related to the actual harm caused. The case also tests whether a jury may punish a company for the effects of its misconduct on people who were not parties to the case.

•Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency — Whether the EPA has the authority to regulate carbon dioxide and other pollution from tailpipe emissions linked to global warming, and whether the agency may decline to issue emission standards for vehicles.

•Ledbetter v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. — Whether a person alleging illegal pay discrimination may sue her employer over a salary decision after a 180-day period for filing such complaints has passed.

•Carey v. Musladin — Whether an appeals court erred in throwing out a jury's murder conviction on the grounds that three family members of the victim were in court wearing buttons depicting the deceased.

•Cunningham v. California — Whether California's sentencing law, which permits judges to boost sentences based on their determination of facts (rather than a jury's assessment), violates defendants' 6th Amendment right to a jury trial and recent Supreme Court rulings limiting judges' discretion.

•Whorton v. Bockting — Whether a 2004 Supreme Court decision barring the introduction at trial of certain out-of-court statements applies retroactively to thousands of criminal cases that were pending at the time.

Abortion, Race Cases Will Challenge Roberts' Goal Of Consensus (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070988

Chief Justice John Roberts Jr., speaking at a judicial conference this summer, sounded positively proud of the consensus he forged in his first term in office. Roughly half the cases were decided unanimously, almost twice as many as in recent years.

And when the run of unanimity ended with some contentious 5-4 decisions in June, Roberts noted unhappily to his audience, some commentators pronounced that the era of good feelings was over.

"You know, when Joe DiMaggio finally ended his hitting streak, sportswriters didn't say, 'He's all washed up,'" Roberts said, mildly miffed, to the 9th Circuit conference in California.

True enough, but then again, DiMaggio, the legendary New York Yankee, never again matched that 56-game hitting streak of 1941 -- nor has anyone else. And Roberts may not have another term as harmonious as his first, either.

Roberts' second term as chief justice begins Monday with a slew of tough curveball cases on the docket. Contentious disputes over abortion rights, race, punitive damages and the environment loom large, and the Court has only just begun to fill its argument calendar for the term.

The cases will bring crucial and tricky choices for the Court's other new justice, Samuel Alito Jr., who replaced centrist Sandra Day O'Connor on the bench, as well as for Justice Anthony Kennedy, who replaced O'Connor in the less official position of swing voter.

But this term will also be a test of Roberts' leadership, especially since he has been so vocal in establishing greater unanimity and consensus as a goal for the Court.

In remarks at the same 9th Circuit conference in July, Roberts offered a remarkable definition of a justice's duties. "It's important for all of the justices to view it as part of their responsibilities to try to work as a Court, rather than the pursuit of individualized jurisprudence." The late Chief Justice William Rehnquist stopped trying for that kind of collegiality in his final years, presiding instead over a growing cacophony of split decisions, separate concurrences, and partial dissents.

Roberts is determined to reverse that trend to enhance the "stature and legitimacy of the Court," he said. And if achieving the goal of greater harmony means deciding cases very narrowly, Roberts added, so be it.

"There are many cases we get that can be decided on a number of different grounds," Roberts told the conference. "If there's one where it's 8-1 or 9-to-nothing, and another where it's 5-4, I think it's better to decide on the former ground and let it go at that."

Roberts' strategy, said former acting Solicitor General Walter Dellinger III, is a throwback to Roberts' days as a skilled Supreme Court advocate. "Advocacy makes you a minimalist," Dellinger said at a Cato Institute conference. Now head of O'Melveny & Myers' appellate practice, Dellinger said that finding narrow ground on which to win a case is "what he did for a living."

But will that minimalist approach cut it in the big cases this coming term, when advocates will be seeking broad decisions either preserving or toppling controversial precedents? Florida International University law professor Thomas Baker, a former aide to Rehnquist, thinks the institutional pressures on Roberts and Alito will result in small change. "The Court is like a big ship -- it only turns slowly."

But Baker and others still view the coming term as far more important than the last. Last term, he says, "they were looking for cases they could decide in ways where Justice O'Connor was not crucial to the outcome. Now we are going to see what her departure really means."

ABORTION AGONISTES

Nowhere will O'Connor's departure mean more this term than in a pair of cases set for oral argument Nov. 8, Gonzales v. Carhart and Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood. At issue in both is the federal law banning "partial birth abortion," which Congress passed in the wake of the Court's 2000 decision Stenberg v. Carhart, which struck down a similar statute in Nebraska because it failed to include an exception that would allow the procedure if needed to protect the health of the mother. The federal law also does not contain such an exception, but Congress cited medical evidence -- which abortion rights supporters dispute -- to conclude that the procedure is never needed to protect a woman's health.

O'Connor was in the majority that struck down the Nebraska law, and Kennedy was in dissent, even though both had been architects of the 1992 decision Planned Parenthood v. Casey, which rescued Roe v. Wade from being overturned.

DOJ_NMG_0070989

Kennedy now must grapple with a no-win dilemma that rivals the agonizing he did before Casey, which at the time produced his now-classic musing: "Sometimes you don't know if you're Caesar about to cross the Rubicon or Captain Queeg cutting your own towline."

If Kennedy votes to strike down the federal law in the November cases, he could be viewed alternately as:

Conservative, because he will be following the Rehnquist Court view of limited congressional power to regulate states;

Liberal, because he will be siding with the abortion rights advocates;

Activist, because he won't be deferring to the will of an elected Congress; or

Nonactivist, because he will be adhering to established precedent regarding the health exception.

By the same token, if Kennedy sticks with his 2000 stance against partial birth abortion and votes to uphold the federal law, he could be viewed as:

Conservative, because he will again join the camp of abortion rights opponents;

Liberal, because he will be supporting the view that Congress has broad power to override the views of states;

Activist, because he will be overturning recent precedent; or

Nonactivist, because he will be showing deference to elected legislators.

"Which Kennedy will show up?" asks Florida International's Baker. "The Casey Kennedy or the Stenberg Kennedy?" He thinks it may be the latter, with Kennedy adhering to his dissent in Stenberg by voting to uphold the federal ban.

"The late Justice Potter Stewart would dissent one year, then feel honor-bound to follow the precedent the next year," says Baker. "I don't see that in Kennedy's jurisprudence."

RACE JUDICATA

Similar issues of precedent will influence the Court's consideration of two race cases, Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education. The 6th and 9th circuits upheld plans in Kentucky and Seattle, respectively, that use race as a factor in assigning students to public schools to achieve diversity.

Though the cases pose somewhat different issues than those raised by the higher education program upheld in the 2003 affirmative action case Grutter v. Bollinger, many analysts see that precedent now up for grabs. Again, O'Connor was in the majority in Grutter, and Kennedy was in dissent.

"It will be very hard to overturn the school cases without overturning Grutter, even if the opinions claim they are not doing so," says Court historian David Garrow, who teaches at the University of Cambridge in England. "The Court is institutionally disinclined to discard its own high-visibility precedents."

The Court's business docket occupies an unusually high proportion of the cases it's accepted for this term -- namely, 13 of the 29 granted review so far -- said veteran advocate Roy Englert Jr. of Robbins, Russell, Englert, Orseck & Untereiner at a Chamber of Commerce briefing. Continuing its recent trend of heightened interest in antitrust issues, he said, the Court is expected to rule in "a minimum of five" antitrust disputes this term.

But the most high-profile business cases so far involve the following:

Punitive damages. In Philip Morris v. Williams, set for argument Oct. 31, business groups are hoping the Court will continue down the road it took in the 2003 decision State Farm v. Campbell, which sought to temper punitive damage awards. The 2003 ruling suggested a maximum of a 9-1 ratio between punitive and compensatory damages, but states have responded in widely varying ways. In the case before the Court, an Oregon jury awarded Mayola Williams $79 million in punitive damages on top of an $895,000 compensatory award. "This is the first case Roberts and Alito will decide in the punitive damages area," says Mark Levy, counsel at Kilpatrick Stockton in Washington. Both, he says, are "up for grabs."

Patents. In KSR International v. Teleflex the Court will consider an issue that arises in almost every patent dispute: When is an invention so obvious that it does not deserve a patent? The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit set a standard for assessing obviousness that critics say has allowed too many patents to be approved.

Global warming. The Court will review the Environmental Protection Agency's determination that it has no authority to regulate emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases emitted by cars. The EPA also said scientific uncertainty about the effect of these gases on the global climate led it to decide it should not regulate these emissions. In Massachusetts v.

DOJ_NMG_0070990

EPA, 12 states challenged a ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit that the EPA had "properly exercised" its discretion in declining to regulate.

But even beyond the headline-making cases, the Court's cases include many that could have a broad impact on everyday life.

That will be clear from the first argument on the first day the justices are on the bench, Tuesday. (There will be no arguments Monday because of the Yom Kippur holiday.)

Two cases consolidated for argument Tuesday could expose thousands of immigrants to automatic deportation. Those convicted of felonies already can be deported, but in these cases, from South Dakota and Texas, the issue is whether deportation should result from relatively minor offenses such as drug possession, which is a felony under state law but a misdemeanor under federal law.

The immigrant cases will have "broad significance," said Steve Shapiro, legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union, at a briefing. Along with the blockbuster cases and others, said Shapiro, they will reveal the direction of the newly constituted Court.

"Last term we got a glimpse of the Roberts Court, but only a glimpse," Shapiro said at the Sept. 19 briefing. "At the end of this term, we will know a lot more."

High Tech For High Court (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 29, 2006

IT WOULD BE UNFAIR TO SAY that arguments before the U.S. Supreme Court are shrouded in secrecy. Reporters and the public long have been able to attend arguments — though seating is scarce in high-profile cases — and transcripts are eventually published on the court's website, http://www.supremecourtus.gov . In recent years, the court has even authorized the same-day release of audiotapes of especially newsworthy arguments.

Compared with Congress, however, the supposedly public proceedings of the court are still far from transparent. But beginning Tuesday, public access to oral arguments will increase exponentially when the court begins posting same-day transcripts on its website.

As with congressional proceedings, some cases will be more absorbing than others. Many Americans will want to read transcripts of the upcoming argument in Gonzales vs. Carhart et al, in which the court will weigh the constitutionality of a federal law banning so-called partial-birth abortions. But only legal junkies will be clicking their mice to read arguments in BP America Production Co. et al vs. Burton, a case that poses the riveting question of "whether — contrary to the decision below but consistent with decisions of the Tenth and Federal Circuits — the limitations period in 28 U.S.C. § 2415(a) applies to federal agency orders requiring the payment of money claimed under a lease or other agreement."

Sensational or soporific, arguments before the court offer citizens an opportunity to learn how the justices think and occasionally to observe an internal debate among them expressed by posing questions to opposing counsel. Making such arguments more accessible could also increase informed knowledge about the judicial branch, always a good thing.

This innovation is the latest in a series of halting steps toward making the court more transparent. In 1993, it moved to deny access to recordings of old cases to a political scientist who had duplicated them for commercial publication. But the court relented, and the National Archives lifted a restriction on making copies. Now official transcripts of oral arguments actually identify justices by name — this counts as progress — when they ask a question.

Same-day transcripts still fall short of making audiotapes routinely available, and even that reform wouldn't allow citizens to see the justices in action. Unfortunately, most justices seem to concur with Justice David H. Souter's view that TV cameras will be brought into the courtroom "over my dead body."

Like lawyers who appear before the court, we hope Souter and his colleagues are willing to reexamine their view that television coverage would change what Justice Anthony Kennedy called the "dynamic" of the court. Reading the justices' questions — and lawyers' answers — will be educational. Even more illuminating would be the opportunity to watch and listen to those exchanges.

How Bush Looks To Define Energy-Policy Focus (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0070991

By John D. McKinnon

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

HOOVER, Ala. -- President Bush said he would speed up his alternative-energy push during the remainder of his term with new spending focused on easing bottlenecks that are slowing the spread of ethanol in the market.

In an interview with The Wall Street Journal on a swing through Alabama, Mr. Bush said he is seeking ways to overcome difficulties in transporting the fuel, and to increase the number of stations selling it. "I envision more money being spent to accelerate" availability of ethanol and other alternative fuels. He pointed to a federally funded project to build fueling stations along the highway from Indiana to the Gulf Coast as an example. (Read the full interview1.)

The president also damped speculation that his administration is exploring a major shift in global-warming policy and may soon embrace some kind of formal government-imposed limits. Though Mr. Bush did imply that a shift could happen in the unlikely event that the modest voluntary goals set by his administration to reduce so-called greenhouse-gas emissions were failing.

"I put some targets out there and we're meeting those targets," Mr. Bush said. "But should we not meet the targets, then I said that the country ought to consider a cap and trade," in emissions credits, he said.

Aides later emphasized that Mr. Bush was reiterating a longstanding administration policy, and the president himself underscored his preference to focus on developing new technologies, even as some states -- notably California -- have begun moving toward more-direct regulation. "As you diversify away and/or improve the capacity to burn certain fuels, you're developing environmentally friendly technologies," he said.

Mr. Bush's comments on energy and global warming come as he and aides try to hone the priorities for his final two years in office. He is increasingly focused on making diversification from oil one of his long-term legacies, and is trying to respond to growing political pressure for more direct government action on greenhouse gases, while continuing to stave off demands for concrete rules.

While Mr. Bush has talked a great deal in recent months about cleaner energies and finding alternatives to oil, he continues to be widely criticized by environmentalists for failing to back his rhetoric with enough government action -- either spending or tougher regulations to cut pollution. His resistance in particular to federal limits on greenhouse gases -- which result from burning fossil fuels and are believed to contribute to climate change by trapping the sun's rays -- has left him at odds with some business leaders who have come to endorse stronger federal action.

Beyond energy, Mr. Bush touched on a range of subjects during a break between an energy-promotion event in the morning and a fund-raiser for the re-election campaign of Alabama Republican Gov. Bob Riley.

On Iran, Mr. Bush said he is willing to let negotiations on Tehran's nuclear ambitions run awhile longer before trying to ratchet up pressure to curb such programs. "We ought to give the Europeans time to see whether or not the Iranians will make the proper choice about verifiably suspending [uranium enrichment]," he said. But he added that the ultimate deadline for a sanctions push would come "sooner rather than later, to make sure that these discussions are not their attempt to stall their way into us losing our interest in the subject."

On the continuing problems of auto giants General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co., Mr. Bush said he is interested in talking with their top executives after the November elections, but he appeared to hold out little hope that the federal government would take the lead in relieving the companies of their huge legacy costs for retired workers. "If their concerns are rising health-care costs, I fully understand," he said. But "if their concerns are, 'We made some agreements in the past that we're not sure we can live with,' I will be most interested in hearing what the prescription would be."

Overall, Mr. Bush said he would place energy independence alongside his long-sought overhaul of federal entitlement programs as he approaches his final two years in office.

"A president has got to think about how ... we stay competitive," Mr. Bush explained in a city building where he had just met with officials who have converted their fleets to alternative fuels like ethanol. If the U.S. can make progress in diversifying its vehicle fuels and also overhaul entitlements such as Medicare and Social Security, "we'll be able to look back and say we made it easier for future Congresses and future presidents to stay competitive in the global economy," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0070992

Mr. Bush said bluntly in his State of the Union address in January that America has become "addicted to oil." He pledged then to increase spending drastically for research into alternatives.

But while consumers have responded enthusiastically -- for example, snapping up so-called flex-fuel vehicles that run on gasoline or ethanol -- many still have nowhere to buy ethanol. Just a small fraction of the nation's gas stations sell the mainstay E85 fuel (85% ethanol; 15% gasoline). The number has been slowly rising but as of yesterday, fewer than 1,000 out of 170,000 gas stations stock E85, according to the National Ethanol Vehicle Coalition.

To increase that number, the federal government could sweeten existing tax credits and/or grant programs to help gas stations that add an ethanol pump or convert an existing gas pump into one that dispenses ethanol. The existing credit pays 30% of the conversion costs, up to $30,000.

The president also could propose increases in an Energy Department grant program that aims to increase ethanol availability. This year the department awarded $1.5 million to help expand the number of gas stations that stock E85. An additional $1.8 million was directed in 2005 to help the National Ethanol Vehicle Coalition give grants to stations for conversion.

To date, the E85 effort has been driven largely by the private sector. In recent months, for instance, Ford and General Motors, which sell most of the cars that can run on ethanol, have helped gas stations that want to add E85 pumps, often helping to publicize the efforts to local drivers. Yesterday, Mr. Bush said he continues to see a major role for private-sector investment, including venture-capital investment, in energy-diversification efforts. He suggested that recent softening of petroleum prices shouldn't affect alternative-energy investments too much.

Overall, Mr. Bush outlined a vision of the future in which ethanol would become available on a regional basis, as locally grown fuel sources such as wood chips and switchgrass become economically viable. "I think what you'll see is regional penetration, depending upon where the feed stocks are being grown," he said. "And as you see new breakthroughs ... then you'll see production plants springing up."

Mr. Bush's comments appeared aimed at underscoring the administration's efforts on energy at a time when high gasoline prices continue to make the White House and Republicans politically vulnerable, despite recent easing of the problem. White House aides complain that Mr. Bush has gotten little credit for his energy initiatives throughout his tenure in office, amid global criticism of his rejection of the Kyoto accords on climate change.

Mr. Bush reflected that concern yesterday. "Part of my frustration is that what we have been doing hasn't quite penetrated into the American psyche," he said. "It was, 'Why aren't you diversifying? Why aren't you doing something?' But this administration has done more than any administration has done."

Bush Touts Ethanol As Way To Ease Dependence On Oil (DJ)

Dow Jones Newswire, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones)--President George W. Bush, touring an alternative fueling station in Hoover, Ala., said Thursday that the U.S. needs to develop ethanol-based fuels to wean drivers off oil.

"One way to become less dependent on foreign oil is for us to develop new ways to power our automobiles right here in America," Bush said.

Bush, who is to attend a luncheon fundraiser later Thursday for Gov. Bob Riley in Birmingham, got a briefing in Hoover on Alabama's efforts to develop alternative fuels and the E85 capacity at Hoover Public Safety Facility, which has been open since May 2004.

The city of Hoover's police force uses around 20,000 gallons of E85 - an ethanol and gas blend - per month, according to the White House.

Bush said the blend "works just fine because it helps keep our air clean. It works just fine because it helps address the national security issue."

"One of the important policies of government ought to be to encourage the production and use of ethanol," Bush said. "And there's a federal role for that."

The president, who repeatedly complains the U.S. has become addicted to oil, boasts that his administration has taken steps to promote energy diversity, including tax credits for ethanol blends and small ethanol producers and a Renewable Fuels

DOJ_NMG_0070993

Standard to boost the amount of homegrown fuel. He said researchers are working on breakthroughs to convert switchgrass and wood products into ethanol.

The Natural Resources Defense Council agreed with Bush's endorsement of ethanol but said Bush and Congress need to enact policies that will help bring the fuel to consumers more quickly.

"The president is on a forward-looking road by supporting these advanced fuels, but he's keeping his foot off the gas pedal when American farmers and families want to go full speed ahead," said Nathanael Greene, an NRDC senior policy analyst. "His administration and Congress need to enact policies that will advance these fuels quickly and affordably to move America beyond oil and cut global warming pollution."

Deficit Comes In Below Projections, Thanks To `off-budget' Borrowing (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - The U.S. government closes the books on fiscal 2006 Saturday, and politicians are likely to trumpet that the federal deficit came in almost $60 billion below projections. Problem is, they won't be using the same math you use.

The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office has projected that the federal deficit for the fiscal year ending Sept. 30 will total around $260 billion, aided by a surge in revenues. That's $58 billion lower than last year's deficit and about $77 billion lower than projections at the beginning of the fiscal year.

Great news? Budget experts in Washington and on Wall Street say it's a welcome development, but misleading. Washington's funny math excludes the Social Security trust fund, which is running a $177 billion surplus this year. Washington spends it, but doesn't count it as spending. It's officially listed as "off-budget" borrowing.

"In practice, all the money Washington collects goes into the same pot and gets spent the same. On paper, we say we'll pay Social Security back later," said Brian Riedl, chief budget analyst for the Heritage Foundation, a conservative research center.

So the deficit is actually about $437 billion, the CBO calculates: the $260 billion official deficit plus the $177 billion borrowed from the trust fund. Since the money is "borrowed," it adds to the gross federal debt, which is expected to reach about $8.5 trillion by Jan. 1.

This is why New York investment bank Goldman Sachs & Co. issued a dour report Sept. 22 titled "The U.S. Budget Outlook: No Lasting Improvement."

Spending trust-fund money to mask the true size of the federal deficit is a longtime Washington gimmick, but even so, Heritage calculates that the Bush administration and the Republican-led Congress have increased government spending by 45 percent since 2001. Heritage uses spending numbers from the White House Office of Management and Budget.

Federal spending increased by 9 percent in fiscal 2006, the biggest jump since 1990. It's risen sharply for education, agriculture and several nondefense programs as well as for the war on terrorism and homeland security.

"It's really been a guns-and-butter spending spree," Riedl said. "Of all the federal spending increases since 2001, defense and homeland security combined are responsible for less than a third."

Heritage calculates that discretionary spending, excluding defense and homeland security, has increased by 7 percent annually during the Bush presidency. That nearly doubles the 4.2 percent annual growth under President Clinton.

The current spending increases appear less dramatic, however, when they're viewed as a percentage of gross domestic product, the total value of U.S. goods and services produced in a year. In its midyear review, the White House projected fiscal 2006 spending in the ballpark of 20 percent of the GDP. That's about the same as it was for most of the 1990s, although up sharply from 18.4 percent in 2000.

"We're in a situation where the immediate cash budget isn't the issue. People shouldn't focus too much on that," said Robert Bixby, the executive director of the Concord Coalition, a bipartisan grassroots organization that advocates balanced federal budgets. "The real issue we need to start paying more attention to is what sort of enormous balloon payment are we setting ourselves up for in the future."

Looming just over the horizon is a huge demographic shift that'll strain the federal budget enormously. On Jan. 1, 2008, the first baby boomers - 76 million Americans born from 1946 to 1964 - become eligible for Social Security benefits. From that point on, a two-decade assault on federal finances begins. The federal government will turn to an ever-declining number of active workers to pay for the health and retirement benefits it's promised to baby boomers.

DOJ_NMG_0070994

"For people who think that's a long ways off, the first baby boomer collects their first Social Security check in 14 months," Riedl said. "No economic boom can make up for Medicare rising 9 percent, Medicaid rising 8 percent and Social Security rising 6 percent."

There's another important way that Washington math differs from yours. The nation's books are done on a cash basis: money coming in and going out. Most American business and family budgets don't look only at the flow of money. They use accrual-based accounting, in which liabilities, or commitments, are factored in.

When you buy something with a credit card, you incur those liabilities immediately even if you intend to pay off your debt in the future. The federal cash-basis budget doesn't treat things such as promised future pension benefits to veterans as immediate liabilities.

Buried deep in the nation's financial report, issued every December, is an alternative accrual-basis deficit calculation. For the fiscal year that ended Sept. 30, 2005, that deficit totaled $760 billion. It has grown every year of the Bush presidency. It will grow in the 2006 fiscal year too, approaching $800 billion or more.

Comptroller General David Walker, the nation's chief accounting auditor, has added up all the federal government's unfunded liabilities, or promises, and offers a present-day figure of $46 trillion. Think of that as promises to the tune of $155,932.18 for each of the 295 million Americans.

For more on the CBO's budget outlook, go to www.cbo.gov/ftpdocs/74xx/doc7492/08-17-BudgetUpdate.pdf

For historical data on the federal budget, go to www.cbo.gov/budget/historical.pdf

For the Government Accounting Office's latest budget update, go to www.gao.gov/new.items/d061077r.pdf

Judge Halts Effort To Recoup Mistaken Medicare Refunds (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 28 — A federal judge on Thursday ordered the Bush administration to halt its effort to collect $50 million from 230,000 Medicare beneficiaries who had received erroneous refunds of premiums paid for prescription drug coverage. He said many of them might qualify for waivers because repayment would cause hardship.

The judge, Henry H. Kennedy Jr. of Federal District Court here, said Dr. Mark B. McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, must immediately send a notice to every one of the 230,000 beneficiaries, stating that each has a right under federal law to request such waivers.

Federal officials had previously told beneficiaries to return the money by Saturday, Sept. 30. Judge Kennedy said the administration could not enforce that demand unless it first gave beneficiaries an opportunity to seek an exemption.

If a beneficiary requests a waiver, the government cannot try to recoup the money until the secretary of health and human services rules on the request, Judge Kennedy said in issuing a preliminary injunction sought by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs include the Action Alliance of Senior Citizens, based in Philadelphia, and Gray Panthers, a national organization for older Americans.

Judge Kennedy said that any money already paid to the government "must be immediately returned to the beneficiaries so that they may decide whether to request waiver."

Peter L. Ashkenaz, a spokesman for the Medicare agency, said government lawyers had not decided whether to appeal the decision. Mr. Ashkenaz said the government would do everything possible to ensure that beneficiaries continued to receive drug coverage "with the least inconvenience possible."

At a court hearing on Tuesday, Gill Deford, a lawyer at the Center for Medicare Advocacy, said some beneficiaries had almost certainly spent the money sent to them by the government.

Mr. Deford said beneficiaries were entitled to notice of their rights because of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution, which states that no person shall be "deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." The administration's refusal to provide such notice violates the Constitution, as well as the Medicare law and regulations, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0070995

The Medicare law says the government shall not recover an overpayment if the beneficiary was without fault and if it would be "against equity and good conscience" for the government to recover the money.

Dr. McClellan has, in effect, acknowledged that the beneficiaries are without fault, saying the mistake occurred because of "an error in Medicare computer systems."

At the court hearing, lawyers for Dr. McClellan and Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, argued that Medicare beneficiaries had no right to a waiver and therefore no right to be informed that they could fight the demand for repayment.

The erroneous refunds averaged $215 a person, and none exceeded $800, federal officials said.

Beneficiaries "have been unjustly enriched," Marcus H. Christ Jr., a lawyer from the Department of Health and Human Services, told the court. "Nothing in the Medicare program allows them to keep that money."

One plaintiff, Lucy C. Loveall of Franklin, Ky., pays for drug coverage by having premiums withheld from her Social Security checks. She received $161.70 from the government, representing a refund for seven months of premiums. Ms. Loveall, 65, said she could not afford to repay the money because she and her husband had total income of $2,214 a month and total monthly expenses of $3,067.

The poorest Medicare beneficiaries do not have to pay premiums for drug coverage. But Mr. Deford said that many of those who did pay premiums had relatively low incomes. About half of beneficiaries have annual incomes less than twice the poverty level, he said. The poverty level is $9,800 for an individual.

Medicare Drug Premiums Steady (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — Average monthly premiums will hold steady next year under Medicare's prescription-drug program as competing insurers offer a range of new coverage options.

The average premium will be less than $24. Prices for the least expensive plans — as cheap as $1.87 in some parts of the country — will rise for the program's second year. Medicare officials will unveil details about 2007 plan offerings today.

Despite pleas from Congress to make the program simpler, seniors and people with disabilities still will face dozens of plans in most states. "There will be more options available with enhanced coverage," says Mark McClellan, administrator of the Centers on Medicare and Medicaid Services.

"The word seems to be pretty much price stability," says John Rother of the AARP, the nation's largest seniors organization.

More plans will have no coverage gap — a period during which beneficiaries must pay full price for drugs. Other plans will offer partial coverage in the gap for generic or certain brand-name drugs. Those plans will be more expensive. Nearly all of the 3,000-plus plans nationwide now have a gap that begins when total drug costs reach $2,250 and ends when enrollees have spent $3,600 of their own money.

Some plans also will add coverage of drugs not now covered by the program, such as certain antihistamines or sleep aids.

The program "is saving seniors on average $1,200 a year, and it just keeps getting better," Secretary of Health and Human Services Michael Leavitt says .

Democrats who wanted a government-run program, under which Medicare could negotiate lower prices with drug companies, aren't impressed. "Under the current drug program, there are winners and losers, and that won't change," says Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., top Democrat on the House Ways and Means Committee.

Companies will begin marketing plans next week. The re-enrollment period begins Nov. 15, and beneficiaries will have until Jan. 1 to decide on a plan. Those who want to remain with their current plan do not need to take any action.

For those who want to shop around, details on the plans will be posted on the Medicare website, www.medicare.gov, in mid-October. Officials are urging people to enroll by Dec. 8 or risk a disruption in coverage in January.

A survey this month by J.D. Power and Associates found three in four Medicare prescription-drug beneficiaries satisfied with their plans. Jeffrey Leiman, the company's senior director of insurance, says only one in five are expected to shop around. Among those people, he says, "there's a lot of confusion."

DOJ_NMG_0070996

There was far more confusion last year, when federal officials rolled out the program passed by Congress in 2003. Seniors complained about the number of private insurance plans. Thousands of low-income beneficiaries previously covered by Medicaid were mistakenly dropped or overcharged.

Critics of the program say beneficiaries should look carefully before choosing. Unlike last year's six-month signup period, they will have only about six weeks this time. “This is just the tip of what you need to know,” says Deane Beebe of the Medicare Rights Center. “You better look closely and assume nothing.”

Sources Of Coverage (USAT)

USA Today, September 29, 2006

Medicare recipients, in millions Where they get prescription-drug coverage

10.4 Stand-alone prescription plans

6 Medicare Advantage (HMO) plans

6.1 Transferred from Medicaid

6.9 Private employer retiree plans

3.5 Federal retiree plans

2 Department of Veterans Affairs

2.6 Employers

0.7 Other

4.4 No coverage

Source: Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services

Page 1A

Lawmakers Argue Over AIDS Funding Bill (AP-Y)

By Erica Werner

AP, September 28, 2006

House members from rural areas and the South clashed with big-city lawmakers Thursday over who should get a bigger share of federal money to care for AIDS patients.

"It's shameful and disgraceful," shouted Rep. Eliot Engel, D-N.Y., denouncing amendments to the $2.1 billion Ryan White CARE Act that could take millions of dollars out of New York's health care coffers.

"The HIV/AIDS epidemic is moving," countered Rep. Joe Barton, R-Texas. "This is a very fair compromise. It begins to treat all states on an equal footing."

The House was expected to vote on the bill later in the evening. A two-thirds vote was needed for passage.

Even if it passes the House, the bill faces uncertain prospects in the Senate before Congress recesses at the end of the week to campaign for re-election. Senators from New York, New Jersey and California are blocking it.

Supporters said the election-year updates were needed because of how AIDS has changed since the Ryan White law first passed in 1990. Once a big-city epidemic infecting mostly gay white men, the disease is now prevalent in the South and among minorities.

By some measures federal funding has not kept up, and states like California, New York and New Jersey get more money per patient than Alabama, Kentucky or North Carolina.

The Ryan White amendments, the first since 2000, make a number of changes aiming to spread money more equally around the country.

While current law only counts patients with full-blown AIDS, the revision also would count patients with the HIV virus who have not developed AIDS.

That change would favor parts of the country where the disease is a newer phenomenon, which tend to be southern and rural areas.

New York state stands to lose $100 million over the five years of the bill. New Jersey would lose $70 million.

DOJ_NMG_0070997

Alabama, by contrast, would get an increase from $11 million a year to about $18 million a year.

"The problem is that the population of those needing services has grown, but the funding for Ryan White programs has not grown with it," said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif. "That means if we're going to give to some people who are very deserving, we're going to take from others who are very deserving."

California and some other states are worried about a change in the bill that mandates counting HIV patients by name instead of codes. Some states used code-based systems out of concern for patient privacy. California could lose an estimated $50 million in the last year of the bill, when the name-based system would take effect, because it won't be prepared to make the transition.

___

The bill is H.R. 6143.

Congress: http://thomas.loc.gov

New Sense Of Caution At F.D.A. (NYT)

By Andrew Pollack

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

A federal advisory group last week derided the Food and Drug Administration as a feckless watchdog unable to protect consumers from unsafe medicines. But try telling that to drug company executives, investors and analysts.

Many of them say the F.D.A. has already responded to a barrage of criticism over the last two years by quietly becoming more assertive about keeping new drugs off the market or refusing to approve new uses for existing medications.

The Nasdaq Biotechnology Index is down about 14 percent since late February, in part on Wall Street's perception that the F.D.A. has become a tougher gatekeeper.

"The uproar that's occurred in the wake of Vioxx has clearly had an effect on the way the F.D.A. approaches its work," said Ira Loss, who follows the F.D.A. for Washington Analysis, a firm that monitors the federal government for investors. "The agency doesn't hesitate to say 'No' or 'Send me more data.' "

Mr. Loss was referring to the market withdrawal of Merck's painkiller Vioxx for safety reasons two years ago. That episode ignited criticism of the F.D.A. and prompted the agency to commission the report issued last week by the federal advisory group, the Institute of Medicine.

Despite the report's critique, executives and analysts point to numerous unexpected delays and rejections by the F.D.A. since the Vioxx debacle that they say show the agency is taking a tougher stance.

Earlier this month, for instance, Genentech said approval of its colon cancer drug Avastin as a treatment for breast cancer would be delayed about a year because the F.D.A. had asked for more data. Genentech said the agency appeared to be toughening its requirements for certain types of clinical trials.

And some drugs that won approval in Europe have merely received "approvable" letters from the F.D.A., meaning they will not be allowed on the market without more information. These drugs include Sanofi-Aventis's Acomplia for obesity, NPS Pharmaceuticals' Preos for osteoporosis and Encysive Pharmaceuticals' Thelin for pulmonary hypertension.

Also whether from caution or a lack of manpower, it has also become common for the agency simply to postpone decisions by 90 days. About half a dozen drugs, including Pfizer's inhaled insulin, Exubera, that have been approved in the last several months were first subjected to 90-day delays.

The F.D.A.'s own statistics, too, show signs of a more cautious stance — at least for new drugs that the agency does not consider major advances over ones already available.

So far, only 1 of 14 such drugs submitted to the agency in the 2005 fiscal year — the Sucampo Pharmaceuticals drug Amitiza for constipation — has won approval on the first try. That is the lowest approval rate in at least a decade.

The main category in which the F.D.A. does not show signs of a slowdown is in approval rates for new drugs that merit a priority review, like the cancer drugs Sutent from Pfizer and Sprycel from Bristol-Myers Squibb. Both were approved within a six-month review.

DOJ_NMG_0070998

A reason for the seeming discrepancy between the perceptions of the agency's critics and the experience of the drug industry may be that, to some extent, they are looking at different things. The Institute of Medicine report, as well as bills in Congress aimed at reforming the F.D.A., focus mainly on lapses in monitoring drugs already on the market, not on the initial approval process.

Indeed, the Institute of Medicine report said the F.D.A. devoted too much of its resources to reviewing new drug applications and not enough to tracking post-approval safety. But the report also criticized the approval process for emphasizing speed at the expense of safety.

Dr. Bruce Psaty, a professor of medicine and epidemiology at the University of Washington and one of the report's authors, said that given the time required to compile the report, it might not reflect changes at the F.D.A. in the last few months.

It is difficult to judge whether the agency has actually become more cautious, because the data on which it bases decisions are usually not publicly released, and the agency does not discuss drugs under review. That means much of the information about the F.D.A.'s actions come from the drug companies themselves.

The F.D.A., which did not make anyone available to be interviewed for this article, denies that there has been a change. So do some of its critics.

The drug industry's laments are "just major kvetching" said Dr. Sidney Wolfe, the head of health research at the watchdog group Public Citizen. He said that executives and Wall Street were looking for a scapegoat for the pharmaceutical industry's failure to develop better drugs.

Even if there have been no official policy changes, though, people close to the F.D.A. say the agency's drug reviewers have become worried they will be hauled before Congress if they approve a drug that is later found to be unsafe. The lack of a permanent F.D.A. commissioner for the last year, along with severe budgetary constraints, are also cited as factors behind delays and rejections of drug applications.

"I speak to reviewers, and they all feel very worried that the decisions they make may come back to haunt them," said Dr. Lee Simon, a former F.D.A. division head, who is now an industry consultant.

One company that may have met such caution is Somaxon Pharmaceuticals of San Diego. It is testing a tiny dose of doxepin, an antidepressant that has been on the market since 1969, for use as a sleeping pill.

Jeff Raser, a co-founder and senior vice president for sales and marketing, said that the F.D.A. had assured the company that it could begin human clinical trials without first doing animal tests, because of doxepin's long history of use in people and because Somaxon was using only about 1 to 8 percent of the dose used to treat depression.

But in May, after Somaxon had completed several clinical trials and was meeting with the F.D.A. to discuss applying for approval, the agency asked for a full battery of animal tests, Mr. Raser said. That will delay the company's application for at least six months.

Another F.D.A. tool, the "approvable" letter, has come to be seen by some analysts as a way for the F.D.A. to make a decision by its deadline but that is really a delaying tactic. The F.D.A. denies this. In some cases there are just minor details to be worked out before approval. But some analysts say the agency is increasingly asking for more clinical trials, as in the case of Preos, NPS Pharmaceuticals' osteoporosis drug.

Some F.D.A. delays have angered patient advocates, as with the request for more data on Avastin, a Genentech cancer drug. They note that in a clinical trial the drug, used in combination with the generic chemotherapy treatment paclitaxel, delayed the worsening of breast cancer by more than six months, compared with paclitaxel alone.

"This, as usual with the F.D.A., does not seem to be about whether the drug combination works, or whether breast cancer patients would be better off if they could get it," said Steve Walker, chief adviser to the Abigail Alliance for Better Access to Developmental Drugs, a patient advocacy group.

The F.D.A. has also postponed by 90 days, until November, its deadline for deciding whether to approve Genentech's late-stage breast cancer drug Herceptin for use in earlier stages of the disease.

And yet, the F.D.A. has recently approved drugs for serious diseases in which few alternative medicines are available. In July, for example, the agency approved Gemzar, from Eli Lilly, as a treatment for recurrent ovarian cancer, even though its advisory committee had recommended against approval — in part on grounds that the drug had not prolonged survival, only delayed the worsening of cancer.Where a new caution seems most evident is in the F.D.A.'s review of drugs that may appear to provide few benefits over existing medicines.

One such case might be Sparlon, a drug for attention deficit disorder developed by Cephalon. Sparlon is a higher-dose version of Provigil, an alertness drug from Cephalon that was approved in 1998.

An F.D.A. advisory panel voted 12 to 1 in March that Sparlon's safety risks were too great to merit approval. Of particular concern was a suspected case of Stevens-Johnson Syndrome, a rare but potentially fatal blistering of the skin that can be caused by an allergic reaction to a drug.

But the boy who supposedly had the syndrome was never hospitalized, and Cephalon subsequently submitted evidence it said conclusively showed that the boy had a different skin condition caused by a virus.

Even so, in August the F.D.A. rejected Sparlon.

"It's amazing to all of us that a single case of a bad rash that the experts have said is not Stevens-Johnson Syndrome would yield a result from the F.D.A. of a nonapprovable letter," Frank Baldino Jr., Cephalon's chief executive, said in a conference call with analysts. He said the company would drop the drug because approval hurdles were too high.

Mr. Loss of Washington Analysis said Cephalon had not shown that Sparlon was indispensable, given other drugs on the market. So even if there were only a slight chance of a fatal side effect, he said, "why would the F.D.A. take a risk like that?"

More Clout Sought For Social Studies In U.S. Law (WP)

By Ian Shapira

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

RICHMOND -- With unprecedented requirements for annual testing in reading and math, a 2002 federal law put a premium on student achievement in those subjects. But some Virginia educators contend that No Child Left Behind has left a vital field behind: social studies.

This week, the Virginia Consortium of Social Studies Specialists and College Educators launched a campaign here to get its educational niche a more prominent place in the law as Congress begins to consider revisions in the coming year. The group aims to include social studies test scores in federal formulas used to rate schools.

As the law now stands, the group said Tuesday, subjects such as history, government and geography sometimes get short shrift while schools increase time spent on reading and math.

"[We] feel that it's time to speak out to emphasize the role that social studies plays in the education of the total student," said Terry LaRocco, a social studies curriculum coordinator for a Roanoke Valley school system who is president of the consortium. "Our society is neglecting skills and content that teach students about how they have been shaped by their past and their social environment, and how their history and society will impact their future."

The group's members, including many social studies department heads from Northern Virginia school districts, contend that the federal law has led elementary and middle schools to reduce social studies lesson time. They also said many teachers have been given less time to prepare students for state social studies tests because those assessments are not factored into the federal ratings.

"Principals tend to schedule us first because they don't think we need as much time to prepare and because the other areas might be interpreted to be more important" in the federal ratings, said William F. Brazier, Loudoun County's social science instructional supervisor. "What we're concerned about is the message that might be interpreted within the school."

Some national data support the group's argument.

The Center on Education Policy, based in the District, reported in March that elementary schools have reduced instructional time for subjects other than reading and math in 71 percent of school districts surveyed.

Social studies lessons were cut the most, according to the survey. One-third of the districts reported that elementary schools have reduced social studies instructional time "somewhat" or to "a great extent."

The U.S. Department of Education said school systems are free to decide how to structure their lesson time. "We think that all subjects are important," said department spokeswoman Jo Ann Webb, "but I think it's certainly important to note that if a child doesn't learn to read well and comprehend what he or she is reading, then [the student] cannot possibly do well in other subjects."

DOJ_NMG_0071000

The law requires testing of all students in reading and math in grades 3 through 8 and once in high school. Starting with the 2007-08 school year, schools also will be required to test students in science.

Some social studies experts fear that their field will lose money if it is not included in the federal mandates.

Judy McConville, a curriculum specialist for Alexandria schools, said a recent federal grant of nearly $1 million has helped train local social studies teachers. But that money soon will dry up, and McConville worries about whether another funding source will emerge.

"Someone said to me, 'Are you going to apply for another grant?' and I said, 'It's easier said than done' " McConville said. "I can apply, but it's so difficult to get one."

As Congress Wraps Up, Pandering Warps Policy (USAT)

USA Today, September 29, 2006

Members of Congress are heading for the exits and the campaign trail to spend the next five weeks trying to convince voters they should be allowed to keep their jobs. Their record is thin. Lawmakers left much undone — a promised ethics overhaul went nowhere, the minimum wage was unchanged and nearly all of the spending bills that keep the government running after Saturday are incomplete. What they did this week instead — on terror suspects, on immigration and on guns — reflected a greater desire to cater to powerful interests, or to look tough on issues that deserved far more thought and care, than to produce sound public policy.

OTHER NEWS:

U.S. Economy: Second-Quarter Growth Is Revised Lower (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Joe Richter

Bloomberg, September 29, 2006

By Joe Richter

Sept. 28 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. economy grew at an annual rate of 2.6 percent in the second quarter, less than previously estimated, as business spending, consumer demand and homebuilding slowed.

The gain in gross domestic product, the value of all goods and services produced in the country, compares with the Commerce Department's previous estimate of 2.9 percent and 5.6 percent in the first quarter.

The report shows that Federal Reserve policy makers made the right decision when they ended two years of interest-rate increases in June, economists said. The lower borrowing costs since then, combined with a 15 percent decline in the price of crude oil, may keep consumers spending and economic growth from unraveling further.

``This report is consistent with the Fed's view that the economy is slowing," said Nigel Gault, director of U.S. research at Global Insight Inc. in Lexington, Massachusetts. ``The decline in energy prices reduces the risk that housing will drag the whole economy down with it, so I think the Fed will be more comfortable staying where they are on interest rates for some time."

The slowdown in economic growth hasn't resulted in more firings, a separate government report showed. Initial jobless claims declined 6,000 last week to 316,000, the Labor Department said today in Washington.

Limited Hiring

Sales are strong enough to prompt companies to keep current staff on payrolls even as a slower pace of growth limits hiring. The Conference Board said today that its index of help-wanted advertising in U.S. newspapers fell to a 45-year low.

Stocks rose for a fourth day, briefly pushing the Dow Jones Industrial Average above its record closing level. The Dow Jones average closed up 29.21, or 0.3 percent, to 11,718.45. The yield on the benchmark 10-year U.S. Treasury note rose 1 basis point to 4.61 percent. A basis point is 0.01 percentage point.

Today's GDP estimate is the government's last for the quarter. Economists estimated the economy grew at a 2.9 percent annual rate last quarter, according to the median of 69 forecasts in a Bloomberg News survey.

DOJ_NMG_0071001

Economic growth will probably average an annual rate of 2 percent to 2.5 percent in this year's second half, Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank President Thomas Hoenig said in a speech yesterday. Inflation ``will come down" as the economy cools, he said. During a Sept. 15 speech in Colorado, Hoenig said he expected the economy to grow 2.5 percent to 3 percent in the second half.

``There's certainly nothing to get worried about going into 2007," said Michael Darda, chief economist at MKM Partners, in an interview. ``I think we are going to have good growth."

The government's personal consumption expenditures price index excluding food and energy, a measure of prices tied to consumer spending and favored by Fed policy makers, rose at a 2.7 percent annual rate, less than the 2.8 percent pace reported last month. That followed a 2.1 percent first-quarter rise.

Home construction fell at an annual rate of 11.1 percent last quarter, the biggest decline since the second quarter of 1995, the Commerce Department's report showed. That compares with a 9.8 percent drop reported last month and a 0.3 percent decline the first three months of 2006.

Reports this month suggest the housing slump is deepening as the supply of unsold homes swells. Sales of previously owned homes in the U.S. fell in August to the lowest since early 2004, and prices fell from year-ago levels for the first time since 1995, the National Association of Realtors said this week. Housing starts fell to a three-year low in August.

The slowdown in housing may limit the cash consumers can obtain through mortgage refinancing and home equity loans, which have helped fuel household spending in the current expansion.

Consumer Spending Slows

Consumer spending, which accounts for more than two-thirds of the economy, expanded at a 2.6 percent annual pace, the same as reported last month and down from a 4.8 percent gain in the first quarter.

Spending will rise at a 3 percent rate this quarter before falling to a 2.6 percent pace in the first half of next year, according to economists surveyed by Bloomberg News this month. The economy will expand at an annual rate of 2.6 percent in the fourth quarter, down from an average of 4.1 percent in the first half, the survey showed.

``We all knew housing would be a drag on economic growth, but no one expected energy prices to fall," said Michael Gregory, a senior economist at BMO Capital Markets in Toronto. ``The bar was set very low for the consumer for the second half, but we may still have a decent holiday shopping season assuming energy prices stay down."

Gasoline Prices

A gallon of regular gasoline at the pump cost $2.38 this week, down from an average of $2.85 in the second three months of the year, U.S. Energy Department figures show.

The International Council of Shopping Centers this week boosted its September sales forecast. The retail trade group projected an increase of at least 4 percent at stores open a year or more, up from its previous forecast of 3.5 percent gain.

Confidence among U.S. consumers rebounded more than forecast in September from a nine-month low, a report from the New York-based Conference Board showed. Almost one in three Americans said lower fuel prices have allowed them to spend more on other goods, according to a recent Bloomberg/Los Angeles Times survey.

``The economy should continue to grow at a robust pace in 2007 and beyond," in part because ``the weakness in the housing sector does not seem to be spreading to other sectors of the economy," Edward Lazear, chairman of the White House's Council of Economic Advisers, said in testimony today to the Senate Budget Committee. The recent decline in energy prices will help ``moderate" inflation, he said.

Corporate Profits

The Commerce Department also said that second-quarter profits rose 0.3 percent from the first quarter. In the 12 months ended in June, profits were up 17.4 percent.

Midland, Michigan-based Dow Chemical Co., world's second- biggest chemical company, expects to sustain growth rates in the U.S. and Europe as those economies experience a ``soft landing," Chief Executive Andrew Liveris in an interview.

Profitability will improve thanks to the falling price of crude oil, Liveris said yesterday at a groundbreaking ceremony for a plant it is building with Germany's BASF AG in Antwerp, Belgium.

DOJ_NMG_0071002

Companies added to stockpiles at a $53.7 billion annual rate last quarter after adding to inventories at a $41.2 billion pace in the first three months of the year. Inventories added 0.44 percentage point to GDP.

Business fixed investment, which includes spending on commercial construction as well as equipment and software, grew at a annual rate of 4.4 percent in the second quarter, compared with a 4.7 percent gain reported last month and a 13.7 percent increase the first three months of the year.

Business Spending

Spending on equipment and software fell at an annual rate of 1.4 percent, the biggest drop since the end of 2002, revised from a 1.6 percent decline.

Investment in commercial building rose 20.3 percent, revised from a 22.2 percent increase reported earlier.

Government spending rose last quarter at an annual rate of 0.8 percent, compared with the 0.9 percent increase reported last month and a 4.9 percent first-quarter gain.

Trade added 0.42 percentage point to second-quarter growth instead of the 0.44 percentage point reported last month. Exports added 0.66 percentage point, more than the 0.54 percentage point previously reported.

Why Economists Track Firms' R&D (WSJ)

By Greg Ip And Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

That research and development makes an important contribution to U.S. economic growth has long been obvious. But in an important advance, the nation's economic scorekeepers declared they can now measure that contribution and found that it is increasing.

The new data, part of efforts to pinpoint the role of knowledge creation in Americans' well-being, helps to explain why the U.S. economy tends to expand faster than the contributions of capital and labor alone, a puzzle that has been the subject of Nobel Prize-winning research.

In the current system of measuring gross domestic product, R&D is treated like a so-called intermediate expense. For example, salaries paid to research scientists are lumped in with wages paid to assembly-line workers. Under the new approach developed by the Commerce Department's Bureau of Economic Analysis and the National Science Foundation, R&D spending is treated like capital investment, such as the cost of a machine tool or an office building. By that measure, R&D would have accounted for nearly 7% of growth from 1995 to 2002, up from a little more than 4% from 1959 to 1994. (The rest comes from an expanding work force, increased capital and other, unexplained factors.) That exceeds by a wide margin the 2% contribution of investment in buildings and factories during the 1959-2002 period.

Treating R&D as an investment would make the economy 3% larger and the national savings rate about two percentage points higher. "Our economy may be hundreds of billions of dollars larger than we currently calculate," said Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez.

Since the 1950s, economists have explained economic output as the result of measurable inputs. Any increase in output that can't be explained by capital and labor is called "multifactor productivity" or "the Solow residual," after Robert Solow, the Nobel Prize-winning economist considered the father of modern growth theory.

From 1959 to 2002, this factor accounted for about 20% of U.S. growth. From 1995 to 2002, when productivity growth accelerated sharply, that grew to about 33%. Accounting for R&D would explain about one-fifth, by some measures, of the productivity mystery. It suggests companies have been investing more than the official data had previously shown -- a good omen for future economic growth. "The slump in investment is not as drastic as people thought before they saw these figures," says Dale Jorgenson, professor of economics at Harvard University.

Mr. Jorgenson noted a lot of the multifactor productivity growth remains unexplained. "The great mystery of growth ... is not eliminated."

Paul Romer, an economics professor at Stanford Business School, said the better the measurements of R&D become, the more economists and policy makers will realize other factors may be more important. "If you look at why we had rapid productivity growth in big-box retailing, there were lots of intangibles and ideas that ... don't get recorded as R&D."

DOJ_NMG_0071003

BEA director Steve Landefeld said for now, GDP will continue to be measured in the typical way, but the agency plans to start including R&D regularly in 2012.

Separately, the BEA said GDP grew at a 2.6% annual rate in the second quarter, down from an estimated 2.9%, in part because businesses didn't boost their inventories as much. In another report, the Labor Department said the number of new claims for unemployment insurance fell by 6,000 last week to 316,000.

For A Moment, The Dow Was Above Its Record Close (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

By The Associated Press

The Dow Jones industrial average reached a milestone yesterday in Wall Street's nearly seven-year recovery from corporate upheaval, economic recession and terrorism, briefly trading above its record close of 11,722.98 set on Jan. 14, 2000.

The Dow index of 30 blue-chip stocks surpassed its record, rising to a high of 11,728.46 in early morning trading. Stocks closed only modestly higher amid a dearth of news that could motivate investors; still, it was the market's fourth straight advance.

"These numbers sometimes tend to act as magnets, and the market is sometimes pulled up toward it," said Russ Koesterich, senior portfolio manager at Barclays Global Investments in San Francisco.

The Dow rose 29.21 points, or 0.25 percent, to 11,718.45. It has yet to reach its record trading high of 11,750.28, also set Jan. 14, 2000.

The broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index and Nasdaq composite index are far off their record highs, although their peaks were reached around the same time as the Dow's.

The S.& P., which gained 2.56 points, or 0.19 percent, to close at 1,339.15, is still about 188 points below its closing high of 1,527.46, but is at its highest in five and a half years. The Nasdaq, which rose 6.63 points, or 0.29 percent, to 2,270.02, is still far below its record of 5,048.62.

The Dow, whose large-cap stocks range from the aluminum producer Alcoa to the discount retailer Wal-Mart Stores, was the first big index to recover because it did not rise as much in value as the S.& P. 500 or the Nasdaq in 2000.

Wall Street made its way back slowly from its 2002 lows, with investors behaving more cautiously and limiting their exposure to risk as they slowly regained faith in stocks. What has also helped is more than four years of sturdy corporate profit growth despite the threat that energy prices and interest rates would hurt consumer spending and corporate profits.

More recently, the Federal Reserve's decision to pause after more than two years of interest rate increases and evidence that the economy is moderating and not heading for a hard landing have given investors the impetus to push the Dow up.

Yesterday, the economic news was mixed and did not appear to have much impact on trading. The Commerce Department revised its gross domestic product number for spring to 2.6 percent from 2.9 percent.

Meanwhile, the Labor Department reported that the number of new people signing up for unemployment benefits dropped last week. The department said new applications filed for unemployment insurance declined by a seasonally adjusted 6,000, to 316,000, for the workweek ended Sept. 23. The latest showing on claims was close to economists' expectations that claims would total around 315,000 last week.

Bond prices fell, with the yield on the 10-year Treasury note at 4.61 percent, up from 4.60 percent. The price, which moves in the opposite direction from the yield, fell 4/32, to 1022/32. The dollar rose against other major currencies. Gold prices also rose.

Crude oil futures fell. A barrel of light crude settled at $62.76, down 20 cents.

In corporate news, General Motors rose 78 cents, to $33.06, after the dissident shareholder Kirk Kerkorian told G.M. that he was interested in buying up to 12 million more shares of the company as he pressed it to enter a three-way alliance with Renault and Nissan.

Hewlett-Packard, which is drawing scrutiny from Congress over a corporate spying investigation, rose 58 cents, to $35.97, after the company announced the resignation of its general counsel, Ann O. Baskins.

Following are the results of yesterday's auction of four-week Treasury bills:

DOJ_NMG_0071004

Dow Industrials Flirt With Peak On Latest Climb (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay, Scott Patterson And Karen Richardson

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average bypassed its high within minutes of the market open, then again near the close, but trimmed its gains to finish shy of the record.

The indicator, which tracks 30 blue-chip companies, posted an intraday high of 11728.46, up 5.48 points from its January 2000 peak. But on the day, the Dow industrials finished up 29.21 points, or 0.29%, at 11718.45, up 9.3% on the year.

Among the Dow average's strongest components were Caterpillar and General Motors. GM rose after Kirk Kerkorian's Tracinda, which owns 9.9% of GM's shares outstanding, said it was considering purchasing as many as 12 million more shares of the auto maker. Tracinda also said it supports an alliance between GM and Renault-Nissan.

However, the three names with the biggest influence weightings in the price-weighted Dow industrial average -- International Business Machines, Altria Group and Boeing -- all finished the day off less than 0.5%. Even modest gains at one or two of those companies would have sent the Dow industrial average over its record, which now stands just 4.53 points away, at 11722.98.

"The Dow is teasing everybody right now," said Kenneth Tower, chief market strategist at the online-brokerage firm CyberTrader.

Analysts said investors are looking for selling opportunities around the Dow's highs, making it tough for the average to sustain its momentum. In the past two days, each time the industrials have neared the record, they have fallen back.

"It's not uncommon to see sell programs hit when an industry benchmark is around a new high," said Barry Hyman, equity-market strategist at EKN Financial Services.

Mr. Hyman also noted that some investors are likely growing wary of a rally that has lasted since mid-July amid a steady decline in energy prices and interest rates. "Enjoy it while it's here, but let's be aware that there are still risks in the market," he said.

Other stock indexes rallied on the day. The broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rallied 0.19%, or 2.56 points, to 1339.15, up 7.3% on the year. And the tech-stuffed Nasdaq Composite Index gained 0.29%, or 6.63 points, to end at 2270.02, up 2.9% on the year.

Fresh economic data were mildly surprising but did little to move stocks either way, analysts said. The Commerce Department revised its estimate of second-quarter growth in gross domestic product, which measures the value of all goods and services produced in the U.S., downward 2.6% from 2.9%. First-quarter GDP was 5.6%.

The Labor Department said the number of initial jobless claims fell by 6,000 claims last week to a seasonally adjusted total of 316,000. The drop was greater than Wall Street's expectation of a 3,000-claim decline, signaling continuing strength in the job market.

Bond prices fell -- the sort of development that is often a sign of rising inflation fears. But analysts said the day's pullback was an exception to a broader trend recently in which Treasury investors have bid up government debt and pushed yields lower, belying expectations that seem at odds with those of stock investors hoping for a sh ort-lived economic slowdown.

Oil prices fell slightly as supply concerns eased. The November contract slipped 20 cents, or 0.32%, to $62.76 a barrel at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Outside the U.S., stocks rose in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, added 0.13%, or 0.28 point, to 220.15.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.34 billion shares, as 1,756 stocks advanced and 1,554 fell.

Bond prices fell: The 10-year note shed 4/32 point, pushing the yield down to 4.618%. The 30-year bond fell 9/32 to yield 4.76%.

DOJ_NMG_0071005

The dollar was mixed. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 117.77 yen, up from 117.5 yen. The euro rose to $1.2706, compared with 1.2703.

Riding The Beast As Stocks Near A High, Pressure Builds For A Professional Investor (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

As the Dow Jones Industrial Average flirts with a record high, Jon Brorson is sitting at the base of what professional investors call "a wall of worry."

Mr. Brorson, a Chicago money manager with $2.3 billion under his supervision, is one of many doubters who stayed on the sidelines as the market marched ahead this summer. Now the Dow is up 9% in just over two months, within five points of its record closing high of 11722.98 after briefly crossing it yesterday. Investors like Mr. Brorson figure others are driving it too high, setting it up for a fall. They've been expecting a slowing economy to shrink corporate profits and lead to a pullback.

Oddly, these doubters are part of the dynamic that has let the market do well.

When the Dow hit its record in January 2000, most pros cheered it on. This time, many have been skeptical. The market's recent gains are based largely on hopes the Federal Reserve's interest-rate management will slow the economy enough to prevent inflation without making companies and consumers suffer. But investors with a different view worry that the Fed rarely has been able to raise interest rates without serious economic consequences.

So far, these skeptics have been outvoted. As stocks have risen, they've seen their holdings suffer -- slowly prompting more and more to throw in the towel and buy the kinds of stocks that benefit from a resilient economy. The gradual conversion of skeptics into stock-buying bulls has provided the fuel for gains. Hence, the cliché: A steadily rising market often "climbs a wall of worry."

Mr. Brorson's worries served him in May. Then, he shifted toward "defensive" companies whose sales tend to hold up in all kinds of economies, such as drug makers, food producers and electric utilities. His May move was gutsy -- and right. The Dow got to within 81 points of its record and then fell 8% into July.

Now, as it rises, he's fighting the trend again. Doing so keeps him up at night and, his wife says, makes him irritable. His travails over the past two months show just how hard it is even for dedicated pros to call the turns. It's especially hard at times like these when investors are debating whether a shifting economy will change stocks' direction.

"I am wiped out when I get home each day," says Mr. Brorson. He's typically in bed by 9 p.m.

Managing money has been his dream since high school, when he first began buying stocks. But at Northern Trust Corp., a big financial group in Chicago that caters to the wealthy, he initially was passed over for an investment job. He was so annoyed he demanded to know why he didn't get it. He got the next one.

After leaving Northern Trust in 1990 to set up his own firm, he was lured back to run most of Northern Trust's mutual funds. His ability to anticipate market shifts helped him weather the post-bubble bear market of 2000-02 better than many. By 2002, headhunters were calling.

A Sunday-school teacher for 23 years at his Scandinavian church, Mr. Brorson is a buttoned-down 49-year-old. He is a Midwest conservative down to his black shoes with a banker's cap toe, which he repeatedly ties and reties in the office when he's nervous. His suit is often a navy blue with pinstripes. "Sloppy dress means sloppy work, a sloppy mind," he says. But Mr. Brorson also has a flair for adventure, dog-sledding in Michigan's Upper Peninsula and kayaking in the Baltic Sea with his Swedish cousins.

He attacks the workday, rising at 4:50 a.m. and, after showering and praying, riding a crowded double-decker train. To be one of the first off, he sits on its stairs, his briefcase jammed behind him as he races through two newspapers.

In late 2002, Mr. Brorson and his team quit Northern Trust for money-management firm Neuberger Berman. The switch meant more pay and independence, but big-time pressure. The main goal in his old job had been to protect assets. But Neuberger Berman, now part of Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., is determined to outdo the competition. It had fired his predecessor just before Christmas that year for being behind the curve. "The mindset is 180 degrees different," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0071006

Mr. Brorson sets the direction for a variety of investment accounts including three mutual funds, letting portfolio managers pick most of the individual stocks. For three years, his team rode what proved to be a resurgent market, mostly staying ahead of the pack. But early this year, he got worried. A string of Fed interest-rate boosts was putting a drag on the economy, as were high oil prices. Yields of 10-year Treasury bonds had pushed above 5%, pulling mortgage rates up. Consumers showed signs of restraining their borrowing and spending.

Pulling out of a winning bet is one of the hardest things for investment pros to do. It means selling your strongest positions while others are buying and prices are high. Yet if you wait for stock prices to weaken, it may be too late. Mr. Brorson's stomach churned as he cut back on stocks tied to economic strength, such as copper company Phelps Dodge and aircraft maker Boeing, and shifted into "defensive" ones such as Coca-Cola.

"It is hard to kick out the girl that brought you to the dance and go over to Bertha," Mr. Brorson says.

When the market cracked in mid-May, he was exultant, as his move to caution had put him ahead of the more-bullish competition.

By August, he was newly queasy. The Dow was up 4% since a mid-July low -- and he was still with Bertha. Sitting in his office at 6:50 a.m. one day, he found himself nervously plowing through dozens of emailed analyst reports, scrolling through the headlines on his Bloomberg terminal, preparing to take calls from analysts and casting an eye toward the commentators on CNBC.

To do his job, he immerses himself in the market -- the data, the commentary, the moves of various stocks and indexes. One computer screen is on his desk in front of him, and two others, for email and for charts, on a credenza behind him. Most days he skips breakfast and lunch, munching on nuts, raisins and bananas and drinking coffee and water.

That Monday in the middle of August, the market wasn't going his way. The Dow had been down the Friday before, in line with his expectation, but now it was up 60 points, and his conservative stocks were trailing. With oil prices and mortgage rates by this time retreating, the market was betting on economic growth. More-speculative stocks linked to technology and consumer spending were leading. "We are giving back a lot of what we gained Friday," Mr. Brorson said, looking irritated.

CNBC reported that retailers, a group he had bet against, were rallying. "We knew that. Yup. Retailers are rallying," Mr. Brorson said. To process information, he regularly talks back to the TV screen, to his Bloomberg screen, or while listening to conference calls with his line muted.

Every morning, Mr. Brorson goes to the Web site of Morningstar, a mutual-fund research firm that compares funds to each other and to indexes. Thanks to his May move, in late August most of the funds still were ahead of the competition for the year, but slipping. He wanted to be able to report solid performance when the quarter ends today. "You don't want to bleed to death at the side of the road from getting nicked, but I am not going to change anything," he said. "What I am worried about is a more sustained move that goes up 15%-20% into December. We would have to react to that."

He believed the upturn wouldn't last. Meanwhile, he had bet that demand would keep energy stocks rising, and had hung onto them. Now, softer oil prices were pulling energy stocks down.

Other pros were selling energy stocks, "taking profits," and putting the money in beaten-down tech and retailing shares. "Very rarely does a sector lead for three consecutive years. I know that. And this would be year three for energy," he said. "But I am maintaining my position."

Although he bases decisions on fundamentals, Mr. Brorson occasionally peeks at another side of the investing world, called technical analysis, which tracks trends in historical and other charts. As he put it: "One of the oldest sayings on Wall Street is, 'I am not a technician, but....' " He pulled out a chart of oil prices, worrying that it seemed to have peaked and started down.

Ken Turek, who oversees the group's biggest fund, and Spiro Voulgaris, who does its data analysis, had been pushing him with increasing urgency to cut back on energy. He was beginning to waver. But suddenly the tension eased. The day's rally faded, and his more-conservative investments recovered. CNBC reported the news. "We knew it would do that. We knew it," he told the TV screen.

Mr. Brorson encourages those around him to think independently. In a staff meeting, Mr. Voulgaris said profit forecasts were rising, suggesting a stronger economy. But Mr. Brorson figured any gains in tech stocks would be a chance to cut holdings in them even more. "I hate these things. If they show any sign of life, shoot 'em between the eyes and throw 'em overboard," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0071007

Over the next weeks, the market kept moving against Mr. Brorson. Economic reports reinforced hope the Fed was managing to cool the economy smoothly. The tech-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index was up 10% since mid-July. But rejecting colleagues' entreaties, Mr. Brorson was unwilling to buy more tech or retail stocks.

By mid-September, the stress was intense. Exxon Mobil, a big holding, was off almost 9% from an August high. "We had a lousy August and we are coming up to the end of the quarter," Mr. Brorson said. "I want to see some butt-kicking. Where is the butt-kicking?"

One thing buoying the market, Mr. Voulgaris noted, was that investment pros who were still trailing the indexes they were measured against felt pressure to buy the currently hot stocks before the quarter's end.

Mr. Turek walked in, and said some of his best stocks were the tech and retailing ones Mr. Brorson had asked him to sell, while some of his worst were the energy stocks Mr. Brorson liked. Displaying a downward-sloping chart, Mr. Turek asked, "If that were a stock, what would you do with it?" Then he showed a chart of consumer stocks such as retailers. Its angle was upward.

"Son of a buck," Mr. Brorson said, the closest he comes to swearing. "Dang it."

Mr. Brorson rechecked which sectors were leading -- something he'd been doing almost every hour. Financials and health care, two of his favorites, were OK. Then he saw tech and retailing stocks pulling back a bit. He took a deep breath and relaxed. "You don't have to swing at every pitch," he said. As the market sank to a close, he untied the shoelaces he has been tying and retying all day.

But the day ended with his energy stocks still suffering. "Crap and a half. It was a stinking, frustrating day," he said.

At 2:30 a.m. that night, unable to sleep, he says, he went to the living room and read some of "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

The next day, the stress got worse.

"Today the Dow could be very close to making a new high that could break this wide open," he said. It was at 11580, less than 150 points from a record. He turned up CNBC. "There is a lot of optimism here on the floor," said a commentator.

"They are just a bunch of sheep," Mr. Brorson told the TV. He pulled out a stock chart and began drawing horizontal lines across its peaks and valleys. The work suggested the indexes were pushing back toward old highs. "Jeez," he said.

"We're on a record-high watch for the Dow," said a cheery CNBC announcer.

"Time to sell. Time to sell," muttered Mr. Brorson.

Yet within days, he had shifted his bet. He told associates he had made a classic mistake of staying too long with a winner: energy stocks. "I should have sold out when Ken wanted me to and Spiro wanted me to. So let's close the barn door when there is still a part of the horse left," he said.

They debated where to put the cash. Still expecting a weaker economy, Mr. Brorson wanted defensive stocks such as makers of food and household products. Mr. Voulgaris disagreed. "History suggests that headwinds haven't slowed the consumer in the past," he said, adding that auto-industry cutbacks, paradoxically, would put more money in people's pockets as they took buyouts. The staff compromised and spread the cash around, to stocks they already owned.

Mr. Brorson knows that if the market keeps defying his expectations, he will at some point be forced to start buying the winners, or risk falling behind. "I do believe we are at the midpoint in a much more elongated cycle, where China will be spending money to support the 2008 Olympics," he said. But he didn't want to position himself for that yet.

In a belief that quarterly profits, due out in October, could disappoint, he and his colleagues agreed late this month they won't chase the tech and consumer stocks. But they reminded themselves that, in the fourth quarter, technology often is a leading group. Their expectation: Techs will pull back after earnings reports; then they'll be prepared to buy.

The goal, Mr. Brorson repeatedly reminds himself, isn't to be right, it's to own winning stocks. "It is not a moral thing, about who is right and who is wrong," he said. "It is just money and we are paid to make it grow."

Hold Your Breath (WSJ)

By Vanessa O'Connell

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0071008

The Dow industrials finished a whisper away from a record close yesterday, and investors can thank the world's smokers and a few sympathetic judges for helping.

Among the Dow's 30 components, the best-performing stock in the past six years -- and one of the three biggest contributors to the average's gains -- is Altria Group, parent company of Philip Morris USA, the nation's largest cigarette maker.

Since January 2000, when the industrials hit their record of 11722.98, Altria's share price has increased by more than a factor of three, from $24 a share to $76.97.

But events this week suggest it might not keep marching higher.

The big factor behind Altria's rally has been a string of legal victories in some once ominous-seeming antitobacco lawsuits brought by smokers and the U.S. Justice Department. The victories seemed to set the stage for Altria to spin off its 88%-owned Kraft Foods Inc. unit, the biggest food company in the U.S.

Spinning off Kraft was impossible when Philip Morris was under the shadow of so much litigation, because Altria could have been accused of transferring assets in order to avoid paying cigarette plaintiffs.

Philip Morris's strategy of challenging nearly every judgment against it has paid off. Many large plaintiff awards have been reduced on appeal, and the higher courts have ruled that some cases can't be treated as class actions. That has Altria investors clamoring for the long-sought corporate breakup.

A Kraft spinoff would allow the maker of Oreo cookies and Velveeta cheese to trade without being weighed down by uncertainty over the long-term prospects of the tobacco business. A new chief executive officer took charge of Kraft this summer, seeming to set the stage for a spinoff, something investors thought might be announced at the company's approaching Oct. 25 board meeting.

Now it looks like they'll have to wait longer. This week, a federal judge granted class-action status to tens of millions of smokers of "light cigarettes" -- exposing tobacco companies to a new $200 billion legal claim. The tobacco companies vow to appeal. But in the meantime, another Kraft-spinoff delay seems likely.

So investors will need to keep holding their breath ... for the Dow industrials and the Altria restructuring they've been waiting for.

How Great Dow Art (USAT)

USA Today, September 29, 2006

It's easy to pooh-pooh the significance of the Dow Jones Industrial Average's near record high on Thursday. With only 30 stocks, the Dow is a much narrower gauge of investor sentiment than indexes such as the Standard & Poor's 500 or the Nasdaq composite, both of which have a long way to go yet to climb back to their previous peaks. And, adjusted for inflation, the Dow would have to get above 13,000 to match the mark of 11,722.98 set on Jan. 14, 2000.

Yeah, yeah, yeah. This is all duly noted. But admit it. It feels good to be all the way back, or at least almost all the way back. Especially if you jumped into the market at the tail end of the past decade's bubble, causing family members and friends to question your investment acumen.

The energy crises and inflation of the 1970s caused a stock market malaise that lasted more than a decade. The Great Depression depressed the Dow's 1929 highs until the mid-1950s.

This time, it has taken just six years. In that period the market has worked off the excesses of the 1990s, when companies with few assets beyond their swell ideas were deemed to be worth billions of dollars. It has also rebounded from a terror attack, a recession, corporate scandals, volatile energy prices, wars and much more. After all that, it now sports a sunny optimism and has been spotted brazenly flirting with a new high.

Call it rational exuberance.

The Dow is rising because the companies within it are getting bigger, more efficient, more technologically savvy and — above all — more profitable. According to the Commerce Department, corporate profits have doubled since 2000. That means that, despite the recent run-up in stock prices, they still look a lot more reasonably priced than they did in 2000.

For all we know, the market will take a tumble some time soon, maybe even today. There are a thousand reasons why this could happen — the sagging housing market, the cooling economy, world events and terrorism, to name a few.

But, sooner or later, it will come back. The American economy and its capital markets are extraordinarily resilient. For all that is wrong with executive pay, ethical lapses on Wall Street and reckless government spending, U.S. capitalism is still the envy of the world, and companies in the Dow index are some of the best investments in it.

The Dow isn't everything. But it's a good indicator of a great country with a powerful economy. And maybe, just maybe, it is saying more than we think. For at least a day, it's OK again to party like it's 1999.

Doha Collapse Threatens US Farm Reform (FT)

By Alan Beattie

Financial Times, September 29, 2006

Another casualty of the suspension of the Doha round of global trade talks could be the long-awaited reform of American farm subsidies. Reformers are worried that the absence of Doha as an incentive to change will tip the balance back towards the expensive and inefficient status quo.

The current five-year US subsidy regime or "farm bill", generous even by US standards, was signed in 2002 and will expire next year.

The Bush administration tried without much success to use the upcoming farm bill renewal to exact concessions from its negotiating partners in the Doha round, saying it could be their last chance for five years to influence the reform of US subsidies.

It is now appealing to Congress and the farm lobby to heed advice about trade rules and particularly the threat of litigation in the World Trade Organisation while writing the new farm bill. It is not an utterly hopeless task, but only an inveterate optimist would be confident of success.

Given how removed they now are from their original intent, American farm subsidies are remarkably resistant to reform. When created as a relief programme for embattled farmers during the Great Depression, the regime spread support by stabilising prices of a small number of "programme commodity" crops, including wheat, rice, corn, cotton and soy, of which most small farmers then grew at least one.

Those crops are now grown on a much smaller number of mainly large mechanised farms. Today 93 per cent of subsidies (an estimated $21bn this year) go to the programme crops, while 60 per cent of American farmers get no such support at all. Farmers of higher-value crops such as fruit and vegetables, who want help with research and development rather than straight payouts, remain largely unsupported – even though US horticulture now grows nearly $50bn worth of produce a year, more than all the programme commodity crops put together.

A report published this week by the Chicago Council on Global Affairs put the case for switching farm spending towards conservation programmes and helping to protect all farmers from fluctuating income, not picking out a few favoured commodities.

Cal Dooley, president of the pro-reform Food Products Association and former California congressman, said that a coalition including environmentalists, anti-subsidy development charities such as Oxfam and neglected farmers in areas such as horticulture, wine and livestock would need to come together to effect change.

But groups of commodity farmers with a strong voice in lobbies such as the nationwide American Farm Bureau Federation have so far successfully resisted large-scale reform, and the suspension of Doha has strengthened their hand.

A successful conclusion to Doha would reduce trade-distorting subsidies such as the programme commodity payments, which are often linked to production, in return for opening agricultural export markets abroad. The US has already offered in the Doha talks to reduce the ceiling for trade-distorting subsidies by 60 per cent. But testifying to Congress last week, Bob Stallman, president of the AFBF (which claims it represents all farmers) called for the current farm bill to be extended in its current form. "Altering our farm programmes now to reduce supports by 60 per cent, just in case that is what is including in the final [Doha] agreement, makes no sense," he said.

Charles Grassley, senator for corn-growing Iowa and chairman of the Senate finance committee, which oversees trade policy, told the FT that without a swift advance in Doha, "we will have a farm bill looking the same way it has looked for the past six years".

DOJ_NMG_0071010

For campaigners this is a grim prospect. Ken Cook, head of the Environmental Working Group, which campaigns for farm subsidies to be redirected to conservation, says the Bush administration could well repeat the fiasco of the 2002 farm bill when it was forced meekly to abandon its own reform-minded draft bill in favour of a more traditional and generous version.

Mike Johanns, the agriculture secretary, insists that change is possible. “There isn't any one group any more that controls the dialogue,” he told the FT this week. “This farm bill has worked well for some commodities and for others it has not worked at all.” The Farm Bureau and others supported a renewal of the current bill, he said, but noted that “there are farm lobbies that disagree with that”. Mr Johanns has also repeatedly warned that Brazil's recent successful legal challenge to US cotton subsidies at the WTO could be repeated across a range of programme commodities, with rice subsidies a prime candidate.

But Mr Stallman last week argued: “To alter farm programmes now because a country might file a case against our farm programmes . . . is not a good reason to alter current farm policy.”

Robert Thompson, professor of agricultural policy at the University of Illinois and co-chair of the Chicago Council report, wrote recently that the combination of overall federal budgetary pressures, the threat of litigation and public disquiet over the inefficiency of farm subsidies were all arguments for change.

But overall he expected inertia to win out. “If I were a betting person,” Prof Thompson said, “I would wager that the 2007 farm bill will look a lot like the 2002 farm bill.”

Risky Mortgages Threaten A Squeeze (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, September 29, 2006

A great shift toward adjustable mortgages helped push America's housing boom into high gear. Now, as the boom unwinds, the riskier side of those mortgages is coming home to roost.

The ultimate impact of all those "teaser" interest rates, the "no money down" mortgages, and exotic loans where homeowners' debt can rise over time will be muted somewhat, economists say, because it will be spread over the rest of this decade.

But that doesn't necessarily mean the mortgage shakeout will be easy. And for many individual borrowers, finance experts say, the sad result will be foreclosure.

"We just really don't have any precedent to say, 'This is how bad it can get,' " says Rick Sharga of RealtyTrac, which follows trends in foreclosure. "The homeowner who stretched to buy a house in the first place could find himself or herself in very serious financial trouble very quickly."

Economists generally don't believe the soaring popularity of "exotic" or nontraditional mortgages since 2004 will cause the kind of problems that push the nation into a recession. But foreclosure rates are already rising, and federal regulators are moving to develop new rules in a bid to keep banks from making loans to people who can't pay.

At the very least, routine shifts like the phaseout of "teaser" interest rates will crimp the purchasing power of many borrowers, sucking some momentum out of a consumer-led US economy.

It's the down side of what for years has been viewed as a positive trend: Ever-expanding choices in the realm of mortgage financing have helped millions of borrowers and boosted homeownership to record levels nationwide.

In 1990, the last time the nation was entering a real estate slowdown, less than 10 percent of home loans were ARMs, adjustable-rate mortgages. For the first half of this year, that number is 46 percent of the total, measured in dollar volume, says Richard Brown, chief economist at the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp.

Of all the adjustable-rate loans, 63 percent of them this year have been nontraditional: either "interest only" loans (it's up to the buyer whether to pay any principal to build home equity) or "option ARMs," which give borrowers a choice of several possible payments each month. Even fixed-rate loans today can be "interest only."

The biggest trouble lies with the adjustable loans that begin with artificially low interest rates. Those rates may only last for a month, a year, or two years, and then comes a "payment shock" as the rates reset in ways that can double the required payments.

DOJ_NMG_0071011

Earlier this year, an analysis by First American Real Estate Solutions in Santa Ana, Calif., estimated that $368 billion in adjustable-rate mortgages originated in 2004 and 2005 are at risk of default because of this pattern. Many more borrowers with traditional ARM loans also face the prospect of rising interest rates, but of a more manageable magnitude.

"This translates into ... 1.8 million families that are at risk as a result of the possibility of default and another 500,000 that are likely to go into foreclosure," Allen Fishbein of the Consumer Federation of America said last week at a Senate hearing on nontraditional mortgages.

Who is most at risk? Exotic loans have been rising nationwide, but are most prevalent in states such as California, Nevada, and Florida where home prices have been rising fastest. They are far less common in the Northeast or Midwest.

And while buyers at all income levels have been tempted - option ARMs were originally targeted at the wealthy in the 1980s - experts say families with modest or low incomes may be most at risk.

"A significant percentage of people taking out interest-only mortgages and option ARMs have credit scores below the median and incomes at median or below," Mr. Fishbein said in his testimony.

The challenges don't begin and end with the negative amortization loans. Many borrowers with poor credit resort to so-called hybrid ARMs that also rely initially on below-market rates.

Payment shocks will land hardest not simply on the states with the most exotic mortgages, experts say. Other key factors will be the trajectory of the economy and of the inventory of homes for sale in specific markets. In a worst-case scenario, many homeowners would simultaneously face a spike in their monthly payment and a decline in their home's value, so that it's harder to resell.

Recent trends, including numbers out this week, suggest that home prices are beginning to decline nationwide. It's rare for such a pattern to persist, but economists also say this housing downturn appears to be getting worse than the last one in the early 1990s.

"It will take more than five years to get housing valuations back to where they ought to be," Merrill Lynch economist Sheryl King writes in a recent report.

Experts on both the pessimistic side, such as Ms. King, and the optimistic side agree on one thing: The impact of the ARM adjustments will occur over several years.

That, along with what Dr. Brown says is a very healthy banking system, could mitigate any broader economic impact.

"It's a time release," says Christopher Cagan, who did the risk analysis at First American Real Estate Solutions. "It's not a single impact like Pearl Harbor."

Democratic Duo Brings Bravado To Party (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- At midsummer, when House Republicans announced nationwide hearings to showcase their hard line against illegal immigration, the chairmen of the Democratic House and Senate campaign committees quickly took up the gauntlet. They assembled reporters and news cameras to promote a report documenting a decline in border enforcement actions under the Bush administration.

"If congressional Republicans want to make immigration the centerpiece of their 2006 campaign," said New York Sen. Charles Schumer, alongside Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, "we've got three words for them: Make our day!"

Such bring-it-on bravado from the Democratic duo has been making for bad days for the beleaguered Republican majority in this midterm-election year.

Yet both men's drive to win has at times left fellow Democrats feeling run over. In their determination to elect more Democrats from moderate and conservative districts, they have antagonized some of the party's loyal, liberal blocs: antiwar liberals, women's groups, civil libertarians and -- by their tough talk on immigration -- Hispanic groups.

Yet even some of the foils agree: These two high-energy partisans with their sharp elbows and tongues, and no apparent need to be loved, are just what Democrats need to end their exile from power. "We haven't had that kind of Rove-ian ruthlessness in the party -- to do or say anything to win -- in a long time," says party consultant Jenny Backus.

DOJ_NMG_0071012

That suggests just how Democrats have come to see them: As a counter, finally, to President Bush's so-called architect, Karl Rove, melding policies and politics for electoral gain. Big-city liberals both -- 46-year-old Mr. Emanuel from Chicago's Daley machine and 55-year-old Mr. Schumer from Brooklyn -- they are nonetheless obsessed with winning back Reagan Democrats and others in the middle-class suburbs.

Both have pushed their roles beyond where previous campaign chiefs have gone, becoming not just candidate recruiters and fund-raisers, but message strategists as well.

They will be heroes if Democrats win majorities; if Democrats fall short, Mr. Schumer will still get credit, because expectations are lower for a Senate takeover. Mr. Emanuel has more to lose, given both higher expectations for House gains and the egos "Rahmbo" has bruised over time.

Even Republicans credit the men with expanding the field of competitive races. Both lobbied reluctant incumbents to seek another term, recruited credible challengers for Republican seats and ignored an unwritten rule against intervening in party primaries. Both sought moderates they felt could win in November, over liberals who appeal to party primary voters.

They didn't always prevail, and even where they did, the men's interference sometimes enraged local Democrats. In suburban Chicago, where the Democratic nominee is an Iraq veteran and double amputee Tammy Duckworth, 68-year-old Alice Doyle, a volunteer for a Duckworth rival in the primary, says, "I was so mad that Rahm Emanuel and the boys in Washington had chosen her." Now she concedes, "Tammy probably has a better chance" in the historically Republican district.

After Mr. Schumer helped recruit Pennsylvania state Treasurer Bob Casey Jr., an opponent of abortion rights, to challenge Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, feminist leader Kate Michelman confronted Mr. Schumer and, as a Pennsylvanian, weighed running against Mr. Casey. "I do not question his own commitment to women's rights and equality," she says of Mr. Schumer. "I do question the tactics from time to time." Still, she came to agree that by running, and splitting the Democratic vote, she would only help re-elect Mr. Santorum.

"I don't mind taking the flak," Mr. Schumer says. "This is a war. It's about time we Democrats won, and we" -- he and Mr. Emanuel -- "are trying to be the generals."

Both men have been equally aggressive at raising money. Each campaign committee had collected more than $80 million as of September, a record for Democrats. Mr. Schumer has swamped his Republican counterpart, North Carolina Sen. Elizabeth Dole, while Mr. Emanuel has nearly matched the House Republicans' campaign committee. But the Republican committees share about $60 million more from party Chairman Ken Mehlman, while the Democrats lack such aid from their party chairman, Howard Dean, spawning an intraparty cold war.

Tensions over the money issue flared publicly in May, when Mr. Emanuel bolted from the trio's summit in Mr. Dean's office. Mr. Dean has spent heavily on a "50-state program" for long-term party-building even in red states; the congressmen want funds targeted to states with hot races now. Other Democrats say both sides have a point, but refused to compromise. Recently Mr. Dean agreed to provide $12 million.

On the party's election-year message, Mr. Schumer has worked closely with Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada. While House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi tapped Mr. Emanuel for his job, their relationship has been more strained given his assertiveness and her liberal instincts. For more than a year, Democrats debated what platform to have for 2006, or whether to have one at all. Mr. Schumer was among those mostly content to bash Mr. Bush. "For us to put out a big range of ideas gives Republicans a target and gets the message off George Bush," he said in an interview as deliberations progressed.

But Mr. Emanuel, a former adviser to President Clinton, wanted an agenda. Paul Begala, a friend from their White House days, says, "We all learned under Clinton, it's just not enough to indict -- you have to offer an alternative." (Mr. Clinton has told audiences Mr. Emanuel was "my Karl Rove.")

When Mr. Emanuel appeared last October on NBC's "Meet the Press," host Tim Russert challenged him, "What are the Democratic ideas?" Mr. Emanuel rattled off five -- college aid, health care, a bipartisan budget summit, energy alternatives and a national technology institute. The "New Direction" agenda that Democrats announced last month roughly mirrors those points.

But he and Mr. Schumer sought to duck the year's big issue -- what to do in Iraq -- given party divisions and fears of Republican counterattacks. Instead, they have focused on what they perceive as administration mistakes and Congress's failure to provide any check.

DOJ_NMG_0071013

They are consumed by monitoring House and Senate votes for potential traps. In this week's votes on administration-supported legislation limiting terrorism suspects' legal rights, Democrats declined to try to block the bill for fear of being branded as soft on terror so close to an election. Similarly, though liberal groups earlier pressed Democrats to try to kill the Patriot Act, Mr. Schumer successfully argued for a compromise reauthorization.

But in February, Mr. Schumer set a trap of his own. Learning from a businessman that state-owned Dubai Ports World was near administration approval to operate six U.S. ports, he called a news conference to question the security implications. Republicans joined in to squelch the deal, over Mr. Bush's veto threat. Dubai Ports World withdrew its bid. Polls subsequently registered a dip in the president's ratings on national security.

When House Republicans passed their bill criminalizing illegal immigration months ago, Mr. Emanuel, himself a foe, was overheard urging vulnerable Democrats to vote for it. Hispanic groups were enraged. Rep. Luis Gutierrez, also of Chicago, sent him a scathing letter. "I'm not for taking a gun to someone's head and saying, 'You have to walk the plank for principle,'" Mr. Gutierrez says. "But when your leaders, with premeditation and threats, say, 'I want you to vote this way,' that's wrong."

More recently, Hispanics assailed Mr. Schumer's committee for a Web video about national security that mixed shots of Osama bin Laden with imagery of two people climbing a border fence. "This was over the top," says Lisa Navarrete, an official at the National Council of La Raza. The campaign committee removed the video.

In Close Races, Local Issues Still Dominate (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

MORGANTOWN, W.Va., Sept. 28 -- Spend nine days traveling through one of this year's most contested political regions and there is no mistaking the mood of voters: They are angry.

Nor is there any doubting the mood of incumbent politicians: They are anxious.

But it is a mistake to assume that anger and anxiety look and sound the same in these coveted precincts as they do in Washington.

The debates over Iraq and President Bush shadow virtually every competitive race, but they do not dominate the conversation -- which suits many Democrats just fine. This month's intense debate over policy toward terrorism detainees, meanwhile, carried hardly any echo at all.

Here is what has people talking in Kentucky's 3rd District: a new bridge over the Ohio River that would ease traffic for Louisville residents. In Indiana, voters are plenty steamed -- over the Republican governor's decision to privatize a toll road that runs through or near the seats of three embattled GOP representatives.

In Ohio's 6th District, visitors are likely to get an earful about what might be called earmark-envy: Why residents of neighboring West Virginia are getting a bigger slice of the federal budget pie.

The Washington Post logged a thousand miles traveling up the Ohio River Valley, where nine of the nation's most competitive House districts are clustered in a continuous line. The trip began in the tobacco fields of Kentucky and ended in this college town. Interviews with voters, candidates and operatives made plain why the old line about all politics being local is a truism: It really is true.

This is not to say the Ohio River Valley is insulated from national debates. They are clearly contributing to the uneasy mood evident in so many places along the dividing line of the upper South and industrial Midwest, even if that mood is often expressed in highly individualistic ways. Virtually every Republican candidate said they are concerned about what a sour electorate means for them on Nov. 7.

"I have never seen such anxiety," said Joy Padgett, a Republican running for the Ohio seat being vacated by GOP Congressman Robert W. Ney, who has pleaded guilty to corruption charges growing from the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal. "I believe that spills over onto the skepticism about virtually everything."

This free-floating angst, she lamented, is influencing attitudes about the economy, terrorism and politics in general.

DOJ_NMG_0071014

If voters' snappishness is unmistakable, its impact remains far from clear. Take Laurie Pitcock. She lives in Ney's district and said she is dismayed by Republican inaction on environmental issues and other matters. Even so, she said, "I am still proud to be a Republican."

Her reaction was a commonplace one in these nine districts -- people expressed disgust with the Republican leadership in Washington but not necessarily toward the Republicans representing them.

Against this ambiguous backdrop, Republicans and Democrats are pursuing two very different strategies in this region.

Republicans all seem to be reading out of the same playbook. To a person, they seek to localize the elections, and accuse Democrats of wanting to raise taxes and put liberals -- a bad word in these culturally conservative districts -- in charge of Congress. Voters are seeing a lot more of House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) in GOP-sponsored television ads than of President Bush.

The National Republican Congressional Committee, for instance, is hitting Democrat Brad Ellsworth -- an antiabortion and anti-gun-control candidate in Indiana's 8th District -- for helping support an "extreme liberal."

"How can he possibly stop their liberal agenda?" the NRCC asks in an ad blanketing the district. Similar ads are popping up in other races.

There is one hitch in this strategy. Unlike in some past elections, Democrats have picked the kinds of candidates who have shown that they can win in heartland districts. Their positions on abortion, same-sex marriage and other fault-line issues are often indistinguishable from Republicans'.

Ellsworth has jumped out to a double-digit lead over GOP Rep. John N. Hostettler while running ads that highlight his social conservatism. "I fit the district well," Ellsworth said when asked the secret of his success. "People appreciate my conservative values."

The Democratic strategy differs from district to district but features one common theme: a need for change.

That appeal takes many forms, but in the Ohio River Valley races it is focused especially on the nation's energy policies. Democrats argue that Republicans have sold out the country for campaign cash from oil and gas companies -- a move they say led to soaring prices at the pump.

"The government should not be subsidizing the most profitable corporations in the history of the world," said Cincinnati City Council member John Cranley, who is running against Rep. Steve Chabot (R). That argument might have been more effective, however, when gas prices were topping $3 a gallon. They have since dropped by almost a dollar in some places.

Particularly in the rural districts, Democrats and Republicans sound alike when discussing Iraq. They lament strategic errors but oppose a speedy withdrawal. But Democrats cite the war as evidence that a divided government is essential to imposing accountability on the White House.

In Kentucky, Ken Lucas, a former Democratic representative seeking to return to his old job, repeatedly criticizes first-term Rep. Geoff Davis (R) for voting with Bush more than 95 percent of time. "You can send a robot to vote the party line," Lucas said -- twice. Because the two candidates differ on few issues, Lucas said, his race is likely to come down to voters' desire to shake up Washington.

That anti-Washington message has real resonance in this part of the country, where anyone who carries a Washington aura -- including out-of-town reporters -- is viewed skeptically at first.

This is also a region where memories run long. Former Kentucky state Senate president Joe Prather is a case in point. Prather, the Democratic candidate in the 1994 special election in Kentucky's 2nd District, refused to be interviewed last week because of lingering resentment about a story written by The Post 12 years before that he believes cost him the seat in Congress. Mike Weaver, the Democratic candidate in this year's race in that district, said he did not much trust the Washington media either.

Though the campaigns have been jousting for months, it is clear in interviews that, six weeks before Election Day, most voters are just starting to tune in. Good luck to those who want to tune out. In Louisville, where the television market reaches into three competitive races, it is not uncommon while watching the evening news to see a cascade of political ads, uninterrupted by pitches for cars or soap.

DOJ_NMG_0071015

Back in Ohio, as in other places, the air wars have a partisan edge, often aimed at voters who insist this is not how they want elections to be waged. "I'd love to get beyond party lines and get things done," said voter Laurie Pitcock -- a wish not likely to be granted between now and Nov. 7.

Religious-Right Voter Guides Facing Challenge From Left (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

A new group called Catholics in Alliance for the Common Good said yesterday that it will distribute at least 1 million voter guides before the Nov. 7 elections, emphasizing church teachings on war, poverty and social justice as well as on abortion, contraception and homosexuality.

The 12-page booklet, called "Voting for the Common Good: A Practical Guide for Conscientious Catholics," is part of a broader effort by liberal and moderate religious groups to challenge the Christian right on moral values, said Alexia Kelley, the group's executive director and a former employee of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Secular groups such as the NAACP, the League of Women Voters and the Sierra Club have long published election-year guides to issues and candidates' positions. Since the conservative Christian Coalition began distributing voter guides in 1992, however, it has faced little or no competition from liberal or moderate religious organizations.

In Roman Catholic parishes, the group Catholic Answers, based in California, had the field largely to itself in 2004, when it distributed 10 million copies of its "Voter's Guide for Serious Catholics." This year, as in the past, the Catholic Answers guide urges Catholics to base their votes on five "non-negotiable" issues: abortion, euthanasia, embryonic stem cell research, human cloning and same-sex marriage.

"No one endorsing the wrong side of these issues can be said to act in accord with the Church's moral norms," it says.

The Common Good guide takes a different approach, saying: "In recent years some have suggested that we can answer this question [of how to vote] by applying a simple 'litmus test' of a few selected issues. But common sense tells us that deciding who to vote for is much more complicated."

Both guides are available on the Web sites of their respective producers, http://www.catholic.com and http://thecatholicalliance.org .

Quoting documents issued by the U.S. bishops conference, the Common Good guide outlines seven "key themes of Catholic social teaching" -- including "prioritizing the needs of the poor and vulnerable" -- and lists 18 "issues important to Catholics," including immigration, the environment, nuclear disarmament and workers' rights.

"Seldom does a single candidate or party offer a consistently Catholic set of positions," it says, adding that "we often must vote for candidates who may hold the 'wrong' Catholic positions on some issues in order to maximize the good our vote achieves in other areas."

Leading Catholic conservatives reacted to the new guide with disdain. Austin Ruse, president of the Catholic Family and Human Rights Institute in Washington, called it "a blatant attempt to convince Catholics that they can vote for candidates who are wrong on the primary human rights issue of our time, which is abortion."

The Rev. Joseph Fessio, provost of Ave Maria University in Naples, Fla., said it is "a flight into abstraction" that treats all issues as though they have the same weight. "Some issues are disqualifying issues. You don't vote for someone who kills babies. You don't vote for someone who destroys the family by supporting homosexual marriage," he said.

But the Rev. David Hollenbach, a professor of Catholic theology at Boston College, defended the guide. "If one were to decide the only thing that matters in the election is avoidance of war and not to look at abortion and poverty, that . . . would not wash, and vice versa," he said. "This cuts against people on both the left and the right."

In Protestant churches, the Christian Coalition's guides will face competition this year from "Voting God's Politics," a brochure produced by the liberal evangelical magazine Sojourners and the anti-poverty group Call to Renewal. Like the Common Good guide, it discusses issues, not individual candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0071016

"Even the term 'voter guide' has been so tainted by the religious right that people are afraid that ours is going to be just a left-wing version of theirs, a thinly camouflaged signal to vote for particular candidates," said Jim Wallis, editor of Sojourners. "Our guide levels the playing field; it makes clear that God is not a Republican or a Democrat."

In numbers, however, the battle of the voter guides is still not an even match. Sojourners has distributed 50,000 of its brochures and plans to print 150,000 more. Roberta Combs, president of the Christian Coalition, said her group will distribute "millions" of its guides, which she said it is now compiling, to candidates in key races.

Lieberman Leads Lamont In Connecticut Poll (AP)

The Associated Press, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Sen. John Kerry is ready to join an exclusive club: prominent Democrats shunning three-term Sen. Joe Lieberman to campaign in Connecticut for his anti-war rival Ned Lamont.

The Massachusetts senator, the party's 2004 presidential nominee, plans to travel to the state Oct. 25 for Lamont. Kerry's running mate, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, appeared at a Lamont rally last month.

Other top Democrats, however, have tacitly backed Lamont, who seized the Democratic nomination from Lieberman in last month's primary, but have avoided public displays of support. The rationale is simple: Lieberman is running as an independent and has a good shot of winning another term; a statewide poll released Thursday showed him up by 10 percentage points.

Democrats want to stay in Lieberman's good graces to ensure that he remains on their side.

"The Senate is a club," said veteran Democratic strategist Dan Payne. "Once a club member, always a club member. And one club member doesn't generally campaign against another club member."

Kerry and Edwards are potential 2008 White House candidates whose campaigning for Lamont could pay dividends among the liberal voters who tend to dominate Democratic presidential primaries.

Kerry has scolded Lieberman, the 2000 Democratic vice presidential nominee, over his staunch support for the Iraq war and for echoing Vice President Dick Cheney.

Leading Democrats have lined up behind their nominee Lamont, but they have also been reluctant to alienate Lieberman, who has served 18 years in the Senate. Democrats greeted Lieberman with applause when he returned to the Senate a few weeks ago -- even as they vowed to fully support Lamont.

It is a delicate dance for Democrats eager to shatter the GOP's lock on Congress.

If Democrats can gain six seats this fall and Lieberman wins, the party will need him to recapture control of the Senate.

"Democrats know it is a win-win situation for them, either way," Payne said.

Lieberman has vowed to remain a Democrat if he wins a fourth term. He expects to retain his seniority and committee seats and, if the Democrats take control, he is in line to become chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, a key panel which deals with issues such as terrorism.

Former Rep. Norman D'Amours, D-N.H., said party rules prevent some elected Democratic officials from voicing public support for Lieberman.

"There are people who are not supporting Joe, for the time being ... who, on a secret ballot would probably vote for Joe," D'Amours said. "They have a responsibility to abide by party rules."

D'Amours made his remarks on a conference call with reporters to announce "Dems for Joe," a group of former senators, House members and Clinton administration officials backing Lieberman. The group includes ex-Sens. Dennis DeConcini, D-Ariz., Bob Kerrey, D-Neb., John Breaux, D-La., and former CIA chief James Woolsey.

The Lamont camp said it is seeking to strike a balance between an influx of national support and the campaign's Connecticut flavor.

Lamont spokeswoman Liz Dupont-Diehl said state Democrats have been strongly supportive. Kerry, she noted, would help galvanize voters, particularly Democrats and the independents whom Lamont needs to win. Kerry beat President Bush in Connecticut by 10 percentage points in the 2004 presidential contest.

DOJ_NMG_0071017

"We don't have all the relationships that incumbency brings, but a significant number of Democrats support the positive changes that Ned is talking about," Dupont-Diehl said. "Senator Kerry is one of the many Democrats who is frustrated with Senator Lieberman's pandering to the Bush administration."

Another prospective 2008 presidential candidate, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., met with Lamont after the primary to talk about campaign strategy and she also offered to host a fundraiser for Lamont.

They met privately.

Now, Even Allen's Apologies Are Getting Him In Trouble (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

RICHMOND, Sept. 28 -- Sen. George Allen can't seem to win: first, he apologizes for addressing an Indian American with a racial slur and acknowledges that many view the Confederate flag as a hate symbol. Now, the Sons of Confederate Veterans want him to apologize, too.

As he fights Democrat James Webb for a second term in the Senate, Allen has spent the last six weeks battling charges of racism after calling a young Indian American man "macaca" and later being accused of having used a racial epithet toward blacks.

He has vehemently denied ever using the "N-word." He has apologized profusely for saying "macaca." And he has insisted that he has moved far beyond his youthful admiration of controversial symbols like the battle flag.

"What I was slow to appreciate and wish I had understood much sooner," Allen told a black audience last month, "is that this symbol . . . is, for black Americans, an emblem of hate and terror, an emblem of intolerance and intimidation."

Now, even that statement is getting him into trouble.

"He's apologizing to others, certainly he should apologize to us as well," said B. Frank Earnest Sr., the Virginia commander of the confederate group at a news conference. "We're all aware, ourselves included, of the statements that got him into this. The infamous macaca statement. He's using our flag to wipe the muck from his shoes that he's now stepped in."

Over the years, Allen has been a darling of the confederate group. As governor, he designated April as Confederate History Month. He has displayed the battle flag in his home as part of what he said is a flag collection. And his high school yearbook picture shows him wearing a Confederate flag pin.

But the senator has been distancing himself from those symbols as he pursues reelection and considers a bid for the presidency in 2008.

In the past several years, he has co-sponsored legislation condemning the lynching of blacks and has promised to work on similar legislation apologizing for slavery. He recently said of the Confederate flag that "the symbols you use matter because of how others may take them."

Allen's recent statements didn't sit well with the SCV. They accused him yesterday of trying to appeal to liberal voters with his new position.

"The denunciation of the flag to score political points is anathema to our organization," said Brag Bowling, a former past commander of the group.

Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams brushed aside criticisms from the group, saying "Senator Allen stands by his comments."

Even as Allen was getting hammered by the confederates, another person emerged on MSNBC's "Hardball with Chris Matthews" to accuse him of using the N-word.

Patricia Waring, who described herself as the wife of Allen's rugby coach in 1978 and 1979, said she overheard Allen repeatedly using the epithet during a match in 1978. She said she confronted Allen at the time, urging him not to use that word.

"I heard to my left, the N-word, and I heard it again, and I looked around and heard it again," she said. "And there was this fellow sitting on the ground. He was putting on red rugby shoes -- it is seared in my brain, believe me. And he was kind of showing off, I guess, but he was telling a story and . . . in the story was a lot of N-words."

Waring said she is a Democratic activist from Maryland. She said she has had no contact with Webb or his campaign staff.

DOJ_NMG_0071018

Asked about Waring's charges, Wadhams said: "It's the latest false accusation. It's patently untrue, made by a self-confessed partisan liberal Democrat."

Peter Schmidt, 58, a former rugby teammate of Allen's, said Thursday night that he did not remember Waring or her husband and said he "never heard anything like that from [Allen]. I just have no way I could possibly believe that."

Also Thursday, a former roommate of Webb's challenged a report that Webb had used the N-word and harassed blacks. An associate of Webb's, Dan Cragg, told The Washington Post on Wednesday that Webb told him he took drives through the black neighborhood of Watts, where he and members of his Reserve Officer Training Corps unit used racial epithets and pointed fake guns at blacks to scare them. Cragg was referred to The Post by the Allen campaign.

Oleg Jankovic, 60, said he was Webb's roommate in 1963 and 1964.

"No. No. It just wasn't happening," Jankovic said of Cragg's allegation. He said Webb once shot rifles into the air from the top of a dorm, but never drove through Watts with one or yelled epithets. "No. Absolutely not."

Also Thursday, black lawmakers in the General Assembly met to discuss whether to endorse Webb. The Democrat has struggled to earn their support because of statements he has made about affirmative action. Members of the black caucus said they would announce a decision Friday.

During the Democratic primary this year, Webb performed poorly in areas of the state heavily populated by blacks after his opponent highlighted comments he had made saying affirmative action is "state-sponsored racism." Webb has since said he supports affirmative action for blacks, but that it should not have been broadened into a larger diversity program.

One member of the caucus, Sen. Benjamin J. Lambert III (D-Richmond), has endorsed Allen, saying he was swayed by Allen's efforts to secure money for historically black colleges and universities.

Group Accuses Allen Of Spurning Heritage (AP-Y)

By Bob Lewis

AP, September 28, 2006

Sen. George Allen's use of the word "macaca" for a young man of Indian descent forced him to spend the past six weeks disputing claims that his past is littered with racist language and a fondness for Confederate symbols. On Thursday, the furor came full circle when the Sons of Confederate Veterans turned on Allen.

The organization criticized the Republican for saying he had been slow to grasp the pain that Old South symbols like the Confederate flag cause black people.

"The denunciation of the flag to score political points is anathema to our organization," Brag Bowling, immediate past state commander of the SCV, told reporters near the state Capitol, once the Confederacy's seat of government.

Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams said Allen stands by his comments.

What had been a warm-up race for a 2008 presidential bid has become the fight of Allen's political life. He had been a strong favorite over Democrat Jim Webb, a decorated combat veteran who once served as President Reagan's Navy secretary.

"Before the Macaca incident, this race was over. George Allen had a 16-point lead in the polls and had a huge financial advantage over his opponent, who had no money. In one moment, he took a race that was essentially won and turned it competitive overnight," said Robert D. Holsworth, a political science professor at Virginia Commonwealth University.

Since Aug. 11, when Allen singled out Webb campaign volunteer S.R. Sidarth at a mostly white rally and called him "macaca" — a term considered by some to be a racial slur — the senator has been beset by damaging claims from his past. Allen's campaign gave conflicting accounts of how he came up with the word.

College-era acquaintances then claimed he used a common racial slur for blacks. Stories about how the Confederate flag he kept in his home and a hangman's noose in his law office have gained new currency. At a debate, Allen was startled and irritated by a question about whether his grandfather was Jewish, then confirmed it a day later.

Allen now has even Republicans publicly questioning what has gone wrong with a candidate known for disciplined, surefooted campaigns in two convincing statewide triumphs the past 13 years.

"Allen's mistake is he's taken his re-election for granted and he's been getting his nice presidential team together," conservative commentator Bay Buchanan said last week on CNN.

DOJ_NMG_0071019

Allen Campaign Ads Launch Two-pronged Attack (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 29, 2006

Sen. George Allen yesterday released two ads that reveal a strategic split and indicate a fundamental problem with his campaign.

One ad, which takes aim from the right, features Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, saying the Virginia Republican should be re-elected because of his tough stance against terrorism. The other attacks Mr. Allen's Democratic opponent, James H. Webb Jr., for an article he penned 27 years ago about women in the military.

"I'm intrigued as to why he'd be criticizing Webb on this," said David Domke, a University of Washington professor who analyzes campaign ads. "Most social conservatives would say women don't belong in combat roles. The ad is powerful because it attempts to undercut Webb's appeal to a key Democratic constituency: women."

Conservative blogger Dean Barnett also finds it odd that the Allen campaign is using the "ancient" article, saying Mr. Allen is attacking Mr. Webb "from the left."

Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams disagreed, saying, "The ad speaks for itself."

Mr. Webb, a former Republican who served as Navy secretary under President Reagan, now says he is "completely comfortable" with women's roles in the military.

The Allen ad features three female Naval Academy graduates saying the article, "Women Can't Fight," was a "slap in the face" and "demoralizing."

"I really have to make it very clear to the women of Virginia who may be considering voting for this man that he is no advocate for women," says Kathleen Murray, a 1984 Naval Academy graduate.

Scott Howell and Co., which produced the spot, also created ads for Republican Jerry W. Kilgore in the Virginia gubernatorial race last year that said his opponent would not oppose the death penalty even for Adolf Hitler. Pundits think the ad was a factor in Mr. Kilgore's loss to Democratic candidate Timothy M. Kaine.

Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny-Todd noted similarities between Mr. Allen's ads and the "Hitler" ads.

"They wear negative campaigning like a badge of honor," she said, dismissing the ad as "very inaccurate."

Mrs. Denny-Todd said Mr. Allen's image is so damaged that his campaign is avoiding talking about the senator's record or substantive issues. "They've got nothing to run on," she said.

The other ad features Mr. McCain calling Mr. Allen a courageous leader.

Mr. Allen "has the utmost confidence and belief that in this terrible, titanic struggle that's going on between good and evil in the world that we will and must prevail," Mr. McCain says in the ad, which juxtaposes images of an Iraqi woman with Osama bin Laden.

Mr. Allen's $650,000 statewide ad blitz aims to combat accusations that he used racial slurs as a young man.

Mr. Webb, who lags his opponent in fundraising, is running an ad that focuses on the increasingly unpopular Iraq war.

"The people who failed to prevent this disaster are not the ones you can count on to fix it," the decorated Vietnam veteran says in the 30-second spot. "We need to end our occupation of Iraq and to bring stability to the Middle East. We can do it with the right kind of leadership."

The ad alternates between Mr. Allen and President Bush saying the U.S. must "stay the course."

Mr. Webb recently got $300,000 from a Democratic fundraiser with former Gov. Mark Warner, after visits from Sens. Barack Obama of Illinois and John Kerry of Massachusetts. Also raising money for the Virginia candidate were former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, the Democratic vice-presidential nominee in 2004, and authors Stephen King and John Grisham.

Mr. Webb's campaign also benefited in the weeks after Mr. Allen's nationally televised gaffe calling a man of Indian descent "macaca," a term considered a racial slur in some cultures.

After that, a former football teammate from the University of Virginia accused Mr. Allen of using the "n-word" decades ago. Since then, numerous racial accusations have surfaced, some substantiated and most not.

DOJ_NMG_0071020

Yesterday, Mr. Allen introduced a bill he says will expand the number of black farmers eligible for compensation under a class-action lawsuit against the U.S. Department of Agriculture in the late 1990s. The farmers were found to have encountered discrimination when applying for federal farm loans.

Unraveling Allen (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

Boy, talk about stepping in a pile of macaca.

Every political campaign frog-marches the candidate through a process of self-discovery, but this is getting ridiculous. Sen. George Allen of Virginia was supposed to coast to reelection this November, then start polishing his cowboy boots for a presidential run. Instead the political world is asking aloud whether he's remotely ready for prime time -- and the senator himself has got to be pondering questions of a more existential nature.

First came the "macaca" incident, in which he referred to a young man of Indian descent with a word that might be some kind of exotic ethnic slur (as Allen's opponents claim) or innocent nonsense (as Allen now maintains, after a few false starts), but sure didn't sound like a compliment. Scrambling to limit the damage threw Allen, whose natural walk is a college quarterback's swagger, off his stride.

Then he had to deal with the revelation that his maternal grandparents were Jewish, which means his mother is Jewish, which means -- what, that Allen is Jewish, too? The answer depends on whether you consider Jewishness (which is matrilineal) to be a matter of ethnicity, religion, culture, history or perhaps even choice. If you accept Allen's assurance that he never had an inkling -- which suggests a pretty incurious nature, but never mind -- then his self-image must have been smitten and his self-confidence sent reeling.

That's what it looked like, at least. By his own account he had a month to prepare for the question of his family history, if anyone ever were to raise it. But when the question came, he was wholly unprepared, as if he hadn't taken the time to process this new information about himself. He bristled, then later softened. He fiercely protected his mother, as any son should. He spoke of his respect for his newfound Jewish heritage but also talked about how much he loves eating a variety of pork products.

I think it's safe to say that the man was a tad conflicted.

What could possibly happen next? The joke in my office was that the only thing left was for a black ancestor to surface.

Not exactly, as it turned out.

What surfaced instead was a story in the cybermagazine Salon.com quoting three of Allen's college football teammates as saying that back in the early 1970s, they heard Allen frequently use the unforgivable racial slur that has come to be known by the too-cute euphemism "the N-word." One former teammate claimed Allen was then such a racist that he stuffed a severed deer head into the mailbox of a black family, in an echo of "The Godfather."

Allen angrily called the whole story "absolutely false" and said he never recalled using the N-word slur. His campaign produced other teammates who defended him and attacked the accusers. Then Larry Sabato, a University of Virginia professor who is frequently quoted as an authority on politics -- and who was in school with Allen -- went on MSNBC's "Hardball" and said that Allen did too use the racial slur, though he later acknowledged that he was relying on hearsay.

Now, instead of cruising to victory, Allen is locked in a tight battle with Democrat James Webb. Perhaps helpfully for Allen, Webb now has an N-word problem of his own -- he can't deny having used it, which amounts to an admission.

But Allen brings unhelpful baggage to this "he said, he said" controversy. In the past he has had to try to explain his love of the Confederate flag, which is unusual for a man who was born in California, and also the fact that he used to keep a hangman's noose in his office. In my book, those would be strikes one and two.

It should be noted that Allen has already spoken words of contrition and atonement for past racial insensitivities. Earlier this month, in a speech to officials from historically black colleges and universities, Allen acknowledged that he was "slow to appreciate" why black Americans were not fond of the Confederate flag. He said that over the past three years he has come to understand "just how completely different, and incredibly difficult, the journey traveled by African Americans has been in this country."

DOJ_NMG_0071021

This is a grown man speaking, a grown man who went to college and now sits in the United States Senate. If you take Allen at his word, then I suppose you could say better late than never. But it's hard to put unalloyed faith in the word of a man who, in every sense, seems to know so very little about himself.

Ugly Words (WP)

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

DID REPUBLICAN Sen. George Allen use racial slurs years ago? Did his Democratic challenger, James Webb? Does it matter, in a race between two candidates with long public records and substantial differences on Iraq, health care, the economy and other critical issues?

Yes, it does matter. Mr. Allen said he does not recall having used what newspapers delicately call "the N-word." But at least a half-dozen people, including ones with upstanding reputations and no evident political agendas, have now told journalists that he did. The stories they have recounted about Mr. Allen's behavior raise disturbing questions about his character and credibility.

In the wake of the furor over the senator's reported comments, Mr. Webb would not deny that he had employed the ugly term. He said he has never used it as a slur but added to the Richmond Times-Dispatch, "I don't think that there's anyone who grew up around the South that hasn't had the word pass through their lips at one time in their life."

It is unfortunate that Mr. Allen, a man who has held elected office practically his entire adult life, is only now, in his fifties, subjected to damning revelations about events that are three decades old. We wish the questions about his racial attitudes had been raised and raked through earlier in his career. But Mr. Allen helped open the door to this inquiry this summer when he singled out the lone person of color at a rural campaign rally, mocked him with the word "macaca" and then offered no plausible explanation for his use of what others see as a racial slur. He's also vulnerable because, as had been reported, he used to display Confederate flags at home and a hangman's noose in his office.

And his public record on racial matters is mixed. As governor of Virginia in the 1990s, Mr. Allen named relatively few blacks to his Cabinet, opposed a state holiday in honor of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., and declared an annual Confederate History Month without reference to the institution of slavery and the scars it left on this country. On the other hand, as a senator he helped provide federal technology grants to historically black colleges and universities and sponsored legislation to apologize for slavery.

The senator has admitted to youthful "insensitivity" and apologized for the macaca incident, just as Mr. Webb has said he would not today endorse the disparaging remarks he once made about the role of women in the military. People can learn and grow; they also can profess change for reasons of political convenience. So the questions are legitimate. But so are the actions both men have taken over years in public office, and the positions they are staking out now. We hope the present discussion won't drown out a broader debate about what each candidate would seek to accomplish as a senator.

Politics In The Age Of YouTube (CBS)

CBS News.com, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27, 2006

Quote

"There's no such thing as opening off-Broadway anymore. It's all prime-time. So everything you say is out there for public consumption for better and occasionally for worse."

Se. Evan Bayh, D-Ind.

(CBS) Back in the 1990s, a forgettable movie called "Ed TV" made comedy out of the idea of following someone around with a camera 24/7.

But as CBS News correspondent Gloria Borger reports, fiction has become reality in political campaigns across the country. The idea now is to catch candidates making mistakes and then post them on the Internet, where they can be seen worldwide with the click of a mouse on sites like YouTube.

Virginia Sen. George Allen has become the poster child for what can go wrong when a candidate gets caught saying something stupid.

"Let's give a welcome to Macaca here. Welcome to America," Allen said.

DOJ_NMG_0071022

"Macaca" means "monkey" to some. It's not a smart thing to call your opponent's campaign aide when he has a camera pointing right at you. It all wound up on YouTube, and the controversy paved the way for new charges this week that Allen has a racist past.

But Allen isn't the only politician who has been caught on tape. Florida Republican Tramm Hudson lost his primary this month after a video of him was posted on a political Web site.

"I know this from my own experience that blacks are not the greatest swimmers or may not even know how to swim," Hudson was heard saying on tape.

The video was posted on the Web on a Thursday. By Friday, the story was making headlines in the local media. On Tuesday, the once-unknown Tramm Hudson was already a punch line on "The Daily Show."

Hudson's political consultant, Dan Hazelwood, did his best to control the damage.

"What you see here is the political equivalent of a drive-by shooting," Hazelwood says.

Hudson may have shot himself, but his campaign believes the video was shot and delivered to the Web by his political enemies. It's a form of guerilla warfare that's now a fact of life.

"You got to have your person out there video taping the other side. You've got to have your staff traveling with you, taping them, and you probably got to have a backup in case one of them needs to run an errand. It's 24/7 now for everyone," Hazelwood says.

Including the candidate. Indiana Democratic Sen. Evan Bayh is running for president, and he has even joined the popular college site Facebook to woo young voters. But he also knows negative news can pop up online instantly, anonymously and cheaply.

"There's no such thing as opening off-Broadway anymore. It's all prime time, and it's all real time. So everything you say is out there for public consumption for better, and occasionally for worse," Bayh says.

It used to be that 90 percent of life was showing up. Well, not anymore. Ask Montana Sen. Conrad Burns, who was seen online while dozing. Now you have to stay awake, too.

Menendez's Firing Of Staffer Buoys New Jersey GOP Hopes (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) severed ties with a longtime campaign associate who was taped seeking a political favor on his behalf, the latest of several ethics-related incidents to shadow Menendez as he seeks a full Senate term in November.

According to yesterday's editions of the Newark Star-Ledger and the Philadelphia Inquirer, the associate, Donald Scarinci, was a Menendez childhood friend who became the senator's closest political adviser and a top fundraiser. In a transcript of the recording reviewed by the newspapers, Scarinci asked a client, a Hudson County psychiatrist who held lucrative local contracts, to hire another physician as a favor to Menendez. The psychiatrist, Oscar Sandoval, secretly taped the conversation, which took place in 1999, when Menendez was a House member.

Gov. Jon S. Corzine (D) appointed Menendez in January to complete the governor's Senate term. The Scarinci story follows the disclosure of a federal review of a lease arrangement between Menendez and a Hudson County nonprofit organization.

The revelations have fueled Republican hopes that the New Jersey seat could flip to the GOP column in November. Although the state is strongly Democratic, polls show that the race between Menendez and GOP nominee Thomas Kean Jr. is extremely close.

A poll by Rutgers University's Eagleton Institute of Politics released yesterday showed Menendez leading Kean 45 percent to 44 percent among likely voters, with 11 percent undecided. A Quinnipiac University poll from last week found Kean ahead with likely voters by 48 percent to 45 percent, with 6 percent undecided.

The Scarinci story prompted speculation among some political operatives in Washington that Menendez could be replaced as the Democratic nominee, similar to what occurred in 2002, when Sen. Robert G. Torricelli was replaced by then-retired Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg five weeks before the election. Torricelli had dropped out of the race after a Senate admonishment over his financial dealings with a campaign supporter.

DOJ_NMG_0071023

A senior Democratic campaign official dismissed talk of Menendez's departure as "disgusting" and "totally unfounded" and blamed Republicans for stirring it up. But some Democrats had worried when Corzine picked Menendez as his successor that his deep roots in Hudson County, a hotbed of public corruption scandals, could become a campaign focal point. Kean, the son and namesake of the popular former governor, has made a campaign issue of Menendez's Hudson ties.

Menendez spokesman Matthew Miller said the Sandoval disclosure was politically motivated and noted that the doctor was being sued by Hudson County to recover money lost through corruption. "Tom Kean Jr. has run his campaign in the gutter since the beginning and has now reached even further in to find this sleazy character," Miller said.

In a statement responding to the newspaper disclosures, Scarinci said he couldn't comment on details of the taped conversation, citing his involvement in the Hudson County lawsuit. But he added: "I will clearly state that none of my dealings with Dr. Sandoval were either directed or requested by Bob Menendez."

Senate Democrats To Keep Menendez On N.J. Ballot (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, September 29, 2006

Senate Democrats said they won't try to replace Sen. Robert Menendez of New Jersey, despite new accusations of corruption that surfaced yesterday in the Democratic incumbent's already tough re-election race.

"We expect week after week they're going to throw these allegations around," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat and chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

Asked whether he is sure that Democrats will not replace Mr. Menendez, Mr. Schumer replied with an emphatic "yes." He cited new polls that show Mr. Menendez either slightly ahead of or tied with his Republican challenger, Tom Kean Jr.

A Menendez fundraiser and confidant was heard on a newly released tape pressuring a government contractor to hire a person as "a favor" to Mr. Menendez, the Philadelphia Inquirer reported yesterday.

In the 20-minute taped telephone call, the Inquirer reported, lawyer Donald Scarinci tells contractor and former FBI informant Oscar Sandoval that agreeing to the hire would afford him "protection" and that failing to do so could result in "the law of the jungle."

Mr. Sandoval, who taped the conversation in 1999, said the clear implication was that he should the hire the person Mr. Menendez wanted or risk losing $1 million in government contracts, the Inquirer reported.

Earlier this month, the Newark Star-Ledger reported that federal investigators are looking into a rental deal between Mr. Menendez and a nonprofit agency that received millions in federal funding while he was a House member.

Recent polls show that the New Jersey Senate race is very close. An Eagleton-Rutgers poll conducted Sept. 24 to 26 called the race a "virtual tie." Among 404 likely voters, Mr. Menendez was at 45 percent and Mr. Kean was at 44 percent, the poll found. A Quinnipiac University poll of likely voters conducted Sept. 13 to 18 found Mr. Kean at 48 percent and Mr. Menendez at 45 percent.

If Democrats lose Mr. Menendez's seat, it will all but kill their quest to regain control of the Senate this year, because they must have a net gain of six seats to end the Republican majority.

"A Menendez loss is the ultimate insurance for Republicans that they won't lose control" of the Senate, said Republican pollster Scott Reed.

Mr. Schumer said yesterday that Democrats face an "uphill" battle to regain the Senate but that he is "feeling good" about New Jersey and the Senate races in general. He said that Democrats always anticipated Republicans would launch a "smear" campaign against Mr. Menendez but that Democrats will continue to repeat the theme that resonates most deeply in heavily Democratic New Jersey: "A vote for Tom Kean Jr. is a vote for President Bush."

The National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC), meanwhile, has a legal team ready to fight any last-minute Democratic effort to replace Mr. Menendez on the ballot, as the party did in 2002, when it ousted embattled Democratic Sen. Robert G. Torricelli in favor of Frank R. Lautenberg, a Democrat who went on to win the Senate election.

"Democrats have a track record in New Jersey of pulling last-minute stunts," said William McGinley, NRSC's general counsel.

Mr. Menendez fought back yesterday with a new radio ad accusing his opponent of ethical hypocrisy, saying Mr. Kean is linked to two ongoing federal investigations.

"Tom Kean Jr. is falsely attacking Bob Menendez. But Tom Kean Jr. is the one under the ethical cloud," the ad says.

Menendez: 'Nothing ... In That Tape Was At My Direction.' (NSL)

By Robert Cohen And Jeff Whelan

Newark Star-Ledger, September 29, 2006

Posted by The Star-Ledger September 28, 2006 21:53

Print | Email

With the Democratic establishment standing firmly behind him, U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez today denied any involvement in the alleged shakedown of a Union City psychiatrist seven years ago.

Menendez, in a brief interview on Capitol Hill, said he did not know that his closest political adviser, Donald Scarinci, invoked his name in pressuring the psychiatrist to give another physician a job in 1999.

In a secretly recorded telephone call, Scarinci tells the psychiatrist, Oscar Sandoval, Menendez would consider it "a favor." On the same tape, Scarinci said the hire would offer Sandoval "protection."

"As it relates to Donald's comments, I am disappointed in him," Menendez said today. "Nothing Scarinci said in that tape was at my direction."

Sandoval contends the tape buttresses claims he makes in a lawsuit against Hudson County and some of its key figures. The suit, filed in March, characterizes Sandoval as a victim of extortion and racketeering and contends Menendez, then a congressman, was actively involved in the campaign to pressure the psychiatrist to provide a job for physician Vicente Ruiz.

The suit alleges that as Scarinci, Sandoval and Ruiz put the final touches on the hiring arrangement in 1999, "Menendez came into the meeting and stated that he was glad we could work out our differences and could work together." Under the arrangement, Sandoval claims, one third of the money that Ruiz made for Sandoval's practice would go to Scarinci and Menendez.

Sandoval claims tapes and documents will back up every assertion in his lawsuit, but he declined to make them available today.

Matt Miller, a spokesman for Menendez's campaign against Republican state Sen. Tom Kean Jr., said Menendez has "no recollection of that meeting, of any of that." Miller said Sandoval's allegation about kicking cash to Scarinci and Menendez was "absolutely not true."

Sandoval is a controversial figure in Hudson County. An FBI informer for two years, he helped federal prosecutors win corruption convictions against former County Executive Robert Janiszewski and two former freeholders, William Braker and Nidia Davila Colon. But his methods irked even the judge in the corruption cases. Sandoval made numerous secret recordings of Colon, his psychiatric patient and lover at the time, who was convicted of ferrying bribes from Sandoval to Janiszewski. Sandoval was never charged.

Hudson County has since filed suit against Sandoval and other contractors, seeking the return of millions of dollars that county officials say were lost to corruption. The county is seeking $7 million just from Sandoval, who once held $2.3 million in contracts to provide services at the Hudson Couty Jail, a county-run psychiatric hospital and the youth detention center.

Menendez has cut off all campaign ties to Scarinci, a Hudson County lawyer and prolific fundraiser. Today the senator's daughter, Alicia, resigned from Scarinci's law firm. But Menendez said he remains a personal friend of Scarinci.

Democratic party chairman Joe Cryan said the tempest has made Democrats, who havve won every U.S. Senate race in New Jersey since 1972, more resolved. "The party understands were not going to win this campaign by virtue of our previous successes," he said.

Democrats, led by Gov. Jon Corzine, fell into line behind Menendez. Corzine press secretary Anthony Coley said Menendez still has the governor's unqualified support. "He was his guy when he appointed him in January and hell be his guy until election day."

Tape About Hiring Puts Menendez Camp On The Defensive (NYT)

By Ray Rivera

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

After months of fighting off charges by his Republican opponent that he is but one more ethically challenged New Jersey Democrat, Senator Robert Menendez found himself facing another set of accusations yesterday.

Senator Menendez, who is being challenged by State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr. in a fierce race for his Senate seat, is on the defensive again, over a tape-recorded conversation in which a longtime friend and political confidant is overheard asking a psychiatrist with $1 million in Hudson County contracts to hire one of Mr. Menendez's political patrons or risk losing the contracts.

A Menendez campaign spokesman denied that the senator had any involvement in exerting any influence on the psychiatrist. He moved quickly to disassociate the campaign from the man accused of applying the pressure, Donald J. Scarinci, after excerpts of the conversation, which took place in 1999, appeared in The Philadelphia Inquirer and other newspapers yesterday.

"If those tapes are accurate, Mr. Scarinci was using the senator's name without his knowledge and without his approval," said Matt Miller, a spokesman for Mr. Menendez. "Because of that, he will no longer have any role in our campaign."

Mr. Scarinci, a powerful New Jersey lawyer and fund-raiser whose ties to Mr. Menendez go back to their childhoods, said he could not discuss the tape recordings or their contents yesterday because they were part of an ongoing civil lawsuit.

"That being said," he added in a written statement, "I will clearly state that none of my dealings" with the psychiatrist, Dr. Oscar Sandoval, "were either directed or requested by Bob Menendez."

In an interview yesterday, Dr. Sandoval said that the tape was of one of dozens of conversations between himself and Mr. Scarinci that he secretly recorded, and that Mr. Menendez was present on several occasions when the issue was being discussed. Dr. Sandoval declined to release any other tapes yesterday.

"It's an insult to the intelligence of the New Jersey public to ask them to believe that Scarinci, who has millions of dollars of business in more than 20 municipalities because of Bob Menendez's influence, did this without Menendez's involvement," Dr. Sandoval said.

According to several public opinion polls, Mr. Menendez is locked in a dead heat with Mr. Kean in his bid to retain his Senate seat — which he inherited from Jon S. Corzine after Mr. Corzine was elected governor — against Mr. Kean.

Democratic leaders publicly rallied around Mr. Menendez and vowed to continue to support him. "Bob is a very good candidate," said Frank R. Lautenberg, the other New Jersey senator. "He is a very good legislator. And he's going to win.'"

Mr. Kean — who has made Mr. Menendez's ethical record the focal point of his campaign — received ammunition earlier this month when federal investigators launched an investigation into a lease arrangement in which Mr. Menendez rented property in Union City, N.J., to a nonprofit agency, the North Hudson Community Action Corporation, that he helped to win millions of dollars in federal grants as a member of the House.

The latest accusations first surfaced earlier this year as part of a civil racketeering lawsuit filed by Hudson County against the former Hudson County executive, Robert Janiszewski, and dozens of others, including Dr. Sandoval, that claimed they used bribery and other means to defraud the county of millions in government contracts.

Dr. Sandoval, a Union City psychiatrist, turned informant in 1999 in an F.B.I. investigation that led to the convictions of a half-dozen New Jersey politicians, including Mr. Janiszewski.

In a counterclaim filed in March, Dr. Sandoval said that in early 1999, he was contacted by Mr. Scarinci and was told that Mr. Mendendez, a congressman at the time, "would very much appreciate if Dr. Sandoval would rehire Dr. Vicente Ruiz," a physician whom Dr. Sandoval had fired a year earlier.

In exchange, Dr. Sandoval claims he was told, his contracts would be protected from Mr. Janiszewski, with whom he had fallen out of favor.

According to a transcript of the conversation provided by Dr. Sandoval, Mr. Scarinci told him, "If you could take this guy back and do something with him it would be a favor to the congressman."

Later in the transcript, Mr. Scarinci is quoted as saying that from his point of view, "it makes sense for you, because it gives you protection."

After a deal was struck making Dr. Ruiz an equal partner, Dr. Sandoval claims that Mr. Menendez met personally with him, Dr. Ruiz and Mr. Scarinci at his law office and stated that "he was glad we could work out our difference."

A 1998 form submitted to the Internal Revenue Service showed that Dr. Ruiz was one of the highest-paid employees of the North Hudson Community Action Corporation — the nonprofit agency that leased property from Mr. Menendez — earning $125,192. Dr. Ruiz remained an employee of the agency until he resigned in January 2000, an agency spokesman said yesterday.

Attempts to reach Dr. Ruiz yesterday were unsuccessful.

Mr. Miller, the Menendez campaign spokesman, said yesterday that Mr. Menendez had no recollection of such a meeting. He added that Dr. Ruiz was a longtime acquaintance of the senator and had contributed to past campaigns.

He charged that the tape's release appeared to have been coordinated by the Kean camp, a charge denied by the Kean campaign and Dr. Sandoval, who said he released it after being asked about it by reporters.

Menendez Linked On Tape To Gov't Contracts Scheme (AP)

By Donna De La Cruz

AP, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - A childhood friend and close political adviser of Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez used the senator's name to pressure a doctor to share his county government contract, and the doctor believed some of the money would be kicked back to Menendez, according to a transcript of the telephone call and court documents. Menendez campaign spokesman Matthew Miller called the allegations "completely false."

The transcript of the 1999 conversation, obtained Thursday by The Associated Press, depicts an expletive - and chuckle-laden chat between Donald Scarinci, Menendez's friend and adviser, and Oscar Sandoval, a psychiatrist who taped the exchange as part of his work as an FBI informant in a criminal investigation of several northern New Jersey politicians.

In the conversation, Scarinci asks Sandoval to rehire a doctor, Dr. Vicente Ruiz, whom he fired the year before. At the time of the conversation, Sandoval had contracts with the Hudson County Jail and a county hospital.

The revelation of the conversation - reported by several newspapers Thursday, including The Philadelphia Inquirer, which obtained a copy of the tape - and details of the court filings were the latest in the ethics barrage hitting Menendez as his campaign enters its final months. Menendez, a longtime Democratic congressman appointed to the Senate when Jon Corzine took office as governor, is locked in a tight race with Republican state Sen. Tom Kean Jr.

In the transcript, Scarinci is quoted as saying, "If you can deal with Dr. Ruiz and make him happy, Menendez will consider that a favor, if you can't, then that's okay ... you can't."

Scarinci later says hiring Ruiz would give Sandoval "protection" but does not say what that meant. In court documents filed in March, Sandoval said "protection" meant that he would keep his government contracts.

The documents also state Sandoval was told by Ruiz he would have to divide his contract earnings between himself, Ruiz, Scarinci and Menendez. Sandoval had fired Ruiz in 1998, according to the documents, which give no reason for the dismissal.

Ruiz was not able to be reached for comment Thursday. He was rehired by Sandoval following the 1999 conversation and the court documents, filed as part of an ongoing civil lawsuit involving government corruption, indicate that Menendez was in on the talks.

"After this Dr. Ruiz, Scarinci and Dr. Sandoval met at Scarinci's office with the purpose of working together at which time now U.S. senator then U.S. U.S. Rep. Menendez came into the meeting and stated that he was glad we could work out our difference (sic) and could work together," one document states.

Ruiz in 1998 served as a physician with the North Hudson Community Action Corp. The U.S. attorney's office has issued a subpoena seeking records from the nonprofit agency related to a lease agreement it had with Menendez, who rented a house he owned in Union City to the group, and also helped the organization obtain federal funds.

Scarinci in a statement said the tape and its contents have long been part of a civil lawsuit filed by Hudson County earlier this year against several county government vendors tied to former county executive Robert Janiszewski, who is serving a 41-month federal sentence after pleading guilty to taking more than $100,000 in bribes. One of the vendors mentioned in the lawsuit is Sandoval, who is countersuing.

DOJ_NMG_0071027

"As I am party to the lawsuit and represented companies owned by Dr. Sandoval during the time it is contended this recording was made, regretfully I am legally constrained from making any further statement at this time," Scarinci said. "That being said, I will clearly state that none of my dealings with Dr. Sandoval were either directed or requested by Bob Menendez."

Miller said the campaign has severed its ties with Scarinci, who has served as a fundraiser to Menendez. He did not respond the court documents' allegation that Menendez stood to get a share of the county contracts.

Miller did say Sandoval has many reasons to lie and questioned statements made by a man accused of seducing one of his own psychiatrist patients and then using her to bribe public officials for millions of dollars in contracts.

Miller was referring to Nidia Davila Colon, a five-term Hudson County freeholder, who was sentenced to a 2 1/2-year prison term after being convicted of passing more than $10,000 in bribes to Janiszewski so Sandoval could win millions of dollars in county contracts. Janiszewski testified against her at trial. Sandoval became an FBI informant and was never charged.

Miller also questioned Kean's judgment for campaigning with Jose Sandoval, who is running for Congress in the 8th Congressional District, saying that Oscar Sandoval and Jose Sandoval are brothers. Miller later said that he was mistaken and the two Sandovals are not related. Kean has questioned Menendez's ethics throughout the campaign.

Telephone calls made to Oscar Sandoval's two attorneys - Tomas Espinosa and Edward Duschock - were not returned Thursday.

The transcript also has an exchange where Scarinci takes credit for getting Colon hired by Carl Goldberg, a developer and Menendez fundraiser who is also chairman of the New Jersey Sports & Exposition Authority, the agency that operates the Meadowlands Sports Complex and other venues.

Scarinci told Sandoval "ultimately I had to physically take Bob by the hand, and sit him down at a table with Carl Goldberg, when Carl handed him $12,000 in checks as campaign contribution. And I said, 'Bob, isn't there something else you that you need from Carl Goldberg?'"

Miller said the "Bob" in this conversation referred to Janiszewski. Janiszewski's lawyer, William F. Maderer, said Thursday he was unaware of the tape and could not comment.

A message left Thursday for Goldberg was not immediately returned. In a statement, Goldberg said he was "puzzled and dismayed by how my role was portrayed in a conversation that took place seven and a half years ago."

Meanwhile, rumors were rampant that the Sandoval-Scarinci phone call would force Democrats to replace Menendez on the ballot with Democratic Rep. Robert Andrews. In a telephone call to The Associated Press, Andrews said to his knowledge, there has never been any discussion of replacing Menendez on the ballot.

"The governor and the party leaders are both behind Menendez and so am I," Andrews said.

N.J. Senate Race A Dead Heat, Poll Shows (AP-Y)

By Donna De La Cruz

AP, September 28, 2006

New Jersey's Senate candidates remained locked in a tie, according to a poll released Thursday that also showed confusion about the candidates among state voters.

Among 404 likely voters, 45 percent preferred Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez while 44 percent backed Republican challenger Tom Kean Jr., according to the Rutgers-Eagleton poll. The error margin was plus or minus 5 percent.

Among 660 registered voters, 42 percent backed Kean while 40 percent chose Menendez. This survey had an error margin of 4 percent. The survey of both likely and registered voters was conducted Sept. 24-26.

The poll showed there was ample opportunity for either candidate to take this race. Murray Edelman of the Eagleton Center for Public Interest Polling said about half of all registered voters said they have not heard of the candidates or do not have an opinion of them.

Only 36 percent of voters correctly identified Menendez as their senator. Menendez was appointed to the seat in January by Gov. Jon Corzine to serve out the remaining year of his term. He served 14 years as a congressman from northern New Jersey.

DOJ_NMG_0071028

Eight percent of registered voters said Kean Jr. was the governor of New Jersey, an office held by his father, Thomas Kean. Another 8 percent thought that Kean, a state senator, was a U.S. senator.

"The candidates have a ways to go to capture the attention of the voters," Edelman said. "The major campaign advertising has yet to begin, and the ads could have a considerable effect considering the lack of voter knowledge about the candidates."

The survey also showed that 51 percent of voters associated Kean closely or somewhat closely to President Bush, while 50 percent said Menendez was very closely or somewhat closely associated to Corzine.

Bush's job approval rating was 30 percent, an all-time low for the president in this poll. Corzine's job approval rating was 48 percent, up three points since June.

___

On the Net:

http://www.rutgers.edu.

Kean-Menendez Seante Racel Too Close To Call (NSL)

By Matthew Reilly

Newark Star-Ledger, September 29, 2006

The race for U.S. Senate in New Jersey is virtually tied, with Democratic incumbent Robert Menendez holding only a 1-point lead over Republican state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. in a Rutgers-Eagleton Poll released today.

Menendez had the support of 45 percent of likely voters and Kean was the choice of 44 percent of likely voters. The difference is well within the 4.9 percent margin of error in the poll of 404 likely voters.

Among registered voters, Kean has a 2-point lead over Menendez, 42 percent to 40 percent, compared to the four-point advantage Menendez had in the June survey. The margin of error for the 660 registered voters polled Sept. 24-26 is 3.8 percent.

Forty-five percent of registered voters who supported one of the two candidates said they might change their minds by Election Day.

Contributed by Matthew Reilly

Comments | Add Your Comment

Posted By: (28/09/2006 2:19:09 PM)

Comment: Once the polls reflect Menendez's latest ethics news, he'll be fortunate to garner 40%. Does it really surprise anyone that Menendez's Hudson County cronies used strongarm tactics to get their way? The new "tapes" out are likely the tip of the iceberg.

Polls Show Kean, Menendez Close (TSNJ)

By Martin C. Bricketto

Today's Sunbeam (NJ), September 29, 2006

Trenton Bureau

TRENTON -- The two candidates running for U.S. Senate are neck and neck, with the Republican scoring points on ethics and the Democrat polling better on national issues, according to a new poll released Thursday.

Findings from the Rutgers-Eagleton Poll were released the same day as published reports that an advisor to Democratic candidate U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez was secretly recorded seven years ago pressing a Hudson County contractor to hire someone as a favor to the then congressman.

Menendez had since cut ties with that advisor, according to the reports.

"It has the potential to be death by a thousand cuts if these stories keep coming out," said Dr. Tim Vercellotti, assistant director at the Eagleton Center for Public Interest Polling. "If so, Kean has a choice between two easy options, sit back and let Menendez react or continue to campaign on ethics."

A separate on-line poll from Zogby International on Thursday placed Menendez ahead of Kean by six points.

Of 404 likely voters who participated in the Eagleton survey from Sept. 24 to Sept. 26, 45 percent supported Menendez, just ahead of State Sen. Tom Kean Jr. at 44 percent. The poll had a 4.9-percent margin of error.

Of 660 registered voters sampled, Kean leads Menendez 42 to 40 percent, with a margin of error of 3.8 percent.

Among South Jersey participants, Menendez leads Kean 40 to 37 percent. Seventeen percent said they were undecided -- just above the percentage of undecided participants in central and northern New Jersey. Both candidates are from the northern half of the state.

It all adds up to a virtual tie with six weeks to go before the election on Nov. 7.

"There's a lot of time to go and there's a lot of money," said Dr. Murray Edelman, a consultant and distinguished scholar with the Eagleton Institute.

"We don't think the candidates are spending money at all like they're going to."

Kean spokeswoman Jill Hazelbaker said Menendez has been conducting a paid media campaign for three weeks which has not changed the poll numbers dramatically.

"I think that shows a serious weakness on Menendez's part," Hazelbaker said. "This guy has serious problems and I think as we begin our paid media campaign and really start to focus the race in on those issues the numbers are going to change dramatically."

Running in a blue state, Kean should be the happiest about the poll results, Edelman said.

"I would think all the stars favor Menendez. He's a sitting senator, which is of some values, he's in a Democratic state.. plus (President) Bush is hurting (candidates) all over the country," Edelman said. "I think it's not so much that Kean is doing so great, but Menendez has all this baggage with the corruption issues."

Michigan Woes Fuel GOP Election Hopes (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 29, 2006

LINCOLN PARK, Mich. -- The fever among voters to throw incumbents out of office -- furiously stoked by Democrats in Washington -- might backfire in this state, where Republicans are riding a surge of voter discontent.

With Democrats holding both Senate seats and the governor's mansion, Michigan is suffering the worst economy of any state in the nation. The state's unemployment rate is nearly twice the national average of 4.7 percent, and the auto industry is losing jobs by the tens of thousands. A recent job fair offering factory work for $10 an hour with no benefits drew 4,000 applicants.

"They're Democrats, but they want jobs," John Katinsky said of his neighbors in this hard-hit town downriver from Detroit.

Much of the discontent is being directed at Sen. Debbie Stabenow, the first-term senator who is trying to fend off a challenge from Oakland County Sheriff Michael Bouchard.

"Only one state in America has lost jobs for three straight years and that's Michigan," Mr. Bouchard says. "That needs to change, and it's going to change by starting with the leadership."

Mrs. Stabenow's primary line of attack on Mr. Bouchard is linking him to President Bush, who lost the state in the 2000 and 2004 elections, though by relatively small margins.

"The people of Michigan have a clear choice in this election between a senator who is fighting hard for them and delivering real results and someone who insists on endorsing the failed and tired policies of the Bush administration even as they continue to cost us jobs and threaten our Michigan way of life," Stabenow campaign spokesman Brent Colburn said.

Not a 'nice'-lady race

Mr. Bouchard often tells voters on the campaign trail that Mrs. Stabenow is a "nice" lady but that they're not running in a nice-lady contest. He then rattles off reasons why he thinks she should be replaced.

He tells people that Mrs. Stabenow voted to grant Social Security benefits to illegal aliens, is one of the biggest pork-barrel spenders in Washington and has authored only one successful bill in Congress: a law to rename a federal building in Detroit.

Last month, Mr. Bouchard toured the state in a moving van to highlight the exodus of Michigan residents leaving the state in search of jobs. The flight is so bad, Mr. Bouchard said in an interview with The Washington Times, that when his neighbors put their house on the market, they had to wait more than a week before a "for sale" sign was available.

On his tour, he promised to curb federal spending, reduce "regulatory burdens" on small businesses and make tax cuts permanent.

DOJ_NMG_0071030

Mrs. Stabenow, he says, has spent six years in Washington with little to show for it. She has authored 68 bills, according to records kept by the Library of Congress, and only one has been approved by the Senate. The bill, S.1285, renamed a building in Detroit the "Rosa Parks Federal Building" in honor of the civil rights activist.

During that same period, she also has written 68 amendments, 19 of which were adopted by her colleagues.

Those figures do not accurately reflect how hard she is working on behalf of her state, Mrs. Stabenow's campaign says.

She has "set the standard for constituent service," fought for lower health care costs and wrote the ban on drilling for oil in the Great Lakes, according to the campaign. In addition, she has supported tax cuts for businesses that create jobs in the United States and "helped lead the delegation effort" to secure more federal transportation dollars for Michigan roads.

A lackluster record?

Despite her successes, even Mrs. Stabenow's staunchest supporters are somewhat at a loss to name her accomplishments as a U.S. senator.

A survey by The Washington Times of delegates who attended the state Democratic convention in Detroit in August found no one who could list any specific successes.

Larry Lewis of Detroit said, "She's done an outstanding job."

Asked to name any accomplishments, Mr. Lewis replied: "I don't have her record in front of me. I couldn't go over it verbatim."

Thelma Murrell of Southgate said: "Off the top of my head, I can't name them. But she does a great deal of things for us. It's not just caring; she really does help."

Carol Poenisch of Northville couldn't name any legislative victories for Mrs. Stabenow, but applauded her efforts to stop Canadian trucks from hauling tons of garbage across the border and dumping it in U.S. landfills. It's an issue that has dogged Michigan politicians for years.

Just last month, Mrs. Stabenow issued a press release boasting that she and other Democrats in the state had reached a deal with Canadian officials "to stop shipments of municipal solid waste to Michigan over the next four years."

But Canada's environment ministry officials weren't losing much sleep over the deal they cut with Mrs. Stabenow. They told local reporters that it does nothing to curb industrial and commercial waste, which makes up more than half of the 4 million metric tons of Canadian trash hauled into Michigan each year.

Moreover, they said the relatively generous deal was prompted by fears that bipartisan legislation moving through Congress would end all trash shipments by year's end.

"Our garbage trucks could have been turned back from the border as early as January 2007," Ontario's environment ministry spokeswoman, Kate Jordan, told the Detroit News. "We needed to find a solution to avert that."

Indeed, that legislation was approved by the House a few days later. But it's not likely to go anywhere soon because the Senate version of the bill — introduced by Mrs. Stabenow — has languished for more than a year in the chamber's Environmental and Public Works Committee.

And, as part of her deal with Canadian officials, Mrs. Stabenow agreed to drop any efforts to get tougher legislation through Congress for the next four years.

Taking a stand on illegals

During these lean times in Michigan, illegal entry has become a top concern for voters. Polls consistently show that three-quarters or more of voters in the state oppose granting amnesty to illegals and support building a wall along the U.S. border with Mexico.

After the Senate passed a bill last spring that would allow illegals to become citizens, Republicans in Macomb County revolted. Rep. Tom Tancredo, the Colorado Republican who is little known except for his tough stance against illegal entry, surprised Republican officials by winning a straw poll in the county for the presidential nomination. Among the Republican luminaries Mr. Tancredo beat were Sen. John McCain of Arizona, former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, the son of former Michigan Gov. George Romney.

A standard line of Mr. Bouchard's stump speech is that anything that begins with the word "illegal" — as in illegal entry — he's against. Mrs. Stabenow, on the other hand, he says, has a weak record on the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0071031

No immigration vote has dogged Mrs. Stabenow more than the one she cast to grant Social Security benefits to illegal aliens for the work they performed illegally.

Mr. Colburn flatly denies that Mrs. Stabenow supported granting the benefits to illegal aliens and called such accusations "misleading and disingenuous."

"Senator Stabenow does not support and has never supported granting Social Security benefits to illegal immigrants," he said.

But, according to the Congressional Record — the official publication of all votes and floor speeches in Congress — Mrs. Stabenow voted on May 18 to strike Amendment No. 3985 offered by Sen. John Ensign, Nevada Republican. That amendment would have prohibited illegals from collecting "Social Security benefits as a result of unlawful activity."

While Mrs. Stabenow went on to vote against the overall Senate immigration bill, she provided the deciding vote that would allow aliens to collect Social Security benefits for illegal work, even if that work had been done using forged documents. And today, that provision remains part of the Senate immigration bill.

Watching the polls

Despite the hostile environment for incumbents here, the Stabenow campaign still takes solace in the poll numbers, which show Mrs. Stabenow more than 10 points ahead of Mr. Bouchard.

The Bouchard campaign notes that her support, however, hovers around 50 percent. With plenty of undecided voters remaining, Mr. Bouchard hopes to see his numbers rise as people across the expansive state learn more about him and hear more about Mrs. Stabenow's positions on key issues.

An ace in Mr. Bouchard's pocket, his campaign says, is Oakland County, which has been trending Democratic in recent elections and is the state's second largest county. In 2004 — when Mr. Bush lost the county — Mr. Bouchard won with more than 60 percent of the vote.

Stabenow supporters say the senator has worked tirelessly on constituent services and that voters here relate better to common-touch Democrats than pro-business Republicans.

"What you have to ask yourself is if you're better off now than you were four years ago," says Jack Childress, a General Motors retiree who supports Mrs. Stabenow. "If you answer that honestly, you won't vote for no Republican."

But Mr. Bouchard is hardly a corporate Republican in a pin-stripe suit. At a carnival in this downtrodden, industrial suburb of Detroit, he rides up in a pack of motorcycles on his Harley-Davidson Road King.

Mr. Katinsky, who calls himself a "closet Republican," also doesn't fit the usual description of a Republican. Wearing yellow machinist's glasses, seven earrings and a long braided pony tail, he asks for a picture with Mr. Bouchard.

Though most of his neighbors are Democrats, he said they desperately want jobs to return to the state. Also, they're alarmed by the influx of illegal aliens who are taking many of the jobs that pay little but are jobs nonetheless.

"Everybody I know wants these borders locked up," he said. "How is that racist? It might be anti-noncitizen, but it ain't racist."

After milling around the carnival with voters for about an hour, Mr. Bouchard stops to talk to a man who is unshaven, smoking a cigarette and wearing thick, military-issue glasses. The man says he's out of work. Mr. Bouchard tells him that he intends to make Michigan a better place to do business.

"Bush is killing us," the man says, shaking Mr. Bouchard's hand. "You got my vote."

GOP Zeroing In On Mollohan's Problems (WP)

By Chris Cillizza And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

MORGANTOWN, W.Va., Sept. 28 -- Nine college-age guys stood silently Thursday morning across the street from Rep. Alan B. Mollohan's (W.Va.) office, holding signs that read "Be My Cellmate" and "Man of Steal."

They were trying to bring attention to allegations that the Democratic incumbent used his congressional power to get rich and reward friends. But few people were listening. "We just want some answers," says Tommy Phillips, 25, who helped organize the rather flaccid protest.

DOJ_NMG_0071032

There is only one way for Republicans to win in this Democratic district: convince voters that Mollohan is a crook. The lunchtime protest is the least sophisticated part of a destroy-the-Democrat strategy that includes operatives in Washington, a rich home builder in Texas, conservative activists in this college town and challenger Chris Wakim himself.

The target is the 12-term representative's complicated financial dealings. Mollohan, a member of the Appropriations Committee, set up several nonprofit groups over the past decade or so to administer millions of dollars he was steering to his rural district. The money benefited friends and big donors.

In a four-year period starting in 2000, Mollohan's net worth ballooned from about $500,000 to more than $6 million. The chief reason for his newfound wealth was real estate investments with one of those friends who benefited from his work in Congress. Mollohan has denied any wrongdoing, saying he was simply helping his district by maximizing its share of federal money.

That is a point that resonates with many voters here. But as the controversy reached a boil this spring, Mollohan was forced to step down from the House ethics committee. He also admitted he misstated some of his financial dealings in public records.

"He was clearly sacking the treasury and stuffing it in his own pockets," Wakim said of Mollohan. "I'm running on the idea that you can trust your congressman."

But scandal alone might not be enough to topple the popular incumbent. As Democrats are finding out in several key races, voters often seem more concerned about local issues than charges of ethical lapses.

Mollohan shows why. Since succeeding his father in Congress in 1982, he has faced only one tough race. That was 14 years ago, when redistricting forced a primary showdown with a fellow Democrat. Mollohan won that race with 61 percent and has coasted through elections ever since.

When news of the Mollohan scandal broke on the front page of the Wall Street Journal, many thought the incumbent was in trouble. But Democratic opposition researchers discovered that Wakim had lied about his rÃ©sumÃ©. Wakim acknowledged some padding but called the furor an attempt to distract voters.

There has been no public polling in the race. Republicans admit that Wakim's rÃ©sumÃ© inflation hampered his attempts to cast the race as a referendum on the incumbent's ethical lapses. But they still think Mollohan can be beaten -- if enough attention is paid, via TV ads, to his finances.

A big part of this effort rests on the shoulders of Texas builder Bob Perry, who has invested $5 million in a group calling itself the Economic Freedom Fund. With Wakim at a clear fundraising disadvantage in the race, Perry is blanketing the 1st District with ads attacking Mollohan's ethics. The group is also sending direct mail and calling voters.

Wakim is running ads of his own that allege Mollohan has "been too busy helping himself and his friends to do the job for us."

Mollohan has not sat on his hands either. He has been unloading on Wakim on television over the past month while touting his own ability to deliver for West Virginia -- a potentially powerful message in a state so dependent on federal largess.

Of his critics, Mollohan said, "They are trying to make all this good look bad."

Challenger Seeks Probe Of Rep. Foley's E-Mails To Boy, 16 (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

The Democratic opponent of Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) is calling for an investigation into an e-mail exchange that Foley conducted last year with a 16-year-old boy who had worked as a congressional page.

Foley, 52, has served in the House for six terms and is seeking reelection. He said that the five e-mails he wrote to the boy were harmless and that their publication is part of an attempt by Democrats to smear him.

"The e-mails in question were a response to a handwritten thank-you letter from a former page," said Jason Kello, Foley's spokesman. "There have not been any allegations made by anyone except by Tim Mahoney and the Democrats who are attempting to misrepresent a series of innocent communications to prop up a failing political campaign."

Jessica Santillo, a spokeswoman for Mahoney, a Venus, Fla., rancher and business executive who is running against Foley, said in a written statement: "This is a matter for the appropriate authorities to investigate."

DOJ_NMG_0071033

In the brief but chatty e-mails, which were first reported by ABC News, Foley asked how old the boy was, inquired what he wanted for his birthday, requested a picture of the young man and told him that he had just finished a long bike ride and was going to the gym.

According to ABC, the boy forwarded the e-mail that requested his picture to an unidentified congressional staffer and wrote that the e-mail was "sick sick sick sick sick." In another e-mail to a staffer, ABC reported, the boy wrote: "Maybe it is just me being paranoid, but seriously. This freaked me out."

Kello, the Foley spokesman, declined to identify the boy.

Kello said that around the time the boy was leaving his job as a page, or House floor assistant, in the summer of 2005, the boy handed Foley a card "thanking him for being a friendly face." The boy then returned to his home in Louisiana.

Foley kept in touch with him, especially around the time of Hurricane Katrina. "He was concerned about the kid because he knew he was from Louisiana," Kello said.

The e-mail, which ended "send me a pic of you as well," began, "How are you weathering the hurricane . . . are you safe." Kello said Foley asked what the boy wanted for his birthday because in a previous e-mail, a copy of which has not been published, the boy had informed the congressman that he was celebrating a birthday.

Kello also said that it is not unusual for someone from Foley's office to seek photographs to keep on file in case people seek recommendations.

Foley was familiar and friendly in his e-mails. In one, he wrote, "did you have fun at your conference" and "what stuff do you like to do." In another, he wrote, "Glad your home safe and sound" and "its nice here . . . been raining today." In a third, Foley referred to someone named Will and said, "hes such a nice guy . . . acts much older than his age . . . and hes in really great shape."

Lawmaker Questioned On E-Mails To Page (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — A Republican House member from Florida who was expected to cruise to reelection faced questions Thursday about the propriety of e-mails he sent to a teenage page on Capitol Hill, potentially adding to the GOP's political struggles as it attempts to maintain its congressional majority.

Six-term Rep. Mark Foley, a member of the powerful Ways and Means Committee and chairman of the House Entertainment Industry Task Force, is being made to explain a series of e-mails he sent in 2005 in which he asked the page how old he was and requested a photo.

The e-mails, copies of which were obtained by The Times, indicate that the boy, 16, then complained to another congressional staff member, noting: "Maybe it is just me being paranoid, but seriously. This freaked me out."

In another e-mail sent to the page, Foley, 52, said of a second teenager working on Capitol Hill, "He's in such great shape."

A Foley spokesman acknowledged that the congressman had sent the e-mails to the page. But the spokesman said they reflected nothing more than an innocent interest in helping young people.

"It was encouragement for a person who was interested in politics," said Jason Kello, noting that the page had written Foley a thank-you note after his service was over.

"This is character assassination in the worst," Kello said, blaming the campaign of Foley's Democratic opponent, Tim Mahoney.

The Mahoney campaign released a statement Thursday disavowing any involvement in the release of the e-mails, which have been floating around Capitol Hill for months.

Mahoney, a businessman new to politics, was widely considered a long shot for Foley's seat, which has attracted relatively little attention from the national parties as they battle for control of Capitol Hill.

But the e-mails have become news in Foley's district; the NBC television affiliate in West Palm Beach, Fla., broadcast a story on them Thursday.

Some of the e-mails were posted on the Internet by a blogger over the weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0071034

Teenage pages, who come to Washington from around the country and serve primarily as messengers in and around the Capitol, were at the center of controversy two decades ago when two congressman were accused of having sex with pages. The scandals generated new ethics rules banning such liaisons.

Republicans In Ohio Say Motivating Voters Is Harder This Year (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil

Bloomberg, September 29, 2006

Sept. 28 (Bloomberg) -- For a brief time on Election Night 2004, Scott Owens was one of the most important Republicans in America.

Owens, the party's executive director in Ohio's Butler County -- which encompasses Cincinnati's heavily Republican suburbs -- was calling vote tallies in to the White House. When Ken Mehlman, President George W. Bush's campaign manager, interrupted the sixth update to yell ``You rock!'' Owens knew he'd delivered enough of a victory margin to give Bush the state -- and the election -- over Democrat John Kerry.

Two years later, Ohio again looms as a battleground as Republicans try to hang onto control of Congress. This time, Owens says he's worried that when he phones his tallies into Mehlman, the news may not be cause for celebration.

Mehlman, now chairman of the Republican National Committee, is counting on Owens's organization to save Republican Senator Mike DeWine and House incumbent Steve Chabot, both of whom trail in their re-election bids. With Ohio Republicans reeling from scandals and Bush's low poll ratings, Owens says party voters are a dispirited bunch.

``It's just a different atmosphere,'' he said in an interview. ``The enthusiasm isn't there. In 2004, we had 950 volunteers'' to help spur voter turnout. ``They just believed in George W. Bush. This year, we have maybe 150, tops. I'll ask people if they can make phone calls or go door-to-door and they'll say, `Um, let me check my schedule.'"

Data-Mining

The key to the Republicans' turnout machine is computerized data-mining, which identifies even tiny blocs of GOP-leaning partisans, and cadres of volunteers that contact voters in their communities and get them to the polls.

The technique was perfected in 2004, when Ohio was at the forefront of the turnout wars. Democrats relied on union members and paid canvassers; Republicans put their faith in micro- targeting and community-based appeals.

While Democrats boosted their vote with gains in cities such as Cleveland and Columbus, the Republicans prevailed by doing even better in suburbs and rural areas.

Kerry got 10,000 more votes in Butler County than nominee Al Gore did in 2000. But while Gore lost the county to Bush by 20,000 votes, Bush's 2004 surge swamped Kerry, who wound up losing by 53,000 votes.

By using advanced marketing-research techniques to increase their margins, Republicans duplicated their Butler County feat in pockets of support all over Ohio. In the process, they sealed their reputation as the leaders in voter mobilization.

Missing in Action

This year, a repeat of the party's Ohio heroics may prove difficult. With Republicans on the defensive in the state, many of Owens's foot soldiers are missing in action.

To be sure, Republicans' faltering efforts in Ohio may represent a worst-case-scenario. Compared to their opposition, Republicans have more advanced voter-identification technology, more money, and, thanks to a 72-hour voter-contact blitz they mount in the final days of a campaign, a reputation as better closers than the Democrats.

According to Federal Election Commission reports, the RNC raised $176 million through the end of August, versus $97 million for the Democratic National Committee. Some of that cash is reserved for late advertising, while Mehlman has pledged up to $60 million for activities to motivate party voters to turn out.

Energized Democrats

The Republicans' concern is that polls show, to this point at least, it's the Democrats who are more energized about the election. The challenges faced by Owens in Ohio and his counterparts in other states are one reason that Democrats are banking on their own turnout drives to recapture the House of Representatives and, if a political tsunami hits, perhaps the Senate. Democrats need to gain 15 seats to take the House and six to grab the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0071035

In the previous election, Republicans ``had Bush and the perfect foil in Kerry to turn out their vote," said Tom O'Donnell, a consultant to Democrat Sherrod Brown, an Ohio Senate candidate. ``This year, it's much harder to galvanize their voters."

Ohio is further complicated for Republicans this year because party office-holders have been enmeshed in scandals. Republican Governor Bob Taft pleaded guilty in August to a misdemeanor and paid a fine of $4,000 for failing to report golf outings with fund-raiser Tom Noe. Ohio Representative Robert Ney is under pressure to resign after pleading guilty to accepting illegal gifts from disgraced Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Backlash

A public backlash over the scandals has hurt Republicans across the board. A Columbus Dispatch poll released on Sept. 25 found Democratic gubernatorial candidate Ted Strickland leading Republican Ken Blackwell by 19 percent, and had Brown holding a 5-point lead over incumbent Republican Senator DeWine. The survey was mailed to 1,791 registered voters and has a margin of error of plus or minus 2 percentage points.

And in a state where Republicans hold the governor's mansion and control the state legislature, a Sept. 20 University of Cincinnati survey found that about 7 in 10 likely voters said Ohio is on the ``wrong track."

George Lang is a trustee of the Butler County township of West Chester, where no Democrats hold office. He says dismay over the Iraq war is likely to depress turnout. ``Republicans are going to take some hits, state-wide and nationwide," Lang said. ``This war in Iraq? Core Republicans are not where the president is. More and more are of the opinion that we should get out."

Malls and Subdivisions

While much of central Ohio is in a Rust Belt swoon, Butler County is a bustling place where farmland is being turned into upscale subdivisions and horse farms are converted into tony shopping malls.

This year, the county Republican Party will operate out of new $850,000 headquarters. On a recent tour, a visitor found 10 volunteers manning phone banks. Republicans plan to ramp up to a seven-days-a-week operation between now and Election Day, and are recruiting volunteers at four different sites to make up to a 1,000 calls per night.

Joe Tellup of Oxford, a carpenter who assists in the party's Ohio turnout campaign, said it's tough finding other volunteers to call or knock on doors on behalf of the Republican Party. ``Regrettably, we're getting a lot of undecideds and `Nos,'" Tellup said.

Republicans' sagging morale puts even more pressure on Owens, because off-year elections often produce lower turnout. ``Some of our people have done things that have our people down and discouraged," Owens said of the scandals. ``I keep telling the state party, `This isn't the same train that was running two years ago.' "

It's Not Easy Getting Out Of The House (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, September 29, 2006

DES MOINES — Jim Nussle is one of Washington's major players — an eight-term Republican who has led the powerful House Budget Committee since 2001.

But as Nussle seeks to move from the House of Representatives to become Iowa's next governor, his formidable Washington résumé is one of the last things he talks to voters about as he barnstorms the state.

At a breakfast for Iowa professional developers last week, the words “Washington” and “Congress” never pass Nussle's lips as he outlines his budget, health care and education plans.

Meanwhile, his opponent, Iowa Secretary of State Chet Culver, raises Nussle's Washington tenure at every opportunity.

“He's part of the D.C. culture of cronyism and corruption,” Culver says. “He's got a lot of baggage, and we're not going to be shy about pointing that out.”

Nussle rejects the notion that his House experience is a drag on his statewide election chances and says Iowa voters want to hear about his plans for the future, not a rehash of his Washington past. “What's your plan? That's what voters want to know,” he says.

DOJ_NMG_0071036

Of 16 House members running for governor or the Senate this year, all but four either have suffered primary losses, trail their opponents in polls or are locked in tossup races. A Sept. 17 poll by The Des Moines Register found the Culver-Nussle race a dead heat.

Historical data show it's never easy to seek promotion from the House. In 2000, 10 House members sought new jobs; two won.

Political analysts say low ratings for President Bush and Congress as an institution present a particularly challenging environment for House members. These lawmakers also get little bounce in local races from the GOP's major political strength in most polls: national security.

"It's a tough year to be a Republican, but it's particularly tough to be a Republican from Washington," says Peverill Squire, a political analyst at the University of Iowa.

Culver, son of former U.S. senator John Culver and Iowa secretary of State since 1999, hammers Nussle on the growth of the federal budget deficit during the time he has headed the Budget Committee. Other Culver targets: Nussle's opposition to expanding federal funding for research using embryonic stem cells and his support for the new Medicare prescription-drug benefit.

"Congressman Nussle isn't working for Iowans in Congress," Culver says. "Iowa voters are not going to fall for the Nussle hustle."

Nussle responds by saying that he has a record of strong leadership and that it's "easy to say that budget plus Nussle equals deficit. What's more difficult is to come up with a plan to actually govern."

In races from Florida to Hawaii, House members are facing similarly tough races for new jobs. Nussle is one of nine House members seeking to be chief executive of his home state — the most to run for governor in 30 years.

Polls show Ohio Democrat Ted Strickland and Idaho Republican C.L. "Butch" Otter with double-digit leads in their gubernatorial bids. In Senate races, polls show Vermont independent Bernie Sanders and Maryland Democrat Ben Cardin with double-digit leads.

Nebraska Republican Tom Osborne lost a gubernatorial primary in May, and Hawaii Democrat Ed Case lost a primary bid to unseat Sen. Daniel Akaka on Saturday. Meanwhile, the other 10 members of Congress seeking new jobs feel Nussle's pain. Some examples:

•In Wisconsin, Republican Mark Green trails Democratic incumbent Gov. James Doyle by 45% to 40%, according to a poll released Wednesday by the Wisconsin Policy Research Institute.

Doyle "wants to blame poor Mark Green for all the federal budget deficits that there have ever been," says Charles Franklin, a political analyst at the University of Wisconsin.

•In the Florida governor's race, Democratic Rep. Jim Davis trails Republican Charlie Crist 51% to 36%, according to an Orlando Sentinel poll out Wednesday.

University of South Florida political scientist Susan McManus says one issue that could hurt Davis is his attendance record in Congress while running for governor. Davis has missed about one-fourth of the roll call votes cast in the current two-year congressional term.

"People remember that kind of thing," McManus says. "It has to do with the fact that people are kind of down on Congress right now."

•In Colorado's race for governor, Republican Rep. Bob Beauprez trails Democrat Bill Ritter 50% to 33%, according to a Rocky Mountain News poll published Sept. 14.

Colorado College political analyst Bob Loevy says Ritter likes to ask Beauprez, when a specific issue comes up: "Well, you were a member of Congress. Why didn't you do something about it?"

Loevy cautions, however, that while anti-Congress sentiment is an issue in the race, it is dwarfed by more local concerns such as Beauprez's opposition to a 2005 referendum that allowed the state to keep millions in tax revenue

Thomas Mann, a congressional expert at the Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank, also warns against making too much of the trouble House members seem to be having seeking other posts.

DOJ_NMG_0071037

Mann says that while there are “ample signs of a negative referendum on President Bush and the Republican Party,” there are not indications of general opposition to incumbents, regardless of party.

The struggle House members are having running for the Senate or governor “likely reflects factors peculiar to each race,” he says.

House members like Nussle, however, may feel they have a common burden to bear. While Nussle was stuck in Washington last week trying to wrap up the legislative session, Culver was at the state Capitol, receiving the endorsement of a group of 20,000 Iowa health care professionals.

“We've spent a lot of time over the last four years trying to track down Congressman Nussle,” says Sarah Swisher, director of Iowa for Health Care. “He's a hard guy to get answers from.”

Effort Aims To Push Muslims To The Polls (WP)

By Michelle Boorstein

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

National Muslim civic leaders announced a new push yesterday to get the country's estimated 2.2 million registered Muslim voters to the polls, unveiling a Web site that spells out key races of "Muslim interest" and ATM-like voter registration machines that will be put in mosques and Islamic student centers.

The campaign by the Washington-based Muslim American Society is a continuation of an effort that has been underway since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks to increase American Muslims' involvement in the political process. A 2005 survey by the Muslim American Political Action Committee said 84 percent of registered Muslims voted in the November 2004 election, compared with 41 percent in 2000.

The efforts are getting more tailored, Muslim leaders said in announcing the creation of the society's Center for Electoral Empowerment. The center's main feature is a Web site that offers details on issues that the political action committee says are the most important to Muslim voters: concerns about "the erosion of civil liberties," "fair" immigration reform and foreign policy, said Mukit Hossain, president of MAPAC.

The site, http://www.masvip.org , highlights 30 races in 11 states where there are significant Muslim populations, including Illinois, New Jersey, California and Texas.

The focus on Muslim voting -- both by Muslim American leaders and political candidates -- rose again after the 2004 election, when the Muslim vote moved significantly away from the Republican Party.

According to a September 2004 poll conducted by Zogby International for Georgetown University's Project MAPS, 76 percent of Muslims backed the Kerry-Edwards ticket, compared with 7 percent for Bush-Cheney. This was a significant change from 2000, when President Bush received 42 percent of the Muslim vote compared with Al Gore's 31 percent.

In one example of increased candidate interest in the Muslim vote, the annual Virginia Muslim Civic Picnic, held in August for Virginia candidates and sponsored by the Virginia Muslim Political Action Committee, attracted 37 candidates last year, compared with two in 2001.

Estimates vary widely of the number of Muslims in the United States, from 3 million to 7 million, and polls of U.S. Muslim political behavior also show discrepancies.

However, polls and anecdotal research from civic leaders agree that Muslims have become much more involved in elections, not just in philanthropy and other civic work.

Now, Muslim leaders said yesterday, many Muslim Americans don't like the consequences of not participating, said Mahdi Bray, executive director of the Muslim American Society's civic training arm, the Freedom Foundation.

"Now I have a double whammy: I have to worry about driving while black and flying while Muslim," Bray said. "I say to Muslims -- take your souls to the polls."

The MAPAC's 2005 survey found that the largest segment of registered Muslim American voters, by age, is people between the ages of 25 and 34; 25 percent of all voters were in this age category. Women in that age group were the largest single segment of Muslim American voters.

Amtrak Requests Yet More Money (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0071038

By Sean Lengell

The Washington Times, September 29, 2006

The survival of Amtrak rides on providing reliable, on-time service between major cities, the railroad's new boss told lawmakers yesterday.

But to meet this goal, the ailing passenger rail service must find new sources of money to supplement the billion-plus federal dollars it receives annually, said Amtrak President and Chief Executive Officer Alex Kummant.

"You just can't escape that the answer is capital," Mr. Kummant said during a House Transportation and Infrastructure railroads subcommittee hearing. "There is no other magic bullet."

Mr. Kummant, who took control of Amtrak Sept. 12, offered few specifics on how to improve the railroad. But he said issuing bonds, securing state financing or wooing private investors are possibilities.

"I don't know what the right answer is," he said. "We just need to take a look at all the options."

The Senate has backed a plan to boost annual Amtrak subsidies to $1.4 billion, while the House has approved a $1.1 billion budget. The Bush administration wants to split up Amtrak, shift some of the cost of operations to states and significantly cut federal subsidies.

Even the Senate's more generous proposal isn't enough to pay for needed infrastructure, such as bridge and tunnel improvements, that could help alleviate frequent delays that have plagued the railroad for years, Mr. Kummant said.

Amtrak, which carries 22 million riders a year, also must work with freight carriers, which own and share most of the tracks Amtrak uses, to devise better schedules between passenger and freight trains.

"At a time of high oil prices, growing highway and airport congestion ... we should be embracing rail and developing it as quickly and as responsibly as we can," Mr. Kummant said. "We should go beyond the debate of a few hundred million dollars of operating costs and begin to realize the potential rail passenger service has to offer with the right level of investment."

Amtrak's future lies with its "rail corridors" -- service between large cities 300 to 500 miles apart -- the railroad's fastest-growing service, he said.

"I hope that in my time at Amtrak we will continue to see more corridor growth and the realization of a federal and state funding partnership for these corridors," Mr. Kummant said.

Rep. John L. Mica, Florida Republican, said Amtrak must look at possibly privatizing its popular Northeast Corridor, which is among the railroad's most successful routes.

"The Northeastern Corridor is very important -- it's the only real hard asset you've got," said Mr. Mica, a longtime proponent of privatizing at least a portion of Amtrak. "Simple math will tell you you're not going to get ahead building your infrastructure" without private money.

Mr. Kummant said he had no immediate plans for the Northeast corridor.

"The only mandate I have from the [Amtrak] board is to run a safe and efficient railroad," he said.

Rep. Leonard L. Boswell, Iowa Democrat, urged Mr. Kummant not to forsake rural routes on behalf of corridor service.

"I understand the importance of the East Coast and the West Coast, but we're a United States and we have to connect together," Mr. Boswell said.

Mr. Kummant, who previously served as regional vice president of the Union Pacific Railroad, the biggest U.S. railroad, inherits a rail service with a bumpy past and uncertain future.

Amtrak never has been profitable since it was created by Congress in 1971, acquiring debt of more than $3.5 billion. Its operating loss its last fiscal year, which ended Sept. 30, 2005, topped $550 million.

Amtrak's former top executive, David L. Gunn, was fired in November after opposing the Bush administration's proposal to break up the railroad. David Hughes served as interim CEO.

Beneficiaries Of CITGO Heating Oil Program Having Second Thoughts (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, September 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0071039

BOSTON - For 42 years, Agnes Crosson has lived in the same three-bedroom house in Quincy, Mass., where she's often visited by her 14 grandchildren. Heating her high-ceiling home during New England's long, cold winters has become increasingly expensive for the former social worker.

Enter Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

Last winter, Crosson enrolled in a heating oil program backed by CITGO Petroleum, controlled by the Venezuelan government, to fill her 250-gallon heating oil tank. She saved $200 on the purchase.

Despite the savings, Crosson is having second thoughts about re-enrolling this year after reading about Chavez's speech last week at the U.N. General Assembly. Chavez called President Bush "the devil" and U.S. policies "genocidal."

"I'm not a Bush person, believe me," said the trim, 75-year-old widow, "but I really resented that."

Chavez has said his comments were directed at Bush and not at the American people, but many of the program's beneficiaries are wondering if the CITGO initiative is a tool in Chavez's anti-Bush crusade, as many Chavez critics believe. Still, their condemnations are tempered by growing nervousness over how to pay for heating, and most hope that the program continues.

Last winter, CITGO distributed more than 4 million gallons of discounted heating oil to 50,000 households in Massachusetts - a big chunk of the 16 million gallons delivered in eight states, according to the Venezuelan Embassy in Washington. Households get a 40 percent one-time discount on 200 gallons purchased.

CITGO has a long-running presence in Massachusetts, where it employs 3,500 and controls 300 gas stations. The CITGO sign in Boston's Kenmore Square, visible past the left field wall at Fenway Park, is considered a local landmark.

Controversy over CITGO and its oil program was stoked by Chavez's U.N. speech. One local politician even proposed replacing the CITGO sign with a U.S. flag.

Venezuela denied that its initiative is a political ploy.

"The program is a humanitarian outreach to people hurt by events beyond their control," according to the Venezuelan Embassy. "It is not intended to embarrass the United States or be seen as a geopolitical move."

Chavez and CITGO have relentlessly promoted the program, taking out full-page ads in U.S. newspapers and producing a glossy booklet, "From the Venezuelan Heart to the U.S. Hearts," with testimonials by grateful politicians and beneficiaries.

In April, 63 beneficiaries were flown to Caracas, Venezuela, to discuss the program with Chavez in a televised event.

And the day after his U.N. speech, Chavez went to a Harlem church and, as TV cameras whirred, announced the program will expand beyond its Northeast core to reach 450,000 households - almost tripling the previous total - in 17 states this winter, including Virginia, Alaska and Wisconsin.

Venezuelan officials are also considering setting aside 30 percent of the revenue from heating oil sales to fund community programs.

Many Boston beneficiaries are grateful. Yushanna Eutsay, a 30-year-old mother of three, said Chavez seemed "like a very nice man" who was "doing more for his people than Bush is for us."

Still, the U.N. speech has cost Chavez support. Rep. Bill Delahunt, the Democrat who represents Quincy and a backer of the heating oil program, co-wrote a letter with Rep. Gregory Meeks, D-N.Y., condemning the "gratuitous personal attack" on Bush as "a direct insult to the people of the United States."

John Baldacci, the Democratic governor of Maine, which received 8 million gallons of discounted heating oil last winter, said that "based on current events," he won't renew his agreement with CITGO.

But some heating oil beneficiaries, the poor people Chavez says he wants to help, are perplexed by his outburst, which included repeated references to the smell of sulfur around the podium where Bush had spoken earlier.

"He stepped out of line," said Linda Kelly, 45, who suffers from multiple sclerosis. She was a member of the delegation that visited Caracas in April.

The ceremony launching the CITGO program was held at Kelly's home on Nov. 22, as a delivery truck pumped heating oil into her tank.

She worried that the controversy will end the CITGO initiative.

"The important thing is that our children are warm at night," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0071040

Concern over winter heating bills have triggered hundreds of calls inquiring about the CITGO initiative, said Brian O'Connor, a spokesman with Citizens Energy Corp., a nonprofit group run by former Rep. Joseph P. Kennedy II of Massachusetts. Citizens Energy helped set up the program.

The price of a gallon of heating oil jumped from $1.65 a gallon in 2004 to $2.61 a gallon last year. It now sells for about $2.50 a gallon.

Other U.S. oil corporations, noted O'Connor, have declined to participate in similar programs despite large profits.

Most Uninsured Children Have A Parent Who Works (LAT)

By Moises Mendoza

The Los Angeles Times, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — A majority of the 9 million children in the United States who lack health insurance live in two-parent families in which at least one parent is working, according to a report released Thursday by a healthcare advocacy group.

In many of these families, one parent or both either have jobs that do not offer insurance or do not make enough to afford the coverage offered by their employers, the report by Families USA found.

These children are much less likely to get regular medical or dental care and are five times as likely to have unmet healthcare needs as insured children, said the report, which was prepared for the Campaign for Children's Health Care, a group that is seeking comprehensive health insurance coverage for all children.

California has more than 1.3 million uninsured children, the report said, more than any other state.

They include 16-year-old Michael Duckworth of Mi-Wuk Village, near Yosemite National Park, who was diagnosed with grand mal seizures in January. Because his family has no health insurance, his parents can't afford to take him to a neurologist until late this year, when a plan at his father's new job takes effect.

"It's a very scary time right now," said his mother, Shannon.

In most states, families with incomes of as much as twice the federal poverty level — for a family of three, that would be $33,200 — can enroll their children in the State Children's Health Insurance Program, or SCHIP, a federal and state government-sponsored plan to aid people who make too much to qualify for Medicare.

California allows enrollment of children whose families make as much as 250% of the poverty level, or $41,500 for a family of three. The vast majority of the state's uninsured children are eligible for the program.

But according to the report, financial constraints are affecting the ability of states to ensure that all eligible children are enrolled. To save money, the report said, some states have frozen their SCHIP plans, preventing eligible children from being enrolled.

SCHIP must be reauthorized by Congress next year, and it faces a funding shortfall of nearly $1 billion in fiscal 2007.

Two-thirds of uninsured children qualify for some form of government-sponsored insurance program, the report said, but some families are not aware of the options. And complex regulations often discourage people from signing up, said Andy Schneider, a senior advisor at the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, which advocates for the poor.

Other families such as the Duckworths, with incomes too large to qualify for government insurance but too small to make private coverage affordable, fall through the cracks.

The uninsured sometimes put off seeing a physician for months or years, which can lead to higher healthcare costs later on.

Some activists and members of Congress say that if Democrats win a congressional majority in the November election, they will push harder for universal healthcare coverage.

"I think you're seeing some real pressure building as fewer and fewer people are getting employment-based benefits," said Rep. Pete Stark (D-Fremont), who has introduced legislation to provide health insurance to all children by 2012. "I'm sensing a strong feeling throughout the country that we need to get healthcare for all."

Union Blocks Foreign Healthcare Plan (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, September 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0071041

ATLANTA

Carl Garrett, an Appalachian paper mill worker, had hoped to go to India this month for medical care - but it didn't work out that way.

The planned journey to New Delhi by Mr. Garrett, a Leicester, N.C., resident wasn't just about fixing his aching left shoulder. His employer, Blue Ridge Paper Products of Canton, N.C., wanted to send a message to American hospitals: Control costs or we'll give our insured workers the option of going overseas for quality, but low-cost care.

Garrett, who belongs to the United Steelworkers, would have been the first union member to go overseas for medical care. But after his pioneering trip became public, the union stepped in and threatened to file an injunction to stop it.

In response, Blue Ridge Paper withdrew the proposal to send its employee to India for surgery. So two days before Garrett was to leave, he had to unpack his bags.

The union, which recently negotiated a new contract with the milk-carton factory containing healthcare provisions for its members, worried that volunteer trips overseas to receive medical care would soon become mandatory even for children and the elderly as companies seek to cut costs and increase profits.

Garrett's case shows how the tug-of-war between labor and corporations on healthcare options "is having a tremendous impact on how we live on a day to day basis," says Norm Solomon, a labor expert at Fairfield University in Connecticut. "If costs keep going up the way they have, it's going to be difficult to maintain them in unionized firms."

American workers' healthcare costs have risen 60 percent in the past five years, according to a new study by HR consultants TowersPerrin. Those cost increases are not only being borne directly by employees, but companies are cutting an average of 1 percent off annual raises to contain healthcare expenditures, TowersPerrin concludes.

Garrett's trip was intended to be a test case for Blue Ridge Paper's plan to offer its employees and their dependents the option of seeking medical care overseas beginning in 2007. For several years, the company failed in its attempt to obtain discounts from healthcare providers for its 5,000 covered workers.

The self-insured company decided to contract with IndUShealth, a Raleigh, N.C., firm that sends patients to Indian hospitals for major savings compared with American hospital care.

Garrett quickly volunteered, mostly for the financial incentive. The operations he was scheduled to have would have cost $20,000 in India compared with about $100,000 in the US. The trip was expected to save the company $50,000, and he was being given a share of the company's total savings. Aside from not retiring in medical debt, Garrett was eager for the opportunity to see the Taj Mahal as part of a two-day tour before his procedure.

But the plan alarmed the USW. "We made it clear that if healthcare was going to be resolved, it would be resolved by modifying the system in the US, not by offshoring or exporting our own people [to receive medical care]," says union representative Stan Johnson, who stepped in to stop Garrett's trip. The USW has more than 850,000 members.

In mid-September, USW president Leo Gerard used the Blue Ridge example in a letter to Congress, calling the possibility of health insurance plans forcing workers and their families to travel overseas for care "frightening."

USW's protest comes at a time when insurance companies from Michigan to Florida, and even the state of West Virginia, are researching overseas healthcare options in order to reduce costs.

At the Blue Ridge Paper plant the union's reaction was met with dismay, says Garrett, who has worked at the company for 40 years. "People had given me so much encouragement, so much positive response, and they're devastated," he says. "A lot of people were waiting for me to report back on how it went and perhaps go themselves. This leaves them in limbo, too."

But Tom Keesling of IndUShealth calls the defunct trip an "isolated incident."

"The basic motivation of this kind of offshoring is not to take US jobs, but to preserve US jobs," says Mr. Keesling. "The challenge is there's a giant freight train called healthcare that is barreling down, so someone has to do something."

Rose Kennedy's Life, In Her Own Words (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0071042

BOSTON, Sept. 28 (AP) — Rose Kennedy, for one brief moment the most powerful mother in America, went over her son President John F. Kennedy's head in 1962 to write directly to the Russian leader Nikita S. Khrushchev. For that, she got a playful scolding from her son.

She wrote a letter asking Khrushchev to autograph photographs of his meeting with her son, and he complied.

"Would you be sure to let me know in the future any contacts you have with heads of state," Kennedy wrote to his mother on White House stationery on Nov. 3, 1962, just days after the Cuban missile crisis ended. "Requests of this nature are subject to interpretations and therefore I would like to have you clear them before they are sent."

Unfazed, Mrs. Kennedy wrote back: "Dear Jack: I am so glad you warned me about contacting heads of state as I was just about to write to Castro."

The exchange is in Rose Fitzgerald Kennedy's papers — 250 boxes of letters, photographs, notes — that became available to the public for the first time on Thursday at the John F. Kennedy Presidential Library and Museum in Boston.

The eldest daughter of a former Boston mayor, John F. Fitzgerald, who also was a congressman, Rose Fitzgerald married Joseph P. Kennedy. Their 1914 Wedding Log, which is part of the collection, shows that they traveled to Philadelphia on their honeymoon to watch the Boston Braves in a World Series game at Shibe Park.

As a teenager she became comfortable on the campaign trail with her father, said James Wagner, the exhibits specialist at the library. That came in handy during her son's 1960 presidential campaign, when she visited more than a dozen states.

A six-page draft of a stump speech she gave in Wisconsin in 1960 includes her revisions.

"On the dais up until the last minute, she'd be revamping her speech," Mr. Wagner said. "She was a very comfortable public speaker. She would write her own speeches and edit them."

Bush's Conception Conflict (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

It was, I believe, Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) who first made the excellent, bitter and terribly unfair joke about conservatives who believe in a right to life that begins at conception and ends at birth.

This joke has been adapted for use against various Republican politicians ever since. In the case of President Bush, though, it appears to be literally true.

Bush, as we know, believes deeply and earnestly that human life begins at conception. Even tiny embryos composed of a half-dozen microscopic cells, he thinks, have the same right to life as you and I do. That is why he cannot bring himself to allow federal funding for research on new lines of embryonic stem cells or even for other projects in labs where stem cell research is going on. Even though these embryos are obtained from fertility clinics, where they would otherwise be destroyed anyway, and even though he appears to have no objection to the fertility clinics themselves, where these same embryos are manufactured and destroyed by the thousands -- nevertheless, the much smaller number of embryos needed and destroyed in the process of developing cures for diseases such as Parkinson's are, in effect, tiny little children whose use in this way constitutes killing a human being and therefore is intolerable.

But President Bush does not believe that the deaths of all little children as a result of U.S. policy are, in effect, murder. He thinks that some, while very unfortunate, are also inevitable and essential.

You know who I mean. Close to 50,000 Iraqi civilians have died so far as a direct result of our invasion and occupation of their country, in order to liberate them. The numbers are increasing as the country slides into chaos: more than 6,500 in July and August alone. These numbers are from reliable sources and are not seriously contested. They include many who were tortured and then killed, along with others blown up less personally by car bombs and suicide bombers. The number does not include the hundreds of thousands who have died prematurely as a result of a decade and a half of war and embargos imposed on the Iraqi economy. Nor does it include soldiers on both sides, most of whom are innocent, too. Last week the number of American soldiers killed in Iraq and Afghanistan surpassed the number of people who died in the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Bush is right, of course, that the inevitable loss of innocent life in wartime cannot be a reason not to go to war or a reason not to fight that war in a way intended to win. Eggs, omelets and all that. "Collateral damage" should be a consideration weighed in the balance. But there is no formula to determine when you have the balance right. It does seem to me that both our wars in Iraq were started and conducted with insufficient consideration for the cost in innocent blood. Callousness, naivete and isolation -- isolation of the decision makers from democratic accountability and isolation of citizens from the consequences, or even the awareness, of what is being done in their name -- all have played a role. I don't see anything coming out of this war that is worth 50,000 innocent lives, although a case can be made, I guess.

DOJ_NMG_0071043

But it is hard -- indeed, I would say it is impossible -- to reconcile Bush's absolutism over allegedly human life when it is a clump of unknowing, unfeeling cells with his sophisticated, if not cavalier, attitude toward the loss of innocent human life when it is children and adults in Iraq.

In all discussions weighing the cost of something or other in terms of human life, a philosopher pops up at this point and says that the crucial difference is a matter of intentions. Terrorists purposely target innocent civilians. We try hard not to kill innocent civilians, even if we know it can't be avoided. They're worse, even if our score is sadly higher.

But are stem cells any different? Stem cell researchers don't want to kill embryos. They know that the deaths of embryos are a consequence of what they do, and they think that curing terrible diseases is worth it -- just as President Bush thinks that bringing democracy to Iraq is worth it. In the case of stem cells, there is the added element that the embryos in question will be killed anyway (or pointlessly frozen indefinitely) if they are not used for research. And -- oh, yes -- there is still the question of whether a clump of a half-dozen cells you can't see without a microscope is actually a human being in the same sense as a 6-year-old girl blown up as she skips off to kindergarten in Baghdad.

A commander in chief who must face life-or-death questions such as these deserves a bit of sympathy. I would sympathize more with Bush if his answers weren't so preening and struggle-free. It is wonderful to be so morally pure that you won't allow a single embryo to be destroyed in the quest for medical cures that could save lives by the thousands. You are way beyond Gandhi, sweeping the path ahead to avoid stepping on an insect: Insects have more human characteristics than a six-cell embryo.

And regarding Iraq you are quite the man, aren't you, "making the tough decisions." A regular Harry Truman, consigning thousands to death in order to bring democracy and freedom and peace to millions. But Truman actually produced democracy and freedom and peace, whereas you want credit for your hopes. That's not how it works. If you want to be the hard-ass, you get judged by results. And you can't be Gandhi and Truman at the same time.

Kazakh President Opens Washington Stay (AP-Y)

By George Gedda

AP, September 28, 2006

Kazakhstan President Nursultan Nazarbayev is opening the official leg of a U.S. visit which is likely to include broad discussions of the country's growing importance as an oil supplier and its shortcomings in protecting human rights.

Nazarbayev spent part of Tuesday and Wednesday in Maine as guest of former President George H.W. Bush. Yachting was on their agenda. He will meet with President Bush at the White House on Friday.

On Thursday morning, Nazarbayev planned to unveil a monument to his country's independence at the Kazakh Embassy, located a short distance from the White House.

He also planned to host an evening reception at a local hotel, the theme of which is the nuclear disarmament efforts of the former Soviet republic.

Kazakhstan, a vast country north of Afghanistan and Iran that is nearly the size of Western Europe, is expected to pump 3.5 million barrels of oil a day in the coming decade.

Nazarbayev has been his country's only leader since it achieved independence in December 1991 and has brought stability and prosperity. Like those of most other Central Asian nations, however, Kazakhstan's record on democracy and protecting human rights is regarded as poor.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said Thursday that the U.S. government's concerns about democracy in Kazakhstan would come up during the meeting with Bush, but he would not characterize how big a place on the agenda it would hold.

DOJ_NMG_0071044

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice laid groundwork for Bush's discussion with Nazarbayev by meeting on Monday in New York with his foreign minister, Kassymzhomart Taokaev. Rice signaled that human rights will be on the agenda with Bush by inviting her chief aide on that issue, Barry Lowenkron, to join her at the meeting.

Freedom House, a pro-democracy group, said in a letter to Bush that Nazarbayev's visit offers Bush a "critical opportunity to reinforce your commitment to promoting democracy and human rights around the world."

It urged Bush not to support Kazakhstan's candidacy to chair the Organization of Security and Cooperation in Europe in 2009. The administration is said to oppose Kazakhstan's bid.

Martha Brill Olcott, a Kazakhstan specialist at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, predicted that Kazakhstan's candidacy will fall short.

"He's getting lunch, but he's not getting what he really wants," she said, alluding to Nazarbayev's White House visit on Friday.

Olcott added that Kazakhstan is a very friendly country in a part of the world where pro-American sentiment is not widespread. As for Nazarbayev's rights record, Olcott said, "The red carpet's been out for a lot worse dictators than this man."

Republican Rep. Christopher Smith of New Jersey, a staunch advocate of human rights, said in a statement to The Associated Press that Kazakhstan's record on human rights and democratization continues to leave a great deal to be desired.

"The president rightfully understands that good relations between our two countries are very much in our shared interest," Smith said. "However, in seeking better relations between our countries, we must insist Kazakhstan follow through on vital human rights and substantive democratic reforms sooner rather than later, especially if they want U.S. support for their bid for chair-in-office of the OSCE," he said.

Although Kazakhstan is located in Central Asia, it is a member of the predominantly European OSCE along with other former Soviet republics. The 55-member group is Europe's largest security organization.

Bush To Seal Strategic Link With Kazakh Leader (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Isabel Gorst

Financial Times, September 29, 2006

Nursultan Nazarbayev, Kazakhstan's president, comes to the White House on Friday confident that his role as an oil-rich and stable ally in the "war on terror" has trumped the US administration's professed sensibilities over his government's shortcomings in corruption, human rights and democratic reforms.

Nonetheless, the developing military and energy relationship between the US and the central Asian giant has led to accusations that President George W. Bush is reverting to the "guns for oil" strategy which his own administration argues created the "false stability" in the Middle East that spawned al-Qaeda.

Senior US officials would not comment on the possibility that Mr Nazarbayev's meeting with Mr Bush would result in an arms deal involving US sales of helicopters and patrol boats for the Caspian, a development that would be sure to antagonise Iran and Russia.

Richard Boucher, assistant secretary of state for that region, told the FT that "military co-operation" would be on the agenda. Kazakhstan has provided troops for Afghanistan and is clearing minefields in Iraq.

One of the prime goals of the US, according to official publications, has been to develop Kazakhstan's military away from its old Soviet framework towards more integration with the US, in air defence systems, communications and vehicles.

Asked about arms sales, a Pentagon spokesman said he had no information to provide "at this time". He expressed US appreciation for "Kazakhstan's support to the war on terrorism, their leadership in the region, and the strong US-Kazakh military-to-military relationship".

Mr Nazarbayev secured his invitation to the White House, and thereby a powerful validation of his international standing, after signing a long-delayed treaty with Azerbaijan sanctioning the transport of Kazakh oil via the Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan pipeline (BTC) across the Caucasus to the Turkish Mediterranean.

Transit contracts are now being negotiated. Mr Bush is expected to seek assurances that US oil companies' interests in huge Kazakh oil projects will be protected, and that Mr Nazarbayev will smooth negotiations for the delivery of his oil. The US is also pushing Kazakh-stan to approve construction of a natural gas export pipeline across the Caspian.

DOJ_NMG_0071045

The BTC project lies at the core of US Caspian policy to break Russia's dominance over oil export routes out of the landlocked region. The US is also sensitive to Kazakh needs to preserve good energy ties with Russia and China.

Mr Nazarbayev wants diplomatic support for his bid to chair the Organisation for Co-operation and Security in Europe (OSCE) in 2009. Both the US and the UK doubt Kazakhstan's fitness to chair an organisation dedicated to raising democratic standards. The US has asked Kazakhstan to postpone its bid to avoid a potentially humiliating rejection.

London and Washington are putting pressure on Kazakhstan to reform electoral laws, lift a ban on street demonstrations and annul restrictive new amendments to the media law. The assassination in February of Altynbek Sarsanbayev, a prominent member of the Kazakh opposition, hardened resistance to Kazakhstan's OSCE bid.

Mr Boucher said the US would raise its concerns over Kazakhstan's human rights record, "but you can't have a single-dimensional policy".

"We're not out there to overthrow governments or support colour revolutions," he told a Senate hearing this week.

The Bush administration is not expected to raise the issue of a continuing US court case against a US businessman accused of giving $78m (€61.4m, £41m) in bribes to Mr Nazarbayev and a former oil minister in the 1990s. Mr Nazarbayev is named as a recipient but has not been charged.

Energy On Agenda At Bush-Nazarbayev Talks (AFP)

By Stephen Collinson

AFP, September 29, 2006

US President George W. Bush welcomes Kazakhstan's President Nursultan Nazarbayev to the White House Friday, in the latest steps of the diplomatic dance over Central Asia's energy riches.

The visit finds Washington finessing worries over human rights and political reform to advance strategic and economic goals with Muslim-majority Kazakhstan, an emerging gas and oil giant also being courted by Russia and China.

In a moment of symbolism, Bush sent his Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman to join Nazarbayev at the Kazakh embassy in Washington to unveil a monument marking the former Soviet Republic's split from Moscow in 1991.

"I hope the outcome of our visit will bring our bilateral relations up to a new level," Nazarbayev said, after pulling a light-blue sheet from a 12-foot (three metre) monument of an ancient warrior astride a winged leopard.

Bodman said Americans and Kazakhs shared a common heritage of striving for self rule and had forged close economic and strategic relations.

Though the two sides agreed on most things, "we don't agree on every issue," Bodman said, in an apparent reference to US worries over Kazakhstan's record on human rights and democratization.

The Bush administration however is conscious Kazakhstan is at the center of the new Great Game energy grab in Central Asia.

Nazarbayev also enjoys US kudos as he has been a valued ally in the "war on terror", sent troops to Afghanistan and Iraq, and has been a bulwark against Islamic fundamentalism in the region.

In a sign of his high regard here, Nazarbayev stayed with the current US president's father, former president George Bush, at the family summer compound in Kennebunkport, Maine, a diplomat said.

Ahead of his meeting with Bush, Nazarbayev also met Vice President Dick Cheney, and was feted at a dinner by leading figures including former US Senator Sam Nunn and CNN founder Ted Turner, to honor Kazakhstan's dismantling of its former Soviet-era nuclear weapons.

The United States has pumped billions of dollars into the Kazakh economy since the fall of the Soviet Union, and suspicions of rights activists were particulary spurred by Cheney's visit to Kazakhstan in May.

After rebuking Russia for stifling democracy, Cheney heaped praise and "admiration" on Kazakhstan over its economic and political development.

That praise came despite the US government's warning last year that "irregularities" appear to have marked December's election which saw Nazarbayev sweep up 91 percent of the vote.

In June Bush urged Kazakhstan to export its oil through a US-backed pipeline that bypasses Russian territory.

DOJ_NMG_0071046

The four-billion-dollar project goes through Azerbaijan and is designed to carry Caspian Sea oil to Western markets via Georgia and Turkey.

Kazakhstan is pleading for time from its critics.

"It's a case half full or half empty, we are moving towards democracy," a Kazakh diplomat said on condition of anonymity Wednesday.

"There is no denying we are not finished with our program of building a developed democratic society and a civil society."

But rights groups argue that the idea that Washington can either have a partner in Kazakhstan or demand it treat its people better is a false choice.

"Why is there a presumption that pushing on democracy issues, per se is going to lose your ally?" said Rachel Denber, Central Asia specialist with Human Rights Watch.

"There is no reason why Kazakhstan can't do better on human rights," she said.

In a nod to US critics, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met Kazakh Foreign Minister Kasymzhomart Tokayev in New York last week, and took along senior State Department official Barry Lowenkron.

The United States has expressed concern at the murder of an opposition leader and the suspicious death of a second in the past year, which have not been solved.

The latest State Department Human Rights Report called the Kazakhstan government's record "poor."

Embrace For A Strongman (WP)

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

PRESIDENT BUSH once made the authoritarian president of Kazakhstan, Nursultan Nazarbayev, a focus of his freedom agenda. He urged the ruler of the energy-rich Central Asian nation to allow more freedom for political parties and media and to hold a fair election for president. The effort failed utterly: Mr. Nazarbayev was awarded 91 percent of the vote last December in an election condemned by international observers. Two months later, a leading opponent was brutally murdered by members of the state security forces. In July, Mr. Nazarbayev ignored Western objections and approved a law tightening already-strict controls on the media.

Today Mr. Bush is treating Mr. Nazarbayev to a White House visit, following a special demonstration of family friendship: The Kazakh leader was a guest of the president's father at the Bush compound in Maine. In short, Mr. Nazarbayev has suffered no consequences for his rejection of the democracy agenda. Instead, he is being feted as a valued ally because his government is supportive of U.S. military operations in Afghanistan and Iraq, and because Kazakhstan recently agreed to pump some of its rapidly growing supplies of oil through a U.S.-backed pipeline to the West. Even the fact that Mr. Nazarbayev has been accused by U.S. federal prosecutors of accepting the bulk of $78 million in bribes -- a small part of the fortune his family has amassed -- has been ignored by the White House.

Mr. Bush has given numerous speeches in the past several years repudiating what he says was the mistake of backing corrupt authoritarian regimes in the Middle East in exchange for economic and security cooperation, as well as an illusory "stability." But that is exactly what he is doing in Kazakhstan -- and in Azerbaijan, Pakistan, Libya and Egypt, among other Muslim countries. Perhaps the only difference is that in the past, the United States rarely attempted to persuade governments to liberalize. Mr. Bush has asked Mr. Nazarbayev, Azerbaijan's Ilham Aliyev and Egypt's Hosni Mubarak to change. When they refused, his administration, in effect, shrugged. It did not significantly alter economic aid, military cooperation or any other aspect of the relationship.

Administration officials defend the Kazakh policy with arguments that are familiar from the Cold War: that it is better to "engage" a strongman than to shun him; that Russia and China, which are competing with the United States for political influence and energy resources in Central Asia, are happy to embrace Mr. Nazarbayev. Such arguments merely condemn the United States to a losing geopolitical strategy, since strongmen will always be more likely to align themselves with Russia and China than with the United States. The arguments also ignore Kazakhstan's own strategic interest in diversifying its energy customers and partnering with the world's only superpower.

DOJ_NMG_0071047

In fact, the history of U.S. relations with Muslim states during the Cold War -- such as Iran and Iraq -- vividly demonstrates the shortsightedness of befriending rulers such as Mr. Nazarbayev. That, at least, is what Mr. Bush says in his speeches.

Kazakhstan's No Joke (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 29, 2006

KAZAKHSTAN PRESIDENT Nursultan Nazarbayev's visit with President Bush today has generated a good deal of attention, mostly for the wrong reasons. The government of Kazakhstan has been buying newspaper advertisements and TV commercials as part of a misguided PR blitz to show that the country isn't really the anti-Semitic, homophobic, sexist backwater that comedian Sacha Baron Cohen — in the character of a Kazakh journalist named Borat Sagdiyev — portrays it to be. Kazakhs' primary hobbies are not, as he says, "disco dancing, archery, rape and table tennis." Really.

It's not clear whether this advertising blitz has changed anyone's opinion about Kazakhstan (although it has certainly been a publicity boon for Cohen and his upcoming film). Not too many Westerners, including Cohen, have ever been to Kazakhstan, a country bigger than all of Western Europe but with a population only about 1 1/2 times that of Los Angeles County, making it the perfect blank slate for satire.

Yet there are few nations more strategically important to the United States than Kazakhstan. Its mineral resources are vast; by 2015, it is expected to account for nearly as much oil production as Iran. It is a stable U.S. ally in a region marked by shaky friends, rivals and foes, such as Russia, China, Afghanistan and Iran. It is a majority-Muslim country that sent troops to Iraq and opened its airspace to U.S. flights during the invasion of Afghanistan. It is a model for nuclear disarmament, having agreed to destroy the missiles it inherited from the former Soviet Union.

Those not tittering over Nazarbayev's visit because of the Borat fuss, such as Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), are mostly complaining about it. Levin told the Senate on Tuesday that the visit was yet another example of foreign policy hypocrisy by the Bush administration. The president's "courtship of corrupt dictators" such as Nazarbayev, he said, is "morally wrong."

It is true that Bush's commitment to spreading democracy and rooting out kleptocratic leaders does seem to wane when an important oil-producing state is involved. Though Nazarbayev appears to be genuinely popular with his people, he is undoubtedly guilty of repressing the media and imprisoning his political opponents.

Yet Kazakhstan is too important to ignore or keep at a distance — and the reasons go far beyond its oil wealth. If Bush confines himself to meeting only with leaders who have perfect democratic records, he'll have to rule out the heads of most countries in the developing world.

By the standards of Central Asia, Kazakhstan is practically a Jeffersonian wonderland. Administration officials say the need for democratic reform in Kazakhstan will be part of Bush's discussion with Nazarbayev. It should be. The president can have more influence over Nazarbayev by keeping him close — and offering incentives to open his society — than by shunning him.

Rice To Meet With Arab Allies, Israel (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 29, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice returns to the Middle East next week for diplomatic meetings with Arab allies and Israel to test the waters for possible new moves toward peace.

Rice will travel to Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Israel and the West Bank to consult with leaders "who have a vision for a more moderate, peaceful, democratic, stable and prosperous Middle East," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Thursday.

In addition to the Israel-Palestinian dispute, McCormack said Rice will seek to move her democracy agenda forward and discuss threats to stability and moderation in the region, including Iran, Hamas and Hezbollah.

Rice will hold the Bush administration's third meeting in two weeks with Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas, the embattled secular leader whom President Bush last week called a "man of courage" for trying to revive Mideast peace talks despite a continued political stalemate with Hamas militants.

DOJ_NMG_0071048

The top U.S. diplomat hopes to revive and expand agreements allowing transfer of goods and freer movement for Palestinians in and out of their separate territories in Gaza and the West Bank. The territories on opposite flanks of Israel would form an independent Palestinian state under a U.S.-backed plan for long-term peace.

Israel wants to reopen dialogue with Abbas and work with him to establish a Palestinian state. But Abbas has been in a weakened position since January when Hamas, which seeks the destruction of Israel, won the Palestinian elections.

Abbas retains his position as president but is caught between Hamas and the West, which considers Hamas a terrorist group and refuses to underwrite it with vital international aid. Abbas has tried to persuade Hamas leaders to moderate their anti-Israel policies and join with his Fatah Party in a coalition government, but the U.S. and Israel are leery of the plan.

Prospects for a return to active peace negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians have looked dim this year, partly because the political upheaval in both governments kept leaders' attention focused inward.

Israel has new leadership following Ariel Sharon's sudden massive stroke. The new prime minister, Ehud Olmert, is on the defensive at home because of widespread dissatisfaction with the conduct and outcome of Israel's summer war with Hezbollah militants in Lebanon.

Arab nations, including the few moderate states that are key to U.S. goals in Iraq, Iran and Lebanon, view improving the Palestinians' lot as essential. The festering grievances of the stateless Palestinians feed unrest and radicalism elsewhere.

Hamas has given no sign that it will meet international demands that would resolve the stalemate with Abbas and allow aid to flow: Renounce violence, recognize Israel and abide by agreements made by the previous secular Palestinian leadership.

It is Rice's first trip to the Middle East since a U.N.-brokered cease-fire stopped Israel's one-month war with Hezbollah militants in southern Lebanon. Rice took heavy criticism during her last visit, in late July and early August, for U.S. unwillingness to move for a quicker end to the fighting.

Rice To Visit Israelis, Palestinians With Little Sign Of Breakthrough (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, September 29, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to the Middle East next week, US officials announced, but with little prospect of producing a breakthrough in the long-stalled Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

With the United States under intense pressure from its European and Arab allies to do more to revive peace efforts, Rice will leave Sunday and visit Israel and the Palestinian territories as well as Saudi Arabia and Egypt.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack was quick to play down the ambitions for Rice's trip, saying the focus would be "consultations" rather than big decisions.

"This is a trip designed to lay the foundations, potentially, for moving the process forward. There aren't any guarantees in that regard," he said.

The decision to dispatch Rice to the region followed a new show of impatience with President George W. Bush's administration, which is seen to have neglected the Israeli-Palestinian crisis as he focused on toppling Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq and the broader "war on terrorism".

At the UN General Assembly last week in New York, Rice and Bush heard one world leader after another appeal for renewed action, saying the festering Israeli-Palestinian conflict lay at the root of global instability and terrorism.

Bush for his part offered a minor initiative involving Rice working with Arab allies to strengthen Palestinian security services loyal to the moderate President Mahmud Abbas -- a task she will follow up on this trip, McCormack said.

But the spokesman held out little hope for any significant progress in ending the deadlock that has gripped Israeli-Palestinian dealings since the radical Hamas movement took control of the Palestinian government in March.

Scant details were provided for Rice's agenda, though she is expected to meet with Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, a US ally in need of support following his government's perceived mishandling of the recent war with the Hezbollah militia in Lebanon.

Although Olmert told Israeli radio earlier Thursday that he planned "in the coming days" to hold his first direct meeting with Abbas since June, McCormack said there were no plans yet for Rice to make that a three-way encounter.

DOJ_NMG_0071049

Abbas has been trying to form a unity government between his moderate Fatah Party and Hamas in hopes of ending Western sanctions and renewing negotiations with Israel on the creation of a Palestinian state.

Israel and the West have suspended essential financial support to the Hamas government, plunging the Palestinian territories into dire hardship but also weakening public support for the Islamist movement, according to US officials.

The United States and its major power allies have said they would lift the aid restrictions only once a Palestinian government recognizes Israel's right to exist, renounces violence and abides by past peace accords.

While Abbas has vowed to meet those conditions, Hamas, which Washington and the European Union consider a terrorist organization, has rejected them.

Rice this week blamed Hamas's hardliners based in Damascus for torpedoing the Abbas initiative and suggested more moderate Hamas leaders could emerge in the Palestinian territories.

But McCormack ruled out any possible contact between Rice and Hamas leaders as long as they continue rejecting the three "principles" laid down by the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia -- the so-called Quartet on peace negotiations.

"We're not talking to Hamas, and we're not going to talk to Hamas," he said.

McCormack said Rice would consult with "leaders who have a vision for a more moderate, peaceful, democratic, stable and prosperous Middle East".

Topics would include the stand-off with Iran over its suspected nuclear weapons program, the situation in Lebanon following the recent war between Israel and the Hezbollah militia, and broader issues of security in terrorism, he said.

In Cairo, Rice will also talk to President Hosni Mubarak "about the importance of continuing the democratic reform process in Egypt," he said.

Rice Sees Moderates As Key To Mideast (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 29, 2006

U.S. officials see the struggle between moderates and extremists -- not the Israeli-Palestinian conflict -- as the defining issue in the Middle East, the State Department said yesterday in announcing that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will visit the region next week.

Although Miss Rice attaches critical importance to the Israeli-Palestinian peace process and will explore ways to revitalize it, her more ambitious task will be to urge moderates in the region to unite against extremists, said department spokesman Sean McCormack.

"This is a trip designed to lay the foundations potentially for moving the [peace] process forward," Mr. McCormack told reporters. "There seems to be a genuine desire among leaders in the region -- you start to see some of those emerge in Saudi Arabia, in Egypt, as well as others -- to try to move that process forward."

He acknowledged that "some people subscribe" to a view of "the Palestinian-Israeli dispute being at the heart of all disputes in the Middle East" but said he does not agree.

"I would just look at the issue a little bit differently," he said. "It will be a frame" for Miss Rice's conversations during her trip.

He said the secretary will visit Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Israel -- countries that are "on the side of moderation" -- because they "have an interest in a more stable, peaceful, prosperous Middle East."

In Egypt, Mr. McCormack said, Miss Rice will discuss with President Hosni Mubarak "the importance of continuing the democratic reform process."

Asked about Egypt's mixed record on promoting democracy, he contrasted that country with "forces for extremism and violence" such as Iran, Syria and Hamas, the militant group that controls the Palestinian parliament and government.

Miss Rice plans to meet with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, head of the Fatah party, but "we are not going to talk to a Hamas-led government, and we are certainly not going to advocate others, including the Israelis, talking to a Hamas-led government," Mr. McCormack said.

DOJ_NMG_0071050

It will be the secretary's first visit to the region since July during Israel's border war with Hezbollah. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said yesterday that he hoped to meet with Mr. Abbas soon, but Mr. McCormack said there were no plans for a three-way meeting involving Miss Rice.

Middle East analysts were doubtful that Miss Rice's trip would produce significant results.

"I don't see what is achievable at this moment," said Danielle Pletka, vice president of the American Enterprise Institute. "Islamists are riding high, dictators are feeling comfortable, and the United States seems at best confused about how to deal with both Iran and Iraq. ...

"If democracy is the centerpiece [of Miss Rice´s trip], that's terrific, because the solution of most problems in the Middle East is broadening the democratic base," she said. "That seems to have been put on the back burner."

David Schenker, senior fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said the only benefit from Miss Rice's visit would be the show of high-level attention to the region at a time when the administration stands accused of lacking interest in Arab-Israeli affairs.

"This is also a critical time for Lebanon, and lending her support to [Prime Minister Fuad] Siniora's government ... is very important," Mr. Schenker said.

Mr. McCormack, asked whether Miss Rice might go to Beirut, said he had no additional stops to announce.

Little Progress In EU-Iran Talks (FT)

By Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, September 29, 2006

European Union talks with Iran on suspending uranium enrichment on Thursday failed to produce substantive progress but both sides suggested the diplomatic process would continue.

After seven hours of discussions with Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Javier Solana, the EU foreign policy chief, said in Berlin that there were still "important issues that have not been closed".

The EU and Iran are in a pre-negotiations phase. Thursday's meeting was designed to find ways to resume the formal talks on curbing Tehran's nuclear ambitions.

In June, the US, UK, France, Germany, Russia and China offered Iran a set of incentives if it suspended uranium enrichment, the most sensitive part of its nuclear programme. The six governments would start negotiations over the package when Tehran agreed to the condition.

Iranian officials have hinted that Tehran would be willing to envisage a two-month suspension to allow for a return to formal negotiations. In return, however, Iran apparently wants European governments to indicate that the negotiations would lead to a deal that gives Iran the right to a small-scale enrichment facility.

European diplomats, who have demanded an unconditional suspension, on Thursday said no agreement could be reached in Berlin. "Progress was made on peripheral issues, not on important issues," said one diplomat. "There's no commitment by the Iranians to enter into a suspension."

Manouchehr Mohammadi, an Iranian deputy foreign minister, said in Madrid there were "some problems with regards to the cycle of enrichment and the suspension".

Mr Solana said contacts with Iran would continue next week, perhaps by telephone. Failure to resume negotiations would lead to renewed pressure on Tehran at the United Nations Security Council, where the US will be pushing for economic and political sanctions.

Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, warned on Wednesday that the talks about talks "clearly won't go on very much longer".

Iran, EU Fail To Reach A Deal In Berlin (AP)

By Stephen Graham, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0071051

Iran and the European Union failed to reach a deal in their latest round of nuclear talks but came to "some positive conclusions," Tehran's chief negotiator said Thursday. Neither Ali Larijani nor EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana gave any details of what had been achieved, but both spoke positively of the discussions over Tehran's disputed nuclear program.

Solana and Larijani are holding the latest round of talks over a package of incentives that six countries — the United States, China, Russia, France, Britain and Germany — are offering Tehran in return for suspending its uranium enrichment program and returning to full-scale negotiations.

Iran missed an Aug. 31 Security Council deadline over the issue. The six are considering seeking sanctions in the U.N. Security Council if Tehran does not comply.

"We have had long, constructive negotiations" Larijani said. "We have been able to come to some positive conclusions."

Soland said, "We have been progressing."

"But still, we have some issues, that have been put but have not been closed," Solana said, adding that the two sides "will keep in touch."

Solana said he hoped to have further telephone contact with the Iranian side later this week, but he gave no specifics. Larijani indicated they had discussed how future negotiations could proceed and expressed hope they could "embark on the main negotiations as soon as possible."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice telephoned Solana on Wednesday and renewed U.S. support for his talks with Iran, she told reporters in Washington, D.C.

Rice said if Larijani agreed to a suspension of processing uranium "we would be on a course for negotiations."

But, Rice told reporters, she had told Solana "clearly this won't go on very much longer."

Solana is to report back to the six countries trying to persuade Iran to give up its program to enrich uranium.

Germany has joined with the permanent U.N. Security Council members in pressing Iran to give up what the U.S. says is a nuclear weapons program. Iran says its program is peaceful.

Enriched uranium can be used for power plants or for weapons, depending on the level of enrichment.

European Official Reports Progress In Talks With Iran (NYT)

By Judy Dempsey, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

BERLIN, Sept. 28 — Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, said Thursday that "some important progress" had been made in two days of talks over resolving Iran's nuclear ambitions and that more talks would be held next week.

"We have had the opportunity of being together for several hours and of working with great intensity," Mr. Solana said after the talks with Ali Larijani, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator. "We have made some important progress on the elements related to how the potential negotiations can take place."

Mr. Solana was referring to a package of political, economic and technological incentives that six nations — France, Germany, Britain, the United States, Russia and China — offered Iran in June in return for a suspension of Tehran's uranium enrichment program.

Diplomats said that reaching the point of negotiations on the incentives depended on establishing a timetable for Iran to suspend uranium enrichment.

"It is now a question of sequencing," said a European diplomat who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly on the matter. "This is about Iran specifically agreeing to when it will start suspending its uranium enrichment program."

Despite the optimistic report here, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran said Thursday that his nation would not be deterred from its nuclear ambitions, though he said that Iran was ready for fair negotiations.

"We support negotiations and talks in the framework of law and fair conditions and on the basis of defending the obvious right of the Iranian nation," he said during a speech at a rally in Karaj, a city west of Tehran. But he said, as he has previously, that Iran would not suspend enrichment.

DOJ_NMG_0071052

"Why are they insisting that we suspend our atomic work?" he said. "Because they control the advertising network of the world, and they want to tell the nations that they were right and Iran wanted to produce nuclear weapons, and after that they would never let us continue our program."

Iran's Uranium Glitch (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

Intelligence analysts believe that Iran is encountering technical difficulties in mastering the complex process of uranium enrichment. That means the West may have a bit more time than previously expected to pursue a diplomatic solution to the Iranian nuclear standoff.

The problem, according to intelligence officials, is that the centrifuges that are supposed to enrich uranium are overheating. Some are breaking down and must be replaced. As a result, Iran has not ramped up its enrichment effort as quickly as analysts had expected.

This assessment is based on recent conversations with analysts from several Western nations that are watching the Iranian program closely and on an unpublished report by the International Atomic Energy Agency that was completed Aug. 31. To me, it's the equivalent of adding some extra time to the clock in a tense football game. The urgency remains, but there is an opportunity for a few additional plays before the game is over.

"There's time, purely from the point of view of the technical development of the threat, to let diplomacy play out in the case of Iran," says Harvard professor Ashton B. Carter, who closely follows the issue.

The technical difficulties involve the uranium enrichment facility in Natanz, north of Isfahan in central Iran. The Iranians broke IAEA seals at Natanz in January and began enriching uranium. It's a highly complex process, in which uranium gas is injected into the linked array of centrifuges that spin at roughly the speed of sound. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad announced April 11 that the Iranians had succeeded in enriching uranium to an initial level of 3.5 percent, and in June Iran told the IAEA it had achieved 5 percent enrichment. That's far below the 90 percent level needed for a nuclear weapon, but it suggested the Iranians were on their way to mastering the technology.

Western analysts had expected that the Iranians would move quickly to expand the enrichment effort to meet their near-term goal of having six cascades of 164 centrifuges each, or a total of nearly 1,000 centrifuges. The danger here was technological mastery rather than raw output of uranium. Even with 3,000 centrifuges operating, intelligence analysts estimate that it would take two to three years to produce enough highly enriched uranium for one bomb. Iran's eventual goal is a massive array of more than 50,000 centrifuges at Natanz.

But problems surfaced this summer. The Aug. 31 IAEA report, marked "Restricted Distribution," noted that since June, Iran had been feeding uranium into a small 20-centrifuge test cascade "for short periods of time," and that it had conducted various tests in June, July and August of the initial 164-centrifuge cascade. "The installation of a second 164-machine cascade is proceeding," the report noted, but it added that Iran planned to test the second cascade in September without injecting uranium.

What happened to slow the expected pace? IAEA analysts have told U.S. and European officials that it appears the centrifuges are overheating when uranium gas is injected. "The Iranians are unable to control higher temperatures, and after a short period they must stop because of higher temperatures. So far they haven't been able to solve this," says one Western intelligence official who has been briefed on the IAEA findings. In addition, this official said, some centrifuges "are simply crashing -- 10 or so have broken down and must be replaced."

There's a lively debate among intelligence analysts about what may be causing these problems. One theory holds that Iran's home-produced uranium, mixed with foreign ore, isn't sufficiently pure for the delicate centrifuges, but other analysts reject that argument. Several analysts I talked to agreed, however, that if Iranian scientists continue with enrichment, they are likely to solve the technical problems eventually through trial and error. That's why U.S. and European officials are still calling for Iran to suspend enrichment, before they have cracked the puzzles they are encountering.

Iran continues to insist that its nuclear program is peaceful. And although it's taken for granted in many Western countries that these statements mask a secret plan to build nuclear weapons, intelligence analysts from several nations told me they lack decisive evidence of an Iranian bomb effort. So far, there is no "smoking gun," said an intelligence analyst from one Western nation. Nevertheless, the United States, Israel and some European countries remain convinced that a covert weapons program exists.

DOJ_NMG_0071053

The clock is still ticking. That's the real import of these new intelligence findings. Iran and the West still have time to find a diplomatic solution to the nuclear showdown. This genie isn't quite out of the bottle.

The writer co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues athttp://www.washingtonpost.com. His e-mail address isdavidignatius@washpost.com.

Hughes: Fixing U.S. Image May Take Years (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 29, 2006

It may take decades to change anti-American feelings around the world that have been aggravated by war in Iraq, U.S. policy toward Israel and America's "sex and violence" culture, the State Department official in charge of dealing with the U.S. image abroad said Thursday.

"The anti-Americanism, the concern around the world ... this ideological struggle, it's not going to change" quickly, Undersecretary of State Karen Hughes said in an interview with The Associated Press. "It's going to be the work of years and maybe decades."

Hughes, a longtime adviser to President Bush, has worked for more than a year to retool the way America sells itself overseas, but she acknowledged that success can be next to impossible to measure.

A June poll by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press found that America's image in 15 nations dropped sharply in 2006. For example, less than one-third of the people in Egypt, Pakistan, Jordan and Turkey had a favorable view of the U.S.

According to that poll, America's continued involvement in Iraq was seen as a worse problem than Iran and its nuclear ambitions.

In the bleak National Intelligence Estimate portion declassified this week, the government's top analysts concluded that Iraq has become a "cause celebre" for jihadists, who are growing in number and geographic reach. If the trend continues, the analysts found, the risks to the U.S. interests at home and abroad will grow.

Hughes said the three-year-old Iraq war "is the most recent excuse" for anti-American grievance in the Muslim world.

"Much of the world did not agree with our decision to go into Iraq," just as there is long-standing disagreement with U.S. support for Israel, Hughes said.

Answering those complaints and defending U.S. policy is part of Hughes' job heading the broad category of U.S. outreach known as "public diplomacy." Although her job involves all regions of the world, Bush asked her to concentrate on reframing the U.S. image in the Islamic world.

"All you have to do is sit in a hotel room in the Middle East and watch the media and you see there is a lot, there is a big drumbeat out there going against our interests," Hughes said.

"I'm trying to approach this as putting in place the type of things that over the long run will make a difference for our country, because I don't expect that in the two years and ... three or four months of the president's administration that we'll see a significant shift."

Hughes has sent Arabic speakers to do four times as many interviews with Arabic media as in previous years and set up three rapid public relations response centers overseas to monitor and respond to the news.

Asked whether America's critics have any legitimate gripes, Hughes said yes.

"One of the things that I hear a lot, particularly in deeply conservative societies, is that parents feel kind of assaulted by American culture," Hughes said. "The sex and the violence that they see on television and movies ... some of the lyrics of our music."

The fact that American culture is so pervasive and accessible around the globe is "a double-edged sword," Hughes said. "Obviously, a lot of young people find our pop culture very appealing."

DOJ_NMG_0071054

Hughes said the United States must be careful not to cast its fight against extremism and terrorism as a confrontation with Islam as a whole. She would not say whether she and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had advised Bush to stop using the term "Islamic fascism" to describe the ideology behind terrorism.

Bush and his spokesman used the phrase several times in August, but it has apparently disappeared from the White House lexicon since then. A check of transcripts on the State Department Web site indicates Rice, who is Hughes' boss, has apparently not used that phrase.

Hughes said that while she would not reveal private conversations with Bush, "that has been a subject of great debate within the administration."

"It's difficult to know what to call the ideology that we're up against, because it is a perversion of Islam," Hughes said.

"I use 'violent extremist,' because I think they are extremists, they are violent, they are actually mass murderers who pervert their religion."

Thailand Names Interim Prime Minister (AP)

AP, September 29, 2006

Surayud Chulanont, a former army commander and a close adviser to Thailand's powerful monarch, has been chosen as the country's interim prime minister, the auditor general said Thursday night.

Surayud, a highly regarded 62-year-old retired officer, was selected by the country's ruling military council which seized power from Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra Sept. 19 and vowed to name a civilian prime minister within two weeks.

"Yes, definitely, Gen. Surayud is the prime minister. He is the suitable person," Auditor General Jaruvan Maintaka told reporters. Her comments were later carried on an official government Web site.

The appointment is expected to be officially announced this weekend or Monday after it receives approval from King Bhumibol Adulyadej.

Akara Thiroj, a spokesman for the council, said an interim constitution has already been finalized and sent to the Royal Palace. He hoped the constitution could be unveiled Saturday or Sunday and followed by the formal announcement of the prime minister on the weekend or Monday.

"The media seems to know more than I do. Every newspaper put his name on the front page," Akara said when asked who the new prime minister would be.

All Friday morning Bangkok newspapers carried headlines that Surayud would probably head the new government which is to serve until an election promised for October 2007.

The other much-touted possibility for the job had been former World Trade Organization chief Supachai Panitchpakdi, who now heads the U.N. Conference on Trade and Development, or UNCTAD.

Surayud's appointment is expected to be widely praised in Thailand.

Korn Chatikavanij, deputy general secretary of the Democrat Party, said earlier that Surayud is an "appropriate" choice. The Democrat Party was the leading opposition to Thaksin's government.

Although being a former general might give the outside world the impression the military was merely transferring power to one of its cronies, that would be neither true nor relevant, he said.

"What is important is domestic reconciliation and Gen. Surayud is ideal for that," Korn told The Associated Press.

The military ousted elected prime minister Thaksin in a bloodless coup while Thaksin was visiting New York. He is now in London, and has not indicated if or when he may try to return to Thailand.

Large demonstrations demanding his ouster — following allegations of corruption and abuse of power — reflected a polarized Thai society.

The United States, which has decried the coup as a setback to democracy, on Thursday suspended $24 million in assistance to Thailand.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said U.S. financing of U.S. military sales to Thailand is being cut off along with training for Thai military personnel.

"The United States continues to urge a rapid return to democratic rule and early elections in Thailand," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0071055

Retired General Picked As Thai New PM As US Cuts Off Military Aid (AFP)

AFP, September 29, 2006

Thailand's junta has chosen General Surayud Chulanont, a former head of the military, to succeed overthrown prime minister Thaksin Shinawatra, the website of state-run Radio Thailand reports.

The website quoted Thailand's auditor general Jaruvan Maintaka as telling reporters that Surayud, 63, was the generals' choice.

"It is quite certain," she said.

"General Surayud is the most suitable for the job, given his qualification and his seniority," she said, according to Radio Thailand, which is run by the government's public relations department.

The generals are expected Sunday to formally announce a new prime minister after ousting Thaksin in a bloodless coup on September 19.

Thailand's media Friday all tipped Surayud, who is a senior royal advisor, but there was no official confirmation.

"Conclusion: Surayud, New Prime Minister," read the headline of Thailand's top-selling daily, Thairath.

The English-language daily Nation also said Surayud was "the most suitable choice in the current situation," while the Bangkok Post said the military had asked Surayud to serve as interim prime minister.

A source close to coup leader General Sonthi Boonyaratglin told the Bangkok Post that Sonthi had asked Surayud "if he was ready to take the post if nominated."

Junta spokesman Palangoon Klaharn would not confirm or deny the reports.

"It's just news. The name of a new prime minister should be announced after the endorsement of the constitution, which has not happened yet," he said.

The United States has stripped millions of dollars in military aid from its ally Thailand, in protest at the coup.

The sanctions jolted years of close links between Thai and US forces in the Asia-Pacific, which co-hosts the region's biggest annual American war games.

But some aid deemed crucial to US national security was spared, notably in the field of counterterrorism, in which the kingdom has emerged as a low-key, yet valued partner in the US battle against Al-Qaeda.

"In response to the military coup on September 19 in Thailand, the United States has suspended almost 24 million dollars of assistance to the Thai government," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

The aid cutoff involved foreign military financing, international military education and training, and peacekeeping operations.

"The United States continues to urge a rapid return to democratic rule and early elections in Thailand," McCormack said.

"We look forward to being able to reinstate these programs after a democratically elected government takes office," he said.

The sanctions were imposed automatically under a US law which forbids assistance to the government of a country where an elected leader has been deposed in a coup.

But using a waiver, Washington will maintain 9.77 million dollars in aid to Thailand deemed to be in US national interests, focusing on counter-terrorism, combating weapons of mass destruction and fighting communicable diseases.

The United States had previously condemned the coup and called on the generals to call elections before their one-year deadline.

Official US military trips to Thailand had previously been suspended and all temporary defense duties in Thailand frozen, according to Stars and Stripes, a daily newspaper published for the US military.

US military personnel in Thailand on temporary orders have been recalled, it said.

The White House has also hinted that so far inconclusive talks with Bangkok on a free trade agreement might also depend on a return to democratic rule.

Thailand's military rulers said earlier Thursday they had selected a new prime minister to be unveiled at the weekend, but refused to say when they would lift martial law and pull troops off the streets.

Thailand is a US diplomatic and non-NATO ally and has been a voice for democratic reform in the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN), which also includes several totalitarian states.

DOJ_NMG_0071056

The fate was also unclear of the next annual "Cobra Gold" live-fire exercise, the largest US war games in Asia, which the United States hosts along with Thailand.

The exercises, launched 25 years ago and originally limited to US and Thai troops, has been expanded in recent years to include an anti-terror component.

Thailand has also played an important role in the US "war on terror" launched after the September 11, 2001 attacks.

Hambali, leader of the Al-Qaeda-affiliated Southeast Asian terror group Jemaah Islamiya, was captured in the country in August 2003.

But Thailand has denied reports in the US media that it was one of the sites for the CIA's secret prisons, now emptied, for top Al-Qaeda suspects.

In recent weeks, the United States had registered concern at an insurgency raging in the Muslim-majority south of the mainly Buddhist kingdom, fearing it could feed into Southeast Asia's Al-Qaeda-linked terror networks.

S. Korean Contender For U.N. Post Has An Edge (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, September 29, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 28 -- The leading candidate to succeed Kofi Annan as secretary general of the United Nations, Ban Ki Moon, South Korea's minister of foreign affairs and trade, has at least one potential advantage over his rivals in the electoral race for the world's top diplomat:

Ban is the architect of South Korea's trade and aid policies, so he is responsible for signing trade deals and doling out foreign assistance that sometimes benefits countries with a hand in deciding his fate.

Rivals have privately grumbled that South Korea, which has the world's 11th-largest economy, has wielded its economic might to generate support for his candidacy. They cited South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun's trade mission earlier this month to Greece, which holds the Security Council's presidency. The visit, the first by a South Korean leader to Greece since 1961, concluded with the signing of trade and tourism agreements.

Ban was also the first senior South Korean minister to visit Congo, another Security Council member, since that country's independence in 1960.

Ban said the insinuations are "groundless" and that he had arranged the trade mission to Greece long ago to balance a similar mission last year to Turkey, Greece's regional rival. He said the Congo trip was part of a process of reaching out to countries that South Korea has neglected over the years. Like most of the candidates, he has tried to visit all the Security Council nations.

"As front-runner, I know that I can become a target of this very scrutinizing process," he said in an interview Wednesday night. "I am a man of integrity."

The political sniping that has accompanied Ban's success in the race marks a departure from previous contests for the top U.N. job, which were traditionally conducted behind closed doors.

With Annan's term expiring at year's end, a field of seven candidates has mounted a global political campaign featuring televised debates, newspaper op-ed pieces and appearances at world and regional summits. To win, a candidate requires the support of at least nine of the 15 members of the Security Council, including its five permanent members.

Ban maintained his lead in the race Thursday when the council took its third straw poll, with 13 council members encouraging his candidacy, one discouraging it and one expressing no opinion. He was followed by Shashi Tharoor, an Indian novelist and U.N. civil servant (8-3-4), and Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga, the only female candidate (7-6-2).

The council is scheduled Monday to hold a potentially decisive vote, which for the first time will reveal whether any of the five permanent members have chosen to veto any of the candidates.

Tharoor, who was urged by Annan's office to take a leave of absence from his U.N. job during the campaign to avoid the perception of a conflict of interest, said it is still possible that the council might want "a two-horse or a three-horse race." But he conceded in an interview before Thursday's vote that if Ban strengthens his lead, "I guess we'll have to admit that it's pretty much over."

DOJ_NMG_0071057

U.N. officials and other diplomats say that while Ban lacks charisma, he is an experienced and skillful diplomat who knows the United Nations from a stint as South Korea's ambassador there. He also speaks English and French, a prerequisite for the job.

Ban has cultivated good relations with China, Russia and the United States as South Korea's chief negotiator in talks over the fate of North Korea's nuclear weapons program. "We've always had the highest professional regard for him," said John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the world body.

In a speech Monday to a gathering of representatives from small countries, Ban underscored that fixing the United Nations' administrative culture -- a U.S. priority -- would be his "job number one." He also vowed in an interview to play a more active role in persuading North Korea to scrap its nuclear weapons program. "I think I can be in a much better position to play an important role," he said. Still, some U.N. observers said the election of a stalwart U.S. military and political ally could exacerbate tensions at the United Nations with developing nations, which have increasingly opposed U.S. efforts to reform the United Nations' financial practices and to reorient it to confront terrorism and the spread of weapons of mass destruction.

The high costs of running a global campaign have handicapped secretary general candidates from some of the United Nations' least powerful countries, who previously fared well in races for the top U.N. post. Jayantha Dhanapala, a Sri Lankan diplomat and one of the candidates, said it has been "impossible to mount the high-cost, high-budget campaign" that a president, foreign minister or top official from a wealthier country can afford. "I can only assume that some of the candidates have been able to do more extensive travel than I've been engaged in."

Industrialized nations have a "long-standing practice" of using development and trade deals to secure voting support for their nationals in international organizations, said William R. Pace, the director of the Institute for Global Policy, which is monitoring the race.

Ban said that he has proudly guided South Korea, once a poor recipient of international assistance, into the exclusive club of aid donors committed to alleviating the plight of the world's most disadvantaged.

Last week, Ban attended a conference hosted by French President Jacques Chirac to build support for an initiative to use airline taxes to fund programs to combat AIDS and other infectious diseases.

Speaking in French, Ban said South Korea would be the first Asian country to back the initiative. "Korea feels very much proud to have become a donor country from a recipient," he said in an interview, noting that his government will double its aid to poor countries, particularly in Africa, in the next three years.

Some key council members dismissed suggestions that South Korea's trade and aid policies have influenced the race. "Our judgment of the candidates is not based on any kind of deal. It's based on the policies they follow," said Greece's ambassador, Adamantios Vassilakis.

"Politics goes on all the time," Bolton said. "And every candidate has his or her strategy, and they follow it, and everybody can evaluate that strategy" in selecting the next secretary general.

South Korean Favored To Win Top Job At U.N. (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 28 — Ban Ki-moon, the South Korean foreign minister, moved significantly closer on Thursday to becoming the successor to Kofi Annan as United Nations secretary general by maintaining a wide lead over six other candidates in the Security Council's third informal poll.

A fourth and more definitive informal poll is scheduled for Monday, and Mr. Ban, with 13 favorable votes from the 15 Council members, goes into that poll as the only candidate with the 9 votes required for approval.

On Monday, the ballots of the five permanent members, Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States, will be colored different than the others, a way of determining whether any nation with veto power has exercised it. Barring a veto, Mr. Ban's election in a subsequent formal vote appears assured.

"I am encouraged by the level of support I received, and I hope that eventually I will have unanimous support," Mr. Ban said in a telephone interview from Seoul on Thursday after his return from New York.

DOJ_NMG_0071058

Mr. Ban, 62, has traveled widely as he has campaigned for the secretary general position over the past six months, and questions have arisen about how effective his modest and soft-spoken style would be in bringing discipline and coherence to such a sprawling and rivalry-ridden organization as the United Nations.

"I now realize that some people regard me as a person with a soft leadership," he said. "But I have been telling them that while I may look soft and have a sense of humility and speak in a restrained manner, this should not be regarded as a lack of determination or commitment."

"Some people have a different aspect," he said. "They speak loud and have a more flamboyant attitude. But I think I have my own charisma."

Mr. Ban has a master's degree from the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard, was assigned twice to the South Korean Embassy in Washington and is a former director general of American affairs for South Korea's Foreign Ministry.

He has the firm backing of the Bush administration and is known as an ally of Washington. If he gets the job, that part of his political makeup will be closely monitored at the United Nations, where tensions between the United States and the developing world have been on the rise.

"I have many friends in the United States, and I think this can be a great asset for me instead of a point of concern for others," he said. "The countries in the third world, in Africa, the Middle East, Southeast Asia and Latin America, they know that I am their close friend, too."

Mr. Annan steps down Dec. 31 after two five-year terms. Under United Nations procedures for choosing a secretary general, the Security Council selects one name and sends it to the 192-member General Assembly for ratification.

Six of the seven candidates are Asian, in keeping with the unwritten but accepted notion at the United Nations that this year it is Asia's turn to occupy the top job. The last Asian secretary general was U Thant of Burma, who left office in 1971.

In the informal polls, the 15 members of the Council have been asked to mark one of three boxes — "encourage," "discourage" or "no opinion" — after each candidate's name.

Mr. Ban's latest total actually decreased by a vote compared with the tally from the previous secret poll on Sept. 14, because one positive shifted to no opinion. But his lead widened over his closest challenger, Shashi Tharoor, 50, the under secretary general for public information, who saw his support diminish to 8 favorable votes from 10.

Vaira Vike-Freiberga, 68, the president of Latvia, a new entry and the only woman under consideration, polled seven favorable votes. The other new candidate, Ashraf Ghani, 57, a former finance minister of Afghanistan and the current chancellor of Kabul University, managed to attract only three.

Surakiart Sathirathai, 47, deputy prime minister of Thailand, saw his positives fall to five from nine. Both Prince Zeid Raad Zeid al-Hussein, 42, Jordan's ambassador to the United Nations, and Jayantha Dhanapala, 67, of Sri Lanka, a former under secretary general for disarmament, drew only three positive votes.

S Korean Foreign Minister UN Frontrunner (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, September 29, 2006

Ban Ki-moon, South Korea's foreign minister, on Thursday increased his lead over other six declared candidates in the race to become the next secretary general of the United Nations.

Mr Ban - considered the frontrunner to succeed Kofi Annan - received 13 votes in favour, one against and one of no opinion. He did slightly worse than in the last straw poll, where he won 14 votes in favour and one against.

Shashi Tharoor, the Indian candidate, dropped significantly with only eight votes in favour and three against. Vaira Vike-Freiberga, the Latvian president, won seven encouragements but six against. Surakiart Sathirathai, the Thai candidate, dipped to five votes in favour. All the other candidates won 3 apiece.

Ahead of Thursday's straw poll Mr Ban hit the right notes without offending any powerful countries, and promised reforms people want without specifying any of the tough decisions that would entail.

DOJ_NMG_0071059

"It is rather sensitive for me as one of the candidates to go into any specific personnel management issues," Mr Ban told the Financial Times in an interview that revealed a reluctance to move much beyond assurances of personal competence, and the need to rise to new challenges.

On the other hand, he displayed a growing mastery of UN vocabulary. Phrases such as "ownership", "gender mainstreaming", "equitable geographical distribution" and, of course, "the common good of the international community", peppered his replies. That said, the word "genocide" appeared to elude him – with regards to Darfur and Rwanda – although he did call for "bolder measures" to ensure events like the 1994 "massacre" in central Africa were not repeated.

On nuclear proliferation – an issue with which he has some personal experience – he noted that "on certain cases, specific cases, I know that the secretary-general may have limitations. This is a fact of life", he said. Nevertheless, "the secretary-general as a chief international diplomat of the world body should play an impartial, but very skilful and astute diplomatic facilitator and mediating role".

Some UN insiders are asking if deals are being made to safeguard the current leadership's interests. Mr Ban declined to say whom he would appoint as deputy secretary-general. But he did say: "I intend to delegate a significant amount of day-to-day management," while he as secretary-general would "more visibly" be involved in resolving conflicts.

His experience in reforming South Korea's foreign ministry may, as he claims, go some way to helping him do that. But the UN is another place altogether; and this softly spoken controversy-avoiding politician may be in for a shock.

South Korean Favored For Annan's Post (AP)

By Nick Wadhams

AP, September 28, 2006

South Korea's foreign minister kept his spot as the favorite in the race to succeed U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan in an informal poll Thursday, the only one among the seven candidates to get the needed majority of votes.

Ban Ki-Moon received 13 votes in favor, one against and one of no opinion, China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya said. He slipped slightly from the previous poll, held Sept. 14, when he received 14 votes in favor and one against.

Despite that dominating lead, the secrecy of the ballot meant no one knows whether he got the necessary approval of all five veto-wielding members of the council. The ballot is also difficult to interpret: The results could give Ban the momentum he needs to win or clear the field for more people to enter the race.

The 15 council nations checked one of three boxes for each candidate: "Encourage," "discourage," and "no opinion." None of the six other candidates even got the necessary nine favorable votes to make their campaigns viable.

As with the previous two polls, Shashi Tharoor, the Indian U.N. undersecretary-general, was second, with eight council members in favor, three against and four undecided. Latvia's President Vaira Vike-Freiberga was third with seven in favor, six against and two undecided.

Thailand's Deputy Prime Minister Surakiart Sathirathai, who was the first to announce his candidacy last year, received five favorable votes and seven against, worse than last time and likely the result of a coup back home.

The other three candidates — former U.N. disarmament chief Jayantha Dhanapala, Jordan's U.N. Ambassador Prince Zeid al Hussein and former Afghan Finance Minister Ashraf Ghani — received only three votes in favor.

So far there was no indication that anyone would drop out of the race. Thailand's U.N. ambassador, Laxanachantorn Laohaphan, said Surakiart would not withdraw, and Ghani said in an interview that his campaign would continue.

"In the past, there have been all kinds of indications from the council that have not proven right," Ghani told The AP. "One cannot read the council from the outside."

Diplomats generally agree that the next secretary-general should come from Asia because of a tradition that the post rotate among regions of the world. The last Asian secretary-general was Burma's U Thant, who served from 1961-71.

Annan steps down on Dec. 31, when his second five-year term expires. Diplomats have said they want the race wrapped up by the end of October so the next secretary-general can have time to prepare for the job.

In the next straw poll, set for Monday, the five veto-wielding members of the council will use different colored ballots than the other 10. A veto from one of the five — Britain, China, France, Russia or the United States — could doom their campaigns.

DOJ_NMG_0071060

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said he would have preferred the colored ballots Thursday.

"We should have had a differentiated ballot today," Bolton said in a statement. "I look forward to a real vote on Monday, when we'll have two different colored ballots.

Bangladesh's U.N. Ambassador Iftekhar Chowdhury said he attended a speech Ban gave on Wednesday and approved.

"He came out quite good — mature, balanced, and with the right amount of experience, gravitas, the qualities that you seek in a secretary-general," Chowdhury said. "We think he'll make an excellent secretary-general, of course."

Senate Shies Away From Vote On Bolton (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, September 29, 2006

John R. Bolton's quest for a longer lease on his temporary job as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations remained elusive Thursday as the Senate shied away from a vote to confirm him.

Sen. Richard Lugar, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, said the Senate likely would recess later this week without voting on his nomination. Lugar, R-Ind., said in an interview with The Associated Press that no committee meeting had been scheduled to take up the controversial nominee.

The Senate is expected to return after the congressional elections in November. Bolton has been serving as the U.S. ambassador to the U.N. under a recess appointment that is due to expire at the end of the year.

Lugar said that if one Democratic senator were to step forward and support Bolton, he might be able to set a committee vote before the recess. In the meantime, Lugar added, Sen. Lincoln Chafee, a Rhode Island Republican, is holding up the nomination with questions about the Bush administration's Middle East policy.

Chafee wants "some clarification" of the U.S. policy on Israel's expansion of settlements, his spokesman Stephen Hourahan told the AP. He wrote Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Sept. 7, two days after 690 housing permits were issued, and did not get a reply that was satisfactory, Hourahan said.

Chafee, who is chairman of the Senate Mideast subcommittee, is not opposed to the settlements if they are part of an overall agreement between Israel and the Palestinians, Hourahan said.

As a result, Lugar said, "it appears very likely the committee will not act" on Bolton's nomination before recess at the end of the week. "Most probably not," Lugar said.

Earlier in the month, the committee unexpectedly postponed a vote on confirming Bolton as U.N. ambassador when Chafee, who was in a tough Republican primary fight at home, said he had more questions.

The committee had been expected to vote along party lines to approve Bolton, whom Bush appointed temporarily to the post last year over opposition by Democrats and a few Republicans.

Chafee won the primary against a conservative GOP challenger.

Chafee's opponent in the primary, Cranston Mayor Steve Laffey, chastised the senator at the time, saying, "Once again, Senator Chafee has demonstrated how indecisive he is on the critical issues."

Republicans control the Foreign Relations Committee by 10-8. A tie vote is not enough to advance a nomination to the full Senate.

Bolton's Post Left In Limbo (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, September 29, 2006

The deadlocked Senate Foreign Relations Committee will not take up the confirmation vote for combative U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton before Congress adjourns this weekend for the fall elections, committee officials confirmed yesterday.

But Mr. Bolton, whose recess appointment to the post expires soon, may get one last chance to save his job in a widely expected lame-duck session after the November elections.

"We have no more business meetings set and the time has just about run out," said committee spokesman Andy Fisher.

DOJ_NMG_0071061

Mr. Bolton, the State Department's arms control chief in Mr. Bush's first term, has been lauded by conservatives for his frank criticisms of U.N. inefficiency and his defense of U.S. foreign policy interests in New York. Critics say his blunt style has alienated potential allies and has set back the cause of U.N. reform.

Facing a fierce confirmation fight in the Senate, President Bush in August 2005 put Mr. Bolton in the U.N. post while the Senate was in recess. Under the Constitution, Mr. Bolton's term will expire when the 109th Congress wraps up at the end of the year.

Committee Chairman Richard G. Lugar, Indiana Republican, told the Associated Press yesterday that Sen. Lincoln Chafee, Rhode Island Republican, remains a holdout on the nomination. The liberal Mr. Chafee, who faces a tough re-election fight in November, has said he would not vote on Mr. Bolton until the administration addressed his concerns about general policy in the Middle East.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has personally lobbied Mr. Chafee in a bid to get Mr. Bolton confirmed. Mr. Chafee's office did not return a phone call seeking comment yesterday.

Supporters say the nomination still can be taken up at a postelection Senate session.

Whether Mr. Bolton's chances improve in the lame-duck session may depend heavily on the outcome of congressional elections, Senate aides said.

The foreign relations panel deadlocked earlier this year when Sen. George V. Voinovich, Ohio Republican, joined the committee's eight Democrats in opposing confirmation, producing a 9-9 tie. Mr. Voinovich has said he will now support the nomination, but then Mr. Chafee balked.

Mr. Bolton's supporters have privately floated several scenarios that could allow him to stay at his post. In one, Mr. Bolton could be named political deputy to the U.N. ambassador -- bypassing the need for a Senate confirmation vote -- and serve as acting ambassador at the lower pay grade.

A study by Congressional Research Service analyst Henry B. Hogue said the Constitution does not flatly bar a second recess appointment by Mr. Bush.

But such an action could offend senators jealous of their prerogative to approve executive nominees. Mr. Hogue said it was likely, based on recent practice, that Mr. Bolton would not be able to draw a salary in a second recess appointment.

Call To Overhaul Security Council Heard (AP-Y)

By Nick Wadhams

AP, September 28, 2006

Amid the vitriol and accusations, leaders at this year's General Assembly meeting sounded the same note: The U.N. Security Council doesn't represent our interests anymore, and it must be reshaped to reflect the world of 2006, not 1945, the year it was created.

The demand was not new, but the insistence was. Reform of the Security Council had been given up for dead last year, suffocated by bitter national rivalries and a refusal to compromise. But with this year's General Assembly session, it's been resurrected.

Many speakers in the General Assembly suggested a new anger toward the council had fueled their call. The Security Council took more than a month to respond to the war between Israel and Hezbollah, a delay that was largely blamed on the United States.

Iran was also dragged before the council under European and American urging, though many poor nations don't share their concern about its suspect nuclear program.

"The Security Council has not only to be more representative but also to be more effective if it is to be able to satisfactorily perform the role mandated to it by the charter," Indian Defense Minister Pranab Mukherjee told the Assembly debate.

Modernizing the Security Council was a key element of a reform package unveiled by U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan in the spring of 2005. Months of jockeying, negotiations, deals and promises ultimately came to nothing, the work stymied by national rivalries and bickering.

DOJ_NMG_0071062

But an increased feeling among poor nations that their wealthy neighbors dominate the Security Council has galvanized them.

Their anger has gotten so bad that many speakers warned the council could losing its authority. The body already has enough trouble getting nations to listen to its demands, and it risks slipping toward irrelevancy without change.

That could be to the detriment of President Bush, who has routed many of his biggest foreign policy initiatives through the council recently, after circumventing it in his first term.

"My argument is that the Security Council is losing legitimacy and that should be of concern to us," said Lee Feinstein, a U.N. expert at the Council on Foreign Relations.

According to a U.N. official who studied the themes of the debate, Security Council reform was the third-most discussed issue of this year's General Assembly, underscoring its importance. It trailed only terrorism and the Millennium Development Goals.

"It just seems to be a topic of active debate and discussion again — that this cat has another life," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of his reluctance to speak on behalf of member states.

At the center of the issue is that the 15-nation council represents the dynamics of 1945, when it was created, not 2006. There is resentment that its five permanent members — Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States — wield so much power, mostly because the five can veto any measure they don't like.

And there is resentment that nations and regions that have risen in power and importance in the last 60 years aren't among them — such as India, Japan, Brazil or any African nation.

Almost everyone agrees that reform is necessary, but they can't agree how to do it.

"Reforming the United Nations has always been a top priority for the United States," said U.S. mission spokesman Richard Grenell. "As part of that reform, having the Security Council reflect the realities of today has always been an important priority as well."

It seems extremely unlikely the five permanent members will either agree to add more veto-wielding members or abandon their own vetoes. That means the best anyone can hope for is that the council would be expanded — possibly to about 25 members — but without any new permanent ones.

The renewed calls for change have been accompanied by what appears to be a new predilection toward compromise among those who have pushed for reform.

The attitude was evident at a dinner meeting attended by more than 130 of the U.N.'s 192 member states that was held to discuss overcoming the impasse between the most serious proposals for council reform.

Unlike in the past, representatives of both sides were there. That included Germany and Japan, who are seeking permanent seats along with Brazil and India, and a group called "Uniting for Consensus," which wants to expand the number of non-permanent seats.

"Let's hope that before the end of this session of the General Assembly, we will succeed in turning the page, engaging in a negotiating process that we never had in more than 10 years of fruitless debates," Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi said.

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, September 29, 2006

China policy shift

The Bush administration's China policy is shifting noticeably to the left through several key appointments. First, President Bush announced Sept. 1 he was permanently appointing National Security Council staffer Dennis Wilder, a longtime CIA analyst with a record of leading mistaken analyses on China, as the senior director of East Asian affairs. Mr. Wilder had been acting senior director.

In another politically suspect move, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., the former Goldman Sachs executive, recently appointed Deborah Lehr as the lead staffer in charge of the new "economic strategic dialogue" with China. Mr. Paulson has been dubbed China's man in the Bush Cabinet by columnist Frank Gaffney because of his pro-China stance.

DOJ_NMG_0071063

The White House announcement on her appointment described Miss Lehr as a well-known China specialist but failed to mention that she will be leaving the consulting firm of Clinton administration National Security Adviser Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger to take the new Treasury post.

Mr. Berger, now head of Stonebridge International, was the architect of the disastrous Clinton administration China policy that gave us Chinese missiles with improved accuracy based on illegally transferred U.S. space technology, not to mention Chinese government payoffs to the 1996 Clinton re-election bid. Mr. Berger also pleaded guilty last year in his mishandling of classified documents from the National Archives.

"It is the most outrageous mistake by White House personnel I have ever seen," one administration official said. "She used to be at [the U.S. Trade Representative's Office] in charge of getting China into the [World Trade Organization], so she is a perfect panda hugger."

She also has worked at the National Security Council and was involved in export-control and trade-policy issues at the Commerce Department.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said in an e-mail that Mr. Bush makes China policy and that it is markedly different from President Clinton's.

Doonesbury

Liberal cartoonist Garry Trudeau, creator of the syndicated Doonesbury strip, is a constant critic of conservatives and President Bush, especially in the war on Islamist terrorists. The Pentagon is a fairly conservative place. One would guess Mr. Bush would get 70 percent of the vote, or more.

But there was Mr. Trudeau at lunchtime Tuesday, sitting at a desk along the Pentagon shopping concourse, signing copies of his new book, "The War Within."

The book is a sequel to "The Long Road Home." It continues the chronicles of war veteran B.D., a longtime Doonesbury character who loses a leg fighting in the war. The book tells the story of B.D.'s struggle to re-enter American society. Mr. Trudeau is donating book proceeds to Fisher House, the network of homes-away-from-home for wounded troops receiving medical treatment and their families.

Troop facts

The Army is putting out a "fact sheet" to help reporters understand its wartime troop commitments.

Among the facts:

•The Army has 105,000 soldiers in Iraq, 15,000 in Kuwait and 16,000 in Afghanistan. The Army National Guard has 55,327 soldiers mobilized; the Reserve has 32,286.

•Units in the combat rotation cycle spend 14 months at home before deploying again for one year.

•There are 499,000 soldiers on active duty. Congress has authorized the Army 482,400 active-duty troops. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has OK'd a temporary increase up to 512,000.

"The bottom line is the U.S. Army is the best Army in the world," the statement says. "It is the best manned, trained and equipped force fielded in over a decade."

Some retired generals say the force is near the breaking point because of frequent deployments and lack of equipment for stateside troops to train.

Skeptical press

Afghan President Hamid Karzai, addressing Washington reporters this week on the premise that attacking terrorists begets more terrorists:

"Ma'am ... terrorism was hurting us way before Iraq or September 11. The president mentioned some examples of it. These extremist forces were killing people in Afghanistan and around for years: closing schools; burning mosques; killing children; uprooting vineyards with vine trees, grapes hanging on them; forcing populations to poverty and misery.

"They came to America on September 11th, but they were attacking you before September 11 in other parts of the world. We are a witness in Afghanistan as to what they are and how they can hurt. You were a witness in New York. Do you — do you forget people jumping off the 80th floor or 70th floor when the planes hit them? Can you imagine what it will be for a man or a woman to jump off that high?

DOJ_NMG_0071064

"Who did that? And where are they now? And how do we fight them? How do we get rid of them, other than going after them? Should we wait for them to come and kill us again?"

Growing terrorists

The fact that al Qaeda-linked groups are growing in numbers is not new. It was happening in the 1990s, before President Bush declared war on Islamist extremists.

A National Intelligence Estimate, completed in April, stated, "We ... assess that the global jihadist movement — which includes al Qaeda, affiliated and independent terrorist groups, and emerging networks and cells — is spreading and adapting to counterterrorism efforts."

The implication is that the war on terror is creating terrorists. Maybe it is. But the Clinton administration faced a similar trend in the 1990s.

Former Clinton national security aides Daniel Benjamin and Steven Simon wrote in their 2002 book, "The Age of Sacred Terror," of stopping terror plots in 1999.

"The sense of success was mingled with astonishment at how many groups were out there," they wrote. "The millennium experience had the further effect of leaving the counterterrorism community stunned at how many terrorists ... had turned up in the United States."

China Lets Currency Rise A Bit On Dollar (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher And Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

HONG KONG, Sept. 28 — It's been just days since Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. returned from China, but already the Chinese government has sharply stepped up the appreciation of its currency, allowing it to push through an important level against the dollar on Thursday for the first time.

The recent climb — less than a full percentage point since the beginning of September — is still modest and perhaps will not last. But it is producing cautious hope in the Bush administration that the Chinese government may be lifting its opposition to a revaluation that could ease China's huge trade surplus with the United States.

And partly in response to the currency lift in China, two influential senators in Washington announced Thursday that they were pulling back legislation that would punish China with tariffs if it did not allow the value of its currency to rise, a step that would make exports to the United States more expensive and imports from America more competitive.

Though modest, the rise this month in the value of China's currency, the yuan, has been at a rate more than four times the currency's appreciation for most of the past year.

On Thursday, China's government let the yuan push through 7.9 to the dollar, the latest in a series of daily highs that for the last two weeks has proceeded at an annualized rate of 17 percent.

The White House and Mr. Paulson had vigorously opposed the measure by Charles E. Schumer, a New York Democrat, and Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, arguing that putting pressure on the Chinese would backfire. The administration also argued that imposing tariffs as the bill contemplated would violate international rules. Mr. Paulson called for the bill to be pulled back after he returned from China last Friday.

Mr. Schumer said Thursday that he and Mr. Graham would work with other senators to write a bill for submission next year that would press the Chinese but not do anything that might contravene rules of the World Trade Organization.

"There's a view in both the administration and in Congress that our legislation and the Paulson visit to China has given an impetus for the Chinese to move," he said in an interview. "Our bill was an admittedly blunt instrument. We have decided that it has run its course and that it is time to move to another approach that complies with the W.T.O." Analysts disagreed on Thursday whether the Chinese action was significant, a harbinger of a trend or a feint that could be reversed easily.

The strengthening of the currency in September, at an annualized rate of 10 percent, compares with an annual appreciation of less than 2.5 percent for most of the year after China's small revaluation in July 2005.

"The reality is they're moving at a faster pace," said Jonathan Anderson, the chief Asia economist at UBS. Others said the pace was likely to be temporary.

DOJ_NMG_0071065

"The Chinese are doing this as a gesture of good will," said Tao Dong, the chief Asia economist at Credit Suisse, while adding that he expected the pace of appreciation to settle down soon to about 5 percent a year.

Beijing's leaders have long bridled at foreign criticism, prompting some China watchers to suggest that quiet diplomacy, rather than confrontation, may be more productive in bringing about an appreciation of the yuan.

Mr. Paulson accumulated decades of experience in dealing with China while at Goldman Sachs, where he served as president before resigning last summer to become Treasury chief. He has pursued a much more low-key approach this summer than his predecessors or American lawmakers, preferring to raise the currency issue in private with Chinese leaders.

Bush administration officials and many analysts cautioned against enthusiasm that the currency appreciation will continue. In the past, the currency has sometimes risen slightly only to fall back again later.

"We're not crowing over this," said an administration official, asking not to be identified because the administration policy is not to comment on these matters.

"If you look back over the last year, there is reason for caution," the official added. "Does this represent a change? Or does it mean that the Chinese are letting us feel good about the Paulson trip and then planning to go back to what they were doing."

Nicholas Lardy, a senior China analyst at the International Institute of Economics, said it was too soon to say whether China had embarked on a trend toward revaluation.

"Extrapolation on the basis of a trend like this is a dangerous business," Mr. Lardy said. "It could be a good will gesture for Paulson. But if there's little more net change over the next six months, people will say that the Chinese are just taking us in again."

Just two weeks ago, before the World Bank and International Monetary Fund annual meetings in Singapore, Chinese officials had repeated their longstanding promises to let the market start playing a greater role in the currency's value, without giving any indication of a timetable.

This month, Mr. Paulson met with top Chinese leaders and established a "strategic economic dialogue" between senior officials in the United States and China to discuss a range of economic issues, including currency. Mr. Paulson said the dialogue would be aimed at enlisting broad support among Chinese leaders to push for economic changes in a variety of areas, including currency policy.

Mr. Paulson said he was encouraged by his meetings with various officials, including President Hu Jintao, but he cautioned against expecting quick results. Nevertheless, the slight increase in China's currency has prompted speculation that the Chinese wanted to reward him.

The yuan's rise also comes at a time when the Chinese economy seems to have settled down to sustained but controlled economic growth. That may make Chinese officials more prepared to experiment a little more with the value of the yuan.

After signs emerged last spring of possible overheating in investment, China's central bank raised interest rates and tightened bank reserve requirements, among other measures. The moves, like a halt to projects that had started without the central government's permission, have helped temper growth.

The official New China News Agency reported on Thursday that Xu Yifan, the deputy director of the National Bureau of Statistics, had predicted the Chinese economy would grow about 10 percent this year for the third year in a row.

Year-over-year growth had jumped to 11.3 percent in the second quarter.

"The various measures that were taken have worked, they've taken some of the steam out," said Michael R. P. Smith, the president and chief executive of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, which encompasses almost all of the Asian operations of HSBC.

Overall economic growth continues in China at a pace that any other country would love to match, Mr. Smith said in an interview on Wednesday afternoon, adding that the Chinese economy "is galloping, but it's in control."

The exception is the trade surplus, which is soaring and has set records for four months in a row through August. "The one big problem sticking out in China like a thumb, like a five-ton thumb, is the trade surplus," Mr. Anderson said.

The People's Bank of China, the country's central bank, said when it revalued the currency by 2.1 percent in July last year that it would start setting the value of the yuan based on a basket of foreign currencies, and would no longer peg it just to the dollar.

DOJ_NMG_0071066

But in practice, the central bank has allowed the yuan to appreciate at a fairly steady but very gradual pace against the dollar; statistical analyses of changes in the yuan's value have shown almost no correlation to currencies other than the dollar. The yuan rose 0.07 percent in Shanghai trading on Thursday to trade at 7.8965 dollars at 5:30 p.m.

To prevent the currency from appreciating more rapidly, the central bank has bought dollars and sold yuan on a large scale. It has accumulated the world's largest foreign exchange reserves, which are on track to reach $1 trillion in the coming weeks.

Senators End Plans To Vote For Tariff On Chinese Goods (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Key senators dropped plans for a vote this week on legislation to impose a hefty tariff on Chinese-made goods because of Beijing's currency policies, and will work to keep pressure on China through other means.

The decision by Sens. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) and Lindsey Graham, (R., S.C.), brings to a close a dispute in Congress about China's currency-management practices, and avoids action the Bush administration had worried might weaken Washington's standing as a free-trade leader.

The measure at issue would have slapped a 27.5% tariff on Chinese goods if Beijing didn't take steps to loosen control of its currency, the yuan. The senators instead said they will coordinate with leaders of the Senate Finance Committee on new legislation designed to put trade pressure on China. Critics say Beijing keeps the yuan's value artificially low to make Chinese goods relatively cheap in world markets, giving Chinese companies an unfair competitive edge.

Yesterday's announcement came two days after Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson urged the lawmakers to give the Chinese more time to adopt economic changes, and after President Bush appealed personally to Mr. Graham to show flexibility.

"I'm convinced the administration is committed to a strategy that will require China to reform its currency manipulation practices," Mr. Graham said.

A Treasury spokeswoman welcomed "the decision to not consider the bill" and said the department "looks forward to working hard on a range of issues through the strategic economic dialogue."

On a visit to China, Mr. Paulson launched a high-level dialogue that will focus on easing the many flash points in the Sino-U.S. economic relationship, including U.S. currency concerns.

Leaders of the Senate Finance Committee, the starting point for trade legislation in the chamber, have for months argued against the Schumer-Graham legislation. Instead, Chairman Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) and Montana Sen. Max Baucus, the panel's top-ranking Democrat, have called for more modest action to address currency concerns. Among other things, they have backed legislation that would direct the Treasury Department to use U.S. leverage at the International Monetary Fund to resolve currency imbalances.

The senators vowed new legislation in the first few months of 2007, after the next Congress is seated. Mr. Grassley said its focus would address China and other nations that manipulate their currencies unfairly.

Bill For Tariffs Against China Dropped (AP-Y)

By Foster Klug

AP, September 28, 2006

Two senators said Thursday they will abandon legislation that would have hit Chinese goods with steep tariffs but promised to renew efforts next year. Their goal is to pressure Beijing to change currency policies they say cost millions of U.S. jobs.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., said he and Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., were asked by President Bush on Thursday to scrap this week's vote on the bill. The measure would have imposed a 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese products coming into the United States unless China went further to revalue its currency.

Graham said the president urged more time for Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to persuade China to allow the yuan to strengthen against the dollar. Critics say China's currency is undervalued by up to 40 percent, making Chinese goods cheaper for American consumers and U.S. products more expensive in China.

DOJ_NMG_0071067

"The hope is to have a constructive dialogue with the Chinese where reform will move forward without legislation," Graham said. But, he added, "the jury is still out" about China's currency policies.

Schumer said senators are discussing legislation that would seek to pressure China to live up to commitments it made when joining the World Trade Organization in 2001. He said such a measure could be considered next year.

Many analysts believed the senators' bill would have passed. But there was no House version and Bush almost certainly would have vetoed it.

Chinese leaders have said they plan eventually to let the yuan trade freely on world markets, but that doing so immediately would cause financial turmoil and damage the Chinese economy.

China's Spending For Research Outpaces The U.S. (WSJ)

By Gautam Naik

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

An unprecedented surge in research and development spending is helping China catch up with the two longstanding leaders in the field, the U.S. and Japan, a new study found.

R&D spending in China has been growing at an annual rate of about 17%, and is far higher than the 4% to 5% annual growth rates reported for the U.S., Japan and the European Union over the past dozen years. China's massive investments in education are also bearing fruit. In 2002, its industrial-research work force was 42% the size of the equivalent U.S. work force, up from 16% in 1991.

China is increasingly making its mark with scientific discoveries and patents held by its scientists. In 2003 China became only the third country, after the U.S. and Russia, to put a person into orbit on its own. Yesterday, Michael Griffin, administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, returned to the U.S. after a visit to China -- the first time a NASA administrator has visited that country -- to explore and expand space-program cooperation.

"China's significant investment in R&D is predicated on the assumption that they want to be a player and competitor both economically and militarily," said Jules Duga, senior analyst at Battelle Memorial Institute, a nonprofit trust in Columbus, Ohio, that runs labs for the government and industry.

The study, co-written by Mr. Duga, was conducted by Battelle and R&D Magazine and is being published today. The study included in its measure expenditures such as scientists' salaries and lab equipment in both the public and private sector, but excluded long-term capital expenditures such as buildings and major equipment.

China's technology-driven rise could heighten worries that the U.S. is ceding some of its competitive edge in science and technology to Asia's new power. America's share of total global R&D is estimated to slip slightly to 31.9% in 2007 from 32.7% last year, according to the study. Japan and Europe are projected to show similar declines, while China's share of global R&D is set to increase to 14.8% in 2007 from 12.7% in 2005.

But the U.S. remains an R&D powerhouse, investing $320 billion in such efforts last year, compared with $236 billion invested by the EU and $125 billion by Japan. Though China's R&D spending now makes up about 1.6% of its gross domestic product, up from about 1% five years ago -- it's still a far cry from the 2.6% of GDP that the U.S. invests, and the 3.2% of GDP that Japan invests.

In the last few years, the increase in U.S. R&D investment has been driven by military-related research. Roughly 60% of America's research and development originates from the private sector. In a ranking of the top five R&D-spending companies, four are American, including Pfizer Inc., Ford Motor Co., Microsoft Corp. and General Motors Corp. The other is Toyota Motor Corp. of Japan.

American firms also make the biggest biotechnology investments, according to the Battelle report. One spur: a continuing decline in the number of new drug approvals by large pharmaceutical companies.

Despite the shifting R&D landscape, "there's no need for the U.S. to panic," said Mr. Duga. Instead, he said, "the U.S. needs to be prepared for a change. We need to figure out how we can keep ourselves in a strong position" in crucial areas of science and technology. His prescription: Spend more on math and science education, and invest more in pure research, which U.S. industry increasingly has shunned.

DOJ_NMG_0071068

China's Crackdown Puts Teeth Into Effort To Cool Property Boom (WSJ)

By James T. Areddy

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

SHANGHAI, China -- China's central government said it has dispatched senior inspectors nationwide to check whether local authorities are following through on orders to cool real-estate prices, the latest development in Shanghai's widening pension and property scandal.

On Thursday, the State Council, China's highest administrative body, sent "high-level officials" from several ministries to 11 provinces to review adherence by local governments to various policies Beijing has set down since 2003, the official Xinhua News Agency said.

Despite the central government's efforts to cool housing prices, values have continued to soar as much as 20% annually in some places, according to Xinhua.

The latest inspection is further indication that the government's investigation into corruption is continuing, even after this week's ouster of Shanghai Party Secretary Chen Liangyu. The Construction Ministry sent six property inspectors to Shanghai after his dismissal was announced Monday.

Also on Thursday, Sun Luyi, secretary-general of the party's Shanghai Municipal Committee, became at least the eighth person detained for questioning on what a government spokesman said is suspicion of "a severe breach of discipline."

Real estate is increasingly central to the two-month investigation, which centers on a misuse of Shanghai's $1.2 billion pension fund. The fund invested, perhaps illegally, in a number of high-profile projects that likely served to inflate land prices at a time when authorities in Beijing were urging local officials to keep real estate affordable.

Chinese President Hu Jintao may also be using the pension probe to strengthen his grip on Shanghai, a major city that has traditionally been run by officials aligned with retired President Jiang Zemin.

The downfall of Mr. Chen and the ongoing probes have boosted hopes for changes in government and prompted unusually large public protests outside some official Shanghai offices this week by people trying to have various complaints addressed.

The problems in Shanghai have sparked a nationwide audit of pension funds, which are often managed by local banks and brokerages but are thought to have widely invested beyond the legal scope. Shanghai Pudong Development Bank Co. and China Everbright Bank say they are among those that have managed Shanghai's money.

A Hong Kong real-estate builder, Shui On Land Ltd., this week detailed how it was pledged nearly $190 million from the Shanghai pension fund to a build a big project in the city.

Shui On said one of its subsidiaries had drawn 875 million yuan ($111 million) of a 1.5 billion yuan loan facility to finance its "Shanghai Knowledge and Innovation Community" project, an 840,000 square meter technology-development zone near Shanghai universities that company materials say is designed to be a local version of California's Silicon Valley. The money originated at an enterprise investment company owned by the pension fund but was actually lent via Shanghai Pudong Development Bank, Shui On said.

Shui On, which is known for its development of a Shanghai entertainment zone called Xintiandi, had confirmed some aspects of the arrangement in response to questions earlier in September from The Wall Street Journal. The extra details were contained in a prospectus related to its plans for an initial public offering in Hong Kong.

Analysts say the $790 million equity sale will succeed, but the stock could suffer when it is listed Oct. 4.

Shui On said in the prospectus that its lawyers believe the borrowing arrangement involving the pension money was "legal, valid and binding" but also warned investors that the company or its officials may "become involved" in the investigation, and that the Knowledge project "may face unpredictable consequences." The company said it is now negotiating alternative sources of financing for the project.

U.S. Financier Helps A Chairman Shake China Inc. (WSJ)

By Jason Dean

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0071069

BEIJING -- Zhang Chunjiang, the chairman of China Netcom Group Corp. (Hong Kong) Ltd., was moving quickly through a routine board meeting of the state-controlled phone giant last year when something extraordinary happened: a director disagreed with him.

The conflict came over a plan for Netcom to buy some assets from its parent company. Netcom management had picked an investment bank to advise on the plan. That drew a dissent from director John Thornton, a former president of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., who said a board committee set up to oversee the deal should pick the banker.

"This was the first time I'd ever encountered opposition," says Mr. Zhang, a 48-year-old former government vice minister. "But we had made a real mistake." He scrapped his selection and let the committee decide.

Walking a tightrope: Zhang Chunjiang, chairman of China Netcom Group Corp. (Hong Kong) Ltd., is trying to keep the Communist Party in control of his company while respecting the rights of foreign investors.

As boardroom dramas go, this one was modest. (The committee went on to choose the same investment bank.) But it helped trigger one of China's most ambitious corporate-governance overhauls. At Netcom, outside directors now have effective veto power over many key decisions, providing a counterbalance to the government's previously unchecked authority. That's a first in the government's empire of companies in banking, oil and many other industries.

At Goldman, the 52-year-old Mr. Thornton helped shepherd some of China's first big overseas initial public offerings, including China Mobile Ltd. and PetroChina Co. Today, three and a half years after leaving Goldman, he spends five months a year in China -- teaching at prestigious Tsinghua University, advising government officials and executives, and serving on boards.

As he promotes Western-style governance notions in China, Mr. Thornton faces a business culture in transition. The government, run by the Communist Party, still controls a vast swath of the economy and has no intention of giving that up -- particularly in strategic industries such as telecommunications. The government owns 75% of China Netcom.

However, policy makers also believe that Chinese companies will perform better if they are exposed to the demands of international investors, just as companies in the West are. That is why Beijing has encouraged its biggest and best companies to list their shares in New York, Hong Kong and London, even though the companies usually don't have an immediate need for funds.

The tightrope Messrs. Zhang and Thornton are trying to walk: Keep the Communist Party in control, but respect the rights of the foreigners who now own a chunk of corporate China.

Another big IPO is coming as early as next month, when Industrial & Commercial Bank of China, the nation's largest lender, is preparing to list its shares in Hong Kong. The offering is expected to raise at least $19 billion, which would be the most of any IPO in history. Mr. Thornton is also on the bank's board.

Until now, China has taken pains to prevent global investors from having their way with prized Chinese companies. The state usually retains more than 60% of the shares in any listed company. While financial reports tell investors something about institutions that used to be black boxes, boards of directors have had no real power. That is reserved for Communist Party committees comprised of a handful of senior executives. In 2004, just before Netcom's listing, the government suddenly swapped top executives at China's big four telecom companies. Boards were presented with a fait accompli.

"There are many listed companies now, and they all have the form of modern corporations," says Qian Yingyi, a leading Chinese expert on corporate governance and a director at Netcom. "But the question is whether those systems work. The answer is, in most cases, no."

Netcom's Mr. Zhang is hoping to change that. Outside directors at Netcom outnumber directors who work for the company. Rules drafted with the help of McKinsey & Co. require that two-thirds of directors approve major decisions. Directors say that would make a repeat of the 2004 executive swapfest difficult unless the board consents.

Netcom, which has annual revenue of about $11 billion, was formed in 2001 from 10 provincial phone networks that were separated from China Telecom Corp., the government's former phone monopoly. The move was intended to spur competition, but it left Netcom far behind China Telecom, which owns networks in about 20 provinces including many of the wealthiest ones. These two companies, with their core in fixed-line services, face challenges from two companies focusing on mobile phones, in particular market leader China Mobile, the world's biggest wireless carrier by number of subscribers.

DOJ_NMG_0071070

Cellphone use is surging so fast in China that many of the nation's more than 400 million wireless users never had a traditional phone. Netcom may get a license to offer advanced wireless services, but to tackle that market will require huge capital outlays and a major shift in management and technology.

Mr. Zhang says Netcom's vulnerabilities made him more open to new ideas -- including the idea of appealing to investors for support. "Of China's four big telecom companies, we are the one with the biggest difficulties," he says. "So under those circumstances, we thought, what can we do to make people feel confident about investing in Netcom?...We wanted to develop a corporate-governance system that could let investors relax."

A longtime Communist Party member, the 48-year-old was born in China's industrial northeast, trained as an engineer and worked most of his life in government. He rose to the level of vice minister in the agency that regulates China's telecom industry before being appointed to head Netcom's parent in May 2003.

Mr. Zhang's modest origins and bureaucratic experience made for a sharp contrast with Mr. Thornton. He's a product of Harvard by way of Connecticut's elite Hotchkiss School, where he briefly overlapped with the young Bill Ford Jr., now Ford Motor Co.'s chairman. Mr. Thornton spent 23 years at Goldman, including stints in Europe and Asia, and rose to be the investment bank's second-in-command.

In 2003, he jumped off the fast track and started a global leadership program at Tsinghua. He hand-picks the roughly 50 students in his management course and invites luminaries such as the head of Wal-Mart Stores Inc. to help teach it. Mr. Thornton also sits on the boards of several big U.S. companies that do business in China, including Ford and Intel Corp. In Washington, he serves as chairman of the Brookings Institution, a leading think tank, and sometimes advises government leaders on China affairs.

"What I know for certain is that whatever I do with the rest of my life, China will be a central element," Mr. Thornton said in an interview.

Messrs. Zhang and Thornton call each other friends although they share no common language. Mr. Thornton, who doesn't speak Mandarin, participates in meetings with a translator.

In mid-2004 Mr. Thornton was introduced to Mr. Zhang by Edward Tian, Netcom's founding chief executive. The U.S.-trained Mr. Tian was one of the few private-sector entrepreneurs to take a top post at a big Chinese state company. Messrs. Zhang and Thornton had breakfast at the Grand Hyatt in downtown Beijing, where Mr. Thornton lives when he's in town.

Mr. Zhang wasted no time offering the American a spot on Netcom's board. Mr. Thornton accepted and made a proposal of his own: Netcom should have a corporate-governance committee on its board. Mr. Zhang immediately agreed and asked Mr. Thornton to head it. Netcom also recruited as an outside director Mr. Qian, the governance expert who teaches at the University of California, Berkeley. Seven of Netcom's 13 directors are outsiders, compared with four of 13 at China Mobile.

Netcom, which went public in Hong Kong and New York in 2004 has annual revenue of about $11 billion. It remains far behind market leader China Telecom, the government's former phone monopoly, and faces challenges from cellphone-centered companies.

After Netcom went public in November 2004 on the Hong Kong and New York stock exchanges, the first big question on corporate governance came the next August, when Mr. Thornton raised his objection over how the asset acquisition was proceeding. Lawyers at the meeting noted that it was legal for management to pick an investment bank itself. Mr. Thornton agreed but said that wouldn't follow best practice in corporate governance.

"It was a seemingly small incident that touched off something much bigger," Mr. Zhang recalls. "It made me think about how we could set up a corporate-governance structure that would put the capital markets at ease."

Netcom hired McKinsey and a Tsinghua expert and asked them to suggest an overhaul of the board's operations -- but not before Mr. Zhang delivered a little talk on how China Inc. really works. At the first meeting of the project's working group, Mr. Zhang explained the role of the Communist Party committee at Netcom. Such committees, usually headed by the chairman and staffed with handpicked executives, essentially run China's government-controlled companies, channeling state policy into corporate practice. Their role is little understood outside China. U.S. regulatory filings by Chinese state-owned companies generally don't mention the party committees.

DOJ_NMG_0071071

"I am Netcom's party secretary. What is my responsibility? To make sure that the direction of our Communist Party is upheld within China Netcom," Mr. Zhang says in an interview. He argues that such influence isn't inherently inimical to shareholder interests, because the party is looking at the company's broader social and economic impact.

Having taken several huge Chinese state-owned companies public at Goldman in the late 1990s, Mr. Thornton was already far more familiar with how they were run than most outsiders. But even he found Mr. Zhang's lecture eye-opening. "There were six functions for which the party committee was responsible, and they were the ones that mattered," he recalls.

McKinsey's consultants knew that merely importing a U.S. playbook wouldn't pass muster. Chinese companies need "something other than a Wall Street model, something that acknowledges that they have other obligations, social obligations. It's a broader set of stakeholders," says Dominic Barton, chairman of Asia-Pacific for McKinsey.

The working group's driving idea was to have the government exercise its authority as majority shareholder and minimize arbitrary actions taken by the party apparatus outside the corporate structure. For months, McKinsey consultants interviewed directors and executives, sat in on board meetings and tried to figure out how to push change without setting off political bombs. The debate was sometimes heated, people involved say.

One meeting among people from McKinsey and Netcom took place in the office of the company's current Communist Party committee, adorned with a painted collage of socialist luminaries from Marx to Mao. "Let's just stop and enjoy this moment," remarked an amused Netcom official, according to people who were present.

As the work went on, the relationship between Messrs. Zhang and Thornton deepened. Mr. Thornton invited Mr. Zhang to speak to his class at Tsinghua. In May, Mr. Zhang traveled to New York at Mr. Thornton's suggestion to meet with investors and governance experts including Roderick Hills, a former chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission and veteran of many U.S. boards. Mr. Zhang "wants to set a pattern for China," says Mr. Hills. "He recognizes that the latent control of the government is a potential problem for investors."

Mr. Zhang was back this week in New York, where he met with Mr. Thornton and discussed a possible plan to have a U.S. company that specializes in rating corporate governance review Netcom's performance.

In June, Netcom's advisers presented their recommendations, which the board is now implementing. Among them: more-regular evaluations of senior executives by the board and rules to ensure that directors have enough time and information to review key decisions.

The effort has also prompted the board to get more involved in the company's long-term challenges. Until the overhaul, the board's corporate-strategy committee had met only once. This year, it has met at least three times to discuss challenges such as managing communications for the 2008 Olympics in Beijing.

Netcom is 75% owned by its parent, which is in turn wholly owned by a government body called the State-Owned Assets Supervision and Administration Commission. The commission is reviewing Netcom's proposed changes. People familiar with the matter say the commission views Netcom as a test case whose model could eventually be applied to other companies.

Mr. Zhang stresses that the state has legitimate interests in its companies. But he says limiting the state's interference in management -- and giving boards more autonomy -- is crucial to making companies more flexible and competitive. "China's companies are trying to catch up with the world's leading companies," he says. "Governance isn't the only important factor. But you have to have it. If you don't have a modern governance system, you can't compete."

Europe Union Weary From Growing Pains (CSM)

By Mark Rice-Oxley

The Christian Science Monitor, September 29, 2006

LONDON

When Britain threw open its doors to workers from Eastern Europe two years ago, plumbers like Keith Millar didn't know what to expect. Official projections anticipated a few thousand pioneers would take advantage of their new status as EU members and seek new lives in Britain, a drop in the ocean for a work force of 30 million.

In reality, more than half a million came, two thirds of them from Poland - and many of those tradesmen like Mr. Millar.

DOJ_NMG_0071072

"It's not a level playing field any more," he says, grumbling about the cheap Polish workers muscling in on his business. "I'll do a boiler estimate for a client and they say they'll think about it. Then I go back a few weeks later and find they've had the boiler installed. These Poles are hardworking and they do the job for half the price."

Millar's concerns are symptomatic of a deep fatigue in Europe with the idea of expansion. Old notions of uniting Europe in one large happy bloc and spreading peace, prosperity, and stability to all four corners of the continent are getting lost in more gritty concerns: Will poorer eastern members dilute the wealth of "old Europe"? Will a Lithuanian welder come and take my job? Is the EU club getting too big, unwieldy - unmanageable even?

This week, the EU gave the green light to Bulgaria and Romania to join in January 2007, expanding the union to 27 countries and nearly 500 million people. But it did so in almost grudging fashion, setting strict conditions for membership and allowing curbs on migrant workers from the two countries. So far, only Finland says it will welcome Bulgarian and Romanian migrant workers.

At the same time, the EU's top Eurocrat, Jose Manuel Barroso, signaled that it may be time to draw breath before bringing any more countries into the EU. "We are not in a position to further integrate Europe without further institutional reform," he said. "There are limits to our absorption capacity."

The EU has come a long way since it started out as a trade agreement between six Western European countries in 1957. By 1982, there were 12 members, 15 a decade later, and suddenly 25 when 10 new countries, mostly Eastern European, joined in 2004.

But the new wave has met with skepticism, an "enlargement fatigue" that is at its weariest in Central European countries like Germany and Austria that adjoin the new EU countries of the East and fear that issues like migration and poverty will upset their delicate social and economic balance.

In countries of "Old Europe," where unemployment remains a stubborn problem, authorities struggle to find work for their own work force, without the additional problems of migrant workers undercutting locals.

And yet, argues Denis MacShane, a British MP who once served as Europe minister, this fatigue is as much about globalization as about enlargement. Migrant workers are still going to flock to wealthy countries, whether they are EU citizens or not (there are already a million Romanians in Italy for example, before the country has joined). Jobs, factories, production lines will migrate to cheaper locations, regardless of EU membership.

"Keeping them out of the EU doesn't solve any of these problems," says Mr. MacShane. "You don't stop people coming, you don't stop the pernicious influence of trafficking and corruption and crime.

"But bringing [new countries] in [to the EU] means they are under pressure to try and improve their game," he adds. In other words, by pushing new members to improve in the regulatory arenas of human rights, health, and worker safety, EU membership will eventually level the playing field for businesses and workers across the continent.

In Britain moreover, it is arguable that the migrant influx - described by one academic as the largest wave of immigration the British Isles have ever experienced - has transformed the country in a good way. Employers have generally found the workmanship of the new arrivals reliable and cost-efficient. And for customers, there is no longer a shortage of handymen, so there is greater choice and better value.

"Our customers are happy," says self-employed Polish builder Marek Flaszka. "We are cheaper, but we give the same guarantees."

Yet Britain has decided that with Bulgaria and Romania it will not allow free access. There is a sense that in some parts of the country, the post-2004 immigration surge has led to imbalances, overcrowding, and serious pressure on local authorities. Some schools have reported that suddenly a quarter of their pupils are Polish.

Even immigrants like Mr Flaszka are unsure if a further influx is a good idea. "England is not so big for everybody in the world to come here," he says. "This is a problem if lots more builders come. The price will go down."

It remains to be seen if these doubts will ultimately lead to drawing up the bridge or just drawing breath.

Some European thinkers say that in the future, new entrants might get different types of members, that some European countries will be "more equal than others."

DOJ_NMG_0071073

Katinka Barysch, an expert with the Centre for European Reform in London says that "inevitably you will have different forms of membership." She notes that some countries are moving closer together on justice and policing, others are bound in the single currency, and still others collaborate on regional foreign policy concerns.

"It will be a more flexible and fuzzy EU and that will make it easier to join," she says. "You won't have to take the whole package straight away."

Poland's Budget Underscores Divisions Among New EU Members (WSJ)

By Joellen Perry

The Wall Street Journal, September 29, 2006

Capping more than a week of political turmoil, Poland's central-bank chief lambasted the government's draft 2007 budget -- which projects a deficit -- as one of "irresponsibility and populism."

The incident highlights mounting tensions among reform-minded central-bank chiefs and populist politicians across the eight Central and Eastern European countries that entered the European Union in 2004.

Slovakia's central bank has criticized the government of newly elected populist Prime Minister Robert Fico, who has said he wants to slow the pace of privatization and give the state more control of utilities and banks. The central bank worries those steps would result in fiscal deficits that endanger the country's 2009 goal for adopting the euro currency. EU member nations must have deficits of less than 3% of GDP in order to adopt the common currency, used by 12 nations.

Meanwhile, the National Bank of Hungary was a vocal critic of that government's fiscal profligacy long before riots broke out there last week following the prime minister's broadcast admission that he had lied about the dire state of the economy and the budget deficit to help secure re-election this spring. In a report on the eight EU newcomers released Wednesday, the World Bank warned of the dangers of rising populism and a backlash against the measures implemented to foster the transition to market economies.

"There is clearly a fairly large group of people who have not benefited much from the reforms and transformations of the last 15 years, and that provides fertile ground for more-populist forces," said Thomas Laursen, the World Bank's lead economist for Central Europe and the Baltic states. He noted that fiscal balances are deteriorating in several countries this year and that 2007 budget plans signal further erosion.

Poland's 2007 budget -- which according to the World Bank forecasts a deficit of 42.5 billion zlotys ($13.6 billion), or about 3.7% of gross domestic product -- avoids spending cuts wanted by the Finance Ministry. That frustrates central-bank expectations that the government would use strong economic expansion to press for further overhauls.

Noting that Poland's relatively sound currency and low inflation rate make fiscal erosion on Hungary's scale unlikely -- Hungary's deficit will be 10% of GDP this year -- central-bank President Leszek Balcerowicz, whose term expires in January, yesterday nonetheless called Poland's public finances "sick."

The clash caps more than a week of political chaos in the country, where elections could be held as soon as Nov. 26. Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski's government earlier this week encountered pressure following the leak of a tape to local media that showed a top aide asking an opposition lawmaker what she expected in return for supporting the government.

Last week the country's fractious ruling coalition collapsed when the prime minister fired his deputy, who had protested that the 2007 budget skimps on funding for agriculture, education and health. Now, roughly six seats short of a majority in the lower house of Parliament, the prime minister is scrambling for support.

The current government has clashed with the central bank before. Mr. Balcerowicz, who was Poland's finance minister in the 1990s and oversaw the country's transition to a market economy, is often heralded as the father of the country's recent economic success. Foreign-direct investment continues to roll in to the country. Yesterday, the bank projected GDP growth of 5% for next year, up from a previous projection of 4.8%.

Irked by Mr. Balcerowicz's support this year for the merger of two Polish banks owned by Italy's UniCredit SpA, the government recently established a financial regulator to oversee the banking, insurance and securities sectors. That prompted the European Central Bank to issue calls for central-bank independence.

DOJ_NMG_0071074

Last week Poland's constitutional court ruled that a separate parliamentary commission established to investigate central-bank activities is unconstitutional. Wednesday the central bank kept rates on hold at a low of 4%, but warned yesterday about the dangers of rising inflation rates as growth accelerates.

The World Bank's report Wednesday also warned about mounting inflation pressures across the region, which further endanger hopes of adopting the euro currency. The central banks of Slovakia, Hungary and the Czech Republic all raised interest rates this week.

U.N. Peacekeepers In Darfur Unlikely (AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou

AP, September 28, 2006

The U.N. chief in Sudan said Thursday the government is unlikely to let U.N. peacekeepers in the country anytime soon, and the international community should instead push for the African Union force to remain in the war-torn region indefinitely.

The comments came after Sudanese authorities and a Darfur rebel group that signed a peace agreement with the government clashed in an affluent neighborhood of Omdurman, a city across the river from Khartoum. The incident underscored the simmering tensions in the country.

A U.N. Security Council resolution calls for 20,000 peacekeepers to replace the ill-equipped and underfunded AU force that has done little to prevent escalating violence in Darfur. But Sudan's president fiercely rejects the U.N. mission, and it can't deploy without his consent.

"I don't expect the government to accept a U.N. transition any time soon," Jan Pronk, the U.N. chief envoy to Sudan, told The Associated Press. "The international community should instead push for the African Union's mission to be prolonged and reinforced."

He called for the AU force to be extended indefinitely to prevent jeopardizing humanitarian work in Darfur, where more than 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million displaced in three years of fighting.

At least 350,000 people are cut off from any aid in North Darfur because of the intensified fighting there, the U.N. said. At least another 100,000 people have fled their homes.

Pronk said he was confident the Sudanese government would allow the African troops to stay on in the region, though for now Khartoum only has agreed to keeping them an extra three months.

Pronk also urged the international community to guarantee more funds for the AU force. He said there were reports the AU force was so strapped for cash that some soldiers in Darfur were not being fed and patrols weren't going out because there was no gas for their armored vehicles.

The current 7,000-strong AU force was due to leave Darfur at the end of September but recently prolonged its mission until the end of the year. John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the U.N., called it a temporary measure while the international community pressures Sudan to allow troops into the country.

Earlier this week, Sudan's top official for Darfur said the government was willing to let a trickle of U.N. military advisers join the AU forces, describing it as "a third way" that could resolve the stand off between Khartoum and the United Nations.

Pronk said these discussions were now being settled and the first batch of 105 U.N. military advisers and dozens of police could be sent to Darfur "very soon." He hinted that their numbers could be increased "in a step by step process."

Meanwhile, the AU has pledged to boost its force by up to 4,000 troops. Some of the soldiers would be immediately available, but the AU says it doesn't have the cash to send them in.

The U.N. chief maintained that the peace agreement signed in May between the government and the rebel faction was "in a coma," which he said reflects the worsening humanitarian situation.

Both government forces and rebels have violated the cease-fire more than 70 times between May and August, and there were new violations in September after Khartoum launched a large-scale offensive in northern Darfur, Pronk said.

On Thursday, tensions degenerated into an open shootout in Omdurman, Khartoum's sister city. Rebel leaders with the Sudan Liberation Movement say they took three police officers hostage in retaliation for the arrests of two of their members.

DOJ_NMG_0071075

Pronk said one man was killed during the clashes. "That (the conflict) has now reached Khartoum is just another proof of how bad things are," he said.

Caucus Presses Rice On Darfur (MCT)

By William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, September 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Congressional Black Caucus urged the Bush administration Thursday to push China and moderate Arab nations to pressure Sudan into admitting a U.N. peacekeeping force to help end the violence and humanitarian crisis in its Darfur region.

The caucus made the suggestion to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice during a closed-door meeting on Capitol Hill. It came a day after Rice warned in a speech that Sudan faces "a choice between cooperation and confrontation" if it doesn't allow U.N. forces in.

Bush has called ending the three-year-old conflict, which the United States considers genocide, a priority for his administration.

Rep. Donald Payne, D-N.J., a caucus member, said the group told Rice that the administration could apply more pressure to nations with major business and cultural connections with Sudan, pointing to China, Egypt and Jordan.

Last year, Beijing purchased half of Sudan's oil exports, which covered only 5 percent of China's ravenous oil appetite, according to the Council on Foreign Relations. Chinese firms also are pouring billions of dollars into office and infrastructure projects in Sudan.

"Our feeling was there should be, whether it's quiet diplomacy, that the U.S. should tell China to tell (Sudanese President Omar Hassan) al-Bashir to stop what he is doing and stop putting out this so-called opposition to the United Nations coming," Payne said.

China is a veto-holding member of the U.N. Security Council, which passed a resolution calling for a U.N. peacekeeping force in Darfur to replace a 7,000-person African Union force there.

Bashir has rejected the resolution, and China historically has shied away from pressuring other nations through the Security Council.

The violence began when Darfur's African tribal villagers armed themselves against the Arab-dominated government in Khartoum in a fight for greater political rights. Human-rights groups estimate that as many as 450,000 people have been killed and another 2 million displaced by the violence.

White House officials thought they had achieved a breakthrough last May when the U.S. brokered a peace accord between Sudan's government, which has supported Arab militias known as the janjaweed, and the rebels. But the agreement has failed to take hold.

The White House has been imploring the U.N. to get peacekeepers into Darfur. Last week Bush named Andrew S. Natsios, a former head of the U.S. Agency for International Development, as a special presidential envoy to Sudan.

Rice painted a bleak picture of the situation in a speech Wednesday to the Africa Society.

"At this moment ... the government of Sudan has renewed its military offensive against the rebels, which is undermining the Darfur Peace Agreement, as well as our collective humanitarian efforts," she said. "Because of the current lack of security, humanitarian aid workers are unable to reach hundreds of thousands of people in the camps. Without food, and water, and other assistance in the coming months, all will suffer, and many could die."

Susan E. Rice, former assistant secretary of state for African affairs under President Clinton, said the world was rapidly approaching a "Kosovo moment" in Darfur.

"If we're serious about saving lives in Africa, as we are in Europe, we'd give the Sudanese government a short, time-limited ultimatum: Accept a U.N. force or face military action, perhaps airstrikes like in Kosovo."

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow hinted last week that there might be movement on Darfur. "There are behind-the-scenes, ongoing diplomatic efforts," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0071076

Payne said he was confident that the White House would prevail. "The U.N. will be in Sudan by the end of the year. Period," he said.

Meanwhile, the 43-member Congressional Black Caucus is pursing its own diplomacy. Caucus members met Tuesday with China's U.S. ambassador, and with Arab League representatives Thursday.

"We believe that the Arab League can have an influence on the government of Sudan - as a matter of fact, all the influence in the world," Payne said. "We're saying to moderate Arab countries - Egypt, Jordan - that they can't sit by and allow the government of Sudan, where they have excellent relations with, to continue the killing."

